Thus intrigue, cabal, and corruption, the degradation of the Executive into a "mere creature" of the legislature, the usurpation and absorption by Congress of all the powers of the Government, legislative despotism, legislative tyranny, the subversion and destruction of the fundamental principles and forms of the Constitution, and consequent revolution, were the disastrous consequences apprehended by the ruling minds of the convention—by Gerry, and Wilson, and Butler; by Morris, and Pinckney, and Madison; by George Washington, &c.—from a subordination of the Executive to the legislature through the appointment of the President by Congress, or by either House of Congress; from the exercise primarily of any influence over the appointment. These apprehensions and the reasonings by which they were so ably supported prevailed.

On July 19 Mr. Wilson said:

It seems to be the unanimous sense that the executive should not be appointed by the legislature, [Congress,] unless he be rendered ineligible a second time. He perceived with pleasure that the idea was gaining ground of an election, mediately or immediately, by the people.—Ibid., page 337.

On July 25 Mr. Dickinson said:

As far as he could judge from the discussions which had taken place during his attendance, insuperable objections lay against an election of the executive by the national legislature, as also by the legislatures or executives of the States. He had long leaned toward an election by the people, which he regarded as the best and purest source. Objections, he was aware, lay against this mode, but not so great as against the other modes, &c.—Ibid., page 367.

On September 4 the committee of eleven, and evidently as a compromise between the several plans for an election by the people and by the State legislatures, reported "amendment 4," which provided for the appointment of president by electors to be chosen under the direction of the State legislatures, and embraced the clause relating to the reception of the electoral certificates by the President of the Senate and the counting of the electoral votes in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives.

What, then, was the manifest purpose of the convention, in article 2 of the Constitution, relating to the Executive? What is the only rational or common-sense construction of that article, and particularly of that clause respecting the counting of the electoral votes? Is it not manifest and plain? Is it not really indisputable? The convention had provided by article 1, section 6, that—

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either house during his continuance in office.

And by article 2, section 1, provided that in the election of the Executive—

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

Is it probable or possible, then, that having thus, in its great dread of legislative corruption, its anxiety to secure the absolute independence of the Executive as a check to legislative usurpation, invested the States with the appointment of the President, having thus inhibited all control or influence of Congress over his election, and excluded all interest of members of the legislature in executive patronage, the convention proposed by the clause (article 2, section 1) respecting the counting of the electoral votes to annul or abrogate, to overthrow and destroy, what it had effected only after so much difficulty and labor?

The clause as reported by the committee of eleven and amended by the convention, read:

The President of the Senate shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then and there be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The arrangement of its parts was subsequently altered by the committee on detail or style to the form in which they now stand in the Constitution—altered, in all probability, by Mr. Gouverneur Morris, who as a member of that committee was assigned by his colleagues the literary part of its preparation—by a man who, as I have shown, anticipated the most disastrous consequences to our institutions and liberties from a control by Congress over the appointment of President. Is it probable, then, or even possible, that the convention or Morris proposed by that clause to clothe Congress with the power now claimed for it to control or influence the election of President; to invest Congress with authority to enter the States and inquire into the manner in which they should execute a grave constitutional trust; to pass judicially upon the legality or illegality of the votes or qualifications of electors or the qualifications of candidates—in a word, to franchise or disfranchise States through the count or rejection of the votes of their electors, and thus endow it with the very powers, demoralizing and destructive, against which they had so earnestly fought; to introduce into Congress intrigue and cabal and corruption; to establish in the organic law the very agencies which they had denounced as pregnant with legislative despotism—legislative tyranny; to introduce into that instrument the very forces which they apprehended would inevitably subvert and destroy the institutions and liberties of the nation? Would not that have been the sheerest stultification?

And Kent and Story and the Federalist in reviewing the acts of the convention leading to the adoption of the Constitution, in analyzing the principles upon which they were founded, the motives which influenced their authors, and their utterances in the convention, also enlarge upon the dangers to be apprehended from the tendency of the legislature to usurp and absorb all "power within its impetuous vortex." They urge, in the language of the forty-seventh number of the Federalist:

The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex. * * * It is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions.

And what was the interpretation placed upon this clause by the men chosen by the people to put the new government into operation?

One of the resolutions adopted by the constitutional convention provided that as soon as nine States should ratify the constitution "the United States in Congress assembled" should fix a day for the appointment of electors to choose a President and a Vice-President of the United States; that Senators and Members should be elected and assemble, and that Senators should appoint a "President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President," &c. Accordingly, on April 6, 1789, a quorum of members-elect of the two Houses assembled. John Langdon, of Connecticut, was chosen President of the Senate. The Senate then—

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and a Vice-President of the United States, and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty, &c.

To discharge what duty? To count the votes of the electors in the presence of the House? Is that a function or duty of the Senate alone under any construction of the Constitution? If not, what was the duty it was ready to discharge? What did the House understand as that duty? In response to the notification of the Senate, the House, through Mr. Boudinot, one of its members, informed that body that it was "ready forthwith"—to do what? To attend or assist the Senate in counting the votes? No; but "to meet the Senate to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors"—that is, to unite or "attend" with the Senate the opening and counting of the votes by the President of the Senate, appointed for that sole purpose.

And Mr. Langdon, who had been a member of the convention which framed the Constitution, in his certificate notifying Washington of his election as President of the United States—a certificate drafted by a committee of four Senators, three of whom had also been members of the constitutional convention, and adopted by a Senate in whom were, besides those I have named, Strong of Massachusetts, Robert Morris of Pennsylvania, Few of Georgia, Bassett of Delaware, &c., also members of the constitutional convention, framers of the Constitution—in that certificate Mr. Langdon declares, not that he had, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, opened all the certificates, and the vote was then counted but that he—

The underwritten appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and a Vice-President, &c.

Again, at the second count, a joint committee of the two Houses, appointed "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their election," &c., made a report on February 11, 1793, fixing the time and place for the assemblage of the Senate and House, and providing for the appointment of tellers in the manual part of the count, which report was adopted by the two Houses. And that in the performance of a constitutional duty. What duty? To organize Congress into a grand canvassing board, with high judicial functions to revise the acts of the States in the appointment of electors, to inquire into the legality or illegality of votes, or the qualifications of electors or of candidates? What said the two Houses? The Senate, on February 13, in its proceedings, adopted the language of the House at the first count. It—

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate are ready to meet them in the Senate Chamber to attend the opening and counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, as the Constitution provides.

Not to count the votes—certainly not to transform the Congress into an arbitrary inquisitorial board to sit in judgment upon the act of the States, but simply in the performance of a purely ministerial duty "to attend," with the House, the opening and counting of the votes as the Constitution provides, by the Vice-President, or President of the Senate.

Again, at the third count, after similar proceedings and similar language in the resolutions and orders of the two Houses, John Adams, as Vice-President and President of the Senate, in notifying Thomas Jefferson of his election, declared not that he had in the presence of the Senate and House opened all the certificates and the votes were then counted, but that he—

The underwritten, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President, &c.

But at the fourth count of the electoral votes, or rather at the first session of the Sixth Congress, in anticipation of the count, in the extremities of a party, the ruling or dominant federalist faction in Congress, which, by its want of sympathy with the masses, by its distrust of the fitness of the people for self-government—its extraordinary and despotic attempts, through unconstitutional laws and methods, to dragoon the people and press into an approval and support of its tyrannical rule—had outraged and alienated a majority of the nation, had excited riot and bloodshed, and threatened to subvert the institutions and liberties of the Republic—in the extremities of that party a characteristic attempt was made by the federalist leaders in Congress to usurp the power of deciding the presidential election through a bill to "decide disputed elections of President and Vice-President." It was notoriously the last desperate intrigue of an expiring faction—a violent measure cooked up in their despair in a party caucus as a means of perpetuating their rule in the Government. I will as briefly as possible sketch its history, its text and purpose, and the crushing and lasting judgment upon it and its advocates by the people.

On January 23, 1800, Mr. Ross, of Pennsylvania, a leading federalist, moved:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider whether any, and what, provisions ought to be made by law for deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States, and for determining the legality or illegality of the votes given for those officers in the different States.—Annals of Congress, Sixth Congress, first session, column 29.

A motion was made to amend by adding, "and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise."

This motion was instantly antagonized by Mr. Brown, of Kentucky, a republican of the Jeffersonian school. In his opinion, it was "a subject on which Congress had no right to legislate." If the Constitution was "incomplete or defective" in the matter, it could only be remedied by an amendment to that instrument, not by a law of Congress.

Mr. Ross, the mover of the resolution, admitted that "the Constitution had certainly made no provision on the subject." But "suppose," he urged, "that persons should claim to be electors who had never been properly appointed;" "suppose they should vote for a person to be President who had not the age required by the Constitution, or who had not been long enough a citizen of the United States, or for two persons who were both citizens of the same State," "is there no remedy?" He thought a law of Congress was sufficient, and that it was their duty to pass it.

Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, a Jeffersonian republican, and a distinguished member of the convention which framed the Constitution, opposed the resolution. In his judgment, the proposed law was unconstitutional. He said:

It was a very dangerous practice to endeavor to amend the Constitution by making laws for the purpose. The Constitution was a sacred deposit put into their hands; they ought to take great care not to violate or destroy the essential provisions made by that instrument. He remembered very well that in the federal convention great care was used to provide for the election of the President of the United States independently of Congress—to take the business as far as possible out of their hands.

He urged that the President was to be chosen by electors, not by Congress; by electors appointed by the people or States, and that "the whole direction as to the manner of their appointment is given to the State legislatures."

Nothing—

He declared—

Nothing was more clear to him than that Congress had no right to meddle with it at all; as the whole [matter] was intrusted to the State legislatures, they must make provisions for all questions arising on the occasion.

But Mr. Samuel Dexter, of Massachusetts, the ablest of the federalist leaders in the Senate, had no doubt as to the right of Congress to make all necessary provisions on this subject. He urged that the proceedings in the election of a President may be defective in the particulars stated by Mr. Ross. Was there "no way to correct them?" The Constitution was "not silent" on the subject. Among the powers given to Congress is that of "passing all laws necessary and proper to carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States," &c. The proposed law was "necessary to carry into effect the power of appointing a President," and was therefore "clearly constitutional."

Mr. Baldwin, of Georgia, a republican of the Jeffersonian school, and one of the framers and signers of the Constitution, rejoined at considerable length. The Constitution provided that the President should be chosen, not by Congress, but by the States through electors appointed under the direction of the State Legislatures—a body "as respectable as Congress, and in whom the Constitution had more confidence than in Congress." All that related to "the elections, returns, and qualifications" were by the Constitution vested in the electoral colleges. "Shall these be taken away from that body and submitted to the superior decision of Congress without a particle of authority for it from the Constitution?" As to "the legality or constitutionality" of the proceedings of the electoral colleges—that is, "whether they vote for two persons both of their own State," whether "for a a person under thirty-five years of age or one who has not been fourteen years a citizen of the United States," and "the authentication of their own acts"—were matters under the Constitution wholly under the control of the colleges and the States. If the colleges performed or were guilty of any "unconstitutional or corrupt steps," it was at their peril, and was punishable by the States, to which only they were amenable. Congress had no control over them or their acts. The clause of the Constitution respecting "the power of Congress to pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers vested by that instrument in the Government of the United States, &c., had no application here. The appointment of a President, or the appointment or control of the electors in the choice of a President, was not a power vested by the Constitution in Congress, but in the States; nor could Congress acquire that power except through an amendment of the Constitution. All the power the Senate and House had in the matter, "when met together in one room," was to "receive the act of the electors as they would the act of any other constitutional branch of the Government, to judge only of its authentication," and to see that the votes were properly counted and declared.

The Ross resolution nevertheless passed. On January 28 a committee was appointed, and on February 14 it reported a bill "prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections for President and Vice-President." The principal provisions of this bill were—

Section 1: That on the day before the second Wednesday of any year when a President and Vice-President of the United States shall have been voted for by electors in the preceding December, the Senate and House of Representatives should each choose six members by ballot, and the twelve persons thus chosen, with the Chief-Justice or senior judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, should form "a grand committee," with power to examine and finally to decide all disputes relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Section 4: That the President of the Senate shall deliver to the chairman of the "grand committee" "all the certificates of electors," "all certificates or other documents transmitted by them or by the executive authority of any State, and all the petitions, exceptions, and memorials against the votes of electors," or "of the persons for whom they have voted, together with the testimony accompanying the same."

Section 5: That this grand committee shall meet, be sworn, and sit with closed doors.

Section 6: That the "grand committee" "shall have power to send for persons, papers, and records," "to compel the attendance of witnesses," "to administer oaths," "as fully and absolutely" as the Supreme Court of the United States, under "all the pains, penalties, and disabilities" of "willful and corrupt perjury."

Section 8: That the "grand committee shall have power to inquire, examine, decide, and report upon the constitutional qualifications of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President of the United States," "of electors appointed by the different States, and whether their appointment was authorized by the State Legislatures or not, [or made according to the mode prescribed by the Legislature;] upon all petitions and exceptions against corrupt, illegal conduct of the electors, or force, menaces, or improper means used to influence their votes, or against the truth of their returns, or the time, place, or manner of giving their votes."

Section 10: That the "grand committee" should report on the 1st day of March next after their appointment; that the report of a majority of the committee should be a final and conclusive determination of the admissibility or inadmissibility of the votes given by the electors, and that on the following day the Senate and House of Representatives should meet, ratify, and record the decree of the committee in its choice of a President, &c.

Very naturally the usurpations and principles of such a bill shocked the republican sentiment of the country—even excited the "abhorrence" of the republican leaders and press. In the Senate all efforts by amendments to destroy it failed. Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, "in defense of the just rights of the States," opposed it at great length and with much earnestness. He urged, the bill "is a serious invasion of some of the most important rights solemnly and explicity reserved by the Constitution to the State legislatures"—a bill "more alarming in its consequences than the alien and sedition laws." The fundamental principle of the Constitution, so zealously insisted on by the States, and incorporated in the amendments to the Constitution, was, that "all powers not specifically granted to Congress by the Constitution are reserved to the States or the people respectively." No power, specific or other, was given to Congress to control or influence, directly or indirectly, the appointment of the President. On the contrary, the power to choose that officer was specifically invested in electors under the direction of the States. Nor "is there a single word in the Constitution which can by the most tortured construction be extended to give Congress, or any branch or part of our Federal Government, a right to make [laws] or alter the State Legislatures' directions on this subject." The right in the States "is complete and conclusive," "subject to no control or revision," and designedly so "for the most unanswerable reasons." The grand object of the Constitution in the article respecting the Executive, was to make the President absolutely independent of the Legislature, and to make him through his appointment dependent upon the people. In framing the Constitution the convention proposed to invest the President with "the most important powers," with "the command of the Army and Navy," with "the disposal of all honors or offices of the Government," with the management of foreign affairs and the revision of the laws through his veto, as well as their administration. Was it to be supposed that they intended to make such an officer, clothed with such high and far-reaching powers, such vast patronage, dependent upon the Legislature by vesting in that body either his appointment or any control over his appointment, making him liable at the same time to its impeachment.

Speaking as a member of the constitutional convention of 1787, Mr. Pinckney declared:

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of a President * * * It never was intended nor could it have been safe, in the Constitution, to have given to Congress, thus assembled in convention, the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given. This right of determining on the manner in which the electors shall vote; the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting, and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in the State Legislatures. If it is necessary to have guards against improper elections of electors, and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State Legislatures, and with them alone, rests the power to institute them, and they must exercise it. To give to Congress, even when assembled in convention, a right to reject or admit the votes of States, would have been so gross and dangerous an absurdity as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of.—Annals of Congress, Sixth Congress, first session, page 130.

They knew that "unprincipled and designing men had existed" in all governments; that cabal and faction and corruption through foreign influence, "foreign gold," had tainted all publ'c bodies; "that around the seat of Congress would be placed all the open and accredited ministers as well as the secret emissaries of foreign powers;" that around it will assemble "the concealed leaders of domestic faction," and that "all the arts and intrigues that have been used in elective governments in the Old World would soon find their way among us."

All that was elaborately discussed in this convention, was a principal source of its most serious alarm, and gave rise to the question, "How was this election [of President] to be guarded to prevent, as far as human prudence could, improper domestic combinations, or, what is infinitely worse, foreign interference?"

It was a difficult problem. And the convention solved it in the Constitution by excluding Congress from all control, directly or indirectly, over the election of President by vesting his appointment in electors under the direction of State Legislatures, and inhibiting all members of Congress from being chosen as electors—in electors widely separated from and unknown to each other, and presumably from that fact incapable of collusion or intrigue, who were to assemble on the same day and vote by ballot for two persons, one of whom should not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves, and then to seal up and transmit their votes to the President of the Senate. Their vote was to remain unknown until opened in the presence of the Senate and House; and when opened and counted, if no one had a majority, then the House was to "immediately"—"instantly"—elect a President from the five highest candidates voted for.

Mr. Pinckney declared:

It is expected and required by the Constitution that the votes shall be secret and unknown until opened in the presence of both Houses. To suffer them to be known, as heretofore has been the practice, is unconstitutional and dangerous, and goes to defeat in some measure the wise provisions of that instrument in declaring that, when the House of Representatives are to elect, it shall be done immediately. The electors therefore ought never to divulge their votes. The votes being thus unknown, it would be impossible in most instances to say who were elected, or who had the five highest numbers on the list. The leaders of domestic intrigue and foreign emissaries would be at a loss how to direct their influence, and the election by the House of Representatives taking place immediately after the votes have been opened and counted, that body would go to the election free and uninfluenced, as they ought.

* * * * * * * *

If the election by the electors can be destroyed by any means, the Constitution gives to that House the election of the President; if, therefore, their favorite candidate has not the majority of votes, but comes so near that the rejecting a few of the rival's votes will prevent an election and bring it to their house, how easy is it for them to elect six members whose opinions they have previously known, and that Senator out of the three nominated by the Senate whom they can most depend upon, as fitted for their purpose, and with these to destroy the election, and assume to themselves the power of deciding who is to be your supreme executive.

* * * * * * *

Wisely foreseeing this, the Constitution expressly orders that the electors shall vote by ballot, and we all know that to vote by ballot is to vote secretly; that the votes shall be sealed up, and not opened until the day appointed by law, and that if no election has been made by the electors, an immediate one shall take place by the House of Representatives; that so far from appointing committees to receive memorials or petitions respecting the election, or decide upon it, or so far from having any right to delegate an authority on this subject, that Congress shall not themselves, even when in convention, have the smallest power to decide on a single vote—that they shall not have authority to adjourn for one moment, but that the House shall instantly and on the spot, in case of no election by the electors, proceed to the choice of a President, and not separate until it is determined.

But, said Mr. Pinckney, it is urged:

Are Congress bound to receive every vote of an elector whether it is constitutionally given or not? Suppose votes are sent for a person not a citizen or fourteen years a resident of the United States, or under thirty-five years of age, or that the Legislature of a State has not authorized by their act the votes of the electors, or that double returns are made, who are then to decide? Or has not Congress, under these circumstances, a power to determine which of the votes shall be received or rejected?

To these inquiries Mr. Pinckney replied, "that the Constitution supposes a mutual confidence between the Federal and State Governments." As the Constitution vests the appointment of electors in the States, and imposes upon the State Legislatures the responsibility of providing for the proper execution of this constitutional trust, it was to be presumed that they would honorably and efficiently perform that duty. That was the theory of the Constitution—the principle upon which article 2 was constructed. Hitherto the States had performed all the duties imposed on them by the Constitution, and, as Mr. Pinckney believed, would continue faithfully, and even jealously, to execute every constitutional trust. But if duplicate returns of electors were received, that return authenticated by the executive authority of the State was the act under the constitution of the State, and must be counted. Congress had no legal option in the matter. Or if any State, in any particular, should fail to efficiently guard against the possibilities urged, the neglect or error was in the State, and must be referred to and remedied by the State. The acts and votes of the electors of a State, authenticated by the executive authority of the State, were the acts and votes of the State. From them there was no appeal but to the State. Certainly none to Congress. The letter and spirit, the express provisions of the Constitution, inhibited Congress from all meddling in the matter. The Constitution, as its framers intended, makes the President wholly independent of Congress in his appointment, makes him "the man of the people," one "on whom they can depend," the champion of the people against legislative despotism; "not a fettered, dependent creature of the Legislature"—not a "production of little packed committees—a thing with a chain on his pen and a curb in his mouth," incapable of "writing or speaking, or even signing his name, but at the will of his creator." Hence the proposed bill, or any bill which clothed the two Houses with power to revise the acts of electors, to inquire into their qualifications, or to admit or reject their votes, was a violent invasion of the reserved rights of the States, an infraction of the Constitution, and its passage would be fraught with disaster to our institutions and liberties.

But little recked the federalist leaders. The fiat of their caucus had more obligatory force upon their consciences than had the provisions of the Constitution or the designs of its framers. Power, authority, domination in the Government, was their great ambition, and all agencies to that end, whether constitutional or not, were proper and just. The bill accordingly passed the Senate by a party vote, 16 federalists to 12 republicans.

In the House, as in the Senate, the whole weight of the republicans was opposed to the bill. They denounced it as unconstitutional, as an invasion of the rights of the States, and "expressed their abhorrence of its principles." With the aid of what the federalist organs denounced as "half federalists, half conciliation men," the republicans in the House succeeded in expunging from the bill some of its most odious features, modifying some of its sweeping usurpations, and returned the bill to the Senate. In that body the federalists were supreme. The amendments of the House were so amended as to destroy their effect and to practically restore to Congress the unconstitutional powers assumed in the original bill, and, both Houses refusing to recede, the bill was lost.

In this rapid review of the proceedings of the constitutional convention of 1787, relating to article 2 of the Constitution, and of the proceedings and construction of Congress respecting that article up to the fourth count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, I have labored to give a faithful exposition of its history and the purposes of its framers in adopting it, as well as of the constitutional doctrines and rules of construction which at that early period of our political history distinguished Jefferson and his disciples, of the men, the fathers and founders of the later democracy, like Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, Gouverneur Morris, John Langdon, and Charles Pinckney, Pierce Butler, Hugh Williamson, and Baldwin, Dickinson, Benjamin Franklin, and Elbridge Gerry, William Cary Nicholas, Peter Muhlenberg, Albert Gallatin, Nathaniel Macon, John Randolph, &c., able and brilliant men, framers and signers of the Constitution, or leaders of the republicans of the day, disciples of Jefferson, preaching the doctrine of "a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." I have labored to clearly describe the doctrines and rules of construction of the republicans of a period within the first decade of the new Government, only twelve years subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution by the people of the States, and when its principles and the purposes of its framers—the character of the Government which they had created—had been widely discussed by our ablest writers and jurists in the press as in the constitutional convention.

In these doctrines and principles and rules of construction the republicans were antagonized in Congress and the country by the federalists. In the constitutional convention of 1787 the men who, under the government of the Constitution, became the federalist leaders, doubting the fitness of the people for self-government, and dreading all popular forms as leading to anarchy, had sternly resisted their adoption in the Constitution—men like Alexander Hamilton, who labored for the establishment of an elective monarchy, the election of a president during good behavior—for life—a Polish monarchy, and who, according to Jefferson in his Anas, not merely favored a monarchy, but a monarchy based, like the English, on corruption, the very form of government so much dreaded by the republican leaders of the convention, and the form which would inevitably result from the control in any sense of Congress over the appointment of the Chief Magistrate of the nation—these men carried their doctrines and fears and distrust of the people into Congress, and attempted, by construction, by usurpation through a loose construction of the provisions and powers of the organic act, to fasten upon the people their favorite form of government.

Fortunately for the nation they failed. The bill of 1800 prescribing the mode of deciding disputed presidential elections was among their latest attempts in that direction. Fortunately for the nation and people, fortunately for mankind, it proved their latest opportunity in which to attempt the subversion of the republican principles which lie at the foundation of our Government and support its noble superstructure. Already their power was waning; already the fabric of their despotic rule was tottering to its fall. Nor were they blind to the signs of the times. Extraordinary measures like the alien and sedition laws, unconstitutional and despotic, if not tyrannical expedients adopted as a means of arresting and crushing out all republican sentiments or principles in the country, all had failed them, and thoroughly alarmed at the rapid growth of their republican opponents in popular strength and apprehending defeat in the impending presidential election, these federalist leaders, with characteristic audacity, resorted to this bill to decide disputed presidential elections, supported by the sedition law, as a means of wresting from the people their constitutional right of choosing a President, and of usurping that right through Congress.

It was so understood and denounced in the country. It was so arraigned and denounced by the republican leaders in Congress and before the people, by the "powerful triumvirate, Jefferson, McKean, and Monroe," and by the republican press, among others by an able and a leading republican organ of Philadelphia, the General Advertiser or Aurora. Side by side in the columns of the Annals of Congress with the Federalist resistance to the attempted repeal of the unconstitutional and infamous sedition law upon the motion of Mr. Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina; side by side with the debate on the bill

"prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President," are the proceedings of the Federalist in the Senate in prosecution of William Duane, the editor of the Aurora, for his strictures in that paper upon the disputed presidential election bill.

Thus the infamous alien and sedition laws and the bill "to decide disputed elections of President and Vice-President" sprang from the same parentage, had their origin in federalist intrigue, in the pursuit of power by the federalist leaders through unconstitutional agencies.

At the presidential election in the November following, the people, "the fountain of all power" and the arbiter of all political issues under our republican system, placed their seal of condemnation upon both these measures. The federalists were beaten. Jefferson and Burr, the republican candidates, had both majorities of the electoral colleges, but the same number of votes. Consequently, under the Constitution as it then read the election fell upon the House of Representatives. After a prolonged and doubtful struggle through seventeen days and thirty-six ballots, after a struggle which, extending to the country excited and exasperated the people and shocked the very foundations of the Republic, Jefferson was chosen "President." The federalists, as a party, were destroyed. Only fourteen electoral votes opposed Jefferson's re-election in 1808. Madison followed Jefferson in the presidential chair—was re-elected in spite of the burdens and losses and sufferings of a war with England, and against the strongest of the federalist leaders. Monroe succeeded Madison, and at his second election the federalists, as a party, disappeared forever from the theater of our national politics. The despotism and usurpations of their brief rule literally filled the people with abhorrence of their doctrines and measures, with their alien and sedition laws, their bills to decide disputed elections of President, and their Hartford conventions; and the title of federalist became a reproach and a stigma.

Jefferson, in his certificate declaring the election of Burr as Vice-President, declared that he—

> The underwritten Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes, &c.

And from the first count of the electoral votes, in 1787, to the tenth count, in 1825, all the different Vice-Presidents and Presidents of the Senate—John Langdon, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Aaron Burr, John Milledge, William H. Crawford, and John Gaillard—all jurists and statesmen distinguished for ability and learning, each in his respective certificate announcing the result of the count, successively declared that he, as Vice-President or President of the Senate, "did, in the presence of the Senate and House, open all the certificates and count all the votes." Did these declarations mean nothing? Is their truth questioned? Did these Presidents of the Senate, for thirty-six years, count the votes of electors? If they did so count the votes, is not the fact conclusive, as far as anything can be established by precedent, as to where resides the right and duty to count that vote, and as to the powers or duties of Congress in the matter?

In the campaign of 1824 all the presidential candidates were republicans—Jackson and Adams and Crawford and Clay. Again the electoral colleges failed to choose, and the election of President for the second time fell to the House of Representatives. Both Houses of Congress were largely republican. In both were active and devoted adherents of all the different candidates. Before the opening of the certificates in joint session the result of the election was known. Jackson had received 99 votes, Adams 84, Crawford 41, and Clay 37—making 131 necessary to a choice; and active and earnest were the friends of the several candidates to insure a majority of the States, each for his favorite.

The excitement ran high—intrigue was notorious. But did the violent federalist expedient of 1800 occur to any one in either House? Did any of those old republicans, those old champions of the rights of the people and States under the Constitution, propose to organize Congress into a quasi-inquisition with arbitrary powers to invade the States, and inquire into the manner in which they had executed a responsible constitutional trust? Did any dare propose a measure so unconstitutional and odious? Apparently the fate of the experiment of 1800 and the crushing judgment of the people upon it and its authors warned them to avoid all measures of that character. And manifestly regarding the issues respecting them settled by the uniform practices of the two Houses since the beginning of the Government, the vote was counted after the forms thus established, the result announced, and the House proceeded to ballot for a President. John Q. Adams was elected.

Instantly the adherents of Andrew Jackson were in arms. Jackson had received 99 votes, 15 more than Adams. They maintained that he was the choice of the people, and denounced his defeat and the election of Adams as the result of "barter and sale," of "bargain, corruption, and intrigue!" Here the present democracy organized under Jackson, and adopted as its cardinal principle undying hostility to elections of President by the House of Representatives—to all control or influence over his election by Congress. Thomas Hart Benton in the Senate, and Governor McDuffie, of South Carolina, in the House, moved for an amendment to the Constitution which would divest the latter body in every event of the power or duty to elect the Chief Magistrate. In the debate which followed in both Houses these motions were supported by the ablest and most distinguished of the democratic leaders—by Benton, Hayne of South Carolina, Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky, Martin Van Buren, James Buchanan, C. C. Cambreling, James K. Polk, J. S. Barbour, and others, and passed the House by a vote of yeas 138 to nays 52.

These gentlemen adopted the principles and language of the republicans of the constitutional convention of 1787 and of the early Congresses under the Constitution. With them they maintained that all experience demonstrates that the power lodged in the House to elect in a certain contingency is corrupt and corrupting; that it threatens the sovereignty of the nation in a probable defeat of the will of the people; that it frustrates the manifest design of the Constitution, which contemplates that in all cases a majority shall rule—the will of a majority legally expressed, without intrigue or force or fraud—in the choice of a President. They maintained that the President of the Constitution is a President of the people; that a "Congress President," a President elected by the House, was a political monster execrated by the people. Such a President was a menace to the liberties of the nation, and his "creation" a usurpation in Congress of the sovereignty of the people. Besides, the existence of such a power in the House destroys all the salutary provisions of the Constitution to insure the purity of the Government.

"Responsibility" is the very essence, the "vital principle" of our constitutional system. Upon it depends our "safety from anarchy and despotism." Hence, the danger of a participation of the House in the election of President. It destroys "that separation of the legislative from the executive indispensable to the effective responsibility of the latter." "What!" exclaims Governor McDuffie—

> What! a Congress President! Who makes him—"we, the people of the United States?" No, sir; we the servants of the people. A grade of workmen below the journeyman fixes him up; the master-hand is not in the work.

"Who is he responsible to"—to the people or Congress? Who but to those who made him? And what the inevitable result? Intrigue and faction, the opening wide of the flood-gates of corruption through the "barter and sale" of patronage. Congress, "instead of enforcing a very vigorous accountability against the President of its own creation," "instead of standing to the Executive in the relation of an independent and co-ordinate department, becomes the partisan of his power and the apologist of his transgressions."

These enlightened leaders and founders of the democracy urged that "the tide of corruption never flows backward." "Corrupt Congress and you assail liberty in the very seat of its vitality;" for corruption, not force, was the destroyer of all free governments. The participation of the House in the election of President necessarily degrades alike the Legislature and the Executive. In the language of Governor McDuffie—

> Instead of statesmen profoundly versed in the sublime art of rendering the Republic flourishing and happy, the members of this House will degenerate into mere managing politicians, trained in the little arts of intrigue, * * * engrossed exclusively in making Presidents.

Hence, Governor McDuffie looked upon the interference by the House in the election of President in any event with "perfect abhorrence." The abhorrence of James K. Polk was equally pronounced; and James Buchanan had even an amendment of his own for emancipating the Constitution and country of an abomination so monstrous; he would not tolerate it, nor would the people. He and they demanded that the constitutional clause conveying the power to the House be expunged. So, too, Van Buren declared "upon no point were the people so united;" and Richard M. Johnson "in vain expected to see a President elected by Congress hailed as the President of the nation." "In no event" would he vote to continue in the House a power so anti-democratic and vicious; and Mr. Benton "pledged himself to the Senate and the American people" to persevere in the movement "with all the energy he was master of."

Jackson, in 1828, was chosen President by the people. In the campaign which preceded his election the philippics of the democratic leaders against an election by the House, in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the press, upon the stump, and even in the pulpit, abounded with eloquence and fire. Jackson heartily indorsed their utterances. Hence, in every one of his eight annual messages to Congress he earnestly recommends the adoption of such an amendment to the Constitution as will sever forever the corrupt, corrupting, and dangerous connection of the House with the election of a President in every contingency. Thus hostility to an election of President by the House of Representatives, hostility to all control or influence over his election by Congress, was one of the earliest measures of the democracy. It lay at the foundation of the party, gave it life and its first victory in the election of Jackson. Nor did any party, prior to the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule, except the federalists in 1800, ever claim the power or attempt to exercise the power of revising the acts of the States in the appointment of electors, of inquiring into the qualifications or acts of the electors, of admitting or rejecting votes of the States, and thus of directly controlling the election of the Chief Magistrate.

As a matter of fact, the only objections to the count of a vote prior to the adoption of that rule (except that to the vote of Wisconsin in 1857, by which it was proposed to disfranchise a sovereign State through a technical legal fault involving neither fraud nor malpractice) were those by members of the House to Indiana in 1817, to Missouri in 1821, and to Michigan in 1837, on the ground in each case that the State at the date of the appointment of her electors was "not a State in the Union." It was an objection outside and independent of the matter of counting the votes. It did not assert any right in Congress to canvass or reject the votes of a bona fide State, but was a question under the Constitution properly subject to the decision of the two Houses in their legislative capacity. Hence, under the objection the question was, not whether if States their votes should be counted, but whether in the sense of the Constitution they were States. Only States can vote in the electoral colleges. If Indiana, Missouri, and Michigan were States their votes must be counted; if not States of course they had no right to vote. But whether they were States or not was a question distinct from and independent of that of counting the votes, and when raised could only be determined by the two Houses in their legislative capacity.

In the case of Missouri in 1821 the facts were: a heated and dangerous political struggle between the sections growing out of the slavery question had attended every step in her admission—even threatening the dissolution of the Union. Consequently the whole country was in a state of the greatest excitement—all parties sensitive upon every question touching the State. Under the circumstances, and as a means of avoiding all controversy at the counting of the votes, as the vote of the State would make no difference in the result of the count, Henry Clay, in the spirit of the compromise which he had effected in the settlement of the Missouri question, caused the adoption of a joint resolution which provided that while counting the votes of Missouri the announcement of the vote should be in a hypothetical form. But even that was assailed by the sagacious and brilliant John Randolph of Roanoke, one of the leaders and founders of the democracy, in a philippic as severe as just. He arraigned the House for a violation of the Constitution. He declared:

He could not consent to this special verdict. He could not recognize in that House or the other House, singly or conjointly, the power to decide on the votes of any State. Suppose you strike out Missouri and insert South Carolina, which also has a provision in its constitution repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, or Virginia, or Massachusetts, which had a test, he believed, in its constitution, was there any less power to decide on their votes than on those of Missouri? He maintained that the electoral college was as independent of Congress as Congress of them; and we have no right to judge of their proceedings. * * * Suppose a case in which some gentleman of one House or the other should choose to turn up his nose at the vote of some State and say that if it be so and so such a person is elected, and if it be so and so What-you-call-'em is elected, did not everybody see the absurdity of such a proposition? * * * He went back to first principles. * * * Your office in regard to the electoral vote is merely ministerial; it is to count the votes, and you undertake to reject votes. To what will this lead? * * * What was the theory of this Constitution? It is that this House, except upon a certain contingency, has nothing at all to do with the appointment of President and Vice-President of the United States, and when it does act, must act by States, and by States only can it act on this subject, unless it transcends the Constitution. * * * If you for the first time now receive the votes of a State, it will be created into a precedent, and that in the life-time of some of those who now hear me, for the manufacture of Presidents by this House.

Even after the votes had been counted and the result declared, hypothetically, as agreed upon, Mr. Randolph arraigned the announcement as a fraud upon the Constitution and an outrage upon the rights of the States. He introduced a resolution reciting the facts, and declaring the proceedings "irregular and illegal."

Do the democracy of this House now propose to reverse all this, to reverse the uniform practice of Congress up to the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule—to deliberately stultify its own record as a party? It claims Jefferson and the republicans of 1787 as the progenitors of its organization—as the founders of its party creed. For half a century prior to 1861 it denounced the federalists as "monarchists"—as guilty, in their measures and administration of the Government, of usurpation, of systematic violation of the Constitution through a loose or latitudinarian construction of its provisions, and of a systematic infraction of the constitutional liberties and rights of the people and States. They also arraigned the whig party as the natural successors of the federalists, denounced them as adopting the methods of construction and the measures of the federalists, and as being like them governed by the maxim that "the people were unfit for self-government, and consequently unsafe depositaries of political power." They also claimed to be the party of the people, the party of strict construction and States rights, as opposed to the theories of a strong consolidated Government maintained by their ancient enemies, the federalists, and their modern foes, the whigs.

Does the democratic majority of this House, by the passage of the joint resolutions now before it, propose to reverse all this, to abandon their ancient faith, the life-long theories of the democracy, the doctrines of the republican fathers of the Constitution and the republican founders of their party creed, the doctrines and principles of the celebrated Virginia and Kentucky resolution of 1799–1800, the doctrines and principles of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, of John Taylor of Caroline and Randolph of Roanoke, of Jackson, Van Buren, and Benton, of all the representative men of their party and faith since its origin? Do they thus propose to abandon the doctrine of strict construction, the championship of the States, to stigmatize the dogmas and principles for the maintenance of which they engaged in a terrible rebellion against the Government, destroying half a million of valuable lives and five thousand millions of treasure, and to take their stand upon ancient federal grounds?

The republicans of 1789, as the democracy subsequently up to 1861, all of their ablest jurists and distinguished men, denounced all interference by Congress with the rights of the people or States to appoint the President as unconstitutional, as an infraction of the rights of the people, a violent invasion of the rights of the States. They maintained that all control or influence of the Legislature over the appointment of President was corrupt and corrupting; that it would inevitably result in legislative despotism, and finally in the subversion of our institutions. They maintained that the framers of the Constitution never intended to invest Congress with any such control; that it invested that power in the State Legislatures, and inhibited and carefully guarded against its exercise by Congress; that Congress, consequently, under the Constitution, has no authority to inquire into the qualifications of electors or of candidates for President and Vice-President, or to canvass the votes of electors; that all regulations involving that power must be adopted by the States and exercised through or under them, and that all votes of electors, authenticated by the executive authority of the States, must be received and counted; that there was no authority in Congress to reject them or to entertain a contest respecting them.

Do the democratic majority of this House, notwithstanding, now propose, by the passage of these joint resolutions, to reverse these judgments, sustained as they were, again and again, by the people? I warn them that these positions challenge their gravest consideration.

Department of Agriculture.

SPEECH OF HON. H. L. MULDROW,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 7, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4909) for the creation of a Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MULDROW said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret that a temporary absence from the Hall while attending to business of importance to some of my constituents prevented me from speaking on the bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture to create a Secretary of Agriculture and to make him a Cabinet officer.

While my presence would not have changed the practical result so far as the vote and passage of the bill is concerned, yet it is my desire at all times to record myself as a friend of this measure, and I have greatly desired the enactment of this legislation.

It was my privilege to introduce the first bill in Congress for this purpose. I have never regretted it; but, on the contrary, I have every year since then seen in a greater degree the importance of encouraging the pursuit of agriculture and doing all that is possible to elevate it; and no more feasible plan has anywhere been suggested than giving it a voice in the executive branch of the Government.

The recognition of the rights of agriculture is demanded by its great importance, and not alone by this, but by every consideration of justice and good policy. It represents 50 per cent. of our population and about 30 per cent. of our property. The means now invested in agriculture is estimated at more than $12,000,000,000. Napoleon called it the body and soul of the Empire of France. It is that to America. It is the life of commerce, and it turns the wheels of manufactories. The anvil and forge, the workshop and the storehouse, are alike dependent on it.

In commerce it furnishes more than 80 per cent. of our exports. Cotton alone furnishes two hundred millions every year, or about one-third of our entire exports. But for cotton our foreign trade during the last four years would have been largely against us. It is a mockery to compare it with any other industry or interest in our land. It pays the greater part, either directly or indirectly, of the entire taxes of the country, both State and Federal. Our farmers pay to-day for the protection of manufactories five times as much as do those of Great Britain, four times as much as France, six times as much as those of Germany, and more even than those of monarchical Russia or Spain.

Yet with all these immense taxes to pay and with all this vast interest to protect, the Department of Agriculture, to foster this industry, has no voice in the suggestion of wise and wholesome laws in its own interest; nor has it the means of pointing out vicious legislation as to it that has been passed by Congress, and which should be vetoed by the President. There is the same warrant in the Constitution for the creation of the Cabinet position that there is for several that now exist. It is no reply to say that there is no express authority in the Federal Constitution for it until several that now exist have been abolished. The people are moving on this subject, and their power will be felt. They have sent their petitions here by thousands asking for the passage of this bill. Individually and through their organized bodies the farmers of the country demand it. Their petition is urgent and respectful, their demand is reasonable, and it is now only a question of time when their wishes shall be fulfilled.

Diabolism of Politics.

SPEECH OF HON. S. S. COX,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 27, 1881.

"Draw the curtain of night upon injuries; let them be as though they had not been. To forgive our enemies, yet hope God will punish them, is not to forgive enough; to forgive them ourselves, and not to pray God to forgive them, is a partial piece of charity. Forgive thine enemies totally, and without any reserve that however God will revenge thee.

"Let not the law of thy country be the non ultra of honesty, nor think that always good enough which the law will make good. Narrow not the law of charity, equity, mercy; join gospel righteousness with legal right; be not a mere Gamaliel in the faith, but let the Sermon on the Mount be thy targum (paraphrase) unto the law of Sinai.

"If thou hast not mercy for others, be not cruel unto thyself. To be too acute in our apprehensions is to add unto our tortures, to lash ourselves with the scorpion of our foes, and to resolve to sleep no more. While thou so hotly disclaimest the devil, be not guilty of diabolism. Fall not into one name with that unclean spirit, nor act his nature whom thou so much abhorrest, that is, to sinistrously interpret other's degenerous depravities and narrow-minded devices not only below Saint Paul's noble Christian but Aristotle's true gentleman. Look humbly upon thy virtues, and though thou art rich in some, think thyself poorer and naked without that crowning grace which thinketh no evil, which envieth not, which beareth, hopeth, believeth, endureth all things.

"The blessed spirits above rejoice at our happiness below, but to be glad at the evils of one another is beyond the malignity of hell."—Sir Thomas Browne.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the following bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Elizabeth P. Page, widow of the late Captain Hugh N. Page, the sum of $136.85, being the balance of pay due the said Hugh N. Page as captain in the United States Navy: Provided, Said payment shall not be made until the said Elizabeth P. Page files with the Secretary of the Treasury copies of her letters of administration, showing that she is the lawful representative of the said Hugh N. Page—

Mr. COX said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This little matter seems to have kindled on the other side a great deal of vindictive spirit. I am sorry for it. I had hoped that after the last Administration had signalized itself by some gentle tenders toward the South, after the present Administration had copied this policy in many kindly ways, and after General Garfield had been elected President and a new lease of power had been given to the republican party, there might have been some generous oblivion of the war; something better than this wrathful exhibition of its hatreds over this little claim of $136.85. Sir, is it not a mortification to the American people that now, twenty years after the war began, fifteen years after Appomattox, we are debating with bickering and provocation, and in a Christian land, about paying a small sum to an elderly widow, whose husband served with Commodore Perry at Put-in-Bay on the memorable 10th of September, 1813. For shame, gentlemen! Why, sir, is there to be no cessation of these unfraternal discussions?

While this debate was going on, while the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] was talking, I sent for Sir Thomas Browne's Urn Burial and Christian Morals for consolation and philosophy. Here are some of his quaint gems fit for our pondering:

They who calumniate the absent living will be apt to be loud enough in infamy of the dead; wherein there should be a civil amnesty and an oblivion concerning those who are in a state where all things are forgotten.

And then he admonishes us not to expect great matters where they are not to be found; and would not fail were he living to console us who are disposed to be kindly toward those who were in strife against us by such advice as I desire to place here for our remembrance:

Be not prodigal or prodigious in revenge; overdo not the necessities of evil; humor not the injustice of revenge; let its arrows fly short.

This volume is full of that wisdom which has its full and best significance, as applied to the distempered state, in the remark of the Bible: "Let not the sun go down upon thy wrath!" Sir Thomas goes further, and urges us not to let the sun in Capricorn go down upon our wrath; that the shortest time possible for its indulgence is the best. He teaches us in many pages how oblivion should be cultivated for great purposes; how little our names are worth after a few years, not to speak of centuries; and he warns us that there is no antidote against the opium of time, and that generations pass while even trees stand. He speaks of a class of men whom I once denominated in this House as "human hyenas." He describes them as those who "gnaw us out of our graves, who make our skulls drinking-bowls, and our bones into pipes, to delight and sport our enemies." He calls such "tragical abominations." So they are, sir; there is not a lofty, spiritual, or Christian idea connected with this class of men or this sort of debate. It has not an element of the spirit of forgiveness. There is nothing in it that belongs to Christian statesmanship, to genuine manhood, or historic chivalry. Debating these old and buried hatreds over a widow's claim for her dead husband's due is neither good nor great.

Gentlemen, even Turkey sets you a better example, as in the days when she protected Kossuth, the revolutionist, who found refuge in her borders. The republic of France strips you naked and makes you ashamed; for has she not bid even the communists come back into her midst, conscious of her power?

All the great publicists known to ancient and modern times have told you, as Montesquieu epitomized, that "it is advisable to exceed in lenity rather than in severity; to banish but few rather than many; and to leave them their estates, instead of making a vast number of confiscations. Under pretense of avenging the republic's cause, the avengers would establish tyranny. The business is not to destroy the rebel, but the rebellion. They ought to return as quickly as possible into the usual track of government, in which every one is protected by the laws, and no one injured."

Here is essential wisdom. You have put down a rebellion, yet you would destroy the rebel. Why not endeavor to bring him back—not as an enemy, but as a friend—into the usual track of the Government, so as to bring about that good feeling which promotes national prosperity and unity. Yet fifteen years after the close of the war we have renewed again and again embittered harangues, and one to-day from our friend from Michigan, and that, too, just after his brow is crowned with the senatorial wreath! He might well have forgotten his old debates through many years, marching as he is, triumphantly to the other body.

He illustrates, I will admit, his devotion to the Treasury, in opposing this claim of $135.85! I will admit that the gentleman is a good Treasury watch dog; but a good deal like the dog of an old lady down in North Carolina, who, when her house was burning up was so good a dog that he would not allow the people to pull the old lady out of the burning house! [Laughter.] A sort of a Snarleyow—a sort of "dog-fiend," about which Marryatt has written a novel. Why, are we forever to have these unchristian utterances? Can no lapse of time pour oil into these old wounds?

Why, gentlemen on the other side talk as though they were already in power, and had the popular voice with them. Not at all; the popular voice, nearly nine millions strong, by some 6,332 majority, was for Winfield Scott Hancock for President! I know you elected your statesman, and I trust that he will turn out a better man in the Presidency than you are in your seats. General Garfield himself said in this House that the man who attempts at this late day to stir up sectional feeling in this House or in this country does not deserve and will not command a following or a party. Yet gentlemen are undertaking to build up his administration in advance on these obnoxious and hateful doctrines, which he said would command neither following nor party.

When, sir, are we to have peace? Just after the war, as we all know, General Grant reported that the Southern States were anxious for contentment and deserved confidence and amnesty. He was solicitous, willing to be at peace and amity with them and they with the rest of the Union. They needed peace to give to their toil its reward, and our good will to give them those interchanges which build up a common prosperity. Have fifteen years made no difference with you of the other side? Are you jealous because the South is growing in population and prosperity, in planting, manufacturing, and commerce; that her cattle, cotton, and corn are enriching her abundantly? Surely not. Why, then, this continual debate, as if their interests and ours were not one.

What is the object of opposing this bill? The debt is not disputed. What can be the object in trying to cut down or deny this little claim of an old widow, a claim of $136.85? Is it only a pretext to display old animosities? Was there ever such monstrosity built on so small a foundation? Is it not time to have a better spirit in reference to the relations between North and South?

When General Butler was in our midst on the other side, and we debated a bill to restore to men who had been in the rebel army the old swords which they had worn gallantly in the battle of New Orleans, he favored the measure with touching and patriotic eloquence. He had the spirit of true soldierly chivalry. He said, "Give back to the old soldiers the swords they wore in the war of 1812;" and men on both sides applauded the patriotic sentiment. What would he say were he here to-day?

Mr. CHITTENDEN rose.

Mr. COX. I see that my friend from Brooklyn, the City of Churches, has risen. [Laughter.] I am glad that my pious exhortations have brought Brooklyn up to the horns of the altar. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, if there is one thing more than another that I love to think of it is the battle of Lake Erie. I have many associations with it. It connects by patriotic relations and personal reminiscences Rhode Island, where I was educated, with my native State of Ohio. The suggestion of the picture of Commodore Perry for the State-house at Columbus, as well as some efforts in behalf of the picture which adorns this Capitol, add other associations to this naval battle scene. Those who fought that fight are heroes to me of rare mold and character.

Mr. CHITTENDEN again rose.

Mr. COX. I wish my friend from Brooklyn would not look so peculiarly at me. [Laughter.] I am speaking for the heroes of Lake Erie, in a Christian and gentle spirit; and I want my friend from Brooklyn to aid me. He is going to speak on our side, I hope.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it ill becomes the gentlemen on the other side, after the Administration which is just dying out, has called to office such gallant rebels as Colonel Mosby, after the former and present Administration had preferred above Northern soldiers other men of the Southern rebellion like General Longstreet——

A MEMBER. And Key.

Mr. COX. After a republican administration has called to Cabinet positions such men as Judge Key——

A MEMBER. And Akerman.

Mr. COX. Yes, there is a long roll of them, and he was among the purest and best of them. After, I say, these republican Administrations have selected these gentlemen for the best honors of the Government, in which I may say the Administration did nobly, it ill becomes them to carp at this side for voting a little debt due to the widow of an old soldier of the war of 1812 because he resigned his commission when his State was about to "go out."

Now, we have this great fight over $135.85. [Laughter.] All to prevent a poor widow in Virginia from getting a little balance due for services rendered by her patriotic husband in the war of 1812. [Renewed laughter.] Will not my friend from Brooklyn [Mr. CHITTENDEN] stand by us on that? [Laughter.] Does the gentleman from Michigan want to cut off the eighty-five cents? [Laughter.] Does my friend from Brooklyn want to divide this debt, or pay it all? I am told he is for paying the whole amount. Why, then, will you gentlemen on the other side not rally round him? [Laughter.] I see many noble countenances anxious to respond, and but for party they would. Oh, then, how your faces would gleam with true Christian statesmanship! [Laughter.]

I see my friend from Maine, whose forehead shines like a star in the sky. [More laughter.] I call upon him first, because he represents the plumed knight of Maine; and I can recall to this House when JAMES G. BLAINE, in his kindest days, before he was bitten with that peculiar tarantula, the Presidency, authorized the Committee on Rules in this House, of which I was a member, to report a bill for general amnesty, Jefferson Davis and all. [Laughter.] So the record will show. That was about seven years ago. I see my friend from Maine already taking the cue for an amnestical speech. [Renewed laughter.] For they all follow BLAINE of Maine. [Laughter.] Why should they not?

Who objects to this bill? And what is the reason? Is it on account of the large amount? Why not openly object to it on the only pretext or principle, that this patriotic Captain Page is in his grave, and his widow is attaint for his acts, and that she should be punished for them? There is nothing else in the way of objection to the bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, to come back to this question in its serious aspect. It is time this nation had shown some of the generosity other nations in all ages have exhibited toward those vanquished in rebellion—high time, sir. We are in the afternoon of the nineteenth century. We are in the midst of our centennial celebrations. All the old associations thronging about Monmouth, Saratoga, Bennington, and Yorktown have revived and are reviving. Soon we shall have the celebration of our treaty of peace with the mother country and of our Constitution. Are we to postpone all comity till after these events are honored? Is the established order in this country, dating from the establishment of peace, to be satirized by such sectional asperities as these debates tend to foster and perpetuate?

Now is the time, if ever, when we the representatives of this country should come together, without hatred, with no unkindness, all one, as the idea of Deity is one. I should like, sir, to have this poetry put upon record, that all may study its fraternal meaning and in the best spirit. It reaches from the grave of the dead patriot, whose widow will be the beneficiary of this bill, to its source above:

Under the blossom, the blue;
Under the garlands, the gray;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day.
We have love and tears for the blue,
And tears and love for the gray.

If we cannot meet in that spirit here in our deliberations, and on committees in the preparation of our work, and at the inauguration, and in all our public duties, God help this Republic! We are worse than the pagan nations, who at least had the grace to give peace to the vanquished and incorporate them into a commonwealth. Let us begin on this bill to discard these spiteful abominations, which should be consigned to oblivion forever. God knows in His infinite mercy what is best for us all. Let us follow his spirit of forgiveness, and all will be well!

You upon the other side have not been so virtuous and pure that you can call us on this side to account in our political relations. I remember the time as a member of Congress here when hot words and threats of disunion came from that side, and when a few Douglas men here in our midst stood as a breakwater against excesses. I remember the hundred provocations given and returned, almost an epitome of the war in advance here in our very Chamber. I plead then as I do now for the unity of the Government and people in the bonds of peace. I favored what some called murder, if you please, although it was not murder to uphold the Union and the Government by killing. But the killing came, killing by the million. Was that killing to keep up strife forever? No; for unity. At last we came together under a noble impulse, spirit, and agreement. It was under the historic apple tree of old Virginia. Has that spirit gone, the agreement been broken, all unity departed?

Is there to be no charity for those who differed from us? Are we to judge their hearts who contended with their lives for the "lost cause" they loved? Let God judge them! It is not for us—in our feebleness of vision and weakness of understanding—to judge them harshly, now that time has covered them with its tenderness and the earth with its turf.

Where we but see the darkness of the mine,
God sees the diamond shine;
Where we can only clustering leaves behold,
He sees the bud they fold.
We only see the rude and outer strife;
God knows the inner life;
And those from whom, like Pharisees, we shrink,
With Christ may eat and drink.

In some better time, it may be, controlling men will arise who will wear the jeweled honors which come to those who champion fairness, magnanimity, kindness, brotherhood in the State, not spite, malice, vengeance, and all uncharitableness. [Long-continued applause.]

Department of Agriculture.

SPEECH OF HON. F. E. BELTZHOOVER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 7, 1881.

On the bill (H. R. No. 4909) for the creation of a department of agriculture.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill now under consideration provides for the establishment at the seat of Government of the United States of an executive department of agriculture which shall be under the supervision and control of a secretary who shall be appointed by the President and shall receive the same compensation and in like manner as the Secretaries of the other Executive Departments of the Government. It also provides for the appointment of an assistant secretary and all the other subordinate officials and employés necessary for the successful operation of a complete and independent bureau of the Government. The object of the bill is therefore plainly to put the great agricultural interests of the nation under the control of a branch of the Government co-ordinate with and equal in all respects to the Departments of State and War and law and postal matters, and so forth. I am heartily in favor of any measure which thus proposes to distinguish and honor and elevate the rights of the agricultural masses of the nation. The census reports show that of our 50,000,000 of population more than 50 per cent. are engaged in the various branches of agriculture. We have more than 188,000,000 acres of farm land under cultivation and a reserve of 318,000,000 acres yet unbroken by the spade or plow. This great and ancient art represents more than 30 per cent. of all the values of the nation, the amount so invested being estimated at $12,000,000,000. It furnishes more than 80 per cent. of our commerce. It pays vastly more taxes and bears more burdens than all the other industries of the country. It is taxed not only to meet the immediate responsibilities and expenditures of Government, but it is put under requisition by tariff to protect nearly all the manufactories of the nation. It is the soul of the nation's existence. It has been the chief occupation of mankind in all ages of the world. It comes down to us from history having inscribed on its banners a long list of honorable names. There was no greater praise among the old Romans than to be called a good farmer. Cincinnatus, the mighty martial leader and statesman, was called from his plow to take command of his country's armies in the hour of her greatest danger. Cato, the censor and distinguished orator, wrote a book on farming, and held it as his proudest work. The Roman Senate ordered the twenty-eight books of Mayo of Carthage on agriculture to be translated for the use of the Romans. Cato and Varro and Virgil and Columella and Pliny and Palladius were not only the sweetest poets and greatest historians of the golden age, but they wrote equally brilliantly on farming. The most famous houses among the ancient Romans, such as the Pisones, the Fabii, the Lentuli, &c., took their names from their favorite crops and vegetables. It is not too much to assert that many of those qualities which fitted them for conquering the world and perfecting their celebrated jurisprudence were acquired and nourished and matured by the skill, foresight, and persevering industry so needful for the intelligent and successful cultivation of the soil. In Egypt, "a land rich in corn," in Palestine, "a land flowing with milk and honey," and in every country mentioned in sacred and profane history the chief men have been husbandmen. Cicero, the greatest orator and one of the greatest patriots and statesmen of the ancient world, in speaking of agriculture, puts the most glowing and exquisite language in the mouth of his Cato. He says:—

I come now to the pleasures of husbandry, in which I vastly delight. They are not interrupted by old age and they seem to me to be pursuits in which a wise man's life should be spent. The gains of husbandry are not what exclusively commend it. I am charmed with the nature and productive virtures of the soil. In my opinion there can be no happier life, not only because the tillage of the soil is salutary to all, but from the pleasure it yields. Nothing can be more profitable, nothing more beautiful than a well-cultivated farm.

This is praise, indeed, from one who had scaled all the heights of civic fame and sounded all the depths of social and intellectual luxury and refinement. In Egypt and Chaldea and China, in the very dawn of authentic history, agriculture seems to have reached great perfection and success. From the paintings and inscriptions with which the Egyptians decorated their tombs we get the first knowledge of agriculture among that wonderful people. In one of these paintings which after 3,000 years retains great exactness and beauty there is a complete panorama given of the processes of the agricultural art down to the smallest details. In an ancient hieroglyphic a simple pick is used as a plow, showing the rudeness of the art in early times. From Egypt agriculture traveled into Greece, and Hesiod, the great Greek poet, a thousand years before Christ describes a plow as "a beam, a share, and handles."

In Judea in the patriarchal age the people were nomads, but rapidly turned to agriculture. Vast herds constituted their chief wealth, at first of sheep and goats, but finally of oxen. With the use of oxen came plowing. We learn that Job, besides immense possessions in flocks and herds, had five hundred yoke of oxen, which he employed in plowing, and "a very great husbandry." Isaac, too, was a successful husbandman; for we read that he sowed in the land of Gerar and "reaped an hundred-fold." Along with the Babylonians, Egyptians, and Romans the Israelites are classed as one of the great agricultural nations of antiquity. They acquired their knowledge of farming during their captivity in Egypt, and upon their release from bondage they found Canaan a land of inexhaustible richness in corn and grain and abounding in vineyards and olive-yards. It was so rich in grain that the invading army, numbering 600,000 able-bodied men, with their wives and children and camp-followers, found "old corn" in the land sufficient to maintain them from the day they passed the Jordan. Moses took a census and made a law giving every man from sixteen to twenty-five acres of land. This was held by a direct tenure from Jehovah and could not be sold or aliened. Debts could not accumulate fast, because there was no interest allowed and all debts were released every seven years. At the year of jubilee all land went back to the original owner or his heirs. The owners of these small farms cultivated them with great care. The stones were carefully gathered off and the land watered by canals and conduits communicating with the brooks and streams, with which the country "was well watered everywhere." The seventh-year fallow prevented the exhaustion of the soil. The whole system of agriculture in that historic country was superb and wonderful. With peculiar political and social arrangements and their balmy and delicious climate, the country at its most advanced stages must have exhibited such an example of high cultivation, rich and varied produce, and widespread plenty and contentment as the world has never yet elsewhere produced on an equally extensive scale. Not by a figure of speech, but literally every Israelite "sat under the shadow of his own vine and fig-tree," while the country is described as "a land of corn and wine," "a land of bread and vineyards," "a land of oil-olive and honey." The early Romans, like the Israelites, limited the amount of land to be held by each man to about seven acres. Cassius, the orator, says, "He is not to be counted a good citizen, but rather a dangerous man to the State, who cannot content himself with seven acres of land."

In later times the quantity was extended to each man to fifty and afterward to five hundred acres. Greece, unrivaled in literature and art, had a country unfavorable for agriculture, and early adopted a social status which still further hindered the growth of farming. Having reduced the aboriginal tribes to bondage they made them till the soil, and by the decadence and failure of their agriculture proved that slavery and that art are absolutely incompatible. Agriculture is an art which can only be learned and nurtured and perfected by freemen. It is a child of liberty and nature. With the Romans, who grew to be masters of the world in arms and jurisprudence and power and civilization, the fundamental idea was the culture of the soil and the acquisition and control of territory. With the Greeks the dominant idea was the culture of art and aesthetics. This fact marks the great line of divergence and difference between these two great contemporary nations. It was the custom to send the evidences of the greatest success in agriculture among the Romans to their emperors. Pliny tells us that four hundred stalks of wheat were grown from one seed and sent to Augustus. Also, that three hundred and forty stalks were grown from a grain in another instance and sent to Nero from Africa. In the later days of her greatness Rome began to be supplied with products from her conquered colonies, and with this foreign supply came the neglect and decline of her agriculture at home. With the decline of that art on which all true and substantial national prosperity must be based came the decline of Rome's national power and her rapid descent into voluptuous enervation and decay. Then came, with her weakness, the invasion of the Vandal hordes from the north and the desolation and destruction of the fair fields of the mistress of the world. Agriculture then degenerated into the hands of vassals, and a long, dark night came down over the world. War became the chief and only pursuit of men which was deemed honorable. In a few instances it is true that war carried the banner of agriculture into foreign lands. Thus the Saracens carried it into Spain, and the Romans carried it into Britain. But in all times war and revolution have been the greatest enemies of agriculture, and as a consequence all the forces of a prosperous agriculture co-operate to preserve peace and encourage thrift. The history of agriculture is full of lessons which ought to be impressed on the mind of the statesman and legislator. Its progress during the last century is filled with triumphs of civilization. The mighty area of land now under superb cultivation, the wonderful perfection of the culture, the extraordinary efforts put forth by scientific, experimental, and practical farmers to develop and foster and extend the science, the stupendous amount of products, the vastly improved methods by which these immense crops are gathered and garnered and carried to market, are the greatest and truest and most enduring victories of our age. They were all won in bloodless battles, with no tears, nor suffering, nor distress in their wake, but have built up and increased the great sum of human happiness, and give the only promise of the realization of the dreams of the prophet and poet of a grand millennium.

In accord with the spirit of advancement in this most useful and beneficent of all the arts it is our duty as the highest legislative body of this great country to strive to free agriculture from all possible obstructions and give it the widest possible scope. We should always discriminate in its favor and never against it. We should elevate the Department of Agriculture from its position as a secondary and subordinate one and make it the most prominent of the Cabinet places in the national administration. The Committee on Agriculture, instead of being briefless and insignicant, should stand at the head of the committees of the Senate and House. It should be composed of the most eminent agriculturists and the most ardent and enlightened friends of the art. It should be constituted with a view to the most effective and unbiased work for the advancement and elevation of agricultural interests. No man should assume to stand as a representative of the farming interests of the mightiest farming nation on the earth who does not believe that a good, successful farmer is the highest type of a citizen. The appropriations for the aid of corporations should be infinitely less, and those for the encouragement of agriculture should be more. The one hundred millions given to subsidize the Pacific railroads, and the millions more to other still more grasping corporations, too numerous to mention, were all drawn from the sweat and toil of the tillers of the soil of the nation. A mere tithe of these sums, given within a few years to fill the pockets of credit mobilierites, has not been appropriated in a century to encourage the earnest, honest art on which the country must depend for its existence. If the great producing masses of the nation, the farmers and laborers, would keep an eye single to their own interests as faithfully as the myriads of corporations and speculators in all the other walks of life do, they could command supremacy everywhere for the pursuit in which they and their posterity must earn their bread. One of the greatest and purest of the dead statesmen of the nation has said that—

Our national interests require that its agriculture should be freed from all the obstacles of the past, and that it should receive the benefit of a fair share of public provision such as is made for the training of youths for the learned professions and for the public service, and of such grants as are given in aid of scientific research for the encouragement of fine arts and for the furtherance of manufactures and commerce.

There can be no success adequate to the importance of this great subject without thorough organization and earnest, untiring work. These things cannot be accomplished without money. The Government that draws all its revenues from the agricultural resources of the nation should appropriate the money. It gives untold millions to maintain a war to defend the political unity of the nation. It contributes hundreds of millions more in pensions to the disabled soldiers who served it in the hour of peril. It appropriates from eight to ten millions every year to improve the rivers and harbors of the country in the interest of commerce. Why should it not contribute a few hundred thousands to support a great department of the Government which should embody and symbolize the great dignity and importance of the most ancient and most useful and most honorable calling among men? The department which would be established under this bill would be a head and center for all the agricultural industries and interests of the nation. The more good agricultural societies there are, the more granges, the more agricultural schools, the more agricultural newspapers, the more legislation and work and argument in the direct line of agricultural knowledge the sooner will come the day when the art and science of tilling the earth, which is the natural, God-given pursuit of humanity, will be brought up again to the dignity it held when the "tiller of the garden was the lord of the earth."

This bill should be passed because it is right, in view of all the considerations which surround it in the light of the present. It should be passed because, from the lessons of the past, it is plain that agriculture develops the highest types of men and the most ardent patriots and the purest lovers of liberty, and discourages all kinds of slavery; it develops and encourages the spirit of accumulation, both of the products of land and of land itself, and becomes thereby the pioneer and leader in national aggrandizement, and wealth, and growth; it discourages war, and appeals to the most potent passions of mankind in favor of peace and thrift. The bill should be passed because the farming people of the nation demand and are entitled to a full, fair, and unequivocal recognition and acknowledgment of the magnitude and importance of their grand interests. The great Napoleon, nearly a century ago, called agriculture the body and soul of the Empire of France. More truthfully in this day and this country, with its 30,000,000 of farmers and farm laborers, and its $12,000,000,000 of investment, can it be called the body and soul of this Republic.

Legal-Tender Treasury Notes Preferable to National-Bank Currency.

SPEECH OF HON. G. DE LA MATYR,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. DE LA MATYR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The refunding measure before us is in the interest of the national-bank system of issuing currency. I oppose it on that ground.

I propose to show that legal-tender Treasury notes are preferable to bank paper for currency.

Legal tender is imparted to currency by law, and only that currency which islegal tender is money. It has become necessary to demonstrate that money is solely a creature of law. The prevalent sneering at the unfortunate phrase, "fiat money," which means simply money created by law, exhibits an amazing ignorance and justifies elaborate proof of a proposition which in itself is so clear "that a way-faring man, though a fool," ought not "to err therein."

Plato says, "money is a creation of law, to effect exchanges." (Plato's Republic.)

Aristotle says, "Money is a measure of value, a medium of exchange, an invention of man, not a product of nature." (Aristotle's Politics.)

The English courts give this definition:

Money comes from monendo—to stamp; as wax is not a seal without the stamp, so metal is not money without the impression of sovereign authority.

These definitions are from the highest authorities.

MONEY INCREASED IN VOLUME BY MEANS OF ALLOY PER FORCE OF LAW.

For centuries, when coin was the only money of Europe, the monarchs of England were wont to increase the volume of currency in times of stringency by means of alloy. If appeals were made to the courts, they invariably decided that the monarch, having the right to make money, could use any material, and alloy gold and silver to any extent demanded by his treasury. As the alleged money was received for all debts due the king or the government, that which was good enough for the ruler was good enough for the ruled. As the king had the right to decree what money should be received in his treasury, he had the right to decree what should be legal tender for the people of his realm. Nearly all the English and French kings resorted to alloying their coins, in order to increase the volume of the circulating medium to meet exigencies. In 1720 the French made their coins more than 50 per cent. copper, without lessening their legal value.

VOLUME OF MONEY INCREASED BY LESSENING WEIGHT THROUGH ACT OF GOVERNMENT.

Having for centuries practiced increasing the volume of money by alloy, the governments of Europe at length changed the mode to lessening the weight of coins. The Parliament and King of England decreed that a pound (troy) should make sixty-two shillings instead of twenty, as had been the law for many years before, thus reducing the bullion value of a shilling more than three to one. Those shillings, reduced so much at a single stroke, were made the lawful money of the nation. Twenty of them made a pound sterling; that is, a legal pound instead of a pound weight. Each shilling had the same legal value as before, and the volume of shillings was trebled by an act of Parliament signed by the King.

From 1797 until 1815 England had been at war. Her silver had been drained by the sustaining of armies in foreign countries. The government was compelled to increase the volume of money and to check its exportation; so out of a pound (troy) of silver sixty-six shillings were coined instead of sixty-two.

SILVER PARTIALLY DEMONETIZED BY LAW.

Up to 1816 both gold and silver coins had always been full legal tender in England, but since then gold alone has been full legal tender, and other nations have also demonetized it. Silver bullion has fallen 15 per cent. below gold.

LEGAL VALUE OF SILVER MADE GREATER THAN BULLION VALUE BY LAW.

Notwithstanding the depreciation of silver bullion full 15 per cent. and its demonetization in large sums, yet silver coins 6 per cent. light are good as gold for the sum of forty shillings in each separate transaction. The retail trade of England is mainly carried on in these depreciated coins and in those of copper. Thus hundreds of millions of money made out of less valuable metal answer the same purpose as gold, and law alone makes them equal.

I have cited these facts from European history to show that money is made and unmade solely by law.

MONEY MADE BY THE ACT OF OUR GOVERNMENT.

In our own country, under the Confederation, Congress made 375.60 grains of pure silver a dollar. Under the Constitution, in 1792, 371¼ grains of pure silver were made a dollar and fixed as the unit of our money. The law of 1792 made one pound of gold equivalent to fifteen pounds of silver. In 1834 the law was changed so as to make one pound of gold worth sixteen pounds of silver. Under the law of 1792 gold was eleven-twelfths fine; under that of 1834 it was required to be only nine-tenths fine. The law of 1792 made 27 grains of gold eleven-twelfths fine a dollar; that of 1834 made 25.8 grains nine-tenths fine a dollar. In 1873 a trade-dollar was created containing 420 grains of silver nine-tenths fine, and was made money by being legal tender for $5 in one transaction. It has since been demonetized by having its legal-tender power taken away, and now it is worth ten cents less than the legal-tender or money dollar of seven and a half grains less of silver.

Previous to 1853 all silver half and quarter dollars and dimes were full legal tender. In 1853 fractional coins were by law reduced 7 per cent. in weight and restricted in legal-tender power to $5 in one payment.

In February, 1873, the silver dollar of 412½ grains, which had been money by force of law from 1792, was demonetized by an act passed in the interest of the money power. By the force of law the same amount of silver was again made a dollar of money in 1878. Thus we see that all gold and silver money has been made so by law; that is, every dollar and fraction of a dollar of these metals which have been money at all have been so by force of law only. We learn also that baser metals, used as alloy, have become money as really as gold and silver, the idols of Shylock worship, thus exploding the theory that worth of material has anything to do with fixing the value of money.

We will examine for a moment smaller fractions of dollars made money wholly out of the baser metals.

The law in 1792 authorized the issue of cents and half cents made of copper. The cent containing two hundred and sixty grains of copper was made full legal tender. The law of March, 1857, reduced the weight of the cent forty-eight grains, but did not lessen its legal value. In 1864 a much lighter coin was substituted, composed of ninety-five parts copper and five parts tin and zinc. Its weight was only forty-eight grains. One pound of this metal cost twenty cents. The legal value of a pound, when coined, was $1.60. In 1866, a five-cent piece was issued composed of seventy-five parts copper and twenty-five parts nickel. One pound of this mixture costs about seventy cents. One hundred pieces are coined out of a pound, making its legal value $5. Here is more clearly seen that law makes money without regard to the value of material used.

FOREIGN COINS MONEY TO US ONLY AS MADE SO BY OUR LAWS.

From 1793 to 1857 coins of most other countries were legal tender by our laws.

In 1857 all foreign coins were demonetized by the Government and they have not been money here since.

The talk about "world money" comes from ignorance. Money is created by law, and no nation can make laws for other nations. If gold and silver were money by virtue of their intrinsic value, as is generally assumed by our opponents, there would be no need of laws to monetize or demonetize them, and they would be money the world over.

We need not pursue this investigation further to convince the most ignorant and prejudiced that specie even is money only by force of law, and that law gives value to coin by making it money which as a commodity it does not possess.

We have established the principle, for which we as a party contend, and which is stoutly and persistently denied, that law regulates the value of currency, and not the material of which it is made.

THE INTENSITY OF CIVILIZATION WE HAVE REACHED DEMANDS PAPER MONEY IN THE FORM OF TREASURY NOTES.

Metal currency belongs to the barter system of barbarism. It is far too cumbersome and costly for a high civilization. It was originally chosen to replace the exchange of one class of common property for another, because the precious metals were less cumbrous than common commodities.

COST OF SPECIE IN THIS AGE OF INTENSE COMMERCIAL ACTIVITY.

No one will question that, as a nation, we need $1,000,000,000 of currency. In the annual report of the Director of the Mint, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, page 59, is a table showing the specie and paper circulation of France for a series of years. The total circulation in 1878, the last year given, was 13,294,948,000 francs, which, taking the franc at nineteen cents, would be equal to $2,526,040,120. Now, France has a population less than ours by some thirteen millions, dwelling on a territory not larger than Texas, for which circumstance alone, not to speak of others, we would be able to wield certainly as large a circulation as France—yea, unquestionably a much larger one. But I make the calculation on one billion, to show the cost of an amount every one would readily admit as necessary.

If we use coin, labor must first produce it, and that amount of real wealth must be taken from the people by taxation. Abrasion will wear it out within fifty years, and it must be replaced by draining the amount out of the product of labor again. In fifty years simple interest at 6 per cent. on this sum will be $3,000,000,000. This amount must be added to the original cost, which makes $4,000,000,000. If we compound the interest, which we must do to reach the real cost of such a currency to the people, we have the enormous sum of $18,420,154,177.88 which a specie currency meeting our demands would cost in fifty years. Real wealth in the hands of the people as active capital is supposed to be worth in this country 6 per cent. annually. In the case we are considering that amount of real capital is taken from the people. Therefore, interest is added to the cost.

If we put the volume at $2,000,000,000, which we regard as below what we shall need on an average for the next fifty years, we have a cost of $36,840,308,355.76 as much as the entire country with all of its improvements is worth.

These figures show us that the barter system is simply impossible now. The thought of such a system of currency for this age would be far more chimerical than is charged upon the notions of greenbackers.

THE BARTER SYSTEM TOO SLOW AND BURDENSOME, AS WELL AS TOO COSTLY.

Before the substitution of paper for specie currency, gold, silver, and other metals had to be shipped to the place of making a purchase or paying a debt. If a merchant shipped any commodity to another country or to distant parts of his own country, he was compelled to invest the proceeds in some other commodity which he could sell at home, and be out of the use of his capital until the long transaction was completed. If he received coin in return he must wait for the shipment both ways and bear the expense and peril. The world has reached a state of commerce which utterly forbids this system of exchange, and nations have been forced to substitute largely a paper currency. Thus paper currency is the herald of commercial advancement.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Bills of exchange were the first effort to substitute paper for coin. The system of negotiating bills of exchange was first instituted by the Bank of Barcelona. These bills are well understood to be drafts drawn in one city or country upon persons residing in others. A merchant in New York ships a cargo to London or Canton. As soon as his invoice and insurance papers are perfected, he can draw a bill of exchange upon the party to whom he ships the goods and obtain of a banker a large per cent. of the value of his cargo. His banker has arrangements with a house in the city to which his cargo is shipped, so that the exchanges are largely effected without the shipment of coin either way. It is not necessary to explain the intricacies of these paper exchanges. It is sufficient for our purpose to note the fact, that on a very large scale, paper currency is substituted for the barter system, the highest phase of which is coin exchange.

LETTERS OF CREDIT.

Letters of credit are another phase of paper currency. A merchant goes from Philadelphia to Paris to buy goods. He takes no coin with him, but instead carries letters of credit from a bank in his own city to a banking house in Paris, draws bills, and obtains currency there to pay for his goods. Not one-hundredth part of the medium of exchange in commerce is now coin.

CHECKS OF INDIVIDUALS AND FIRMS.

In all large cities in Europe and the United States more than nine-tenths of business is conducted by means of checks either on the credit of individuals or firms. It is stated that the banks of England have on an average more than $5,000,000,000 in checks out marked "good," though they may not have one billion of any kind of money in their vaults. Our authority is Sir John Lubbick. When California banks received on deposit only gold, to avoid the inconvenience of handling it the check system was used in payments instead of coin.

BANKS OF DEPOSIT AND EXCHANGE.

Banks of exchange were early resorted to, to escape the intolerable burden of coin circulation. The Bank of Venice was the first of this kind in Europe.

The intense activities caused by the crusades inspired the creation of that remarkable institution. It was established in 1171, and destroyed only with the republic in 1797, standing firm as a rock for more than six hundred years. Its system of exchange was essentially the same we propose, and we shall notice it under another head.

The Bank of Genoa was fully established in 1407, that of Barcelona in 1401, and that of Amsterdam in 1609. These banks all had the same object in view. Their general principle was that money deposited in the bank was not to be paid out, but that the credit of and in the bank was to be used in the payment of debts instead of money. This saved the loss in the coin by friction, clipping, sweating, and boring, and furnished an invariable representation of value. Debts in considerable amounts were all paid by crediting the party to whom the debt was due and debiting him who owed it. These credits in these banks were made legal tender, and were at a premium over coin because all debts due the government and the people had to be paid in them.

THE BANK OF FRANCE.

I give the history and analysis of this bank in the language of Judge Warwick Martin, than whom there is no better authority on finance. I quote from an article of his in the National View:

This bank succeeded the Royal Bank of France, which failed about 1720. The charter has been renewed several times. It was and is chartered by the French nation. At first its capital was only 45,000,000 francs, now it is 192,000,000 francs, or $36,000,000. It is located in Paris, but has seventy-eight branches in different parts of the nation. No bank but this one can issue paper money in France. The governor and two sub-governors are appointed by the nation. There are fifteen regents and four censors, who are appointed by the stockholders. The bank receives and holds the money of the government, but allows no interest thereon. It is the disbursing agent of the government, and makes advances to it upon treasury and mint bills or bonds, similar to the exchequer bills of England or interest Treasury notes of the United States. The notes of the bank are legal tender for all debts due the nation. They are so made by law. The law does not limit the circulation of the bank. The issues are controlled by demand for the bills.

In addition to the business of the government the following private business is done:

1. The bank discounts bills of exchange having three months to run, secured by two or three names.
2. The bank makes advances upon French public securities, railroad stocks, bonds of the city of Paris, or deposits of bullion.
3. The bank not only issues paper money, but notes payable to order and transferable by indorsement, which can be used as bills of exchange.
4. This bank receives on deposit coins, bank-notes, and bills of exchange.
5. This bank also receives for safe-keeping bonds, public securities, and diamonds; and cashes interest coupons when payable in Paris. The circulation is supplied by the bank in Paris, but the branches distribute it throughout the country. The amount of the business of the bank is from $2,000,000,000 to $3,000,000,000 per annum. The rate of interest charged is fron 2½ to 3½ per cent. per annum, according to demand and supply. The rate is not regulated by law.

THE AMOUNT OF PAPER CIRCULATION.

As we stated before, there is generally no legal limit to the circulation. From 1870 until 1878 the limit of the full legal-tender paper issues of the bank was $600,000,000. These were, however, really government issues made by the bank. This limit extended only from 1870 until January 1, 1878.

GOLD AND SILVER COINS HELD BY THIS BANK.

This bank, unlike other so-called specie-paying banks, is not required by law to hold any particular amount of coin. The law provides no minimum or maximum of coin, but this bank generally holds as much coin as all the banks in England, Germany, and several other European states together.

The following coins were held by the bank each year from 1868 until 1878:

In 1868	$202, 800, 000
In 1869	253, 360, 000
In 1870	263, 760, 000
In 1871	138, 300, 000
In 1872	158, 000, 000
In 1873	164, 160, 000
In 1874	266, 200, 000
In 1875	333, 700, 000
In 1876	436, 580, 000
In 1877	450, 260, 000
In 1878	429, 200, 000

These are the maximum amounts. In 1871, when $250,000,000 in coin were paid to Germany, the coin in the bank ran down to $79,700,000. In all the other years during which the notes were not paid in coin the sum in the bank greatly increased from what it had ever been until it reached $450,260,000, more than any other bank ever possessed from the beginning of banking up to that time. The Bank of England holds only $75,000,000 coin, and is at all times alarmed if one or two million pounds in coin are drawn out. But the Bank of France, when suspended, had six times as much coin as the Bank of England ever had. The Bank of France did not purchase this coin. It was paid and deposited in the bank in exchange for the notes of the bank, which, though not redeemable in coin, were full legal tender, and preferred to coin, as our legal-tender notes are now.

This adds to the proof that people will not use coin for business purposes if they can obtain reliable paper money. The paper money of the bank was not only made by law full legal tender, but it became the paper of the government by being, under the law, receivable for all debts due the government.

The facts here stated respecting the Bank of France are from the official statement of Leon Say, French minister of finance. They can, therefore, be relied upon.

THE NOTES DURING SUSPENSION.

The most of the time during the suspension the notes of the bank were $600,000,000. In 1877, they were $545,043,480. On January 1, 1878, they were $502,505,950. But we are asked, why was the law suspending specie payments and making the notes legal tender repealed? It was not repealed. The bank was loaded down with nearly five hundred million dollars coin, about one-half of which was silver. This coin was burdening to the bank. The directors wished to unload a portion of it. They therefore proposed to pay coin for their notes. But the coin has not been materially decreased, nor have the notes.

THE REASON WHY THE FRENCH PEOPLE CONFIDE IN THEIR MONEY.

1. The circulation of coin and of the notes of the bank has always been large. In addition to the coin held by the bank, there are generally about one thousand million dollars coin in circulation among the people. Including the notes of the bank and coin, there are over fifteen hundred million dollars money in the country, which is $50 per capita. It is diffused among the people. For generations the bank, through its seventy-eight branches, has diffused its circulation among the people. It has never failed them. They therefore confide in it, as the people of the United States do in the notes of the Government. France has never imitated the bad practices of England and of the United States in reducing her paper circulation to prepare for the humbug of resumption, thus prostrating the industries of the country and reducing the value of all commodities so that the people have nothing with which to pay debts. On the contrary, the French have invariably increased the circulation in all crises, and kept the people employed and their industries in a prosperous condition.

IN 1848 THEY DID THIS.

2. In 1848, when Louis Philippe abdicated and a republic was declared, surrounding nations were greatly alarmed. They anticipated the scenes of the former revolution. The people of England and of all Europe commenced talking and acting rebellion. Monarchs trembled upon their thrones. The stocks of all nations were greatly depressed. Those of France for the time being were unsalable. The Rothschilds had just before the abdication taken a large French loan, which they had not yet disposed of. It was then estimated that had they been compelled to sell it, they would have lost at least $8,000,000 upon it. But they showed their great strength by holding it.

A run was made upon the Bank of France. The bank was in good condition for ordinary times, but not able, as no bank ever is, to pay all its liabilities in coin on demand. The industries of the country were prostrated for the time being. The people were out of employment. The bank contemplated winding up. But there were wise men connected with the government. They compelled the bank to suspend, and the government made the notes of the bank legal tender. This made them equal to coin.

But this was not all. The bank was compelled, instead of calling in its circulation, to increase it to $600,000,000. This increased circulation of legal-tender paper money was diffused among the people. All the people were set to work, and paid good wages. While other nations decreased their circulation and prostrated their business, the business interests of France were prosperous. The storm passed over. The credit of the nation was restored. The products of France met ready sale. Gold and silver flowed into the country, until it could boast $1,000,000,000 in addition to a large legal tender bank circulation.

The writer will never forget this French revolution. It cost him a business worth $100,000 a year, and many days, months, and years of embarrassment, from which he never fully recovered. Had the Bank of France not been taken possession of by the government, and its notes made legal tender, the bank would have failed, and untold calamity would have resulted. But by this one act all calamities were avoided. It was done without scarcely any cost to the people. They were blessed, instead of being cursed, by the revolution.

FRANCE FROM 1870 UNTIL 1878.

The war between Germany and France broke out in 1870. Louis Napoleon was then Emperor of the French. He repaired to the field with his army, expecting a great triumph over Germany. He then left Paris for the last time. In a few days his army was scattered and he was a prisoner. The conquest by Germany of France was complete. A republic was again declared. Paris was surrounded by German troops. The people within had no ingress or egress, excepting by balloon. A treaty of peace was finally concluded, the conditions of which were that two of the most valuable French provinces should be ceded to Germany, and that the former should pay the latter $1,100,000,000, and that the troops of Germany should remain on French soil until certain installments of this sum were paid. The opinion of most persons was that France would be wholly unable to pay this debt in a generation. But the wise policy which had saved the country in 1848 and 1849 was adopted by the republican government in 1870 and 1871. The coin in the bank had been drawn from $264,000,000 to $72,700,000, and this small balance would soon have been gone. Confidence was destroyed. Had the policy of England of late years and of the United States since 1873 been adopted and carried out by France in 1870 and 1871, the bank would have failed, the industries of the country would have been ruined, and the very existence of the nation would have been threatened, if not destroyed.

But there were statesmen and wise financiers in France at that time. These men, instead of being controlled by Shylocks, were controlled by the love of their country.

The Bank of France was ordered by the supreme authority to suspend specie payment, and to issue sufficient notes to make the circulation $600,000,000. These notes of the bank were made by law legal tender for all debts due the government and individuals. Two hundred millions of notes were put into the business of the country. The laborers and manufacturing establishments were put to work. Employment was given to every man at good wages. The first installment of the debt to Germany, amounting to $250,000,000, was paid in coin, which was furnished principally by 5,000,000 small farmers, and was called "the stocking loan." In exchange for their coin, which had been hid away in stockings, these small farmers received either the legal-tender notes of the Bank of France or small interest-bearing bonds. This payment reduced the debt to $850,000,000. Not another dollar of this debt was paid in coin. It was paid by loans made in other countries and by manufactured articles sold to Germany. Germany had been so elated over her conquest of France and the anticipated receipts of $1,100,000,000 coin from France that her own industries had been neglected.

Indeed, so many German soldiers had been taken from the plow, the anvil, and the loom to occupy the soil of France until the debt was paid that it was impossible for the usual industries of Germany to be carried on. All the time when the German soldiers were keeping watch of France, the French people, by the aid of $200,000,000 legal-tender notes, in addition to their former circulation, were crowding the German markets with their merchandise until they had sufficient credits with German banks and bankers to pay the $850,000,000 balance of the debt without the shipment of coin. By the use of paper money receivable for all debts, public and private, but not otherwise redeemable before 1877, the Bank of France had paid the whole $1,100,000,000, and had $450,000,000 coin in its vaults.

We call attention to the fact that no great speculations took place during these years when the notes of the bank and of the government were not redeemed in coin. The history of the world shows that all such speculations have their origin with banks that profess to pay coin for all their liabilities.

THE DISCOUNT ON NOTES OF THE BANK OF FRANCE WHEN LEGAL TENDER.

We noticed a few days ago in the Chicago Times a very uncandid, untruthful statement to the effect that as soon as the notes of the Bank of France were made legal tender, and certain issues were made, they went to 2½ per cent. discount, and as the quantity of the notes was increased, the discount thereon increased.

The party who wrote that article is either ignorant or dishonest. He may be both. The facts of history are just the reverse of those stated by him.

After the notes of the bank were made full legal tender they became the money of account and the standard of payment in all transactions. Coins, whether of gold or silver, for the time being ceased to be the money of account and the standard of payment. They were simply commodities or metal, and were purchased and sold as such, the legal-tender paper money being the standard of payment for the coin or bullion. When the $250,000,000 in coin had to be paid to Germany, the silver and gold were in great demand to make this payment. The large, unusual demand raised the price of these metals so that it required $102.50 of the legal-tender paper to purchase a given quantity of gold and silver, just as iron or lead would have been raised in price if two hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of lead or iron had been in haste purchased. Gold and silver were high in price because of the demand.

But immediately after this payment was made, and the notes of the bank had been increased in quantity and diffused among the people, and were actively employed in the industries of the country, there was no premium on either gold or silver over the legal-tender notes. On the contrary, the notes on account of convenience and safety were everywhere preferred to gold and silver coin. The bank was able, therefore, in three or four years to accumulate nearly five hundred million dollars of coin, the coin not being wanted by the people. Such will always be the case with the legal-tender notes of a nation of credit and large revenue.

THE BONDED DEBT OF FRANCE.

France has the largest debt of any nation in the world. It is $4,000,000,000. At only 3 per cent. per annum it amounts to $120,000,000 a year, $12,000,000,000 in one hundred years, and $24,000,000,000 in two hundred years.

This bonded debt, like that of England, commenced near the close of the sixteenth century and by the many wars of France since that time it has been greatly increased. Banking and funding commenced about the same time in France as they did in England. They generally go hand in hand.

Previous to the introduction of banks and bonds in France, when an increase of money to carry on wars or for other purposes was required, the money was forced from those who had it in abundance, or the gold and silver coins were doubled in legal value by copper alloy placed in the coins; or by decreasing their weight, so as to make two or three pounds out of one. This was extensively done in the sixteenth and the early part of the seventeenth century in France, as it was in England near that time. This practice of increasing the amount of money by adding alloy to the coins and reducing their weight was not confined to France and England. It was practiced by most monarchs of that time, and sustained by the courts. It was greatly preferable to the practice of funding. The money changed was still the lawful money of the country issuing it, and as money is nothing but a creation of law to effect exchanges of commodities, it was immaterial of what it is composed, so that it was the lawful money of the nation for all purposes.

OPPRESSION OF THE PEOPLE BY THE DEBT.

Though the French bonded debt is larger than that of England, it does not oppress the French people as that of England does the English. Some of the reasons for this are the following:

The debt of France is all owned in France. The money paid as interest is to the French people. It is not as in the United States sent to pay interest in foreign countries.

1. The French bonded debt is like the notes of the Bank of France, distributed in small sums among the people. The smallest farmer and the poorest laborer has some of it. This is one peculiarity of French loans. They are made into bonds of a few francs, so that all the people can purchase them. They are, therefore, held by the humble tax-payers, and these tax-payers receive the interest. The whole $250,000,000 paid Germany were paid by these tax-payers.

2. The French Government keeps the circulation of either coin or bank-notes so large that money is plenty and the industries of the country are generally prosperous. The people can therefore pay tax to discharge interests due to themselves without being oppressed by the payments. The bonded debts of England and of the United States are generally in few hands, and a large majority of the people are compelled to pay taxes to raise the interest for a few persons who live in idleness and are exempt from taxation.

The Bank of England commenced existence in 1694. It was born of the exigencies of war. It has a monopoly of furnishing a paper currency based upon interest-bearing national bonds. This was the first bank that issued a paper currency in the form of a "promise to pay." At first its notes were based solely upon the debt of the nation. The currency it issued was its credits against the nation. It drew interest on its credits paid by the government, and issued its own notes, based on its credits, and received interest from the people. Not until a large amount of coin had been received by sale of its own notes, which were made receivable for all government dues and for "bills of exchange," were their notes ever professedly payable in coin. From the establishment of this great monopoly, permitted to drain a double interest out of the products of labor for currency, commenced the accumulation of debt and impoverishment of the producers.

The national debt of England has steadily grown from that time till it has reached the ominous sum of $3,700,000,000. At 3 per cent. the interest on this debt taxes labor $111,000,000 annually. Compound this interest for forty years, the time of a single generation, and it would swell the debt to $12,067,543,600. In one generation labor must be taxed to pay a tribute of $8,369,543,600 interest to support an idle, haughty, and voluptuous class. This enormous tribute added to the other necessary burdens of labor inevitably dooms the toiling masses to helpless drudgery and squalid, degrading poverty.

Such is the present condition of the producers in Great Britain. The class to whom interest is paid have absorbed the soil and all other sources of wealth, and collect tribute from every stroke of toil. No marvel that Ireland starves, and on the verge of despair revolts. The oppressors of the poor "sow the wind," and are sure to "reap the whirlwind." The harvest ripens fast.

I have analyzed the English system of double usury drained out of the products of toil for currency, and hinted at the nearly ripe fruits of terrible retribution to suggest the measureless folly of our statesmen who with open eyes have copied it.

OUR BANKING SYSTEM BEFORE THE WAR.

We will notice but briefly our banking system before the civil war. It consisted of a national bank and of State banks. The national bank was founded in 1791. It expired in 1811, and was revived in 1816. Because of President Jackson's noted veto, it was not rechartered, and perished finally in 1836.

The first State bank was established in Boston, in 1784. This was followed by numerous banks in all the States. The main features of this entire system were "specie basis" and control of the volume of currency by bankers. The unsoundness of these features is clearly seen in the facts I quote from a speech I delivered on this floor in February of last year.

The following table exhibits a statement of the number of State banks, the amount of their circulating notes, and the amount of specie they held at different periods from 1784 to 1861:

Year.	Number of banks.	Circulation.	Specie.
1784	3	$2,000,000	$10,000,000
1790	4	2,500,000	9,000,000
1796	24	10,500,000	16,500,000
1800	28	10,500,000	17,500,000
1811	89	28,100,000	15,400,000
1815	208	110,000,000	17,000,000
1820	308	44,863,344	19,820,240
1830	330	61,323,898	22,114,917
1834	506	94,839,570	.....
1835	704	103,692,495	43,937,625
1836	713	140,301,038	40,019,594
1837	788	149,185,890	37,915,340
1838	829	116,138,910	35,184,112
1839	840	135,170,995	45,132,673
1840	901	106,968,572	33,103,155
1841	784	107,290,214	34,813,958
1842	692	83,734,011	28,440,423
1843	691	58,563,608	33,515,806
1844	696	75,167,646	49,898,269
1845	707	89,680,711	44,241,242
1846	707	105,552,427	42,012,095
1847	715	105,519,766	35,132,516
1848	751	128,506,091	46,369,765
1849	782	114,743,415	43,619,368
1850	824	131,366,526	45,379,345
1851	879	155,163,251	48,671,048
1853	750	146,072,780	47,138,592
1854	1,208	204,689,207	59,410,253
1855	1,307	186,952,223	53,944,546
1856	1,398	195,747,950	59,314,063
1857	1,416	214,778,822	58,349,838
1858	1,422	155,208,344	74,412,832
1859	1,476	193,306,818	104,537,818
1860	1,562	207,102,477	83,594,537
1861	1,601	202,005,767	87,674,507

COMMENTS ON THE ABOVE TABLE.

If we examine closely the above table we will discover three important facts: 1, that the number of banks in operation at different periods increased and diminished greatly; 2, that the volume of bank-notes in circulation was subject to rapid and extensive expansion and contraction; 3, that the amount of specie held by the banks up to 1811 greatly preponderated over the volume of bank-notes, and that thereafter it was subject to expansion and contraction to a marked degree, but was always less than half in volume to that of bank-notes out at any one time.

INCREASE AND DECREASE OF STATE BANKS.

Notice these facts, found in the foregoing table: From 1784 to 1811 only eighty-nine new banks were started, in a period of twenty-nine years. During this period the first United States Bank was in operation for twenty years. In the four years from 1811 to 1815, two hundred and nineteen new banks were started. This was just after the expiration of the charter of the first United States Bank. Again, from 1820 to 1830, a period during which the second United States Bank was in existence, there were but twenty-two new banks started, while during the ten years from 1830 to 1840, five hundred and seventy-one new banks were started, and in the next three years two hundred and ten of them went out of existence. This occurred immediately after the veto of the bill to recharter the second United States Bank. Again, from 1843 to 1851, a period of eight years, one hundred and eighty-eight new banks were organized, while between 1851 and 1853, one hundred and twenty-nine banks expired.

INFLATION AND CONTRACTION OF BANK-NOTES.

A careful study of this table shows several very important facts in reference to the inflation and contraction of bank currency. It will be seen that from 1784, the time the first bank was organized, to 1811, there was a gradual increase in the volume of bank-notes until $28,100,000 were put in circulation. There was no sudden inflation or contraction of their volume for a period of twenty-nine years. But between 1811 and 1815 the volume of currency suddenly increased from $28,100,000 to $110,000,000, an actual inflation of $81,900,000 in four years. Notice what followed this: Within the next five years the currency was contracted $65,136,656. The coin during the entire period from 1811 to 1820 increased less than $5,000,000. Again, during the years from 1820 to 1830, a year or two before the veto of the bill for the recharter of the second United States Bank, there were but twenty-two new banks started, and there was an increase of but $16,460,554 in the bank-note circulation. But from 1830 to 1837, a period of seven years, four hundred and fifty-two new banks were organized, and the bank circulation was inflated $87,961,992.

This inflation of bank-notes took place soon after the veto of the bill for the recharter of the second United States Bank by General Jackson. Business was booming during this period. Now what followed?

This table shows that from 1837 to 1838, in one year, they contracted the volume of bank notes $33,046,980. During the next year, from 1838 to 1839, they inflated again $19,032,085; and during the four years, from 1839 to 1843, they contracted these bank notes $76,607,387. The startling fact is observed from these figures that from 1837 to 1843, the paper currency was contracted $90,622,182.

That is what they call honest money and a stable basis of business, and it shows the working of a paper currency redeemable in coin.

Notice again that from 1840 to 1843, a period of three years, three hundred and ten banks went out of existence, and from that time to 1848 they inflated their currency $69,942,483. During the next year they contracted again $13,752,676.

Again, from 1849 to 1853, in four years, they inflated $89,943,792. During the next year they contracted $17,636,974.

From 1854 to 1857 they inflated $37,826,599; while in one year after this they contracted $59,579,478.

This sudden expansion and contraction of the currency resulted in the panic of 1857 and 1858.

From 1858 to 1860 they again expanded the bank currency $51,900,133.

This constant inflation and contraction of the currency is what the hard-money press calls "regulating the currency according to the laws of trade." It shows the very great disadvantage to the people of "doing business on a specie basis" with "a paper currency at all times redeemable in coin."

BUT HOW ABOUT THE COIN?

Another important fact is discovered by examining the foregoing table, and that is, that while the banks were increasing the issues of their notes $64,546,320, the volume of coin held for the redemption of these notes diminished over $8,753,513, and that during the three years, from 1839 to 1842, when everybody wanted more money, when bank notes were being contracted over $90,000,000, the coin also disappeared from the banks to the extent of $16,692,250. Again, from 1842 the coin increased in the banks $21,457,846. In three years thereafter it contracted $14,735,753. From 1847 to 1859 it greatly increased in volume until it reached $104,537,818, an increase of $69,405,302. In one year thereafter, however, it diminished $20,993,281. Soon after the war began it disappeared from circulation altogether.

CONCLUSIONS.

These facts and figures are taken from the finance reports of the Treasury Department of the Government, and therefore they should be authentic.

They furnish a record of the unreliability of a specie basis and of a bank paper currency which is supposed to be at all times convertible into coin. It is what bankers call an "unfluctuating standard of value," a "redeemable currency," a "reliable medium of exchange," and it is a kind of "dishonest money" these dishonest money advocates would have the people adopt.

The great advantage to the banks of this system is the power it gives them to expand and contract the currency, thus increasing and decreasing prices at their pleasure, and bankrupting debtors and absorbing their property—defrauding the laborers. Shall this system be perpetuated?

Our banking system before the war, with its great imperfections, was a step in the advance of civilization. We have passed on from it. Only those who "learn nothing and forget nothing" think of going back to it. It is a graveyard out of which there is to be no resurrection. We shall never return to a currency supplied by State authority. We have learned the value of paper currency resting on the credit of the nation, and therefore alike good in every State of the Union.

THE COST OF ISSUING CURRENCY ON THE NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM.

The national-bank bill was passed February, 1863. This system is copied from that of the Bank of England. The bank buys of the government interest-bearing bonds, deposits the same with the Treasurer, and receives 90 per cent. of the deposit in notes to issue to the people at the rate of interest allowed by State laws. Thus the bank receives interest on its capital and also on its notes.

I ask careful attention to what this plan has already cost us, as revealed in the books of the Treasury. To ascertain this cost we must find how much, in bonds, the Government paid the bankers for the loan received from them, and what amount of interest has been paid to them. First, what has the Government paid for the loan secured?

To get at just what the bankers paid for their bonds, we must establish the price of gold at the periods when the bonds were sold by the Government and purchased by the bankers. The bonds were sold at par with greenbacks. The price of gold, in greenbacks, from April 1, 1863, to January 1, 1864, varied from $1.30 to $1.60, averaging $1.45. During this time sixty-six banks were organized, with a capital stock of $7,188,393. This capital was in bonds which cost the bankers, in specie, $4,866,005, giving them a clear profit of $2,322,388.

From January 1, 1864, to January 1, 1865, five hundred and eight banks were organized, with a capital of $86,782,802. The average price of gold was $2.10. This stock cost only $39,530,259.10, a clear profit of $47,252,542.90.

From January 1, 1865, to January 1, 1866, one thousand and five banks were organized, with a capital of $306,374,404. The price of gold averaged $1.62½. This stock cost $198,890,175.40, making a profit to the bankers of $107,484,228.60.

From January 1, 1866, to January 1, 1867, one hundred and thirty-one banks were organized, with a capital of $22,315,163. The price of gold averaged $1.42. This stock cost $15,620,614.10, making a profit to the bankers of $6,694,548.90.

From January 1, 1867, to January 1, 1870, the increase of capital was $10,316,886. Currency was worth 70 per cent. This stock cost $7,221,818. The banks made a profit of $3,095,068.80. Thus we see up to 1870 the banks bought of the Government bonds for a basis of issuing currency to secure circulation and deposits and for reserve to the amount of $432,977,648, for which they paid in specie only $265,651,870.80, making a clear profit of $167,325,777.20. Since 1870 the amount of bonds held by the banks has not greatly varied.

On the sums enumerated above the bankers have averaged at least 6 per cent. interest in currency. Their interest having been paid in gold, which has been at high premium much of the time, no doubt makes it average much more. It is well known that they have been able to loan their interest at from 7 to 12 per cent. as soon as received, so that we fall far below their real gains when we compound their interest at 6 per cent. This compound interest paid to bankers on their bonds for the years respectively in which they were bought to the present we find to be $1,108,088,083.93. Add to this the principal, $432,977,649, and we have the sum of $1,541,065,731.93. These figures are not easily grasped. They express sums which bewilder and amaze; yet they state approximately the amount drained out of the products of labor to furnish simply a basis for the issue of bank paper as currency. We may be able to understand this enormous expense better by considering how much it has averaged per month, which is $7,134,563.11, or still better per day, which is $237,818.77.

It should not be forgotten that their bonds of $432,977,648, which are now above par, cost them in specie but $265,651,870.80. If the Government had issued currency directly, as it did the greenbacks, to the amount of bonds sold the national banks, it would have received the full value in the service of men and in means to carry on the war, whereas it received from the banks only $265,651,870.80; and also would have saved the enormous sum of interest stated above.

On this costly basis banks have issued about three hundred and fifty million dollars of currency, costing them only the expense of preparing the notes. The amount of tax on them only a little more than meets that expense. It is difficult to fix the amount of discount paid over the counters of the banks for the currency, but we will approximate it. We estimate that they have furnished an average of $350,000,000 for sixteen years. The average rate of discount has been at least 8 per cent. This would give them $849,080,050, if we compound it.

We challenge any man to show why the Government might not have issued $432,977,648 directly to meet war expenses, to have been used as currency instead of bank notes, as it did the greenbacks. By doing so it would have saved to the people the amount paid in discount to the banks as well as the principal and interest of the bonds.

I utterly fail to find any reason why the amount of the national debt put into interest-bearing bonds to furnish a basis for bankers to issue currency might not have been put directly into currency. That simple course, demonstrated to be feasible by the sum issued in greenbacks, would have saved the enormous cost so plainly set forth.

We charge that the marvelous expense of the national-bank system has been robbery, deliberate, merciless, and ruinous to the producers. It is a curse more to be deprecated than the civil war, with all its wastes and woes. It is wholly gratuitous; there is absolutely no need of it.

Now, sir, it is the settled purpose of the authors of this iniquity to greatly enlarge it by retiring the greenbacks and making it a complete and perpetual monopoly. This purpose is the secret inspiration of the funding bill now before the House. Before we suffer the consummation of this gigantic scheme let us further count the cost.

At the lowest estimate we shall need for the next twenty years an average of $1,000,000,000 of currency. With our present population this would give $22 per capita. If the issuing of this be committed to the national-bank association we must pay them interest on bonds to the amount of $1,100,000,000. That at 4 per cent. compounded would enlarge the amount to $2,213,034,230, and that vast sum must be taken out of the product of labor to swell the fortunes of bankers and minister to their luxurious living. All this in the brief space of twenty years.

Then all currency must be borrowed of bankers by the people, and interest from 6 to 10 per cent. be paid for it in advance. For every dollar issued somebody's note must go into the bank, and the note must be the amount of the discount added to the currency issued. Thus this form of supplying the people with currency taxes them a double interest—one for the bonds and a larger one for the currency. This is a drain which no state of business can long endure. It absorbs faster than the people can produce, and causes frequent general bankruptcies.

There is still a worse phase of this infamous system. It makes the bankers "absolute dictators of the financial and business affairs of the whole people." It gives them power to vary at will the volume of currency, and thus to absolutely dictate the price of labor and property. It enthrones over the Republic a sordid, selfish, irresponsible oligarchy, a tyranny most odious and rapacious.

Mr. Chairman, to prevent the consummation of this scheme the national party has been organized, and, sir, we shall fight it to the end. We propose instead that, to the extent that our business demands, the debt of the nation shall be funded directly in currency, and that all paper currency shall be issued from the Treasury Department to the servants and creditors of the Government. The Bank of Venice furnishes us a precedent. We will present the salient points of the Venetian system by quotations from the celebrated work of Stephen Colwell on The Credit System.

I am informed that the publication of this inestimable work has been stopped by the money power by controlling the plates and copyright, and I do not wonder. That power has full control of current literature and has subordinated certain definitions and principles in standard literature to its insatiable greed. Every American dictionary up to the years 1878 and 1879 defined "dollar" as existing in silver only. Not a solitary lexicon defined the unit of money and account as existing in gold. The dollar was of silver only. An eagle was of the value of $10, &c. Until to-day Worcester's Dictionary, unabridged, retains the old definition unchanged, thus:

> A silver coin of Germany, Holland, Spain, the United States, Mexico, &c., of different values;—that of the United States dollar is 100 cents, or 4*s.* 2*d.* sterling.

All the editions of Webster up to 1879 defined "dollar" as existing in silver only. The definition in the unabridged ran thus:

> A silver coin of the United States weighing about 417 grains and equivalent to about four shillings and two pence sterling. It is equal to 100 cents, 10 dimes, or $\frac{1}{10}$ of an eagle.

In 1879, or late in 1878, the publishers of Webster's Dictionary cut the plate containing the definition of "dollar," and changed it so that dollar was defined as existing in gold. Out of sheer shame the long-standing definition was spared, but the clause defining the dollar as existing in gold was adroitly inserted so as purposely to change and corrupt the immemorial meaning of the word. The clause added to the old definition was this:

> A gold coin of the United States weighing 25.8 grains of standard gold, or 23.2 grains of pure gold.

Thus in silence and subtlety the unit of money and account which, according to the standard lexicons and the laws of the United States, had never existed except in silver, was turned into a new form so as to give the unit dollar an existence in gold. It was an ill-disguised attempt to make American lexicography bear witness to the righteousness of robbery.

A like perversion in the definition of money and the defense of silver money is found in the revised edition of Wayland's Political Economy. The "honest dead man" cannot rise from the grave to confront and punish the unscrupulous perpetrators, and his work thus corrupted must be placed in the hands of the young to inculcate error and mislead the unwary.

The revision consists for the most part of the perversion of the author's doctrine, so gross and outrageous that no parallel can be found anywhere. Wayland defines money as being "the instrument of exchange;" the reviser defines it as being "some useful product of labor which serves as a standard of value by which wealth of every kind is measured." Wayland places silver money on terms of perfect equality with gold. The reviser has the following disinterested paragraph:

> The proposed remonetization of silver would simply warrant the payment of the debts of the Government and of all private debts with a depreciated money. So far it impairs existing contracts and works a wrong of the same kind with that involved in the action of the kings of the middle ages when they debased the coin of the realm. Seen in its true light, the measure involves this: it says to every debtor as did the defaulting steward in Christ's parable, "Sit down quickly and take thy bill and mark ninety-two for every hundred."

This pious and excessively moral reviser adds the following remarkable explanation of the terrible disasters to industry from 1873 to 1878, as being in part the fact that within the last sixty years the invention and introduction of labor-saving machinery have changed the methods and increased the results of productive industry. The fact that within this time productive power has been increased very many fold is given as the reason of almost unparalleled distress among producers. Here we have presented the superior wisdom of this moneyed aristocracy.

Mr. Chairman, I confess that such morality and such wisdom are "too powerful" for common mortals, and having no language to characterize them we proceed to our quotations concerning the Bank of Venice.

THE DEBT OF THE REPUBLIC THE BASIS OF THE CURRENCY.

The public loan of Venice, which gave origin to the bank, was forced; but the whole subsequent history of the bank and the public credit is one of entire confidence on the part of the people, and admirable prudence, good faith, and forbearance on the part of the government. Venice made the public debt the chief currency or medium of exchange in all the large operations of trade; and the public debt was wisely kept at that amount, which not only preserved its value, but furnished the full quantity of currency required for trade, with the means of increasing or diminishing the amount, according to the proper demand. This mutual confidence and prudent management are creditable alike to the financial skill and intelligence of all concerned. The government enjoyed a loan, free of interest, equal to the whole capital of the bank, without having given any special guarantee, or any evidence of the debt, except an inscription on the books of the bank; the people enjoyed a currency which for centuries stood at a high premium over gold and silver.

THE DEBT SUBSTITUTED FOR CURRENCY.

The facility of payment furnished by the bank, which made it the admiration of Europe, honorable at once to the government and merchants of Venice and a support to the pride and power of its people, consisted in substituting as a medium of payment the debt of the republic for current coin.

THE DEBT MADE A LEGAL TENDER.

It was established by a solemn edict of the republic that all payments of merchandise in gross and of bills of exchange should be made only in bank, and that all debtors should carry this money to the bank to receive credits in bank therefor, and that creditors should receive payment in bank by a simple transfer from their debtors.

SUCCESS OF THE SYSTEM.

This system of payments was so well adapted to the exigencies of commerce that it was maintained in full vigor in the great commercial city of Venice for almost four hundred years.

The Bank of Venice enjoyed a reputation throughout the commercial world which greatly promoted the success of Venetian trade. It was a tower of financial strength to the republic in her long and expensive wars, and of course contributed no small share to the celebrity of the city, as well as to its power and wealth.

There is no evidence extant that the Bank of Venice ever caused any derangements of the social economy. The voice of the best authorities is all the other way.

THE FACT THAT THIS SYSTEM WAS LEGAL TENDER FOR DEBTS GAVE IT SUCCESS.

To comprehend this extraordinary fact of a credit on the books of a bank, with no money in its vaults, and not bound to make that credit good in later times, even by the payment of interest, or to redeem it in any way, having been for hundreds of years at a high premium over gold and silver, we need only remember that these credits were the funds in which debts were chiefly paid. If credits had been convertible at will into the precious metals, the agio could never have originated, much less attained so high a point; for the moment the holders of credits advanced the price, specie, if a legal tender, would have become the medium of payment as the cheaper medium.

ALL THE BULLION NEEDED EASILY OBTAINED.

Those who had occasion for gold or silver purchased with their deposits what was required, and, with slight exception, for more than four hundred years the precious metals were at a discount compared with the bank funds, the demand for that which would pay bills of exchange being greater than for gold or silver for any special use to which they could be applied.

These quotations, from an unquestioned authority, exhibit a system of finance in all essentials such as we advocate. They answer also every objection urged by the defenders of the national banks against our proposed plan.

The Venetians used all their specie for foreign exchange. They took their gold and silver to the bank and received credit therefor, which credit they used for home exchanges.

The government used the specie whenever needed to pay its obligations to other peoples, and did not keep it locked and guarded and drawing no interest for fear the people would cheat themselves, on the plan of the specie basis for currency. The credits owned by individuals against the whole people acting together in their government, by their solemn agreement put in the form of law, were made their only medium of exchange among themselves.

If it be possible to make a public debt a blessing, the Venetians made it so. They certainly prevented it from being a burden through the drain of interest. They also turned it to a great convenience by using it as a medium of exchange. We emphasize the facts that it avoided the enormous expense of the purchase of coin for home currency and its waste by wear. It also saved all interest on the public debt. It was a medium of exchange without cost. It was an eminent success for centuries. It resulted in unparalleled prosperity for those centuries. It brought no evils, but only good, to the people. Facts are stubborn things. We challenge the advocates of the bank monopoly to meet these unquestioned facts.

Mr. Chairman, we propose to follow the wise system of Venice, adapting it to our condition. The small area of the Venetian Republic made it convenient to effect all home exchanges by transfers on the books of the bank of credits against the government. With us that would be impossible. The credits of individuals against the Government must be exchanged in the form of notes convenient for circulation, as are the greenbacks. This is the main difference, made necessary by the immense area of our country.

OUR PLAN TESTED AND FOUND SUCCESSFUL IN OUR OWN HISTORY.

As far as we have used Treasury notes receivable for taxes as currency in the Confederation, States, and nation, they have proved to be the best.

Mr. Calhoun says that "under the Confederation North Carolina issued $500,000 State notes, which were made legal tender and were received for all debts due the State, and that they were always equal to coin."

Benjamin Franklin says that "from 1720 till 1760, Pennsylvania had issued her own legal-tender paper money, not one dollar of which was ever at a discount for coin." It was received for taxes. It was a currency without cost.

Thomas Jefferson says that "in 1755 Virginia issued treasury notes bearing interest. They were received for all debts due the State, and were never at a discount for coin." They afterward issued non-interest-bearing notes which were equally successful as currency.

In 1841, when the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania failed, that State issued a large amount of what was called "relief money," which was not based upon or payable in coin, but upon the credit of the State and receivable for all debts due the State. For years it was the entire money on which the business of the State was transacted, and it was ultimately redeemed in the payment of taxes.

When the civil war burst upon the nation it made the question of finance the most difficult problem for the Government. As it always does, when tested, specie failed as a basis of currency. Borrowing money was resorted to. The banks of New York and Boston loaned to the Government $60,000,000. They did so to make excuse for suspending specie payments, and in the hope of compelling the Government to exchange its bonds for their suspended notes at eighty cents on the dollar; but the Government refused to accept loans on those conditions and issued $60,000,000 of "demand notes." These notes the banks then suspended labored to discredit, and would have done so had not the Secretary of the Treasury ordered the notes to be received for duties on imports, and afterward had them made legal tender by law.

In 1862 the issue of greenbacks was commenced. They were used to pay war expenses to the amount of $400,000,000. They were made legal tender except for interest on the public debt and for customs dues. That exception was secured by the united and desperate efforts of bankers. They brought their power to bear upon the Senate, and through it effected their fell purpose. The conduct of the bankers in this matter cannot be adequately characterized; it exhibited "total depravity." They took advantage of the Government when in a life-and-death struggle, manifesting a sordid greed unparalleled in the annals of sin. The acts of ghouls who followed the Army to rob wounded men while bleeding on the field of battle were saintly compared to it. The latter secured from those who periled their lives for the nation a few dollars; the bankers robbed them and their families of millions. But for that exception, the greenbacks in which the soldiers were paid would not have fallen below par, but by that means the bankers depreciated them so that at one time it took $2.85 in them to buy $1 in gold; the bankers had the gold. The time will come when that infamy will be fully understood by a robbed people, and those who perpetrated it will be execrated as Benedict Arnold is not. The Senators who yielded to the pressure of these robbers are partakers with them.

Notwithstanding these credits held by individuals against the Government were thus outrageously crippled, they sustained the nation through four years of the wastes of an unparalleled war, have built the Pacific railroads, and for nearly nineteen years have proved better currency than bank-notes. Just as soon as the Secretary of the Treasury ordered them received for customs dues they rose to equality with gold, and since then have been preferred to gold by the collectors of interest. These facts from our own history demonstrate the wisdom of Mr. Jefferson expressed in the noted words—

> Bank paper must be suppressed, and the circulating medium must be restored to the nation, to whom it belongs. It is the only fund on which they can rely for loans. It is the only resource which can never fail them, and it is an abundant one for every necessary purpose. Treasury bills, bottomed on taxes, bearing or not bearing interest, as may be found necessary, thrown into circulation, will take the place of so much gold or silver, which last, when crowded, will find an effiux into other countries, and thus keep the quantum of medium at its salutary level.

Mr. Chairman, we have shown clearly that money is purely a creature of law, having its value as money fixed by law instead of by the commercial value of the material of which it is made.

We have demonstrated that metal money has become utterly impracticable for the rapid, numerous, and vast exchanges we have reached, and have shown that civilized people have been forced to substitute for it paper currency.

We have demonstrated further, that the cost of a paper currency based on specie or on interest-bearing bonds has become intolerable.

We have made clear by incontrovertible facts and logic that a currency made of the credits of individuals held against the Government, drawing no interest but made legal tender, answers every purpose of money in the home exchanges of a people. Such a currency costs only the preparing and replenishing the notes which are the evidences of the credit. This currency represents labor done by individuals for the Government, or the products of labor sold the Government.

We have shown that such a currency was used by Venice for centuries with marvelous success, and also that we have given it partial trial, and as far as tried it has done for us what it did for the Venetian Republic. This system is represented and illustrated by the greenbacks.

Mr. Chairman, the great, overshadowing issue before us is, shall the national bank currency or the greenback currency become universal and perpetual? We have them both now, but between them is a conflict as irrepressible as between freedom and slavery before the civil war. While the legal-tender greenback currency remains it menaces the system of the national banks. The bankers, aware of this, are determined on their destruction. The President in his last message and the Comptroller of the Currency in his last report voice that stern purpose. It will not do to have the two systems in contrast. The people are learning that while each has given about the same amount of currency for the last eighteen years, one has cost them in double interest, at the lowest estimate, $2,390,145,781, and the other only a nominal amount, and there is danger they will adopt the latter. The bankers understand this full well. One of the main motives which impelled them to the desperate efforts which secured the exception to the legal-tender power of the greenbacks was the fear to have the people learn the value of such a currency.

The same motive inspired them to secure the law by force of which a large share of the national debt has been refunded in long-time interest-bearing bonds, and is the secret of the hot haste to refund what remains of that debt manifested in the pressure to pass this bill. They fear that the temptation to refund this part of the debt in non-interest-bearing notes, to be used as currency, will be too strong for the people to resist; hence the persistent effort to make that an impossibility.

Mr. Chairman, we take the side of a currency issued directly into the channels of trade by the Government and made full legal tender. We would refund the bonds in controversy in such notes and retire the national-bank notes. The increase of the volume of currency that would result is sorely needed. We oppose every other mode of refunding. On this issue we shall appeal to the people, the sovereign power of our Republic.

Improvement of Rivers and Harbors.

REMARKS OF HON. PHILIP C. HAYES,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 12, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAYES said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I wish to make a few remarks in regard to the bill now before us, and only a few. Notwithstanding all that has been said against it, I stand here as its supporter and friend. I want the bill passed, because I believe the shipping interests of this great country demand it. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am in favor of internal improvements first, last, and all the time. I am in favor of appropriating out of the public Treasury each year all the money that can profitably be used in improving our rivers and harbors. I do not believe in being niggardly in regard to a work of such magnitude and importance. When a question comes before us which interests the whole nation, I believe in looking at it from a national stand-point; in taking views in regard to it as broad as the nation itself. More than this, I believe that it is the duty of the Government to take hold not only in a liberal but in a determined manner and improve the rivers and harbors of this great country.

Having said this much, Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask what the matter is with this bill? Why do gentlemen oppose it so bitterly? Why is there arrayed against it such a solid phalanx? I do not understand it. I have never witnessed such opposition to any river and harbor bill since I have been a member of this body. Is this war waged against it because the amount proposed to be appropriated is too large? It is a large sum, I admit, when looked at in the abstract, disconnected from the great work which it is designed to help forward. But when considered in connection with that work, it is not large. It is nothing more than we ought to have. But what makes it so large? What are the items that go to make it up? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] informed us in his speech on last Thursday in regard to the chief of these items. Something like $1,625,000 are to be set apart for the improvement of the Mississippi River according to a plan submitted by the commission authorized by the act of Congress of 1879, and approved by the War Department. Now, who is to blame for this addition to this bill? Not the Committee on Commerce assuredly. That committee acted in this case, as in all cases, upon the recommendation of the War Department, the War Department acted upon the recommendation of the commission, and the commission acted under the authority of Congress. Now, it strikes me that Congress is as much to blame as any one, if there is any blame anywhere, and gentlemen, if they would hit the guilty party, should aim their blows at Congress rather than at the Commerce Committee.

Now, sir, take this sum of $1,625,000 from the aggregate amount of the bill, and what remains? Over four hundred thousand dollars less than was appropriated in the river and harbor bill of last year. Did we appropriate any too much last year? Where is the gentleman that will say that we did? I do not think we did; and I do not think we shall appropriate too much this year if we pass this bill as it came from the hands of the committee. It seems to me from what I have heard certain gentlemen say on this floor that they fail to comprehend the magnitude and importance of the work we are making provision for carrying on; that they do not realize the enormous proportions of that work. Why, sir, look at the long line of sea-coast stretching from Maine along the Atlantic, around by the Gulf of Mexico, and along the Pacific up to Alaska. Look at the numerous rivers, many of them navigable for hundreds of miles, flowing out from the center of the country into these great bodies of water. Look at the immense number of bays, inlets, and harbors along this vast stretch of sea-coast to be improved and kept fit for use. Look at the great chain of lakes on the north with their importance to the shipping interests of the country. Look at the mighty Mississippi and the Missouri flowing through the very heart of the country with their many tributaries, all so necessary to the immense carrying trade of the great Mississippi Valley. I say look at all these and tell me if $10,000,000 are too much to expend for the year 1882 for improving them and making them subservient to the vast commercial interests of our people. I believe, sir, that we can expend double that amount to advantage every year. What is the sum of $10,000,000 in comparison with the magnitude and importance of the work? It is but a trifle; and so long as we know that it will be wisely and properly expended in improving the shipping facilities of the country I cannot see why any one should oppose its being appropriated.

I hold, Mr. Chairman, that both the internal and external or foreign commerce of this country demand that we make large appropriations for the improvement of our rivers and harbors. The commerce of this country is an immense thing now, and is yearly increasing. Look at our foreign commerce. For the year ended June 30, 1880, it amounted, both exports and imports, to the enormous sum of $1,613,770,633. But this is nothing in comparison with our internal commerce. Look at this great country, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific and covered with a complete net-work of railroads, running in all directions and busy in transporting from one point to another the extensive products of our forests, our mines, our manufactories, and our farms! Look at our grand lakes and magnificent rivers, covered during the summer months with an immense number of water craft, all plying their busy wheels to help forward the carrying trade of our fifty millions of people! Why, sir, I have the pleasure of living in the great Mississippi Valley, that immense garden lying between the Alleghany and Rocky Mountains and rich in all that munificent nature can bestow. With all the vast and varied productiveness of that valley, we need all the shipping facilities we can have. To give some idea of what we are doing out there, I call attention to the following tables, compiled by the Chicago Inter-Ocean, showing a portion of the trade of one of our cities, Chicago, for the year ending December 31, 1880. It will be observed that, except lumber, shingles, and salt, all the articles mentioned in these tables are the products of the farm:

Received.		Shipped.
Articles.	Quantity.	Articles.	Quantity.
Flour.....barrels..	3,377,313	Flour.....barrels..	2,953,459
Wheat.....bushels..	23,313,650	Wheat.....bushels..	23,114,908
Corn.....bushels..	95,846,145	Corn.....bushels..	94,911,213
Oats.....bushels..	21,852,073	Oats.....bushels..	21,007,619
Rye.....bushels..	1,841,142	Rye.....bushels..	1,855,403
Barley.....bushels..	5,274,428	Barley.....bushels..	2,998,236
Grass-seed.....bushels..	53,886,351	Grass-seed.....pounds..	44,851,348
Flaxseed.....bushels..	192,110,983	Flaxseed.....pounds..	150,888,565
Broom-corn.....pounds..	12,727,002	Broom-corn.....pounds..	9,389,992
Cured meats.....pounds..	165,331,511	Cured meats.....pounds..	954,039,680
Beef.....packages..	6,231	Beef.....packages..	92,666
Pork.....barrels..	38,103	Pork.....barrels..	366,294
Lard.....pounds..	68,481,193	Lard.....pounds..	329,753,120
Tallow.....pounds..	18,620,419	Tallow.....pounds..	28,288,902
Butter.....pounds..	67,635,852	Butter.....pounds..	60,056,453
Dressed hogs...number..	89,189	Dressed hogs..number..	33,426
Live hogs.....number..	7,066,144	Live hogs.....number..	1,386,776
Cattle.....number..	1,382,346	Cattle.....number..	747,145
Sheep.....number..	335,770	Sheep.....number..	220,815
Hides.....pounds..	71,810,334	Hides.....pounds..	71,178,309
Highwines.....barrels..	17,095	Highwines.....barrels..	7,399
Wool.....pounds..	40,253,385	Wool.....pounds..	37,940,566
Potatoes.....bushels..	1,998,845	Potatoes.....bushels..	190,922
Coal.....tons..	2,674,758	Coal.....tons..	618,027
Hay.....tons..	45,435	Hay.....tons..	12,285
Lumber.....feet..	1,556,134,000	Lumber.....feet..	813,574,000
Shingles.....number..	652,547,000	Shingles.....number..	124,230,000
Salt.....barrels..	1,169,119	Salt.....barrels..	1,019,980

These figures show an immense amount of business done. But it is only a part of what is done. To get at the correct figures we must add to these tables the products of our mines that go to that city, the products of our mills and shops and factories, and all the vast amount of various kinds of goods that go out from that city to supply the great Northwest. But when we have ascertained all that Chicago does in the line of commerce, we have only ascertained what one single city in that valley is doing. Look at the many other cities, all as busy as Chicago in proportion to their size. There is Saint Louis, Louisville, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, Saint Paul, Omaha, Kansas City, Burlington, and hundreds of others of lesser size, all busy with life and activity, helping forward the carrying trade of the country. Could we ascertain the aggregate amount of all the shipping done at these places, what an enormous sum it would be. But could we, in addition to this, ascertain all the vast amount of shipping done at all the thousands of cities in the whole land, the amount would swell to almost incredible proportions. But it is impossible to do this with any great degree of accuracy. Certain estimates, however, have been made from time to time, which, although not exactly correct, yet serve to show that the carrying trade of the country is of immense magnitude. The latest of these estimates that I have been able to find is the one made by the Bureau of Statistics (connected with the Treasury Department) some time during the summer of 1880, which gives the following:

> The internal commerce of this country greatly exceeds in magnitude its foreign commerce. From the data furnished by Mr. H. V. Poor, the accepted authority upon railroad statistics, it appears probable that the value of the traffic upon the railroads of the country alone, counting each separate shipment, is at least twenty times as great as the value of our foreign commerce. About 90 per cent. of our internal commerce now finds the means of transportation on railroads.

Now, we know what our foreign commerce is. For the year 1880, as I have before stated, it was $1,613,770,633. Multiply this by 20 and make proper additions for the commerce carried on by water, and we have something over thirty-five billion five hundred million dollars as the amount of internal commerce of this country each year. Add to this the amount of our foreign commerce, and we have a grand aggregate of $37,000,000,000. But, startling as these figures are, they are not all. They will become larger rather than smaller every year. It is safe to say that during the next decade our population will increase over a million each year. With this increase will come increased productiveness. Our agricultural interests will widen and broaden. Our mineral resources will be developed more rapidly. New manufacturing establishments will spring up on every hand; and as we thus grow as a people, and become stronger and richer and more powerful, our necessities will grow also. As our productiveness increases, our shipping facilities must be increased also. In view of these facts; in view of the vast amount of our commerce to-day, and its large probable increase each year to come, how can any gentlemen stand up on this floor and say that we ought not at this time to appropriate $10,000,000 for the improvement of our rivers and harbors? It seems to me that, as a body of men legislating for the nation's good, we ought to give heed to these facts and endeavor, so far as we can do so by legislation, to keep our shipping facilities abreast of our productive industries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there appears to be a great disposition here to criticise the committee that got up this bill; but I cannot see why this should be so. In my opinion that committee has done remarkably well. I know there is not a committee in this House that has worked harder, nor do I believe there is a committee that has sought more earnestly to do the fair and right thing. Of course they may have been imposed upon now and then, and placed some little item in the bill that ought not to be there; but would that, if it were true, be a remarkable thing? Was there ever an appropriation bill passed by this House that did not have some objectionable items in it? I think very few. My belief is that this bill is as free from objectionable features as any river and harbor bill that has been passed since I have been a member of this body, and I am surprised to hear gentlemen assail it with such bitterness. I am surprised to hear them denounce it as recommending appropriations for improvements that the Government never ought to undertake. How was this bill gotten up? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] says:

> There is no item in the bill that is not put there in conformity with the recommendation of the War Department—not one; and there are very few or no items (unless it may be some small items for finishing works) as to which we have allowed the amount of the estimate of the Department.

Now, if items have crept into this bill that ought not to be there, who is to blame? Congress authorizes the War Department to send out engineers to survey certain rivers and harbors. Acting under this authority the War Department sends engineers here and there, who, having done their work, return and make their reports. If any one of these recommends the improvement of a certain river or harbor, that fact is set forth in the estimates furnished the Commerce Committee by the War Department. The Commerce Committee act upon these recommendations. They rely upon the judgment of these engineers. If any of these improvements which they recommend ought not to be made, then the engineers are the parties to blame, and not the Commerce Committee. But, sir, I imagine that these engineers, as a general thing, are competent and reliable men. They are not likely to make recommendations for the improvement of any river or harbor unless they are thoroughly convinced that such improvement is going to benefit the carrying trade of the nation. I think we can rely upon what these men advise; and as every item in this bill has their indorsement, has in addition the approval of the War Department and the recommendation of the entire fifteen gentlemen who constitute the Commerce Committee, I think we can accept it with a reasonable assurance at least that it is about as fair and just and honest as any of the appropriation bills that come here for the consideration of this House.

I might say more, Mr. Chairman, but I feel that I have already taken up more time than I ought to have taken in advocating a bill whose merits alone should recommend it to the favorable consideration of every gentleman on this floor. As I have said before, I hope to see the bill pass and become a law. We cannot afford to let it fail.

Should we do so, immense loss must ensue to all our river and harbor improvements now being carried on, by arresting the work on them and holding it in check for a whole year. This fact gentlemen should consider before they commit themselves positively to a policy that may defeat the bill. But I cannot think the bill will be defeated. In the interest of economy, in the interest of our producing classes, in the interest of cheap freight rates, in the interest of our commerce upon the rivers, the lakes, and the ocean, the bill ought to pass, and I trust it will.

Apportionment.

SPEECH OF HON. C. E. HOOKER,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 5, 1881.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census—

Mr. HOOKER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I had hoped, when this bill was reported to the House for its consideration, and my honorable friend from New York [Mr. COX] as chairman of the committee reporting it had made the opening speech which seemed to receive universal approbation from all parts of this House, when I saw gentlemen from the other side of the Chamber crowding over to this side to congratulate him upon the able and exhaustive speech which he had made on this subject—I say I had hoped that this was one subject at least which might be considered by the American Congress without dragging it through the mire and the slough of partisan politics. But it seems in this I was mistaken. We have had, upon a simple proposition to apportion the ratio of representation in this body on the recently taken census as many political speeches as we could have had upon almost any subject that could have been introduced. I had myself believed that this was a subject so wholly foreign to politics that it would be impossible to crowd into this discussion anything of political significance. I was struck with the fact that the distinguished gentleman at the head of the Census Bureau, General Francis A. Walker, had not only by his own conduct but through the agents he appointed under the law, the supervisors and others, conducted the taking of the census in such a manner, so free from any partisan spirit, that the result I supposed would be received by the House in the same spirit, and the apportionment of members of this House under it would be made in the same spirit.

When a portion of the public press of the country undertook to criticise the manner in which the census had been taken in South Carolina and in some portions of the State of Mississippi the distinguished officer having this matter in charge at once sent his agents to make inquiry in those two States; and they came back and submitted a report which at once refuted, so far as South Carolina was concerned, and so far as portions of the State of Mississippi was concerned, the accusation that an improper and partial census had been taken. Under these circumstances I say I had hoped that we would have a discussion of this subject, not as politicians, but that we should be governed primarily in determining the ratio of the representation by the question of increase of population. I did not expect to see the question of suffrage under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution dragged into this discussion; but it has been done, and therefore it is necessary at the threshold of this discussion to ascertain how far the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States is to be consulted in the action which the House of Representatives shall take in fixing the ratio of representation.

The second section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution provides in the first clause—a clause which the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] wisely did not comment upon, and which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] did not comment upon, and which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWLEY] did not comment upon—as follows:

> Representatives shall be apportioned—
>
> Using the imperative term shall—
>
> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

The remaining portion of that section makes provision for securing the right to vote to every male citizen in every State in the Union, excepting under certain circumstances. It was said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CROWLEY,] in the speech which he made a few days ago, that you must deduct from the population of each State all the male citizens of that State twenty-one years of age who are denied the right to vote. And the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] undertook to show how many Representatives Mississippi ought to have, and how many Louisiana ought to have, and how many certain other States ought to have, on the basis of votes cast.

Upon what basis did the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Michigan proceed? By what election would they test the question as to how many persons were not allowed to vote in these States? Why, sir, it is a very well known fact that in the various elections the votes of all the States differ, and differ materially. I will call attention first to the State of New York, to see what basis the gentleman would adopt there. In 1876 the total vote in the State of New York was 828,445; in 1877 it was 786,616; in 1878 it was 1,015,502. Upon what basis, then, would the gentleman from New York undertake to ascertain what proportion of the population of New York had not been allowed to vote? Take the district which the gentleman himself now represents, and you will find that in 1876 there were cast in that district 24,118 votes. In 1878, when the gentleman was a candidate, there were cast in his district only 21,784, with three candidates in the field, a democrat, a republican, and a greenbacker. In determining what proportion of the male population of New York had been denied the privilege of voting, would the gentleman take as the basis the vote of 1876, when he was a candidate with but one opponent, and when there were 24,118 votes cast, or would he adopt as the basis the election of 1878, when there were only 21,789 votes cast?

It is proposed now that the Congress of the United States shall shrink from the discharge of its duty in making this apportionment until it has ascertained what proportion of the people in the various States of the Union have been denied the right to vote; and this position is taken especially with reference to the Southern States. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] who has just spoken maintains that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, though it does not say so in terms, was, looking to contemporary legislation in the reconstruction acts, designed to apply alone to the colored vote of the South. There is nothing in the language of the fourteenth amendment to indicate this. But if this construction were admitted, how are you going to fix the basis? For instance, in Mississippi in 1878 the entire vote in all the congressional districts and in the gubernatorial election amounted to but a few thousand. In 1876 it amounted to over one hundred and fifteen thousand. On what basis will you proceed if you undertake to ascertain how many people of Mississippi were denied the right to vote? Every man living in that State knows how this discrepancy occurred. The total vote of the State in 1878 was only 49,631; in 1876 it was 164,778; in 1877 in round numbers it was 97,000. In 1876 Mr. Tilden, the democratic candidate for President, received 112,173 votes, and Mr. Hayes, the republican candidate, 52,605. In 1877 Mr. Stone, the democratic candidate for governor, without any republican opposition, without opposition of any kind, received over ninety-seven thousand votes. Now, every one who resides in the South knows that in 1878 there was practically no vote cast. Several gentlemen on the other side have asked where were the voters? Why, they were there; but a terrible scourge afflicted the country, and our population did not come out and vote at all. In the city where I reside, the capital of the State, I received but one hundred and twenty votes at that election, and my opponent received but a very few. Such was the case all over the South.

The gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Michigan and those who concur with them, say that before you can make an apportionment, you must ascertain what proportion of the male citizens of every State in the Union have been denied the right to vote, and especially must ascertain this in the Southern States. They fail to show how this can be ascertained. They proceed, too, upon the idea that every colored voter in the Southern States, if left to vote freely according to his own judgment, would vote the republican ticket. Allow me to say that this is a very great mistake. In 1875 we changed our form of government of the Southern States. How? Not by the white vote alone, because that could not be done; but because the governments which had been established by "carpet-bag" and alien rule under a law passed by the Congress of the United States had been found so burdensome in the taxes which they imposed upon the people that every man, whether one of the loftiest intelligence or the very humblest citizen, felt the oppression of those governments—felt that they had become too onerous to be borne. The result was that when an economical form of government was proposed, whites and blacks, rich and poor, all that had to pay taxes, felt it necessary that there should be a change.

How had the governments thus brought to an end been established in the Southern States? By "carpet-bag" rulers who were aliens and strangers uniting with the colored vote, and thus filling our legislative halls with their representatives. On this question I do not like to speak my own sentiments, because it might be said, "You are a southern man; you were a rebel formerly, and you do not state the whole truth about those governments."

Mr. HORR. What does the gentleman mean by an "alien?" He says those men were "carpet-baggers" and aliens. Were they not citizens of the United States?

Mr. HOOKER. They were aliens to our soil, strangers to our institutions and our wants. They came there to run our governments for purposes of rapine and plunder. That is the reason we turned them out. But I will give the gentleman an authority that he will not question. I will answer him through the voice of a member of his own party. In 1872, when the canvass for the Presidency was going on, the most prominent man at present in the Cabinet of Mr. Hayes, a man from whom I have had occasion to differ in reference to questions of policy, but whose integrity of purpose and whose uprightness I have never doubted, took occasion to speak of those "carpet-bag" governments in the South. He said they had established there a system of government more tyrannical, more odious, and more corrupt than had ever been established anywhere before.

In the speech he made at Syracuse in the State of New York, in speaking of the reasons and the how and the wherefore of that carpet-bag government, Mr. Schurz, a member of the Cabinet of the present Executive, said, and I commend it to the sober reflection of the gentleman from Massachusetts and others who think like him:

And thus it is that the great name, the great authority of the republican party, in its national capacity, is being used this very moment to uphold the most atrocious system of government which this country ever saw. A party which cannot live and prosper unless it be supported by a revival of the old war feeling, and by tearing open again the wounds from which the people of the United States have bled so long—such a party, when it has come to that, does not deserve to live.

He referred to these Southern State governments; and that was the sentiment of Mr. Schurz in his speech which he delivered in 1872 in Syracuse.

In the same year, Mr. Speaker, this distinguished leader of the republican party, this man of lofty thought, in his own State of Missouri, in the city of Saint Louis, said that they had predicted that if you allowed the rebels to become voters, you would destroy the rights of the colored people in Missouri. But I will quote his own words. I remember he said "that the State of Missouri was not frightened by the predictions that were made then to frighten them, that the 'red-handed rebel' would rise up again in bloody ferocity and make it impossible for Union people and colored people to live in some parts of this State. Well, the people of Missouri were not frightened. They did trust. They clasped hands over the bloody chasm in 1870. Their trust was not in vain. The rebels were enfranchised. They became, not only voters, but good citizens again. The rights even of the lowest among us were more secure and sacred than ever, and we have lived as friends and brothers since. Let the American people profit by the lesson."

Mr. BREWER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOOKER. Certainly.

Mr. BREWER. When was it that Mr. Schurz made that speech?

Mr. HOOKER. In 1872.

Mr. BREWER. He was then speaking for the democratic candidate for President.

Mr. HOOKER. He was speaking for the honest party, then represented by old Mr. Greeley, of New York. [Laughter.] But do you mean to say because he was then speaking for the democratic party, he did not tell the truth? Did he really describe the Southern States' governments as they were? Did he not depict them as everybody knew them to be; and has he ever retracted one word of what he then said? No; and it stands as the recorded sentiment of the great leader of that party, who is now a member of the present Cabinet. He has never retracted one word of it, and never taken it back in the least.

No wonder the southern people, colored people as well as white, rose up in opposition to a form of government which had become intolerable. They overturned it, and then these States, acting in obedience to the instructions from the Federal Government, gave to the colored people in their constitutions the right to vote. Those colored people have exercised that right ever since. Indeed, the first proposition that ever was made to take away from the colored man the right to vote was made by a republican Executive in a message sent to the Congress of the United States, in 1876, in which it was proposed that a general property qualification should be applied after 1880.

Why, sir, so far from being opposed to colored suffrage, although we thought it doubtful at the time it was begun whether they were fitted at once, springing as they did from a condition of slavery and ignorance, to become voters at the baHot-box—although we thought it doubtful whether they were so qualified, and we had high authority for so thinking, nevertheless that suffrage was accorded them and they have ever since retained it. We had very high authority for doubting whether they were fitted at once to become full voters at the ballot-box. The late Senator Morton, in a speech which he delivered at Richmond, Indiana, and he was the great leader of his party while living, said, and his statement was afterward quoted in the Senate, that he did not believe the colored people ought to be invested with the ballot until they had undergone ten, twelve, or fifteen years of probation. But the majority of the republican party decided otherwise, and so they were made voters at once under the constitutions of the various States adopted under the reconstruction acts. They were made voters by force of those constitutions.

And that right has been secured to them, it is said, by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Who are the persons to deny it to them? Who are the persons to take it from them? But you now deny you want to make an apportionment, because you say certain portions of the people of the South have not the right to vote. I turn you to the votes of 1876 and 1878, and show you that many of the people of the North, if you are to be controlled by that test, did not vote. I can show it from subsequent elections. I can demonstrate the fact also from the district of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CROWLEY,] who represents the Lockport district. The difference is apparent there. Would you oppose now this apportionment, when the census has been taken, when we have gone back to the bosom of the people to ascertain again what sort of representation they ought to have, when we have gone back by enumeration of the people under the Constitution to ascertain their numbers, when in accordance with the ancient and well established practice of this Government since its foundation we have gone out into the body of the people, and learned exactly what increase of population has taken place since the last census—will you, I say, refuse to make an apportionment under that census, and bring renewed life and vigor into the Representative Hall of Congress? It is your duty to make this apportionment under the recent census. You owe it to the great mass of the American people to do it. You have done it every ten years, and now if you shall oppose it according to the sentiments of the gentleman from New York, and the gentleman from Michigan and others who have participated in this debate, until you can send out commissioners to ascertain how many in Rhode Island have been deprived of the right to vote, and how many in Pennsylvania, because of property qualifications, and how many in the Southern States have been denied the right to vote, then you will say in effect to this whole country, notwithstanding its vast increase in population, notwithstanding its increase in industrial pursuits, notwithstanding the people are looking forward to the American Congress to give them proper representation, that this largely increased population on the part of our people shall have no representation until the next decennial period.

Mr. Speaker, it must be remembered that we are only fixing under the Constitution the ratio of representation which shall last for ten years. Yet gentlemen on the other side say we shall refuse to the great mass of the people the right of representation under the recent census, until we have ascertained how many people in Rhode Island, and how many in Pennsylvania, and how many in New York, have been denied the right of voting. We are told that we shall be denied this representation until it has been ascertained how many colored people in the South have been denied the right to vote. Sir, if gentlemen postpone it until then, if they postpone it until they ascertain that fact, they will never make a report. The duty of the present Congress, Mr. Speaker, is to make the apportionment now. I say it must be made upon the basis of increased population, that is the great leading idea that must distinguish and characterize legislation.

Some portions of the South have increased in population. The State represented by my friend Mr. REAGAN (the State of Texas) has increased its population to such an extent that it will be entitled, I understand, to four additional members. The State of Mississippi has increased until it will be entitled to one additional member. Some of the extreme New England States have reduced their population and will lose here and there a Representative in Congress, but no great proportion. And will you say that you will refuse to make an apportionment because the great tide of immigration, following the law of its natural pursuits and avocations, has flowed to the South and West? Will you say that because the great West has increased vastly in population, and because the South has increased, that you will decrease their ratio of representation to which they are entitled in this House, or that you will deny them representation? Do you begrudge the people of the South their rights, that people laboring after the war with nothing but their lands, blackened and scarred by the terrible breath of war but, thank God, not altogether deprived of fertility and the power of production? Will you, I say, deprive them of the increased representation to which they are entitled? Will you refuse it to the West and say, "No, we will not give you your increased representation; we will withhold that to which you are constitutionally entitled until we ascertain why five hundred men in Massachusetts, or in South Carolina, or in Rhode Island, have not exercised the right of suffrage to which they are entitled?" Will you refuse to perform a great and solemn duty due by you to the American people for a mere chimerical idea like this?

As I have stated, sir, the increase of population has been South and West. We have our representation upon the basis of population, and we ask you to comply with your solemn duty; we ask that alone, and nothing else. We ask that the natural increase which has been granted to us shall be recognized.

Do you want to take away the right of the colored man to vote? Do you want to refuse representation in the South because the negro does vote? If you do, if you want to deprive him of his rights, or deprive him of his representation, then I protest against it as a southern man. You gave them the ballot when they were probably altogether unfitted for it. You gave it to them when they were not prepared to exercise it as freemen ought to exercise it. But ten, fifteen years have passed, and they have learned that if we of the South make a cheap government for the white man, we make a cheap government for the colored man. They are becoming now, to a considerable extent, interested in holding property. They are the owners of land and the owners of leases all over the South. They own the animals with which they cultivate these lands and the implements of agriculture, and they own their own household furniture, and, in a great measure, they are interested in all the prosperity of that section of country. If they have increased in population, are they not entitled to additional representation? Would you take it away? Is there anybody on the other side who wants to do it? Then, if not, what are you grumbling about? You are like the old woman who was always knitting stockings for the children in the Timbuctoo Islands. She was always knitting, always at work for them, and when her neighbors came in and asked the question, "What are you doing?" she says, "I am knitting stockings for the poor children in the Timbuctoo Islands;" while her own children were running around the floor shoeless and stockingless.

The negro is but another illustration of your paternal care. As long as you can drive him; as long as you can make him go your way; as long as you can herd them together and force them to the polls to vote the republican ticket, you want to protect them, and you claim for them that they need protection even among those people who have proven themselves to be their friends. But as soon as the negro living with the white man there, learning that his property is protected under the same law that protects the property of the white man, learning, as I have said, that a cheap government for the white man means a cheap government for himself, as soon as he begins to exercise his own judgment and votes the democratic ticket, you say that it is an instance of depravity on the part of the negro, or intimidation on the part of the white people, and that they shall be deprived of their representation in proportion.

In the last election in the State of Mississippi, I think there was not a single instance—not one certainly that came to my knowledge in any portion of that State, or in any portion of the adjoining States, Alabama or Georgia—where a single colored man, entitled to vote, and authorized to vote under the Constitution and the laws, was denied the privilege. They have long since learned to understand that we are all in the same boat together. They know that if we ride the storms safely they will also. If we have a good government for the white man, a cheap government for the white man—low taxes—we make it a good government for the negro, and a cheap government for the colored man as well.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the people who pay the taxes of this country—that the people who pay the taxes of every country—are in the end the laboring men. It is the product of his labor that pays the tax, whether he makes one bag of cotton or one bushel of grain or a thousand bags of cotton.

I say, therefore, that when you make cheap government for these people you make cheap government for the white man and for all alike; and they know it and find it out.

Now, it is said that you ought to pause before you make this apportionment, before you determine what shall be the number of this House. I am indifferent as to the number, except to this extent, that I do not think it ought to be increased until this House becomes an unwieldy body. In 1842, when the question of apportionment was under discussion and when some of the most distinguished men of this country engaged in the discussion, it was proposed to fix the number of this House then—even as early as 1842—at three hundred and six; three hundred and six was the number in the bill which passed this House. When it went to the Senate the number was largely decreased there. Reference was made then, as in this debate, to the forms of governments in other countries, and particularly to the House of Commons in England. The House of Commons consists of six hundred and fifty-eight members. But, Mr. Speaker, a quorum of the House of Commons consists of only forty. And then there is no basis on which you can draw an analogy between the House of Representatives in the American Congress and the House of Commons in England; for this reason, that the House of Commons legislates for all Great Britain, for India, for the African Islands, for all the British dependencies. There is but that single legislature to speak for them. The House of Representatives legislates simply on those subjects that are intrusted to it under the Constitution. And in addition to that, every State of the Union has its representatives in the Senate and House of Representatives of each of the thirty-eight States looking to their local interests and local affairs.

I would rather, sir, compare this House with the ancient governments of the old world when the Roman Senate, in the palmiest days of the power and splendor of the empire, consisted only of five hundred representatives and a little over, clothed with absolute unchecked power, with the power even to remove a consul. I say I would rather compare our system of government with that more analogous to it alike in its extent and in its operation than with the English Parliament. I would leave it at three hundred and one or fix it at three hundred and seven. In that debate in 1842 the proposition was to make three hundred and six the basis of representation. I am not particular about the number. Only I say we ought to be governed by two things: First, we must be governed by the laws of increase of population; secondly, we must be governed by the consideration that we ought not to make this House too numerous a body, a body too unwieldy in the exercise of its power.

But I am not in favor of a very restricted representation. I believe, sir, that a large House of Representatives is essential to our institutions. We have grown now from the number of sixty-five, which was fixed arbitrarily in the first House which assembled, up to two hundred and ninety-three. It is proposed by this bill of the majority of the committee to put the number at three hundred and eleven. The amendment of my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] the chairman of the committee, puts it at three hundred and one. I am indifferent whether three hundred and one or three hundred and seven be the number adopted; but I do not think it should go beyond the latter number. I think the House is now as large as it ought to be and as is consistent with proper deliberation. But if you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that a quorum of this House must exceed the one-half of its members, as a quorum of the Senate must also exceed the one-half of its members, and since we must not lose the idea of a representative system, and when the census shows the immense increase in numbers of the people of this country, extending across the continent from ocean to ocean, with vast industries, great pursuits, and wonderful commerce stretching all over the world, its ports from New York to Galveston sending out fleets all over the world—that we number fifty millions, and that the population increases at a rapid rate north, south, east, and west; I say do not deny to the great American people, with their wonderfully diversified resources and development, the right of representation, and do not delay the settlement of this question upon a simple pretext that there are persons in certain portions of the country not entitled to vote.

I would inquire, Mr. Speaker, how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes of his hour left.

Mr. HOOKER. I must keep my promise to a gentleman on the other side, and will draw my remarks to a close.

I again appeal to the fair-minded men of this House, on the other side and on this side, that if the freedom of the colored man and his admission to representation gives power to the South or to the West, then do not deny it, do not be niggardly in the liberality with which you treat the colored race. Let them enjoy the full benefit of it.

I am glad to see by the census that the negroes as well as the whites have increased in numbers. The people of the South, white and black, after the war were very poor. All were struggling for the means of keeping soul and body together and driving the wolf away from the door. It does not become a great and mighty party, powerful in its extent and great in its resources, to attempt to strike down the weak. Let them take a lesson from the great thunderer of the skies, who with his lightning bolt "strikes rather the gnarled and unwedgeable oak than the soft and tender myrtle."

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS.]

Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. C. E. HOOKER,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 5, 1881,

On the subject of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. HOOKER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In 1841 and 1845 and 1849 and 1853 and 1857 and 1861 and 1865 and 1869 and 1873, as in every presidential election since 1797, and including that, the official record states, and I now quote from that record, that—

> The two Houses of Congress having assembled, the certificates of election of the several States for President and Vice-President were in their presence opened by the Vice-President and delivered to the tellers, who, having read and ascertained the number of votes, presented to the Vice-President a list thereof.

And here ends the quotation. In 1793, when General Washington was unanimously re-elected, the proceedings differed somewhat from all that followed. The record states with reference to the count:

> The two Houses having accordingly assembled, the certificates of the electors of the fifteen States in the Union, which came by express, were, by the Vice-President, opened, read, and delivered to the tellers appointed for the purpose, who, having examined and ascertained the votes, presented a list of them to the Vice-President, which list was read to the two Houses.

It will be observed that even on this occasion, in 1793, on the re-election of General Washington, while the President of the Senate opened and read the returns from the respective electoral colleges, they were yet delivered to the tellers appointed by the two Houses to examine and ascertain what the votes were, and they were then returned to the Vice-President, who simply performed the function of announcing the result.

In 1857, when the vote of Wisconsin was not cast on the proper day, owing to the fact that the electors could not reach the capital of the State, but cast upon a subsequent day, the inquiry arose as to whether the vote of Wisconsin should be counted; and after debate in each House, and the report of the tellers requiring it, it was counted. But in the course of the debate, the Vice-President was bitterly accused by men of both parties of having usurped a power with reference to counting the electoral vote with which he was not invested by the Constitution.

In reply to that the then Vice-President said that he "did not undertake to decide whether the vote of Wisconsin was a good vote or a bad vote." He disclaimed—I now quote his own language—"having assumed on himself any authority to determine whether that vote or any other vote was a good or a bad vote."

In the joint convention which assembled, Mr. Jones, one of the tellers, remarked:

I suppose, Mr. President, the proper way would be for the tellers to report the facts to the convention of the two Houses and let them decide.

To which the Vice-President replied:

The presiding officer so considers.

In the debate which ensued after the two Houses had separated, Mr. Seward said, speaking of the power which the Vice-President was accused of assuming:

A misunderstanding exists in both Houses of Congress whether the President of the Senate, acting, as I hold, as the organ of the Senate, has not passed upon the question and counted the votes from the State of Wisconsin, and whether that may not be drawn into a precedent hereafter. I am one of that number who think that the Vice-President has not counted them.

Mr. Douglas, then a distinguished Senator from the State of Illinois, commenting upon the same subject-matter of the assumed power of the Vice-President, said:

I rise to state that in my opinion the tellers have no right to authenticate the certificate until the two Houses have passed upon it as being a true count.

Mr. Crittenden said—

That any member of either House has the privilege and right to object to the counting of a vote.

But I proceed with the remarks of Mr. Crittenden. He said—

That any member of either House has the privilege and right to object to the counting of a vote, and that it was competent for the Senate and House of Representatives alone to decide upon that objection.

Speaking of a supposed assumption of authority by the Vice-President to declare the vote, he said:

It involves the privilege of determining a presidential election and declaring who shall be President. I protest against any such power.

So much, then, Mr. Speaker, for the early precedents upon this subject and the manner in which they run through the several occasions when the powers of the two Houses were called in question. They settle conclusively and forever the assumption that the Vice-President, or the President pro tempore of the Senate, has the right to open and count the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Department of Agriculture.

REMARKS OF HON. H. D. MONEY,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 7, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4909) for the creation of a Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MONEY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The business of the executive branch of the Government is to execute the laws and administer public affairs. The Cabinet of the President is a political council with whom the President advises upon his foreign and domestic policy. All matters of mere business are attended to by the several bureaus and divisions of the respective Departments; but in the council of State no business, trade, or industry, as such, should have any voice. The Cabinet as a whole represents all the interests of the Republic and all classes of its citizens.

There is nothing in this bill, nor is there anything in the arguments in its favor that shows that the addition of another officer to the Cabinet to be called the Secretary of Agriculture, or by any other name, would in the slightest particular confer any advantage or benefit upon our farmers. The present officer, the Commissioner of Agriculture, can do all for our agricultural interests that he could do if admitted to the Cabinet. This bill does not enlarge his powers for usefulness nor make more effective those which he has, and if any new legislation is proposed in that direction it can be done for him as the head of a bureau as well as the head of a Department.

Gentlemen talk about adding dignity to the profession of agriculture! It is insulting to this noble profession to say so! I beg gentlemen's pardon, but there is no power in this Congress to add one jot or tittle to the dignity of the profession which embraces the majority of our population, owning the greater part of our property, and the most reliably conservative in peace and patriotic in war—a profession upon whose labors the prosperity of every other class is based, and whose industry, economy, and intelligence furnishes the solid foundation of our national prosperity and honor. No, sir; the farmers of our land stand independent of empty compliments, and are accustomed to confer dignity upon others. If it could be shown that this measure could lift even one single burden from the farmer's shoulder, add one single dollar to his purse, soften a single asperity of his rugged toil, brighten his life with one added ray of sunshine, or endow him with a higher conception of the dignity, honor, and usefulness of his profession, it would receive my hearty support. We have now no vocation, trade, or industry represented as such in the Cabinet; it is, as was designed by our forefathers, a political council to assist the President, who is responsible for their acts, not they for his. Add to this council the representative distinctly of a class or business calling, and at once you will be called upon to make a department of commerce, another of manufactures, another of mines, another of railroads or transportation, and so on, until the Cabinet, which now meets to advise the President upon the affairs of the whole country in the interest of all citizens for the common weal, would become a wrangle of trades over conflicting interests, each representative member anxious for his own and indifferent to the whole.

I represent an agricultural constituency. I believe I understand their wants. I know I fully sympathize with them in all their aspirations and efforts for improvement, materially and otherwise, and my recorded votes since I have been a member of this House show that I have consulted their interests and provided for them as faithfully as lay in my power, and I will gladly assist in any measure to promote their good; but I am convinced that this measure can in no respect whatever ameliorate their condition, ennoble a profession already of primal dignity, or make any weightier their already preponderant power; but, on the contrary, that it is an innovation that may lead to unhappy consequences. For these reasons, sir, I record my vote in the negative.

Apportionment.

LETTER TO HON. S. S. COX,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 9, 1881.

The following letter and accompanying table, relating to the apportionment of representation under the recent census, and supplementary to the various papers previously published, were, on motion of Mr. COX, February 9, 1881, ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1881.

DEAR SIR: The main difficulty in apportioning members of Congress among the States being that some States fall short of their share of representation by reason of small fractions of population, while others by reason of large fractions get an additional Representative, thus exceeding their just share of representation, I desire to call your attention to the inclosed table, which shows at what number of total Representatives these disadvantages are reduced to the minimum.

If what New Hampshire loses by reason of fractions Vermont could gain, and what South Carolina loses Georgia could gain, it would be far more just than that Vermont and New Hampshire both gain by fractions while South Carolina and Georgia both lose. The table shows the sectional gains and losses under each apportionment from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and twenty-five, inclusive. Among the Eastern States are included the six New England and the four Middle States; in the Southern States are included Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and the States south of them; in the Western States all from Ohio to Kansas and Nebraska; and in the Pacific States California, Colorado, Nevada, and Oregon.

As will be seen from the table, if two hundred and ninety-four be the total number of Representatives, the East gets eighty-eight, while its population strictly entitles it to 87.27; the South gets one hundred and seven, while its population entitles it to 109.82; the West gets ninety-one, while its population entitles it to 89.69; and the Pacific gets eight, while entitled to 7.72. Thus so many of the Southern States lose by fractions that their net loss is equivalent to 389,584 people unrepresented, or to 2.32 Representatives. A correspondingly unfair advantage is distributed between the East, West, and Pacific States; the excess of eastern representation, .73 of a member, being equal to a double representation of 122,585 people; of the West, 1.31 of a member, being equal to a double representation of 219,980 people; and of the Pacific States, .28 of a member, being equal to a double representation of 47,019 people. The total variations between the four sections of the country are such as would result from unrepresenting or doubly representing 779,168 people.

If three hundred and one be the total number of Representatives, the East gets ninety, while entitled to 89.35; the South gets one hundred and eleven, while entitled to 111.92; the West gets ninety-two, while entitled to 91.82, and the Pacific gets eight, while entitled to 7.90. In this case the South suffers the loss of .92 of a Representative, equivalent to 150,897 people unrepresented, which is distributed; to the East .65 of a Representative, equivalent to 106,612 people doubly represented; to the West .18 of a Representative, equivalent to 29,523 people doubly represented; to the Pacific .10 of a Representative, or 16,402 people doubly represented; a total variation from justice of 303,434 people's representation.

If three hundred and seven be the total number of Representatives, the East gets ninety-two, while entitled to 91.13; the South gets one hundred and fourteen, while entitled to 114.15; the West gets ninety-three, while entitled to 93.66, and the Pacific gets eight, while entitled to 8.06; thus the East has .87 of a Representative more than its share, equivalent to 139,907 people twice represented, of which the South sacrifices .15 of a Representative, equivalent to 24,121 people unrepresented; the West sacrifices .66 of a Representative, equivalent to 106,136 people unrepresented, and the Pacific sacrifices .06 of a Representative, equivalent to 9,649 people unrepresented. The total variation amounts in this case to 279,814.

If three hundred and eleven be the total number of Representatives, the East gets ninety-two, while entitled to 92.32; the South gets one hundred and seventeen, while entitled to 115.64; the West gets ninety-four, while entitled to 94.88, and the Pacific gets 8, while entitled to 8.17. In this case the South has an excess of 1.36 Representatives, equal to 215,893 people twice represented, which it takes from the East .32 of a Representative, 50,798 people; from the West .88 of a Representative, 139,695 people, and from the Pacific .17 of a Representative, 26,987 people. The total variation is 433,286.

If three hundred and nineteen be the total number, the East gets ninety-five, while entitled to 94.69; the South gets one hundred and eighteen, while entitled to 118.62; the West gets ninety-seven, while entitled to 97.32; and the Pacific nine, while entitled to 8.38. Here the East gets an excess of .31 of a Representative, 47,977 people, and the Pacific an excess of .62 of a Representative, 95,954 people; which excesses are taken from the South, .62 of a Representative, 95,954 people, and from the West .32 of a Representative, 49,524 people. The total variation is equivalent to doubly representing or not representing 289,409 people.

The foregoing are the numbers which seem to have been most thought of, except the one first named, which is given as illustrating the greatest sectional injustice that can be done by any number between two hundred and ninety-three and three hundred and twenty-five. The number which does the least sectional injustice is three hundred and four. In this case the East gets ninety Representatives, while entitled to 90.24; the South gets one hundred and thirteen, while entitled to 113.04; the West gets ninety-three, while entitled to 92.74; and the Pacific gets eight, while entitled to 7.98. The South only lacks .04 of a Representative of justice, and the Pacific only exceeds justice by .02 of a Representative. The .24 of a Representative which the East falls short of justice and the .26 of a Representative which the West gets in excess of justice, would equal the unrepresentation of but 38,976 people out of the 14,654,671 people of the East, and the double representation of but 42,224 people out of the 15,061,006 people of the West. The total variation would be represented by 90,944 people unrepresented or doubly represented.

The number next to three hundred and four in doing little injustice is three hundred and six, where the effect is equal to 124,231 people unrepresented or twice represented, and the number next nearest to justice is three hundred and two, equivalent to 140,588 people unrepresented or doubly represented. The order therefore in which the proposed numbers come nearest to doing equal justice to all sections of the country is: three hundred and four, three hundred and six, three hundred and two, three hundred and five, three hundred and eighteen, three hundred and three, three hundred and seven, three hundred and nineteen, three hundred and one, three hundred and twenty, three hundred and eight, three hundred and seventeen, three hundred and sixteen, three hundred and twenty-five, three hundred and eleven, three hundred and thirteen, three hundred and nine, two hundred and ninety-nine, two hundred and ninety-seven, three hundred and fifteen, three hundred and twenty-four, three hundred and twenty-one, three hundred, three hundred and ten, two hundred and ninety-five, three hundred and twelve, two hundred and ninety-eight, three hundred and twenty-three, three hundred and fourteen, two hundred and ninety-three, two hundred and ninety-six, three hundred and twenty-two, two hundred and ninety-four.

Yours, very truly,

CHAS. W. SMILEY.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Chairman Joint Special Committee Tenth Census,
United States House of Representatives.

The apportionment of members of Congress under the census of 1880, (upon each total from 293 to 325, inclusive,) compared sectionally with an apportionment strictly according to the population of each section, and showing the sectional injustice of the different apportionments from 293 to 325, inclusive.

Proposed number of Representatives.	Ratio, 1 to—	Eastern States.				Southern States.				Western States.				Pacific States.
		Representatives assigned.	Representatives entitled to.	More or less than justly entitled to.	People doubly represented or unrepresented.	Representatives assigned.	Representatives entitled to.	More or less than justly entitled to.	People doubly represented or unrepresented.	Representatives assigned.	Representatives entitled to.	More or less than justly entitled to.	People doubly represented or unrepresented.	Representatives assigned.	Representatives entitled to.	More or less than justly entitled to.	People doubly represented or unrepresented.
293	168,497	87	86.97	+.03	5,055	107	108.95	−1.95	328,569	91	89.38	+1.62	272,965	8	7.69	+.31	52,234
294	167,924	88	87.27	+.73	122,585	107	109.32	−2.32	389,584	91	89.69	+1.31	219,980	8	7.72	+.28	47,019
295	167,354	88	87.57	+.43	71,962	108	109.69	−1.69	282,828	91	89.99	+1.01	169,028	8	7.75	+.25	41,838
296	166,789	89	87.86	+1.14	190,139	108	110.06	−2.06	343,585	91	90.30	+.70	116,752	8	7.77	+.23	38,361
297	166,228	89	88.16	+.84	139,631	109	110.44	−1.44	239,368	91	90.60	+.40	66,491	8	7.80	+.20	33,246
298	165,670	90	88.46	+1.54	225,132	109	110.81	−1.81	299,863	91	90.91	+.09	14,910	8	7.82	+.18	29,821
299	165,116	90	88.75	+1.25	206,395	110	111.18	−1.18	194,837	91	91.21	−.21	34,674	8	7.85	+.15	24,767
300	164,565	90	89.05	+.95	156,337	110	111.55	−1.55	255,075	92	91.52	+.48	78,990	8	7.88	+.12	19,748
301	164,018	90	89.35	+.65	106,612	111	111.92	−.92	150,897	92	91.82	+.18	29,523	8	7.90	+.10	16,402
302	163,475	90	89.64	+.36	58,851	112	112.30	−.30	49,042	92	92.13	−.13	21,252	8	7.93	+.07	11,443
303	162,936	90	89.94	+.06	9,776	112	112.67	−.67	109,166	93	92.44	+.56	91,244	8	7.96	+.04	6,517
304	162,400	90	90.24	−.24	38,976	113	113.04	−.04	6,496	93	92.74	+.26	42,224	8	7.98	+.02	3,248
305	161,868	90	90.53	−.53	85,790	114	113.41	+.59	95,502	93	93.05	−.05	8,093	8	8.01	−.01	1,619
306	161,339	91	90.83	+.17	27,428	114	113.78	+.22	35,494	93	93.35	−.35	56,469	8	8.03	−.03	4,840
307	160,813	92	91.13	+.87	139,907	114	114.15	−.15	24,122	93	93.66	−.66	106,136	8	8.06	−.06	9,649
308	160,291	92	91.43	+.57	91,366	115	114.53	+.47	75,337	93	93.96	−.96	153,879	8	8.09	−.09	14,426
309	159,772	92	91.72	+.28	44,736	116	114.90	+1.10	175,749	93	94.27	−1.27	202,910	8	8.11	−.11	17,575
310	159,257	92	92.02	−.02	3,185	117	115.27	+1.73	275,514	93	94.57	−1.57	250,033	8	8.14	−.14	22,296
311	158,745	92	92.32	−.32	50,798	117	115.64	+1.36	215,893	94	94.88	−.88	139,695	8	8.17	−.17	26,987
312	158,236	92	92.61	−.61	96,524	117	116.01	+.99	156,654	94	95.18	−1.18	186,718	9	8.19	+.81	128,171
313	157,730	92	92.91	−.91	143,534	117	116.39	+.61	96,215	95	95.49	−.49	77,288	9	8.22	+.78	123,029
314	157,228	92	93.21	−1.21	190,246	118	116.76	+1.24	194,963	95	95.79	−.79	124,210	9	8.24	+.76	119,493
315	156,729	92	93.50	−1.50	235,093	118	117.13	+.87	136,354	96	96.10	−.10	15,673	9	8.27	+.73	114,412
316	156,233	93	93.80	−.80	124,986	118	117.50	+.50	78,116	96	96.40	−.40	62,493	9	8.30	+.70	109,363
317	155,740	93	94.10	−1.10	171,314	118	117.87	+.13	20,246	97	96.71	+.29	45,165	9	8.32	+.68	105,903
318	155,250	94	94.39	−.39	60,548	118	118.24	−.24	37,260	97	97.01	−.01	1,553	9	8.35	+.65	100,913
319	154,764	95	94.69	+.31	47,977	118	118.62	−.62	95,954	97	97.32	−.32	49,524	9	8.38	+.62	95,954
320	154,280	95	94.99	+.01	1,543	118	118.99	−.99	152,737	98	97.62	+.38	58,626	9	8.40	+.60	92,568
321	153,799	95	95.28	−.28	43,064	118	119.36	−1.36	209,166	99	97.93	+1.07	164,565	9	8.43	+.57	87,665
322	153,322	95	95.58	−.58	88,927	118	119.73	−1.73	265,247	100	98.23	+1.77	271,380	9	8.45	+.55	84,327
323	152,847	95	95.88	−.88	134,505	119	120.10	−1.10	168,132	100	98.54	+1.46	223,157	9	8.48	+.52	79,480
324	152,375	95	96.17	−1.17	178,279	120	120.48	−.48	73,140	100	98.84	+1.16	176,755	9	8.51	+.49	74,664
325	151,906	96	96.47	−.47	71,396	120	120.85	−.85	129,120	100	99.15	+.85	129,120	9	8.53	+.47	71,396

RECAPITULATION.

Proposed number of Representatives.	Ratio, 1 to—	More or less Representatives than justly entitled to.				People doubly represented or unrepresented.
		East.	South.	West.	Pacific.	East.	South.	West.	Pacific.	Total.
293	168,497	+.03	−1.95	+1.62	+.31	5,055	328,569	272,965	52,234	658,823
294	167,924	+.73	−2.32	+1.31	+.28	122,585	389,584	219,980	47,019	779,168
295	167,354	+.43	−1.69	+1.01	+.25	71,962	282,828	169,028	41,838	565,656
296	166,789	+1.14	−2.06	+.70	+.23	190,139	343,585	116,752	38,361	688,837
297	166,228	+.84	−1.44	+.40	+.20	139,631	239,368	66,491	33,246	478,736
298	165,670	+1.54	−1.81	+.09	+.18	255,132	299,863	14,910	29,821	599,726
299	165,116	+1.25	−1.18	−.21	+.15	206,395	194,837	34,674	24,767	460,673
300	164,565	+.95	−1.55	+.48	+.12	156,337	255,075	78,990	19,748	510,150
301	164,018	+.65	−.92	+.18	+.10	106,612	150,897	29,523	16,402	303,434
302	163,475	+.36	−.30	−.13	+.07	58,851	49,042	21,252	11,443	140,588
303	162,936	+.06	−.67	+.56	+.04	9,776	109,166	91,244	6,517	216,703
304	162,400	−.24	−.04	+.26	+.02	38,976	6,496	42,224	3,248	90,944
305	161,868	−.53	+.59	−.05	−.01	85,790	95,502	8,093	1,619	191,004
306	161,339	+.17	+.22	−.35	−.03	27,428	35,494	56,469	4,840	124,231
307	160,813	+.87	−.15	−.66	−.06	139,907	24,122	106,136	9,649	279,814
308	160,291	+.57	+.47	−.96	−.09	91,366	75,337	153,879	14,426	335,008
309	159,772	+.28	+1.10	−1.27	−.11	44,736	175,749	202,910	17,575	440,970
310	159,257	−.02	+1.73	−1.57	−.14	3,185	275,514	250,033	22,296	551,028
311	158,745	−.32	+1.36	−.88	−.17	50,798	215,893	139,695	26,987	433,286
312	158,236	−.61	+.99	−1.18	+.81	96,524	156,654	186,718	128,171	568,067
313	157,730	−.91	+.61	−.49	+.78	143,534	96,215	77,288	123,029	440,066
314	157,228	−1.21	+1.24	−.79	+.76	190,246	194,963	124,210	119,493	628,912
315	156,729	−1.50	+.87	−.10	+.73	235,093	136,354	15,673	114,412	501,532
316	156,233	−.80	+.50	−.40	+.70	124,986	78,116	62,493	109,363	374,958
317	155,740	−1.10	+.13	+.29	+.68	171,314	20,246	45,165	105,903	342,628
318	155,250	−.39	−.24	−.01	+.65	60,548	37,260	1,553	100,913	200,274
319	154,764	+.31	−.62	−.32	+.62	47,977	95,954	49,524	95,954	289,409
320	154,280	+.01	−.99	+.38	+.60	1,543	152,737	58,626	92,568	305,474
321	153,799	−.28	−1.36	+1.07	+.57	43,064	209,166	164,565	87,665	504,460
322	153,322	−.58	−1.73	+1.77	+.55	88,927	265,247	271,380	84,327	709,881
323	152,847	−.88	−1.10	+1.46	+.52	134,505	168,132	223,157	79,480	605,274
324	152,375	−1.17	−.48	+1.16	+.49	178,279	73,140	176,755	74,664	502,838
325	151,906	−.47	−.85	+.85	+.47	71,396	129,120	129,120	71,396	401,302

River and Harbor Improvements.

SPEECH OF HON. G. DE LA MATYR,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 7, 1881.

On the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

By substituting treasury notes for national-bank currency funds can be secured to open three lines of water-ways from the Mississippi Valley to the ocean, besides improving the Missippi River.

Mr. DE LA MATYR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The river and harbor bill now before the House brings up a subject which next to finance is the most important that engages the attention of our statesmen. The measureless resources of agriculture and mineral wealth opened in the Mississippi Valley and west of it make the question of transportation to the seaboard one of immediate and paramount interest.

I rise, sir, mainly for the purpose of calling attention to a remarkable report upon this subject presented to the Senate by Mr. WINDOM, of Minnesota, in 1874. No more able or valuable report was ever presented to Congress, and I marvel that it has elicited so little interest. I had the honor at the extra session of last year to present to the House a bill prepared by Colonel John Childs, of Kentucky, the purpose of which was to execute the recommendations of that report; and it called forth an outburst of derision, especially from the republican press of the whole country. It was stigmatized as proposing a system of "De La Matyr canals." It was evident that metropolitan editors as well as their country cousins were utterly ignorant of this report, although it came from a committee a majority of whom were the ablest republicans in the Senate. I was not so lost to all sense of propriety as to have presented, even at the request of another, a bill proposing so vast a system of internal improvements, resting on my judgment alone; but, sir, I did not hesitate to act on a judgment so competent as that which originated that report, and the ignorant sneering which Mr. Childs's bill caused did not in the least disturb me.

Mr. WINDOM'S report recommends the opening or improving of four lines of transportation to the seaboard. It shows conclusively that they were then needed. The eight years which have elapsed since have doubled the demand for such addition to our facilities for moving the products of the West to the sea. The vast range in the Northwest capable of unlimited production of cereals, opened by the extension of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and by explorations for other purposes, and the tide of immigration into it, promise to more than double the amount of freight to be shipped.

Within these few years the South has exhibited resources which demand attention. Alabama promises to be the banner iron State. Capabilities of cotton and tobacco under free and skilled labor are awaking interest.

Florida is only beginning to receive investigation of her marvelous possibilities. She is capable of producing oranges—the best in the world—pine-apples, lemons, limes, and cocoa-nuts in such abundance that she is destined to be one of the richest States in the Union. These fruits and the iron of Alabama must be transported to the great Northwest and cereals returned to the South.

Just now the people are rousing to the fact that railroad corporations have acquired a dangerous power, and they are seeking a way to break that power. This report discusses that subject with the same eminent ability that it presents the necessity of great thoroughfares for freight under Government control.

We are greatly indebted to the Senate committee, and especially to its able chairman, Mr. WINDOM, of Minnesota, for that exhaustive report.

Mr. Speaker, in order to call the attention of the country to this report I quote the substance of it, skillfully pressed into a small compass in the summary:

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS.

The following general summary of the conclusions and recommendations of the committee are respectfully submitted:

First. One of the most important problems demanding solution at the hands of the American statesman is: By what means shall cheap and ample facilities be provided for the interchange of commodities between the different sections of our widely-extended country.

Second. In the selection of means for the accomplishment of this object Congress may, in its discretion and under its responsibility to the people, prescribe the rules and regulations by which the instruments, vehicles, and agencies employed in transporting persons or commodities from one State into or through another shall be governed, whether such transportation be by land or by water.

Third. The power "to regulate commerce" includes the power to aid and facilitate it by the employment of such means as may be appropriate and plainly adapted to that end, and hence Congress may, in its discretion, improve or create channels of commerce on land or by water.

Fourth. A remedy for some of the defects and abuses which prevail under existing systems of transportation may be provided by direct congressional regulation, but for reasons stated at length in this report it is seriously doubted if facilities sufficiently cheap and ample to meet the just and reasonable requirements of commerce can ever be obtained by this method.

Fifth. Whatever may be the limit of the power of Congress over interstate commerce, it is believed that the attempt to regulate the business of transportation by general congressional enactments establishing rates and fares on 1,300 railways, aggregating nearly one-half the railway mileage of the world, and embracing an almost infinite variety of circumstances and conditions, requires more definite and detailed information than is now in the possession of Congress or of your committee. Believing that any ill-advised measures in this direction would tend to postpone indefinitely the attainment of the desired object, cheap transportation, the committee deem it expedient to confine their recommendations in this regard to such measures only as may be enacted with entire safety, reserving other matters of legislation for further inquiry and consideration. They therefore recommend for present action the following:

1. That all railway companies, freight lines, and other persons or organizations of common carriers engaged in transporting passengers or freights from one State into or through another be required, under proper penalties, to make publication at every point of shipment from one State to another of their rates and fares, embracing all the particulars regarding distance, classifications, rates, special tariffs, drawbacks, &c., and that they be prohibited from increasing such rates above the limit named in the publication, without reasonable notice to the public, to be prescribed by law.

2. That combinations and consolidations with parallel or competing lines are evils of such magnitude as to demand prompt and vigorous measures for their prevention.

3. That all railway companies, freight lines, and other organizations of common carriers employed in transporting grain from one State into or through another should be required, under proper regulations and penalties, to be provided by law, to receipt for quantity, and to deliver the same at its destination.

4. That all railway companies and freight organizations receiving freights in one State to be delivered in another, and whose lines touch at any river or lake port, be prohibited from charging more to or from such port than for any greater distance on the same line.*

5. Stock inflations, generally known as "stock-waterings," are wholly indefensible; but the remedy for this evil seems to fall peculiarly within the province of the States who have created the corporations from which such practices proceed. The evil is believed to be of such magnitude as to require prompt and efficient State action for its prevention, and to justify any measures that may be proper and within the range of national authority.

6. It is believed by the committee that great good would result from the passage of State laws prohibiting officers of railway companies from owning or holding, directly or indirectly, any interest in any "non-co-operative freight line" or car company, operated upon the railroad with which they are connected in such official capacity.

7. For the purpose of procuring and laying before Congress and the country such complete and reliable information concerning the business of transportation and the wants of commerce as will enable Congress to legislate intelligently upon the subject, it is recommended that a bureau of commerce in one of the Executive Departments of the Government be charged with the duty of collecting and reporting to Congress information concerning our internal trade and commerce, and be clothed with authority of law, under regulations to be prescribed by the head of such Department, to require each and every railway and other transportation companies engaged in interstate transportation to make a report, under oath of the proper officer of such company, at least once each year, which report should embrace among other facts the following, namely: First, the rates and fares charged from all points of shipment on its line in one State to all points of destination in another State, including classifications and distances, and all drawbacks, deductions, and discriminations; second, a full and detailed statement of receipts and expenditures, including the compensation paid to officers, agents, and employés of the company; third, the amount of stock and bonds issued, the price at which they were sold, and the disposition made of the funds received from such sale; fourth, the amount and value of commodities transported during the year, as nearly as the same can be ascertained, together with such other facts as may be required by the head of such bureau, under the authority of law.

Sixth. Though the existence of the Federal power to regulate commerce to the extent maintained in this report is believed to be essential to the maintenance of perfect equality among the States as to commercial rights; to the prevention of unjust and invidious distinctions which local jealousies or interests might be disposed to introduce; to the proper restraints of consolidated corporate power, and to the correction of many of its existing evils, yet your committee are unanimously of the opinion that the problem of cheap transportation is to be solved through competition, as hereinafter stated, rather than by direct congressional regulation of existing lines.

Seventh. Competition, which is to secure and maintain cheap transportation, must embrace two essential conditions: 1. It must be controlled by a power with which combination will be impossible. 2. It must operate through cheaper and more ample channels of commerce than are now provided.

Eighth. Railway competition when regulated by its own laws will not effect the object, because it exists only to a very limited extent in certain localities, it is always unreliable and inefficient, and it invariably ends in combination. Hence additional railway lines under the control of private corporations will afford no substantial relief, because self-interest will inevitably lead them into combination with existing lines.

Ninth. The only means of securing and maintaining reliable and effective competition between railways is through national or State ownership or control of one or more lines, which, being unable to enter into combination, will serve as regulators of other lines.

Tenth. One or more double-track freight railways, honestly and thoroughly constructed, owned or controlled by the Government, and operated at a low rate of speed, would doubtless be able to carry at much less cost than can be done under the present system of operating fast and slow trains on the same road; and being incapable of entering into combinations would, no doubt, serve as a very valuable regulator of all existing railroads within the range of their influence.

Eleventh. The uniform testimony deduced from practical results in this country and throughout the commercial world is that water routes, when properly located, not only afford the cheapest and best known means of transport for all heavy, bulky, and cheap commodities, but that they are also the natural competitors and most effective regulators of railway transportation.

Twelfth. The above facts and conclusions, together with the remarkable physical adaptation of our country for cheap and ample water communications, point unerringly to the improvement of our great natural water-ways and their connection by canals or by short freight-railway portages under control of the Government as the obvious and certain solution of the problem of cheap transportation.

Thirteenth. After a most careful consideration of the merits of various proposed improvements, taking into account the cost, practicability, and probable advantages of each, the committee have come to the unanimous conclusion that the following are the most feasible and advantageous channels of commerce to be created or improved by the National Government in case Congress shall act upon this subject, namely:

1. The Mississippi River.

*This provision, it is believed, will prevent the discriminations now practiced against such ports, and will enable States which are separated from water lines by intervening States to reach such lines at reasonable cost. Congress has no power to regulate commerce wholly within a State, and hence States bordering upon such water lines will regulate the rates to ports within their own territory.

2. A continuous water line of adequate capacity from the Mississippi River to the city of New York, via the northern lakes.

3. A route adequate to the wants of commerce through the central tier of States, from the Mississippi River, via the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers, to a point in West Virginia, and thence by canal and slack-water or by a freight railway to tide-water in Virginia.

4. A route from the Mississippi River, via the Ohio and Tennessee Rivers, to a point in Alabama or Tennessee, and thence by canal and slack-water or by a freight railway to the ocean.

In the discussion of these four existing and proposed channels of commerce we shall for the sake of brevity designate them repectively the "Mississippi route," "Northern route," "Central route," and "Southern route."

THE MISSISSIPPI ROUTE.

The improvements necessary on the Mississippi route are: 1. The opening of the mouth of the river so as to permit the free passage of vessels drawing twenty-eight feet; estimated cost, $10,000,000. 2. The construction of reservoirs at the sources of the river, (if upon a careful survey they shall be deemed practicable;) estimated cost, $114,000. 3. Improvements upon a system to be provided by the War Department at all intermediate points, so as to give from three to five feet navigation above the Falls of Saint Anthony; from four and one-half to six feet from that point to Saint Louis; and from eight to ten feet from Saint Louis to New Orleans at the lowest stages of water; estimated cost, $5,000,000.

The total cost of the Mississippi improvements may, we think, be safely estimated at $16,000,000.

THE NORTHERN ROUTE.

The improvements suggested on this route are:

First. The Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement, by which five feet of navigation will be secured during the entire season from the Mississippi River to Green Bay, thereby affording the shortest and cheapest connection between the centers of wheat production and the eastern markets, and a continuous water channel from all points on the Mississippi River and its tributaries to the Atlantic Ocean. Estimated cost, $3,000,000.

Second. The construction of the Hennepin Canal (sixty-five miles long) from a point on the Mississippi River, near Rock Island, to the Illinois River at Hennepin, thereby affording the shortest and cheapest route from the largest areas of greatest corn production to the East, and a connection by water between the river system of the West, the northern lakes, and the Atlantic Ocean. Estimated cost, $4,000,000.

3. The enlargement and improvement, with the concurrence of the State of New York, of one or more of the three water-routes from the lakes to New York City, namely: the Erie Canal from Buffalo to Albany, the Oneida Lake Canal from Oswego to Albany, or the Champlain Canal from Lake Champlain to deep water on the Hudson River, including such connection as may be effected between Lake Champlain and the Saint Lawrence River, with the co-operation of the British Provinces. Estimated cost, $12,000,000.

Total cost of the northern route from the Mississippi River to New York City, $19,000,000.

The enlargement of the Welland Canal, now in progress, with the construction of the Caughnawaga Canal, and the proposed enlargement of the Champlain Canal, will enable vessels of a thousand tons to pass from western lake ports to ports in Vermont and to New York City. The Erie Canal enlarged as proposed will pass vessels of about seven hundred tons.

THE CENTRAL ROUTE.

The plan of improvement for this route contemplates—

First. The radical improvement of the Ohio River, from Cario to Pittsburgh, so as to give six to seven feet of navigation at low water. Estimated cost, $22,000,000.

Second. The improvement of the Kanawha River, from its mouth to Great Falls, so as to give six feet of navigation at all seasons. Estimated cost, $3,000,000.

Third. A connection by canal or by a freight railway, from the Ohio River or Kanawha River, near Charleston, by the shortest and most practicable route, through West Virginia to tide-water in Virginia; the question as between the canal and freight railway to be decided after the completion of careful surveys and estimates. If by canal and slack-water, the estimated cost is $55,000,000; if by a freight railway, the cost would probably not exceed $25,000,000.

The total expenditure necessary for the improvement of the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers is estimated at $25,000,000. The amount necessary to complete the connection with tide-water depends upon the nature of the improvement, as above stated.

THE SOUTHERN ROUTE.

The plan suggested by the committee for the southern route contemplates:

First. The improvement of the Tennessee River from its mouth to Knoxville, so as to give three feet of navigation at lowest stages of water. Estimated cost, $5,000,000.

Second. A communication by canal, or freight-railway, from some convenient point on the Tennessee River in Alabama or Tennessee, by the shortest and most practicable route to the Atlantic Ocean. The railway, if constructed, will be about four hundred and thirty-five miles long; the question as between the canal and railway to be decided after a careful survey and estimate of both shall have been completed. If by canal, the cost will be about $35,000,000. If by railway, probably about $30,000,000. Large portions of all of the above routes have been surveyed, and careful estimates prepared by the War Department. It is recommended that appropriations be made at the present session of Congress for completing the surveys of the entire system of improvements proposed, in order to determine accurately the cost of each route, and to enable the Government to enter at once upon the work, if the same shall be deemed practicable and expedient after such surveys shall have been completed.

On presenting this general plan of improvements the committee wish to be distinctly understood that the ordinary annual appropriations for other important works in aid of commerce should not be omitted.

The cost of the entire improvement will depend upon the decision to be hereafter made between the canal and the freight-railway portages, on the central and southern routes. If the canals be constructed the total cost will be about one hundred and fifty-five million dollars. If the railways be chosen, the total cost will be about one hundred and twenty million dollars.

An actual expenditure of $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 per annum will be required for five years, (in addition to the loan of Government credit, as above stated,) when the whole work can be completed. The resulting benefits will, for all time, annually repay more than double the entire cost.

In view of the fact that private companies invariably combine with each other against the public, it is recommended that no aid be given to any route to be owned or controlled by private corporations, but that the four great channels of commerce suggested shall be improved, created, and owned by the Government, and stand as permanent and effective competitors with each other and with all the railways which may be within the range of their influence.

The committee believe that the water-routes suggested should constitute free highways of commerce, subject only to such tolls as may be necessary for maintenance and repairs. If, however, Congress, shall deem it expedient to require them to provide interest on the cost of construction, and the means for ultimate redemption of the principal the whole improvements will involve only a loan of Government credit.

NATIONAL CHARACTER OF THE PROPOSED IMPROVEMENTS.

By reference to the map of the United States it will be seen that the completion of the system of improvements proposed will provide four great competing commercial lines from the center of the continent to the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico. It will also be observed by reference to the crop-maps, republished with this report, that these routes lead directly from or through the greatest areas of production to those sections which constitute the greatest areas of consumption, thus dividing their benefits equitably between producers and consumers, and contributing to the development and prosperity of the whole country. The Great Architect of the continent seems to have located its rivers and lakes with express reference to the commercial necessities of the industrious millions who now and shall hereafter occupy it. The plan of improvements suggested by the committee merely follows the lines so clearly indicated by His hand.

The proposed improvements are so located as to distribute their benefits with great equality among all the States east of the Rocky Mountains. Twenty-one of those States are situated directly on one or more of said routes; two States—Kansas and Nebraska—are so situated as to enjoy the full benefits of reduced cost of transportation from the Mississippi River by all of the proposed lines. Eleven States, namely, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, North Carolina, Florida, and Texas, nearly all of which consume largely of the food of the West, and most of which are to a great extent dependent upon the West for a market for their manufactures and other products, are directly connected by the waters of the ocean with their several termini. The improvements will therefore connect, by the cheapest known means of transport, every one of the thirty-four States east of the Rocky Mountains with all the others, and but one State in the Union will be without water connection with the whole world. The accomplishment of so great a result by an expenditure of money comparatively so small illustrates the wonderful provisions of nature for cheap commercial facilities on this continent.

These four great channels of commerce under public control, and hence unable to combine with each other, or with existing lines of transport, will, by the power of competition, hold in check all the railways radiating from the interior to the seaboard, and, by affording a cheap and ample means of communication, will solve the problem of cheap transportation. If local railways discriminate against them, it will be in the power of the States whose boundaries they touch to prescribe regulations for the correction of such discriminations. A law of Congress prohibiting discriminations against river or lake ports will enable the other States not directly upon any of said lines to reach them at reasonable rates. The committee submit that no scheme of public improvement could be more eminently national in its character, nor diffuse its benefits more generally and equitably than the one proposed, and they believe that the entire system of improvements should be considered and acted upon as a whole.

Let us now consider more specifically the benefits and advantages to be anticipated from each route and from the entire system when completed.

I.—BENEFITS ANTICIPATED FROM THE NORTHERN ROUTE.

From all points on the Mississippi River between Minneapolis, Minnesota, and Quincy, Illinois, the average railway rate to lake ports in 1872 was 17 cents per bushel of 60 pounds. From Chicago to New York, by rail, the average charge during that year was 33⅓ cents per bushel, and the average rate by water was 26.6 cents per bushel, making the all-rail charges through from the Mississippi to New York 50⅓ cents and the rail and water charge, exclusive of terminals, 43.6 cents per bushel. In the section of this report devoted to the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement and the Hennepin Canal we have shown that an average saving can be effected through their agency of at least 10 cents per bushel on all the cereals transported from points west of the Mississippi River and north of the southern line of Iowa.

It is believed by those who have studied the subject that the enlargement of the New York canals so as to pass boats of 600 to 1,000 tons will reduce the cost of transportation on that part of the line 50 per cent. The establishment of reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, which shall induce the construction of the Caughnawaga Canal, (if such an arrangement can be made,) and which will encourage Canadian shipmasters to compete for the carrying trade on the lakes, will also materially cheapen the cost of transport to New England. The evidence taken by your committee fully justifies the opinion that by the enlargement of the New York canals, the construction of the Caughnawaga Canal, and the use of the enlarged Canadian canals, the cost of transport from Chicago to Burlington, Vermont, and to New York City will not exceed from 12 to 15 cents per bushel, making the entire cost from the Mississippi River to Burlington, Vermont, or to New York, not more than 22 cents per bushel, against the present cost of 43.6 cents by water, and 50⅓ cents by rail. We may therefore reasonably estimate that by the proposed improvements upon this route a saving can be effected of 20 cents per bushel or $6.70 per ton on all the east tonnage moved between that river and the East.

BENEFITS ANTICIPATED FROM THE CENTRAL ROUTE.

Assuming a charge of 4 mills per ton per mile on the Mississippi River and on the improved Ohio and Kanawha Rivers,* a charge of 8 mills per ton per mile on the James River and Kanawha Canal, and 6 mills per ton per mile on the slack-water improvement, the following statement will represent the cost of transport from Cairo, Illinois, to Richmond, Virginia, by the central water line:

Cairo to Great Falls of the Kanawha, 790 miles, at 8 mills per ton per mile	$3 16
From Great Falls to Richmond, the distance (equating each lock at one-half mile of canal) is 509 miles, of which 348 is canal (equated) and 161 is slack-water:
Three hundred and forty-eight miles canal, at 8 mills per ton per mile	2 78
One hundred and sixty-one miles of slack-water, at 6 mills per ton per mile.	96
Total per ton for entire distance	†6 90

equal to 20.4 cents per bushel of sixty pounds.

If the freight railway from the Kanawha to tide-water be adopted instead of the canal and slack-water improvement, the cost of transport from the Ohio River to the ocean will, it is believed, be substantially the same as above stated. The central route would be closed by ice only about thirty days each year, and hence it would be an active competitor with all the railways from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic at times when competition is now suspended by reason of frost on the northern water route. The effect of such a regulation of railway charges would be to greatly reduce the present winter rates, and by the constant competition it would maintain to compel uniformly low charges on all rail and water lines from the interior to the eastern and southern seaboard. Its advantages would be greatest,

*The evidence taken by the committee, and already stated in this report, shows that average charges by the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers is now only from 3½ to 4½ mills per ton per mile, and in many cases only 2 mills.

†It is due to this route to say that the above estimates of costs are fully 50 per cent. higher than those relied upon by its advocates. The committee have adopted them from superabundant caution, preferring to understate the benefits to be anticipated from all the routes, rather than to exaggerate them. The successful application of steam as a motor on canals will doubtless reduce the cost of transport by this line very much below the figures named.

however, to the central tier of States. Four of the largest interior cities of the continent—Saint Louis, Cincinnati, Louisville, and Pittsburgh—are situated directly upon it. The trade of these cities, together with the other towns and cities on the Ohio River, is now far in excess of our entire foreign commerce. A vast area of the richest agricultural and mineral country in the world is directly tributary to it, and only awaits reasonable facilities for transportation to develop a commerce the magnitude of which it is difficult now to conceive.

BENEFITS ANTICIPATED FROM THE SOUTHERN ROUTE.

Assuming the same rate of charges as in the estimate just made for the central route, namely, 4 mills per ton per mile on the open river, 6 mills per ton per mile on slack-water navigation, and 8 mills per ton per mile by canal, the following will represent the cost of transport by this route from Cairo to the ocean:

Open river, 980 miles, 4 mills per ton	$3 92
Slack-water, 70 miles, 6 mills per ton	42
Canal, 325 miles, 8 mills per ton	2 60
Total per ton for entire distance	*6 94

It is believed that a freight railway from the vicinity of Guntersville, Alabama, or Chattanooga, Tennessee, would enable this route to accomplish very nearly the same results.

This route will never be obstructed by ice, and hence will afford unfailing competition throughout the year. Its greatest advantages, however, will be found not so much in furnishing a highway of commerce to the seaboard as in opening up a valuable connection between the grain-growing States of the West and the cotton plantations of the South, whereby each section will have the full benefit of those crops for which its soil and climate are best adapted. It will connect with various southern rivers, penetrating a very large portion of the cotton districts of the South. It is believed that eventually inland navigation will be obtained at small expense along the coast of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, connecting with the rivers in those States which flow into the ocean. By this route the center of the cotton-producing region can be reached from the center of the corn area, at a cost not exceeding 15 to 18 cents per bushel; and hence, in addition to the creation of a new competing avenue to the sea, the home market for food that will be developed and the increased production of cotton that will be induced will much more than compensate for the entire cost.

BENEFITS ANTICIPATED FROM THE MISSISSIPPI ROUTE.

The evidence submitted with this report justifies the conclusion that, upon the completion of the entire improvement of the Mississippi River, wheat and corn can be transported from Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri, and other States above Cairo, to New Orleans for an average of 12 cents per bushel, and that the cost from Saint Paul will not exceed 17 cents. The average rate from New Orleans to Liverpool in 1872 was about 27 cents, (currency,) which can be reduced, as hereinbefore shown, to 18 or 20 cents by the improvement at the mouth of the river. Estimating the cost from Saint Paul to New Orleans at 17 cents, the two transfers at Saint Louis and New Orleans at 1 cent each, and the charge from New Orleans to Liverpool 20 cents, the total from Saint Paul to Liverpool will be 39 cents per bushel. The charge in 1872 from Saint Paul to Liverpool, including transfers and terminals at Chicago, Buffalo, and New York, by the cheapest route, averaged 67½ cents per bushel. The saving to be effected by the improvement of this route may, therefore, be estimated at 28 cents per bushel from Saint Paul to Liverpool, with a proportionate reduction from all other points on the river.

In view of the benefits and advantages to be derived from each of the four proposed routes, and from their combined influence when in constant competition with each other and with the railroad system of the country, it is, in the judgment of your committee, entirely safe to say that the completion of the system of improvement suggested will effect a permanent reduction of 50 per cent. in the cost of transporting fourth-class freights from the valley of the Mississippi to the seaboard; and that the cost of carrying a bushel of wheat or corn to the markets of the East and of the world will be reduced to at least twenty to twenty-five cents per bushel below the present railway charges, and that a similar reduction will be effected on return freights.

The actual movement of grain to the eastern and southern markets in 1872, as shown by the carefully prepared statistics submitted with this report, amounted to about 213,000,000 bushels. An average saving of twenty cents per bushel on the surplus moved that year would have amounted to about $42,000,000, or more than two-thirds of the entire expenditure necessary to complete the proposed routes, in addition to the loan of Government credit as before stated. But for the fact that large quantities of corn were unable to find a market on account of the high transportation charges, the amount moved would have been very much greater. Hence, in addition to the saving in transportation above named, a benefit perhaps equally great would have been conferred upon the producer in affording him a market for his surplus products.

To this must be added the enhanced value which such reduction would give to the improved lands of the West, amounting, in the eight Northwestern States of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, in 1870, to 55,841,000 acres. Estimating the productive capacity of these lands at an average of only twenty bushels per acre, (the average of corn, oats, &c., being in fact very much greater,) an addition of only ten cents per bushel (one-half the estimated saving) to the value of cereals those States are capable of producing would give a net profit of $2 per acre, which is the equivalent of 10 per cent. interest on a capital of $20, and hence equal to an increase in the value of lands to that extent. Twenty dollars per acre added to the value of improved lands in those States would exceed an aggregate of $1,100,000,000. This calculation assumes that one-half of the reduction will inure to the benefit of the consumer, and the other half to the producer.

Add to all this the increased value of farms in other States, the increased value of unimproved lands, the enhanced value of cotton plantations, the benefits to accrue from reduced cost of movement of the products of the mine, the foundry, the factory, the workshop, and of the thousands of other commodities demanding cheaper transportation, and some conception may be formed of the vast additions to be made to our national wealth and prosperity by the system of improvements under consideration. In comparison with the great benefits reasonably to be anticipated, their cost is utterly insignificant.

The probable effect of such reduction in the cost of internal transportation upon our exports and foreign balances of trade is also worthy of the most careful consideration. America and Russia are the great food-producing nations of the world. Great Britain is the principal market. For many years America and Russia have been active competitors for the supply of that market. Until recently the farmers of the West have had the advantage of the wheat producers on the Don and the Volga; but a few years ago, Russia inaugurated a system of internal improvements by which the cost of transporting her products from the interior to the seaboard is greatly reduced. The result is shown by the importations of wheat into the United Kingdom during two periods of five years each.

Imports of wheat from Russia and America into the United Kingdom from 1860 to 1864, compared with the imports from 1868 to 1872.

1860 to 1864, inclusive.		1868 to 1872, inclusive.
From—	Wheat.	From—	Wheat.
	Bushels.		Bushels.
Russia	47,376,809	Russia	117,967,022
United States	127,047,126	United States	116,462,380

An increase during the latter period as compared with the former of 70,590,213 bushels from Russia, and a decrease of 10,584,746 from the United States.

The cheaper mode of handling grain by elevators has not yet been adopted by Russia, but doubtless will be very soon. When this shall be done, and her wise system of internal improvements, which have already turned the wavering balances in her favor, shall be completed, she will be able to drive us from the markets of the world unless wiser counsels shall guide our statesmanship than have hitherto prevailed. In fact, as the increased size of ocean vessels is constantly decreasing the cost of ocean transport and our wheat-fields are yearly receding farther westward from the lakes, it is not impossible that when she shall have driven us from the markets of Europe she will become our active competitor in Boston and Portland, if cheaper means of internal transport be not provided.

A condition of things equally unsatisfactory exists with regard to our chief article of export—cotton. High transportation charges from the grain-fields of the Northwest to the cotton-fields of the South have compelled the planter to devote his cotton lands to the production of wheat and corn, for which they are by nature unsuited, thereby reducing the product of cotton and diminishing the market for grain. The effect upon our cotton exportations is shown by the following statement:

Receipts of cotton in Great Britain in 1860 compared with 1872.

1860.	Quantity.	1872.	Quantity.
From—	Pounds.	From—	Pounds.
United States	1,115,800,608	United States	625,600,080
All other countries	275,048,144	All other countries	783,237,392

Our cotton exports have fallen off nearly 50 per cent., while other countries have gained nearly 300 per cent. This is doubtless largely due to the war, which stimulated the production of cotton in India; but it is also attributable to a great extent to the causes above mentioned, and to the system of internal improvements inaugurated by Great Britain in India for the express purpose of rendering herself independent of us for the supply of cotton. Every cent unnecessarily added to the cost of transportation is to that extent a protection to the cotton-planters of India and the food-producers of Russia against the farmers of the West and the cotton-planters of the South.

The cry of despair which comes from the overburdened West, the demand for cheaper food heard from the laboring classes at the East and from the plantations of the South, and the rapid falling off of our principal articles of export, all indicate the imperative necessity for cheaper means of external communication. If we would assure our imperiled position in the markets of the world, reinstate our credit abroad, restore confidence and prosperity at home, and provide for a return to specie payments, let us develop our unequaled resources and stimulate our industries by a judicious system of internal improvements.

A reference to the expenditures of our Government* since the adoption of the Constitution will show that in some matters we have been sufficiently liberal, but in appropriations for the benefit of commerce and for the development of our vast resources, most parsimonious. For public buildings, including those in the District of Columbia, and custom-houses, post-offices, and court-houses in other parts of the country, we have expended over sixty-two million dollars; while for the improvement of the 20,000 miles of western rivers, through which should flow the life-currents of the nation, we have appropriated only $11,438,300. For the improvement of these great avenues of trade, which are designed by nature to afford the cheapest and most ample commercial facilities for the teeming millions who inhabit the richest country on the earth, we have expended an average of $133,100 per annum; while for public buildings we have appropriated an average of over seven hundred and fifty thousand a year. Is it not high time that all expenditures not absolutely necessary be suspended, and that the imperative necessities of the country receive attention?

England, in order to encourage and stimulate the culture of cotton in India for the supply of her factories at home, guaranteed interest on an expenditure for internal improvements in that distant country amounting to over four hundred million dollars. The most advanced nations of ancient and modern times have regarded their highways of commerce of the first importance, and, in exact proportion to the excellence of those highways have been the development of national resources and power, and the augmentation of national wealth.

It may be said that in the present financial condition of the country, and with our heavy burden of indebtedness, we cannot afford to enter upon the system of improvements indicated. It is true, our debt is large, and our industrial enterprises are temporarily deranged, but our resources are immeasurable, and need only a liberal and wise statesmanship to insure their full development.

As we have already stated, the public debt of a nation is great or small according to the proportion it bears to public wealth and to the commercial prosperity of the people who have it to pay. A debt that would have crushed the United States in 1800 would scarcely be felt to-day. In the exact proportion that our wealth increases the burden of our debt diminishes. For instance, in 1840 the entire national wealth was estimated at $3,764,000,000. At the close of the rebellion our national indebtedness had reached $3,300,000,000. Hence to have paid the debt of 1865 in the year 1840 would have required 90 per cent. of all the property in the country. On the 1st of March, 1874, our debt was $2,145,880,066. Our national wealth is estimated at over $30,000,000,000. While, therefore, the debt of 1865 would have consumed almost the entire property, public and private, owned in the United States in 1840, the payment of our present debt would require only about 7 per cent. of our present wealth. It is, therefore, apparent that the burden of the debt of 1874 is less than one-twelfth as great on our present property as the debt of 1865 would have been in 1840.

If by the development of our resources we can maintain the same ratio of increase during the next twenty-five years that we have since 1850, the debt of the nation (if no further payments be made) will amount to only about 1 per cent. on the national wealth in 1900. In other words, with the full development of our resources, which it is in the power of wise statesmanship to induce, the entire debt

*The same remark should be made with reference to this route just made with regard to the Central, namely, that the estimates of the committee are much higher than those of its special advocates.

*See Appendix, pages 184 to 186, inclusive, showing the expenditures for various purposes from the adoption of the Constitution to June 30, 1873.

can be paid in the year 1900 by the assessment of a tax but little greater than is now required to meet the current expenditures of the Government. If it be true, then, that the burden of a nation's debt diminishes in exactly the same ratio as its wealth increases, is it not the dictate of wisdom and sound policy to pay only so much of our debt as may be necessary to keep our faith and maintain our credit, and to devote whatever surplus revenues may remain to such improvements as are required for the full development of our unequaled resources?

Mr. Speaker, if the nation could enter at once upon the execution of this admirable system of internal improvements, employment could be given to all the idle in the land. Such employment would enable thousands of men to provide comfortably for their families which now suffer for the necessaries of life, and also to pay for homes, making them freeholders. General employment would stop the tide of crime which during the years of enforced idleness has swollen to a flood.

No man can measure the importance to the safety of our institutions, now resting on universal suffrage, of employment for the idle and the multiplication of freeholders among voters. Then the many idle hands would be employed in creating wealth.

The opening of these ways for commerce would make arteries for the flow of national life, and do more to bind the Union than all the frantic efforts of the party in power expended in warnings from stump and press and halls of legislation.

But of most value, these facilities of commerce under Government control would lessen the cost of transportation so as to inspire vastly increased production, and at the same time break the power of monopolies which threaten our liberties.

Mr. Speaker, thus far we all agree; but, sir, the difficult question is how to get funds.

We assert that the necessary funds can be secured by retiring the national-bank currency and filling its place with greenbacks. We can replace the more than $400,000,000 in interest-bearing bonds which are the basis of the national-bank currency with non-interest-bearing notes to be used as currency. This would give us the means for constructing all these works and for a ship-canal across Florida, and all improvements of harbors and rivers now pressingly needed. At the same time, instead of increasing the burdens of taxation, we should lift from the people the payment of annual interest on the bonds.

These simple statements cannot be refuted. We challenge the supporters of the national-bank monopoly to answer them. We propose to unceasingly urge their consideration upon the people. We beg the House to consider them in view of the refunding bill soon to be reported from the Senate. When that bill comes back we shall be called upon to provide for a portion of the national debt now coming due. Why not provide for it in the way we have indicated? Will not members take the interests of the whole country into view, rather than give attention alone to the clamor of a gigantic and oppressive corporation?

Remember, the attention of the people is fixed upon this refunding scheme with a scrutiny they seldom manifest. They will hold their servants to a strict account.

Yeates vs. Martin.

SPEECH OF HON. J. VAN VOORHIS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 29, 1881,

On the contested-election case of Yeates vs. Martin.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is easier for a camel to pass through a needle's eye than for a republican elected to Congress from any district in thirteen States of this Union to get and keep his seat.

Joseph J. Martin is the only republican in this House from these thirteen States who took his seat when this Congress began. It is now proposed to oust him from that seat. These thirteen States have seventy-one Representatives in this House. We know that many districts in these States have republican majorities, and there is scarcely a doubt that they elected republicans to this Congress who have been unable to obtain their seats. They failed to run the gauntlet of the democratic returning boards. Upon one pretext or another, they never got so far as to receive the legal certificates of their election.

One man from those thirteen States, solitary and alone, reached the doors of this House at the opening of the first session of this Congress with such a certificate of his election. That man is Joseph J. Martin, of the first congressional district of North Carolina. He passed the ordeal of the democratic election officers, of the democratic boards of county canvassers, and of the democratic State returning board, and appeared here with the certificate of the democratic governor of North Carolina, the democratic secretary of State and attorney-general, and two democratic Senators from that State, showing that he was elected to the Forty-sixth Congress by 51 plurality. This result was reached notwithstanding the trickery and fraud of the counsel for the contestant, and notwithstanding the fact that hundreds of votes cast for him, and honestly cast, by legitimate voters were rejected by the democratic officials.

For instance, in Merry Hill precinct 108 votes cast for Martin were rejected by the inspectors because the words "republican ticket" were printed as a caption on the inside of the ticket, this being deemed a wicked device to cheat honest democrats into voting for Martin.

It made no difference with the democratic returning boards that J. B. Martin, the chief-justice of a North Carolina court, the agent and friend of the contestant and his counsel on this contest, got these tickets printed and circulated them for a fraudulent purpose.

The majority of the committee are in favor of sustaining this fraud of Chief-Justice Martin and aiding him in consummating it. He intended to cheat as many republicans as he could into voting a ticket which he thought would vitiate their votes, and the majority of the committee, by their report, say he ought to be permitted to do so. If this be a device, under the laws of North Carolina, then the fraud destroys its character as such, and the contestant cannot be permitted to profit by the fraudulent act of his attorney, counsel, and agent. If the republicans cannot rely upon the good faith of a North Carolina democratic chief-justice, then what is there in that State, which is democratic, that can be relied upon? But this is no device within the meaning of the laws of North Carolina.

It is the fairest possible statement to the voter that if he votes that ticket he votes for a republican. In Salem precinct 135 votes cast for Martin were rejected by the county board of canvassers, because the return was brought to them by a registrar instead of a judge of election. If the county canvassers received the return, it makes no difference what messenger brought it. These 135 votes were unquestionably rejected for this informality for several reasons: (1) This same board rejected 39 votes cast for Yeates for that reason; (2) no other reason is assigned; (3) this county canvassing board possessed no judicial power, and any of the other reasons now alleged would have required a judicial investigation and the production of evidence. It is not pretended there was any. The 39 majority for Yeates in Providence Township was rejected as a pretext for rejecting the 135 majority for Martin in Salem. This 135 majority in Salem was made of legal votes honestly cast—indisputably so—and they were excluded simply and solely because one messenger instead of another carried the returns to the county canvassers. In Goose Nest precinct 120 legal voters who offered to vote for Martin were refused the right to do so. This refusal was on the ground that these votes were registered in Hamilton as well as at Goose Nest. The fact is that Hamilton had been divided and Goose Nest set off from it, and all the votes of Goose Nest had been taken from the Hamilton registry by order of the court. These 120 voters were refused the right to vote because their names remained on the Hamilton register. They had no power to get them off, although they tried to do so.

The town of Hamilton for several years prior to this election had formed a single precinct, called Hamilton. Prior to this election this town had been divided into two precincts, one called Hamilton and one called Goose Nest. The registrar of Goose Nest was required to transfer to his register the names of all voters in the Goose Nest territory whose names were on the Hamilton register as it was before the change. He did so. This made two new precincts out of one old one. The new Hamilton district was as much a new district as Goose Nest was. The old Hamilton district had been cut in two, and a new register made of the votes in the Goose Nest half. The vote of every democrat whose name had been on the register of the old Hamilton precinct, and whose name had so been transferred to Goose Nest, was received. The votes of at least 120 voters at Goose Nest precinct who were republicans and who offered votes for Martin, and whose names had been duly transferred to the Goose Nest register, were rejected because they did not produce certificates that their names had been erased on the old Hamilton register. Many democrats produced no such certificates, but their votes were received and counted. Here was a transparent illegality that deprived Martin of 120 votes. Notwithstanding all this Martin was elected. The State board of canvassers were compelled to give him his certificate of election. This fact raises a presumption, which is almost conclusive, that Martin was fairly elected.

The democratic majority of the Elections Committee ask this House at this late day in the life of the Forty-sixth Congress to throw Martin out, and upon what grounds? They assume that the votes for Martin rejected in Merry Hill, Salem, and Goose Nest were properly rejected; and then they go to work to extinguish Martin's majority in this way. They reject the 64 majority which Martin received in Hamilton, for the sole and only reason, that Martin, for a few minutes and to relieve somebody else, performed the clerical duty at the polls of checking the poll-list. He checked off perhaps fifty names. This ground was too narrow for even a North Carolina returning board to take notice of. It is absolutely ridiculous—no fraud or wrong of any kind was intended, or is pretended.

Next they throw out Martin's majority of 64 in South Mills because the democratic election officers did not open the polls as early as they ought to have done. There is no pretense but that every voter who desired to vote had abundant opportunity to do so after the polls were opened and before they were closed. The election officers excuse the delay as unavoidable. Here again is a point too narrow to be noticed by the democratic returning boards of North Carolina. It is left for the majority of the Committee on Elections.

Again, they reject the majority of 40 given to Martin in Vandemere precinct. The sole reason here again is that the democratic election officers did not open the polls until eleven o'clock. This makes 168 votes cast for Martin and allowed to him by all the returning officers of North Carolina, which the committee take away from him. Then the committee add a single item of 39 votes in Providence to Yeates's vote, and this gives as a result 156 majority for Yeates.

There can be no doubt from the evidence in this case that Joseph J. Martin was elected by over 350 majority, instead of 51. And yet Martin is to be ousted. A political necessity demands it. The solid South demands it, and villainous as it is, it will be done. The notice of contest in this case embraced fourteen precincts. The case thundered in the index. The fourteen precincts complained of at the first were reduced to four. No evidence was offered as to ten of them.

It was intended to make the pleadings broad enough to cover any evidence which might be discovered. The ingenuity of the counsel for the contestant, and of the majority of the committee could discover nothing except the three frivolous things to which I have referred. To oust Martin on this case would be a gross outrage upon the law, upon the people of this North Carolina district, and upon the country. The majority of this House will not carry this high hand but a few days longer. Its days are numbered.

The republican party is a patriotic party and abides by the law. Were it such a party as that which now controls this House it might say to the majority of this House, "The villainy you teach me, I will execute; and it shall go hard but I will better the instruction." The Forty-seventh Congress will have opportunity, I trust, to set right some of the wrongs against the ballot-box in the Southern States; and if it does not make reprisals it will not be because the Forty-sixth Congress has offered no provocation therefor.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. W. G. COLERICK,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. COLERICK said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The bill now under consideration, in its present form, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury "to issue bonds in the amount of $400,000,000, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years and payable ten years from the date of issue, and also certificates in the amount of $300,000,000, in denominations of $10, $20, and $50, either register or coupon, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after one year and payable in ten years from the date of issue." The bonds, if issued, are to be paid in coin, and exempted from taxation.

The purpose of this bill when first reported was to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain bonds described in his annual report for 1880, page 10, as follows:

Title of loan.	Rate of interest.	Payable.	Redeemable.	Amount.
	Per cent.
Loan of February, 1861	6	Dec. 31, 1880.		$13, 414, 000
Oregon war debt	6	June 30, 1881.		711, 800
Loan July and August, 1861	6		June 30, 1881.	145, 786, 500
Loan of 1863 (1881's)	6		June 30, 1881.	57, 787, 250
Funded loan of 1881	5		May 1, 1881.	469, 65, 1050
Outstanding November 1, 1880				687, 350, 600

The bonds described in the first item of this statement, amounting to $13,414,000, have since been paid. The bonds now proposed to be refunded are those described in the last three items of the statement, which, it will be observed, are of two classes:

First. Those redeemable June 30, 1881, amounting in all to $203,573,750, bearing 6 per cent. interest; and Second. Those redeemable May 1, 1881, amounting to $469,651,050, bearing 5 per cent. interest.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his report, to which I have referred, says that these bonds "are not by their terms payable at a specific date, but they are redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the dates above-named."

Wise statesmanship and an economical administration of the Government, in my judgment, imperatively requires the payment of our public debt as rapidly and promptly as the ability and resources of the Government will permit without increasing the present burdens of the people. If these bonds can be paid without issuing new ones then I am opposed to the passage of the bill, because I do not believe that any more bonds ought to be issued unless actually necessary. The system of issuing Government bonds by reason of its many flagrant abuses, has justly become odious to the people, who, as a measure of economy, demand that the public debt, represented by interest-bearing and non-taxable bonds, shall be paid as soon as practicable, and not perpetuated. I am willing that the republican party, which created the system, may have all the glory and honor that can possibly flow from its perpetuation.

Sir, the people have not forgotten, and will never forget, that by the provisions of the law under which the 5-20 bonds were issued they were payable in the lawful money of the country, then, as now, consisting of coin and greenbacks, and that after the bonds had been issued, and sold for greenbacks, which were then greatly depreciated in value by the act of the Government in dishonoring them in refusing to accept them in payment of her own demands. When a dollar in gold would purchase from two to three dollars in greenbacks, a republican Congress, in the interest of the holders of the bonds, passed a law, falsely bearing the euphonious and deceptive title, "An act to strengthen the public credit," by which it was declared "that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin" of the bonds, and they were afterward so paid, thereby unjustly bestowing, as a bonus, and paying, without right or consideration, out of the public Treasury, to the holders of the bonds, millions of dollars to which they otherwise had no right, legally or morally, and at a time when the people were sorely oppressed by the weight of heavy taxation in every form. It was then an undisputed fact that those bonds might have been lawfully paid in greenbacks. It was so declared on this floor by Thaddeus Stevens, then the acknowledged leader of the republican party in this House. John Sherman, a United States Senator and now the Secretary of the Treasury, declared in a letter written by him, that any man who insisted on coin in payment of his bonds was a public extortioner. In a speech delivered in the Senate in February, 1868, by Mr. Sherman, then chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, he said:

> I say that equity and justice are amply satisfied if we redeem these bonds at the end of five years in the same kind of money, of the same intrinsic value it bore at the time they were issued. Gentlemen may reason about this matter over and over again, and they cannot come to any other conclusion; at least that has been my conclusion after the most careful consideration. Senators are sometimes in the habit, in order to defeat the argument of an antagonist, of saying that this is repudiation. Why, sir, every citizen of the United States has conformed his business to the legal-tender clause. He has collected and paid his debts accordingly. Every State in this Union without exception has made its contracts since the legal-tender clause in currency and paid them in currency.—Appendix to Congressional Globe, February 27, 1868, page 184.

Both of the great political parties in their platforms and in speeches delivered by their favorite leaders declared that those bonds were so payable. In 1868 the democratic party, in its national platform adopted at New York, so declared, and tendered that as an issue to the republican party, who refused to accept the issue because, as then asserted, no difference in opinion existed between the two parties on that question; and yet, at the first session of Congress after the presidential election of 1868, the republican party, which then controlled both branches of Congress, in violation of justice and in defiance of its pledge to the people, passed the measure to which I have referred, and President Grant, as his first official act, signed that infamous bill. If such legislation under such circumstances could transpire, what assurance have the people that hereafter the bonds now proposed to be issued, although payable by their terms in coin, may not by a republican Congress be declared payable in gold alone. Such legislation would be as justifiable as that to which I have alluded; and this danger is greatly enhanced by the fact that it is the avowed design of the republican party to again demonetize the silver dollar, or at least forbid its further coinage, as recommended by President Hayes in his messages to Congress, and by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual reports. The leaders of the republican party all unite in denouncing it as a "dishonest dollar," although it was invented and its present weight established by the fathers of this Republic, whose honesty, intelligence, and patriotism have never been questioned except by the modern-day saints of the republican party.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill in its present form becomes a law and the proposed bonds are issued and sold, the holders will demand and receive gold alone in payment of them. A book has been recently issued by Fisk & Hatch, one of the leading banking-houses of this country, and who extensively deal in Government bonds, in which it is said:

> There can be no doubt that in the various loan acts in which the word coin is used, as well as in the public-credit act, it was the intention of Congress to pledge the payment of the bonds in the recognized money standard common to the financial nations of the world, namely, gold, or its equivalent. The absence of the word "gold" in the several acts affords no ground for a presumption to the contrary or for the belief that its omission was intentional and designed to leave the Government the option of paying the bonds in a depreciated silver currency.

Again they say, "We do not believe that any bonds or other obligations of the United States will ever be paid off in any coin or currency of a less value than gold coin, except at the option of the holder, unless payment otherwise than in gold has been expressly provided for in the terms of the contract;" and to justify their belief they refer to the fact that "all bonds and obligations of the United States which have matured have invariably been redeemed in gold coin." Thus we are advised of the construction that will be given to this bill, if it becomes a law, by the holders of the bonds to be issued and by the Secretary of the Treasury, who, in his present official capacity, has always made the interests of the people subservient to those of the bondholders. This bill does not expressly provide that the bonds shall or may be paid in silver as well as gold. All the provisions relating to that subject have been eliminated from the bill; and in their absence we will not be able to utilize in the payment of these bonds or the ones that they are intended to replace the silver with which God has so lavishly blessed us, and all our efforts to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out of the public Treasury the silver dollars now uselessly hoarded there, as well as those hereafter to be coined, will prove abortive. By the provisions of this bill he is merely required, in his discretion, to use not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin in the Treasury in paying the outstanding bonds. We all know how he has heretofore exercised such power as to the silver coin, by invariably paying the bonds redeemed exclusively in gold, and that by reason of his conceded hostility to the present standard silver dollars he will not use them for that purpose unless compelled to do so by mandatory provisions of law.

The Treasurer of the United States, in his last annual report, dated November 1, 1880, informs us that the total coinage of standard silver dollars under the act of February 28, 1875, (which remonetized silver,) to November 1, 1880, is $72,847,750. Of this amount $47,588,106 were then in the Treasury and the mints. Since that time others have been, and under said act must be, coined at the rate of not less than $2,000,000 per month. The total amount of silver certificates issued under said act to September 30, 1880, was $27,308,000, of which, according to the report of the Treasurer, only $12,429,381 were then outstanding and unredeemed, so on that day there were in the Treasury 35,158,725 standard silver dollars in excess of the amount required for the redemption of the outstanding silver certificates. There was also then in the Treasury $24,629,489.89 of fractional silver coin, and $6,043,367.37 of silver bullion, making as the entire amount of silver coin and bullion in the Treasury on that day $65,831,582.26 in excess of the amount of the outstanding silver certificates, and this sum has been greatly increased by the silver dollars coined since that time.

Is the Treasury to be converted into a storehouse or depository for the silver, or is the silver to be used for the purposes designed by the law remonetizing it, which was enacted, as a democratic measure, in obedience to the voice of the people? The same popular sentiment that secured the passage of that law demands its enforcement. I am in favor of using the silver dollars now on hand and which may hereafter come into the Treasury, other than those required for the redemption of the silver certificates, in paying the outstanding bonds. That this may lawfully be done has been declared by Congress in the resolution adopted in January, 1868, known as the Stanley Matthews resolution, which, after reciting the provisions of the several acts under which the bonds were issued, declares:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring therein,) That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

Believing, as I firmly do, that if this bill becomes a law it will, by reason of the discretionary power granted to the Secretary of the Treasury in using the silver now in the Treasury in paying the outstanding bonds, and his avowed hostility to that coin, result in his not using the silver for that purpose, and keeping in view other objections to the bill to which I will refer, I cannot vote in favor of its passage.

If any compulsion rested upon the Government to pay these outstanding bonds when they become redeemable, then the assertion so often made, that the credit and honor of the Government is involved, that an imperious necessity exists in promptly procuring the money to pay them at that time, would have great weight, in the absence of other objections, in persuading me to vote for the bill. But fortunately no such compulsion exists, as the bonds will not then become due so as to authorize the holders in demanding payment, but the Government will, from and after that time, enjoy the option or privilege of redeeming them, from time to time, according to her ability and pleasure, and the Government alone is to determine whether or not it will avail itself of that privilege, and when it shall be exercised, so that those who assert that the honor of the Government will be tarnished or her credit affected if this bill fails to pass have either not read or misapprehend the provisions of the laws under and by virtue of which these bonds were issued.

The only plausible argument that has been or can be presented or urged for the passsge of the bill is that it will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange or replace these outstanding bonds with ones bearing a lower rate of interest. This persuasive but delusive argument would be potential if those who urge it could demonstrate that the people would be benefited by so refunding the debt. If the Government was unable to extinguish by payment these bonds before the new ones proposed to be issued mature, or if, having the ability to pay them before that time, it possessed no option or privilege of so redeeming them, then I concede that it would be unwise, if not a dereliction of duty on our part, if we failed or refused to avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity to exchange or replace the present bonds with ones bearing a lower rate of interest. But, sir, as I have stated, the Government will soon enjoy the right or privilege of paying them, or any of them, at her convenience and pleasure; and by availing itself of that privilege it can, as I will endeavor to show, with its annual surplus revenues and the money now in the Treasury not needed for resumption or other purposes, pay all of these bonds before the new ones mature and thereby not only the interest but the principal of more than one-third of our public debt will be paid, to the great relief and joy of a people upon whom the heavy burden of excessive taxation has so long and oppressively rested.

Sir, if these new bonds are issued it will result in delaying unnecessarily the payment of that part of the public debt which they will represent, and the surplus revenues which are now constantly flowing like an uninterrupted stream into the public Treasury (excepting that which may be used in the redemption of the certificates authorized to be issued by this bill, and which, in my judgment, will never be issued or sold) will be hoarded there and remain idle and useless until the debt again becomes redeemable, unless the bonds are purchased by the Government at a high premium, as we will by the passage of this bill surrender or suspend for years the invaluable option which the Government will soon enjoy of applying these revenues in paying the principal of the debt, instead of consuming them as has been done in the payment of interest and premiums. Why surrender or suspend this option? Is it of no value to the people?

Why, sir, in its absence the money vaults of the Treasury might overflow with their precious treasures seeking an outlet, and the Government would possess no power to compel the bondholders to receive the money in payment of their bonds, and the Secretary of the Treasury would again resort to the novel and expensive mode of paying the public debt by purchasing the bonds of the Government from the Wall street brokers, or competing with them in the purchase of the same, and paying therefor large premiums. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1880 shows that the Government, from 1869 to 1880, inclusive, paid, in the form of premiums, the sum of $19,461,238.03 for the privilege of paying a part of its bonded debt. This sum was paid in addition to the amount of the bonds, principal and interest, as a bonus to induce the bondholders to allow the Government the privilege of paying its debt. Is this ot be repeated? God knows that it is a sufficient hardship for the people to pay the actual debt, principal and interest, without requiring them to pay vast sums in addition thereto for the privilege of paying it. I am unalterably opposed to the surrender or suspension of the power that the Government will soon enjoy of paying its debt without purchasing the privilege of doing so.

The bonded debt of the Government since and including 1865 has never been less than $1,700,000,000, and during all that time, covering a period of seventeen years, the bonds have been exempted from taxation for Federal, State, county, township, city, town, and all other purposes, which exemption has been equal to 2½ per cent. annually on the amount of the bonds so exempted. If the bonds, estimating their amount at $1,700,000,000, had been taxed at the rate of 2½ per cent. annually, it would have produced an annual revenue of $42,500,000, or $722,500,000 for the entire time, producing a sum sufficient in amount to pay one-third of our present public debt. The people naturally inquire why these bonds, like all other property, are not taxed. The fact that men of wealth invest their fortunes in Government bonds to avoid taxation is well calculated to engender a spirit of discontent on the part of the poorer classes of the people, who are unable to comprehend how in a republic like ours a privileged class can thus be created and protected by the Government. Certainly it is not in harmony with the form of government adopted and established by our fathers, which forbids and ought to preclude the creation or existence of any and all such distinctions between the rich and the poor, and where the burdens of government as well as its blessings should fall on all alike. It has been asserted without contradiction that William H. Vanderbilt owns one-thirtieth of the bonds of the United States, upon which he receives annually more than $2,000,000 interest, and on this collossal fortune he does not pay one dollar in the form of taxes.

The democratic party, through its Representatives in this House, on the 29th of March, 1869, endeavored to rectify this great wrong, but was defeated in its efforts by the republican party, which then controlled the House. The record shows that on that day General George W. Morgan, of Ohio, a democrat, introduced in this House the following resolution:

Resolved, That as a means of relief to the people, and in some degree to equalize taxation, the Committee of Ways and Means be, and said committee is hereby, instructed to report a bill, first, to exempt salt, tea, coffee, sugar, matches, and tobacco from every species of taxation for Federal purposes; second, to impose a tax of 2½ per cent. on all bonds heretofore issued or which may hereafter be issued by the Government of the United States.

This resolution was defeated—the democratic members voting in favor of its passage, and all the republicans, except one, voting against it. The democratic party thus stands committed on the records of this House in favor of taxing Government bonds. Why should we now yield our position on that question and abandon the fight in favor of equal taxation, when we can by inserting a provision in this bill provide for the taxing of the bonds to be issued? It would be better, far better, to increase the proposed rate of interest on the new bonds and tax them, than sacrifice the principle involved in exempting them from taxation.

Can we pay these outstanding bonds without issuing new ones? The Treasurer of the United States in his last annual report, dated November 1, 1880, says:

The amount of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury January 1, 1879, the date of resumption of specie payments, was $135,382,639.42, and at this date it is $140,952,837.74, a gain of $5,570,198.32, and in addition there have accumulated in the Treasury $47,084,459 in standard silver dollars.

Is it necessary to retain in the Treasury for the redemption of the United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, the $140,952,837.74 in gold now held there for that purpose? Is it likely that that amount of greenbacks will be presented for redemption? How many have been redeemed? The Treasurer, in the report to which I have referred, says:

The redemptions of United States notes in gold since the resumption of specie payments have aggregated $11,963,336.

Of this amount only $706,658, less than one million, were presented for redemption during the year ending November 1, 1880, and the amount presented for that purpose is decreasing monthly. Only $9,000 were presented and redeemed during the month of October last. The confidence of the people in these notes, which the Government alone impaired by refusing to accept them in payment of its own demands, has now been completely restored and established, as they are now received by the Government in payment of all demands, including import duties. The Secretary of the Treasury is even constrained to express his admiration for them, and says in his last report:

While no distinction as to value is made between coin and notes in business transactions, a marked preference is shown for notes, owing to their superior convenience in counting and carrying.

This House in Committee of the Whole expressed its opinion as to the amount of gold necessary or proper to be held in the Treasury for redemption purposes in adopting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] fixing the amount at $50,000,000, which amendment received the support of three-fourths of all the members who voted. I voted for the amendment, because I then believed, as I now do, that that sum is amply sufficient for that purpose. Deducting the $50,000,000 from the amount of the gold now in the Treasury for redemption purposes, and it leaves $90,952,837.70 that can and ought to be applied in paying the bonds; and adding to this the $34,710,189 in standard silver dollars now in the Treasury in excess of the amount required for the redemption of the outstanding silver certificates, and it makes in all $125,663,016.70 in coin that can be used in paying the bonds. Why not use this money in paying the 6 per cent. bonds, which amount to $203,573,750?

If so applied the balance due on those bonds will be $77,810,733.30, and this can be paid out of the surplus revenues of the Government for the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1881, which the Secretary of the Treasury estimates at $90,000,000, and leave an unexpended balance of the surplus revenues in the Treasury of about twelve million dollars. By doing this not only the interest, but the principal, of more than $203,000,000 of our public debt will be paid; and then the 5 per cent. bonds amounting to $469,651.50 can be paid in such amounts annually as the surplus revenues of the Government will permit. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the amount of the surplus revenues for the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1882, at more than $90,000,000, and it is not likely that they will ever amount to less than that sum annually, as the country is now in a prosperous condition, and is constantly increasing in population and wealth. With the surplus revenues, estimated at $90,000,000 per annum, the 5 per cent. bonds can be paid in five years, so that on June 30, 1886, the debt now proposed to be refunded can be paid. Is it not wiser to thus pay the debt than refund it by issuing new bonds?

The Government has already paid as interest on its bonds a sum nearly equal to the present amount of the public debt. Let us pay the bonds as rapidly as possible and stop interest, the payment of which is consuming the revenues of the Government, and which will never cease until the bonds are paid. By doing so, the money now invested in Government bonds will necessarily seek other investments, and enter the active channels of business, and impart increased vitality to our reviving industries and augment the wealth and prosperity of the country, and the money thus invested, which now escapes taxation, can then be reached for that purpose and thereby relieve the people to a great extent of their present burdens.

Interstate Commerce.

SPEECH OF HON. J. W. SINGLETON,

OF ILLINOIS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 4, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1028) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

The General Government should not seek to operate when the States can operate with more advantage to the community.—Daniel Webster.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I arise to address this House for the first time on the pending question laboring under an embarrassment that one arrived at my time of life and so long accustomed to public discussion should not feel. But, sir, the evil consequences to follow and flow from the power asserted by the bill before us alarm me, and a feeling of distrust of my ability to accomplish what duty to my constituents prompts me to undertake, fills me with a degree of trepidation beyond the power of my courage to suppress.

But if I can have the attention and indulgence of the House for a little while, I will try in a discursive way to present my objections; so that if I cannot convince any who differ with me of their error, I have, at least, the courage to believe I can lead them into a line of thought that will work its own conviction in time to save the country from the catastrophe of this bill.

When an individual contemplates some important action having a desired object in view he naturally, in the business order of procedure, first inquires as to his right under the law to do what his mind proposes. Having settled that question affirmatively, he will, as a prudent and wise man, carefully consider the means best adapted to the end in view.

The bill before us suggests the same, and many other inquiries to my mind.

First. What is "interstate commerce?"

Second. Is there such a commerce known, and amenable to the Constitution and laws of the United States?

Third. If there is such a commerce as "interstate," ought it not to be regulated by the same rules wherever it exists or may be found?

Fourth. Has Congress, in virtue of its authority to "regulate commerce," the power to discriminate in favor of one class of carriers and against another class; in favor of wind against steam, and in favor of water against railroads; in favor of one State and against another; in favor of one port and against another?

These are all important inquiries to be settled correctly, I hope, before we enter upon the boundless and unfathomable sea of legislation, to which the subject will lead in the future if the power claimed for Congress be conceded and exercised.

The time has come, to say the least, for directing public attention to this great question, that it may be made the subject of sagacious thought and wise determination upon the part of Congress as well as the States and people.

It is an important economic question. The carrying trade, which is the real subject of the bill, has its ramifications extending to all the departments of social and business intercourse. It is an ever-present necessity, as indispensable as the power of locomotion. And while necessary to commerce and intercourse generally, the qualified power of Congress over the subject can be exercised only when conjoined to "commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." Were it otherwise—and the power to regulate commerce extends to common carriers and their business, because common carriers are necessary to commerce—then the power of Congress will know no law but necessity, and everything necessary to commerce will be subject to its control, and thus absorb all the remaining powers of the State. Imagine if you can the field, the factory, or the shop that is not as necessary to commerce as common carriers.

The business of common carriers, I am free to admit, has, in the last quarter of a century, grown into such vast and almost immeasurable proportions of importance to the general welfare of mankind that legislative restraint upon its alleged aggressive tendency and power has become as indispensable and imperative as laws for the suppression and punishment of crime.

The hue and cry of "oppressive exactions and unjust discriminations" is heard on every hand, but I am not prepared to affirm or deny these charges, nor is it necessary to my purpose that I should do so at this time. True or false, I am fully persuaded the exercise of the power invoked to remedy the abuses charged would be far more pernicious than acquiescence in a continuance of the evil unmitigated.

The transportation of persons and property from one place to another for a reasonable compensation is a business or trade as old as human society, and the improvement in the mode and expedition with which such trade is now carried on is but a development in the line and march of civilization commensurate with its ever-growing wants.

If Congress has power to deal with the general and abstract subject of transportation, its action should not be confined to railroads alone, which are but modern adjuncts to the broad and intricate system of foreign and domestic intercourse, to which common rules and regulations should be applied.

If there is one class of carriers less subject than another to congressional jurisdiction and control, it is rail corporations created and authorized by the laws of the several States, licensed to prosecute their business of "common carriers" for a reasonable compensation.

No inflated idea of their "vested rights," no aggregation of wealth can lift them above the power of State laws and popular interest, to which they owe allegiance, if in fact guilty as charged of "oppressive exactions and unjust discriminations."

The power of thirty-eight States, acting independently of or in concert with each other, is a much more formidable power to control and a safer repository of the public interest in respect to railroads than the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Webster, in the argument of Gibbons vs. Ogden, says "the General Government should not seek to operate where the States can operate with more advantage to the community." Such in fact was the object that led to the adoption of the Federal Constitution—to accomplish something beyond the power of a State.

The management of railroad corporations created by the States is not beyond their power. Their roads are operated under State laws and subject to legislative revision.

The railroad power of the country is less effective distributed among the States than it would be concentrated upon Congress. If it is a power for evil, as is said, it is like all other powers of the same kind weakened by diffusion. A thimbleful of powder discharged from a pistol or gun-barrel would send a ball through a man's head, but you might scatter a quart of it over the floor of this Hall and it would prove less harmful than the malarious atmosphere with which we are daily regaled.

A distinguished statesman at the other end of this Capitol in a published communication over his own name printed in the January number of the North American Review, speaking of the democratic party, gives us a warning not to be unheeded in the consideration and determination of this question. He says "the hour for its triumph will have come, when it boldly asserts its true theories, and ignores the blandishments of money, monopoly, and corrupt power." If my democratic friends in Congress would profit by these wholesome suggestions they will give no support to the pending measure, lest by so doing they should provoke the promoters of monopoly and corrupt power, and invite the blandishments of five thousand millions of railroad capital to the lobby of Congress.

I insist, and shall endeavor to demonstrate by logical deductions from conceded premises, that Congress has no power over the subject of this bill. And if it has such power I say it is, in my opinion, unskillfully employed by the pending proposition, which, in operation and effect, would prove a ligature upon the great arteries and capillaries of the system to which it is applied. The intercourse and commerce that existed prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and constituted the attractive force and leading object of the convention, was of four kinds—three kinds of intercourse with commerce, and one kind of intercourse without commerce: first, the commerce of the several States with each other; second, the commerce of the several States with foreign nations; third, the commerce of navigable waters lying beyond and between two States; fourth, intercourse without commerce known as social, political, and religious.

There was a wide difference as to the power and mode applicable to the regulation of the several kinds of commerce and intercourse, and wisely the convention decided by the adoption of permanent and uniform rules and inhibitory provisions to regulate commerce between the States and the intercourse of their citizens with each other; and the successful and satisfactory manner in which that duty was performed I will now proceed to show.

The fourth of the articles of confederation contain among others the following provisions:

> The free inhabitants of each of these States—paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted—shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall have free ingress and egress to and from any other States, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof: Provided, That such restrictions, shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any State to any other State of which the owner is an inhabitant.

Prior to the adoption of this article each State had the unlimited power of discrimination in favor of its own inhabitants and their property and against the citizens and inhabitants of every other State and their goods. Each State had the power to exclude the citizens and inhabitants of every other State and their goods and wares from their markets, their climate, their territory, and soil. They could make an act, if done by a citizen or inhabitant of one State, lawful and harmless; if done by an inhabitant or citizen of another State, at the same time and place and under precisely the same circumstances, unlawful and criminal. And each could declare a perfect non-intercourse of their inhabitants with the inhabitants of other States, or establish gates or posts upon their borders with or without highways, and collect toll or tribute from all who came in or passed out.

To improve this condition of things and remove as far as the States would agree the embarrassments to which they were alike liable to be subjected in their intercourse with each other, the article I have quoted was adopted. That it failed to accomplish the object in respect to the matters most essential to the States is apparent. Its purport confused by ambiguity, its insufficiency and difficulty of practical application to the relief of the wants of the country under any construction its language would bear, plainly foretold the result. While it pretended to make the personal intercourse of the inhabitants free, "paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice" (a numerous class at that time) were excepted from its benefits, and the State retained the power to decide who were paupers, who vagabonds, and who fugitives from justice. All men not possessed of a certain amount of money or property might be declared "paupers;" all persons without fixed homes whose calling and business might lead them from place to place, "vagabonds;" and all who fled to the New to escape the tyranny of the Old World pronounced fugitives from justice. The "ingress and regress" of the people, clogged and spanceled by "duties, impositions, and restrictions," was a fascinating picture of vineyards, farms, herds, shops, and factories to the benighted vision, while the State retained the power to erect impassable barriers at will.

The subject remained in the bondage of State authority, subject to the power of the necromantic agency of evil-disposed persons to revive the disorder in its worst and most malignant form.

Thus stood commerce and intercourse between the States at the adoption of the Constitution. And from the clouds and darkness of the articles of confederation sprang the bright and unfaded light of the Constitution, which with the mailed hand of its own supremacy broke the shackles of local sovereignty from the palsied limbs of social, political, and commercial intercourse between the people of the several States and made them free. That light still shines undimmed and unimpaired by the consuming power of time, though the darkness comprehend it.

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." This clause—the multum in parvo of constitutional law—is a meteor of wisdom and patriotism which broke through the clouds of conflict to establish a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night to direct our intercourse by the paths of Providence, so long obstructed by unfriendly and hostile legislation. It obliterates State lines, and with the inhibitions born of the same cause—State and Federal authority also.

Under this provision the privileges and immunities of citizens in each State are extended to the citizens of every other State—without a reserved power of the States to restrict or embarrass the due exercise of the right or a power delegated to the Federal Government to suspend or control it. The people of each State are thus secured in the natural right of enjoying the society and markets of every other State beyond the power of legislative interference, limitation, or restriction. They may freely come and go by water, rail, or any other public or private mode of conveyance, nor can the State of which the citizen is a resident impose any restrictions upon his right to seek the markets of his own and foreign countries by such channels of communication as he may choose—"no tax or duty shall be laid on any article exported from any State."

The convention that formed our Constitution did nothing without consulting the most ancient laws and usage for meaning, effect, and operation of every clause and term employed. The provision I have just quoted and extolled was the result of much careful examination and study. Its broad operation and ready application to the regulation of intercourse between the States was supported by the experience of the Hanse Towns two hundred years prior to its adoption. Among the laws of this ancient confederation I find the following:

> These towns are so knit together by their common interest that the citizens of any one of them are fellow-citizens to all the rest, enjoying, in point of trade, the same privileges and immunities, and paying no manner of custom or impost within the jurisdiction of the Hanse.—Malyne's Lex Mercatoria, volume 1, Sea Laws.

This expresses the result intended and accomplished by the Constitution.

Are not the people of the United States knit together by a like common interest, and held in the indissoluble bonds of the Union and the Constitution, enjoying like privileges and immunities in "point of trade," and equally exempt from all "manner of customs and imposts."

Such, sir, is the freedom of intercourse and trade established by the Constitution.

The two provisions of the Constitution to which I have referred, with their kindred associates, disarmed the States.

No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, or pass any ex post facto law or law impairing the obligation of contracts, lay duties on imports or exports, or any duty of tonnage.

Each of the foregoing restrictions upon the power of the States relate to and are a necessary part of the system by which the convention intended and has regulated the commerce of the States with each other and put it on an equal footing with the citizen.

Without the employment of one or all of the inhibited powers I have enumerated, no State can narrow the privileges and immunities of the citizens of other States within her jurisdiction, or in any manner clog, embarrass, or obstruct the free intercourse established by the Constitution.

Equality of the citizen, with equal privileges and immunities for his goods, wares, and merchandise, is the result of the operation of the Constitution.

No citizen of Missouri or other State temporarily sojourning in the State of Illinois can there be deprived of or denied any of the privileges, social, political, religious, or commercial which citizens of Illinois are permitted to enjoy.

Both persons and property wear the same impenetrable shield of natural right. Both may move from place to place, from State to State, as interest or pleasure may dictate. It is the right of unrestricted intercourse for persons and property between the States that we are considering. And how, I ask, can a commerce between States be created except through transactions between their citizens, respectively, whereby one thing is exchanged for another? This right of the citizens of the several States to exchange their products with each other is a natural right; it is a trade, commerce, or intercourse, one or all as you please, between the States regulated by the Constitution beyond the power of interruption. It adjusts itself to every attempt to violate this right with the same overruling power that it asserts in behalf of "life and liberty." It has invited the free intercourse of the States with each other, and has prepared the way by opening all the gates, letting down the bars, burned the fences, broke the dams, and destroyed the power to rebuild or replace them, so that the products of the several States may mingle as freely as wind or water.

The commerce of the several States with each other and the intercourse of their citizens are twin subjects, from the same womb, treated alike, and bound together by the necessities of social order and the ligaments of constitutional law that forbid their separation.

The power of regulating or interfering with commerce between the States was abolished by the Constitution. Prior thereto the States exercised the same powers as between themselves that are now exercised by the General Government in reference to commerce with foreign nations. The power of laying duties on imports and exports was a common power exercised by all the States. The power to contract and be contracted with; to grant letters of marque and reprisal; to coin money, emit bills of credit, make what they pleased a tender in payment of debts, pass ex post facto laws and laws impairing the obligations of contracts, and lay duties on tonnage—all these powers have been surrendered by the States, and thus placed their intercourse beyond the possibility of local embarrassment.

Commerce between the States as political corporations cannot exist, because they can form no alliance, or enter into any contract, or adopt any regulations or restrictions for such purpose without a change of the organic law. Commerce between two States, or "interstate commerce," so called, is the carrying trade found on navigable waters forming the boundaries of States lying upon our coasts, or such navigable waters as the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, that separate and flow between two States over which neither has more than a qualified jurisdiction. As the waters are between two States, the commodities that float upon them are geographically so, and therefore called interstate commerce.

The traffic between the ports of Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, through the navigable waters of the Gulf; the traffic between the ports of California and Oregon, by way of the Pacific; the intercourse of the States of Georgia, South and North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine is a remnant of interstate commerce over which Congress has a qualified control. The vessels in which the commodities of those States are carried to each other for the purpose of exchange through the waters I have indicated require the license of the Government of the United States, because all navigable waters are natural highways of commerce, and subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States as to the privileges of navigation. But the commodities transported on these waters under the license of the Government, if of domestic growth or manufacture, cannot be affected by any regulation of Congress without interfering with the unrestricted intercourse between the States established by the Constitution.

The commodity that floats upon the waters of the Mississippi from Saint Paul to New Orleans is almost the entire distance between two States until it reaches New Orleans, and more closely approximates what is called "interstate commerce" than anything I know of; yet it is a misnomer to call it "interstate commerce" simply because the commodity floats from the place of production to the place of sale or exchange between two States; for we must bear in mind that the moment the cargo reaches New Orleans and is sold or exchanged it becomes the commerce of New Orleans and subject to the laws of the State of Louisiana applicable to the commerce of that city, and if the vessel should sink or burn, the cargo would never become commerce at all. A return cargo of sugar and molasses is carried by the same vessel on the same waters from New Orleans to Saint Paul, which in like manner passes between two States until it arrives at Saint Paul, where it is discharged as part of the commerce of Saint Paul and subject to the laws of that State, and eo instanti a part of the internal commerce of Minnesota, where it is distributed and consumed or again transported by rail or other mode to some other State. It was first the commerce of New Orleans; secondly, the commerce of Saint Paul. Whose commerce was it on the waters of the Mississippi between Saint Paul and New Orleans? It could not be the commerce of Minnesota or Saint Paul, because they have no jurisdiction over the water, the vessel, or the commodity. For the same reason, it could not be the commerce of Louisiana or New Orleans.

The United States has jurisdiction over the waters and the vessel, but can exercise no control over the cargo; it cannot, therefore, be the commerce of the United States. Again I ask, whose commerce is it? It is not commerce at all, but the material ready to be converted into commerce. There can be no such thing as commerce in transitu. Commerce is the exchange of commodities between different places and communities.

The commerce over which Congress has control is the exchange of the merchandise and manufactures of foreign nations among the several States of this Union. It is the exchange of commodities between foreign nations and the several States that constitutes the commerce of the Constitution. Such exchange is made upon the terms and conditions prescribed by Congress. The power to "regulate" is the authority to prescribe the terms upon which the exchange shall be made. There are two kinds of commerce to be regulated—internal and external; or, if you please, foreign and domestic commerce. Domestic commerce is the internal commerce of the States—the exchange of products between different places in the same States, or between places in different States. If the commodity to be exchanged is of domestic origin it matters not where it is produced, where it is carried from or to, it is the commerce of the State where the exchange takes place. The fruits and wines of California exchanged in Chicago is, pro tanto, the commerce of Chicago and the internal commerce of Illinois. External commerce, or the "commerce of foreign nations and among the several States" to which the Constitution relates, is the same commercial intercourse that existed among the States and foreign nations prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and which each State regulated for itself by prescribing the terms upon which foreign merchandise would be admitted and exchanged in their markets.

The clashing and adverse regulations of thirteen different States made it the interest of all that some uniform regulation should be adopted, and for that purpose the power was of necessity committed to Congress to do what no one State could do, and what all, acting separately, had failed to accomplish. The power committed to Congress was to regulate a commerce then existing and to be continued among the several States, a commerce already distributed but embarrassed and clogged by conflicting discriminations. The commerce of the States with each other being liberated by the provisions of the Constitution to which I have already referred, the only commerce that remained beyond the regulating power of each State was the exchange of foreign products among them. The Federal Government, representing the unity of the States on the subject, was empowered to make the regulations; in other words, to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which the future commercial intercourse of the States with foreign nations should be conducted. Commerce requires two or more places and two or more parties to give it an existence. One party to the commerce of the Constitution is foreign nations, the other the several States. The places from which the commodity must come are in a foreign nation, and the places to which it is brought are among the several States.

Chief-Justice Marshall, whose opinions have been quoted on the other side of this question, has given the clearest possible proof that could be furnished of his opinion as to the commerce committed to the regulation of Congress. In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 195, he says:

> But in regulating commerce with foreign nations the power of Congress does not end at the jurisdictional lines of the several States. It would be a very useless power if it could not pass those lines. The commerce of the United States with foreign nations is that of the whole United States. Every district has a right to participate in it. The deep streams which penetrate our country in every direction pass through the interior of almost every State in the Union, and furnish the means of exercising this right. If Congress has the power to regulate it that power must be exercised wherever the subject exists. If it exists within the States, if a foreign voyage may commence or terminate at a port within a State, then the power of Congress may be exercised within a State.

If the commerce of the United States with foreign nations is, as Judge Marshall correctly remarks, "that of the whole United States," then the thing to be regulated and the locus in quo could not have been more clearly indicated and expressed than has been done in the descriptive words of the Constitution, "commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States."

When this clause was adopted there was a commerce with foreign nations, and that commerce was among the several States; but after the adoption of the Constitution it ceased to be commerce among the several States, because the Constitution united the States as well as the commerce, and it thereby became the commerce of the United States—the commerce of the whole, instead of the parts as it had previously existed. Since the adoption of the Constitution, it is the commerce of the United States with foreign nations; before its adoption, and while the subject was being considered by the convention, it was the "commerce with foreign nations and among the several States;" hence the description, that the commerce might be clearly identified to which the power relates.

The power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes is a broader power and is not limited by descriptive words as the power that precedes it, in the same clause. It comprehends all commerce with the Indian tribes, whether it is the commerce of foreign nations with them or the intercourse of the United States; it extends to all association, connection, and intercourse. It is a distinct and substantive power—conjunctively expressed, but disjunctively exercised—and unlike the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. The power to coin money and the power to regulate its value are mutually dependent powers, in performing the duty to which they are annexed, like the power of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction are necessarily conjoined in their application.

Admiralty without maritime jurisdiction would be like coin without value.

Congress, I submit, has no power to apply the same rules and regulations to the intercourse of civilized men with each other that it may apply to savage tribes of Indians. It has no power to extend the existing intercourse laws of the Indian tribes to the States and people of this Union.

> If a foreign voyage may commence or terminate at a port within a State, then the power of Congress may be exercised within a State.

What is this power to be exercised by Congress in a State where a foreign voyage may commence or terminate? It is the power to apply its rules regulating the intercourse of the States with foreign nations. If the Constitution had simply given to Congress the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations" and there stopped, omitting the words "and among the several States," the question would naturally arise, what commerce? It could not regulate the commerce between two foreign nations. Then what commerce is to be regulated? The answer is found by adding to the words of the supposed grant the words of the grant itself, "and among the several States;" these are words of explanation and description only, showing where the regulation was required and where the disorder had prevailed. Thus has the Constitution laid the venue of congressional jurisdiction. The commerce subject to its regulations must have its inception in a foreign nation. The voyage that brings the material to be converted, sold, or exchanged on our shores must begin in a foreign country and end among the States, or vice versa. There will be no commerce to be regulated if the vessel is never unladed, but returns with her cargo to the foreign port from which the voyage commenced.

If there is such intercourse as interstate commerce left to the regulation of Congress, what are the means appointed by the Constitution for such purpose? It must be the same power and the same machinery employed in regulating commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, as there is but one grant of power on the subject.

If interstate commerce is subject to the regulating power of Congress, then it must be conducted, if Congress should so require, under the same regulations prescribed in the case of commerce with foreign nations. Custom-houses may be established wherever a railroad crosses a State, and every locomotive and car required to enter, clear, and pay duty, and the officers and conductors to be licensed, consuls appointed to reside at every important trading town in the States—truly a Government of general and unlimited power, instead of a Government of special and enumerated powers, as we democrats have been educated to believe; no restraints upon its power except that it is forbidden to lay any tax upon articles exported from a State, give preference to the ports of one State over those of another, or require vessels bound to or from one State to enter, clear, or pay duty in another.

If the power claimed be admitted, can any gentleman who supports this claim give a reason why Congress may not require specific duties to be paid on all products or commodities arriving in Chicago from points beyond the State of Illinois?

There is but one reason why Congress may not do so, and that reason cannot come from those who advocate the pretensions set up for Congress; but from my stand-point will give the reason, which is, that whatever is bought, sold, or exchanged in Chicago, being the produce or manufacture of the United States, is a part of the internal trade or commerce of the State, it matters not from what State or Territory of the United States it may come. A stream of water may have its source in one State and wind its way through the mountains and valleys of several States before it becomes a navigable stream subject to regulations of commerce and the jurisdiction of admiralty. It is subject to the control of the States through which it flows, without reference to its source, until its increased and navigable proportions bring it within the purview of the power of Congress.

The little streams of mountain and valley that make up the deep and navigable waters that flow between and through the States on their way to the sea are to navigation what the products of the States are to commerce. One is an element of navigation essential to commerce, and the other an element of commerce. These mere elements of navigation and commerce are not the subjects of congressional power and jurisdiction. As the waters that form and replenish the rivers and seas are not a part of either river or sea until they have reached their destination and mingled in the natural element of navigation and highways of commerce, so the commodities of the States in transitu are no more commerce until they reach their destination and become so by the only mode known to human intercourse—exchange—than the rivulets that make up the rivers are navigable streams. Commerce means the business of exchange on a large scale—a wholesale business.

The corn of Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, and Illinois is retailed in Chicago, where it is internal commerce; but when thus aggregated and shipped by lake, river, and sea to Liverpool, it is a wholesale transaction, over which the General Government exercises supervision and control.

If it had been the intention of the convention to confer on Congress the power to interfere with or regulate in any manner the trade and intercourse of the citizens of the several States with each other by any general provision, it would not have exhausted the subject as it has done by the numerous provisions directly affecting and regulating that question. How easy, if such had been the intention, to have given expression to it in the words following:

> Congress shall have power to regulate the commerce of the citizens of the several States with each other and with foreign nations.

These words are plain and direct, and if employed would not admit of a doubt that the power now claimed for Congress was meant to be and was granted.

Chief-Justice Marshall says in discussing the same clause of the Constitution:

> As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed the Constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense.

It will not be pretended that there was any intention that required concealment, and that they did employ the words that most directly and aptly expressed their ideas.

Then if the words I have suggested as a substitute for those employed in the Constitution are admitted to be more direct and apt words for conferring such a power as is now claimed for Congress than the words from which it is attempted to deduce such power, then the presumption is raised that no such power was conferred or intended to be conferred.

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; second, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duty in another.

These restrictions indicate the commerce to which the general power of Congress was applicable. They show that it was a commerce carried on in vessels on water. There was no commerce or laws of commerce until navigation was invented. Admiralty and maritime laws were unknown until navigation had become the primæ viæ of commerce, when admiralty followed as the shadow follows the substance. It was external and not internal commerce. External commerce or the commerce of foreign nations among the several States was then the only commerce necessarily confined to vessels and ports. It was the only commerce to which the forbidden preference of the ports of one State over those of another could apply in view of the regulations by the Constitution of other branches of commerce, because it was the only commerce which Congress could affect by its discriminating regulations for the purpose of revenue or protection and thereby prefer the ports of one State to those of another. The power to regulate foreign intercourse, with or without commerce, by water or by land, is not denied.

"It is a settled rule of construction that the exceptions from a power mark its extent as well as its object," says Chief-Justice Marshall, "and the most obvious preference that can be given to one port over another, in regulating commerce, relates to navigation." He also says in the same opinion, "the enumeration of particular classes of commerce would not have been made had the intention been to extend the power to every description of commerce. The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated and that must be internal commerce. What is "internal commerce," and how produced? It is the aggregated transactions between different people and different places in the same State, and between themselves and the people of other States, who sell something to, or buy something from, or exchange something with them. If these transactions which take place in a State, involving the sale or exchange of commodities, do not constitute internal commerce, then I beg some gentleman better informed to have pity upon and relieve my ignorance.

The commerce of foreign nations is with the United States, but is distributed among the States and carried on by its citizens under the license of the Government; no other commerce requires such license. The commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, to which the intention of the convention and the language of the Constitution relate, means that intercourse with foreign nations by which the States severally exchanged what they had to spare for what they wanted respectively.

In construing an instrument like the Constitution of the United States, containing so little of detail or legislation to explain its meaning, the import of its words and their application to its objects make verbal criticism indispensable, as is evidenced by the example of the Supreme Court of the United States. The word "among," says the venerable Chief-Justice Marshall, means "intermingled with; a thing which is among others is intermingled with them." If the opinion of Justice Marshall be correct, that the words "intermingled with" are equivalent to and mean the same thing as the words "and among," used in the clause of the Constitution we are considering, it seems to me the intention of the convention should not remain a moment longer in doubt.

Then if we substitute the words "intermingled with" for the words "and among," the Constitution would read thus: Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations intermingled with the several States. It was the commerce of foreign nations intermingled with and among the States that was to be regulated at the time appears clear. There was no commerce with foreign nations that the power of Congress could reach except what was among or intermingled with the several States. Justice Johnson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in commenting upon that clause of the Constitution under consideration, reasons as follows:

> The power to regulate foreign commerce is necessarily exclusive. The States are unknown to foreign nations; their sovereignty exists only with relations to each other and the General Government. Whatever regulations foreign commerce should be subjected to in the ports of the Union, the General Government would be responsible for them, and all other regulations but those imposed by Congress would be regarded by foreign nations as trespasses and violation of national faith and comity.

Why is this power necessarily exclusive? Because there is no other sovereignty but the United States capable of exercising it.

Foreign nations in their intercourse are not permitted to recognize any other sovereign, on this or any other subject, but the United States. State sovereignty is unknown abroad since the adoption of the Constitution.

If the exceptions from a power mark its object and extent, the following will reduce the power of Congress and object of the convention to its properly attenuated form of intercourse with foreign nations:

> Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin.

This power gives rise to two inquiries: first, To what extent can Congress exercise the power of regulating the value of its own money? second, Where is the value of foreign coin to be regulated?

The exchangeable value of a dollar is very fluctuating, and it is very desirable it should be otherwise. The value of a dollar depends upon how far it will go to supply our wants. One dollar may supply our wants to-day, and to-morrow may require two dollars for the same food and fuel. No regulation of the value of money is perfect until it is uniform. And it can never be uniform until it is made to bear the same exchangeable relation to other things one day that it does to another. Has Congress therefore the right to fix the price of commodities in order to give uniformity to the value of money? If Congress should say that the value of wheat should be one dollar a bushel, and so on with all commodities, money would then be a true and unvarying measure of value—it cannot otherwise be so.

In the case of money, Congress has the power to create and regulate; in the case of commerce, it has no power to create, but to "regulate" only.

The power of Congress to coin money and regulate its value is not limited by any restriction whatever. The power is denied to the States and delegated to Congress. It is one of the powers exercised by the States before the adoption of the Constitution, and forms one of the many exceptions to the power of Congress to regulate commerce. Money is certainly essential to commerce; and if it had been intended that everything essential to trade and commerce should be included in the grant to regulate commerce, the power to coin money and regulate its value need not have been specifically delegated.

If the power to create and regulate commerce which is now being contended for had been delegated, the field would have been no broader than it is now claimed to be by the advocates of this bill.

The power is also conferred upon Congress to regulate the value of foreign coin, a necessary incident to the power of regulating commerce with foreign nations. Where is the regulation of the value of foreign coin to be made? Where can it circulate so as to be subject to the regulation? Nowhere but among the several States—like foreign commerce subject to the same power. In regulating the value of foreign coin Congress may discriminate in favor of or against its own coin. Although inferior in weight and quality of metal, it may be made a legal tender equally with our own coin. It is the value of both coins Congress may regulate by the same rules if it please.

The regulation of value depends on the single will of Congress. There is no second party to regulate it with. Not so with the regulation of commerce. Commerce must be regulated with somebody. Between whom and with whom is the regulation to be made? The Constitution says "with foreign nations" as one party to the transactions to be regulated, and among the several States as the other party, because it is among the several States that the subject exists. The exercise of the power to regulate the value of money is properly confined to the weight and quality of metal which shall constitute a dollar as the unit of value, and the use of that unit, but if the same latitude of construction be given to the power of regulating the value of money that is claimed for the power to regulate commerce, other things than money are incidentally brought within the power as necessary to its exercise.

Congress has the power to fix the standard of weights and measures; under the exercise of this power a pound is a pound the year round, a bushel, gallon, and yard are the same at all times, and everywhere weights and measures are uniform, everywhere and always the same. This power is also necessary to commerce, but is not included in the grant on that subject. While Congress fixes the dimensions of the pound, bushel, and yard as a general regulation applicable to all commerce, the States adjust the pounds to the bushel. The power of Congress is exhausted when it has fixed the standard by saying how many cubic inches shall constitute a bushel measure; it has no power to say how many pounds the commodity to be measured thereby shall weigh. This is one of the reserved powers of the States, by means of which they regulate quality, by the conjoined use of the weights and measures Congress has provided.

The power to borrow money, pass bankrupt laws, punish offenses on the high seas, provide and maintain a navy—all these powers are exercised in the interest of commerce and are essential to it. Why, therefore, should such enumerations of power have been considered necessary if the grant on that subject was to be made the laboratory of its power? With deference I say it is a mistake to suppose that everything necessary to commerce is comprehended in the grant, or that the word commerce imports more than the intercourse of nations.

If the power is "necessarily exclusive," which, in its application to foreign commerce, I admit, the same necessity that makes it exclusive would confine its exercise to foreign commerce and exclude it from interference or control over a commerce where no such necessity could be urged.

If foreign goods have crept into the country without conforming to the regulations prescribed for their admission, the power of Congress may be exercised wherever found as against the person or thing. But if the person and thing thus stealthily escaping for the time being the duties and obligations imposed by the statute be found in some secluded spot in a State, the power of Congress to follow it there and seize both person and property is not an exercise of the power to regulate commerce, but a power to punish offense against the laws of the United States. Nor is it the exercise of the power where the subject exists, because the subject cannot exist where no provision of law has been or can be made, in the nature of the power, for its existence. The place where the subject can have a legal existence is ports of entry and ports of delivery. "If it exists within the State, if a foreign voyage may commence and terminate at a point within a State, the powers of Congress may be exercised within a State."

The act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed March 2, 1799, divided the United States into districts for such purpose, with ports of entry and ports of delivery in each district, defining the territorial jurisdiction of the collector of the port of entry and likewise the jurisdiction of the port of delivery.

The word port used in the law and the Constitution must have been employed in its universal legal and commercial acceptation, and is defined by lexicographers, compilers, and commentators on commercial law, sustained by the courts of all Christendom, to be a place for ships to ride at anchor and for lading and unlading of the cargo of vessels and the collections of duties and customs on imports and exports. Many of the ports of England, like those of the United States, have inland streams into which it is unlawful for ships to enter for the purpose of importing or exporting goods without special license. In England it is the prerogative of the Crown to designate the ports and havens or such places only where foreign merchandise shall pass in and out of the realm, including all navigable waters through which such passage could be made, and its courts have held long before the adoption of our Constitution that the king is lord of the whole shore and guardian of the ports, havens, and navigable waters, inlets, and outlets of the realm. In the time of Elizabeth it was found necessary to fix bounds of ports, establish wharves and quays in each port for the exclusive landing and lading of foreign merchandise, and also to improve the harbors.

The word "port" is defined by the statutes of the United States to be a place from which merchandise can be exported and to which imported, or, in the language of Judge Marshall, "where a voyage may commence or terminate." In the reign of George III it was enacted that no pier, quay, wharf, jetty, or embankment should be made on or adjoining to any port, or harbor, or river immediately communicating therewith so far as the tide-water flows up the same. We are not at liberty to suppose that the word "port" is used in any other sense than that which it carried to every civilized nation on earth. I concede to Congress all the power to which I have referred, in view of which, and the rule of the common law and English statutes applicable to the subject and country, the Constitution was formed, and the law to which I have referred enacted. I admit that Congress is lord of the whole shore and guardian of the ports and havens and navigable waters of the United States; that it may improve harbors and rivers, establish wharves, quays, light-houses, &c., fix the boundaries of ports, and confine the landing, lading, and unlading of foreign merchandise within the same.

In a word, I concede all the powers of the King and Parliament exercised over the subject at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and such other powers as are necessary to execute the power specified. But its regulations must be confined, and applicable to, the subject to which its powers relate—"commerce with foreign nations." These words were not inserted in the Constitution without consulting existing laws upon the subject of the construction due to them.

The Constitution says Congress shall have power to define and punish piracies on the high seas and offenses against the laws of nations, but no provision is made for the place of trial. Another provision of the Constitution, to be found in Article 3, section 2, clause 3, supplies the omission, by authorizing Congress to fix the place of trial when the offense is not committed, infra corpus commitatus, or "when not committed in a State:"

> The trials of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed.

Now, let us compare these clauses of the Constitution with the following clauses on the same subject to be found in 27 and 28 Henry VIII, and that we may see that the convention consulted the laws of England applicable to this country for ideas as well as words:

> All offenses of piracy, robbery, and murder done on the high seas or within the admiral's jurisdiction, shall be tried in such places of the realm as shall be limited in the king's commission.—First Statute, 27 Henry VIII, chapter 4.
>
> All treason, felonies, robberies, and murders upon the seas or within the admiralty jurisdiction shall also be tried in such shires and places in the realm as shall be limited by the king's commission.—Second Statute, 28 Henry VIII.

Thus it will be seen that the idea of giving to Congress the power to appoint the place for the trial of offenses not committed within the body of a State or county is taken from the English statutes to which I have referred, giving a similar power to the king's commission.

But for the laws of England, how impenetrable would be the darkness in which, after the lapse of a century, we should now find ourselves. In the case of Baine vs. The Schooner James and Catherine, 1 Baldwin, 588, the court, in determining a question of admiralty jurisdiction, says "neither the Constitution, amendments, or law give a definition of law, equity, admiralty, or trial by jury;" and,

I add, is equally silent as to the word commerce. The court proceeds:

But the terms are not consequently indeterminate, or open to any construction that may be put upon them; they must be taken in the sense in which they have been universally understood through all time by the people, the Convention, and governments of the States and Union. The jurisprudence of England is the test and standard to which these terms are to be referred, and by which they are clearly defined.

If these words have been used with proper reference to their sense as employed in the English laws, why should the word commerce be excluded from the same rule?

The civil jurisdiction of admiralty was well and clearly defined, but there was criminal jurisdiction that might with profit to commerce be extended by Congress to particular cases in dispute between the admiralty and common-law courts of England; such, for example, where a mortal blow is given at sea and the victim dies on land in his own or a foreign country. This identical question came up in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The United States vs. James Magill, reported in 4 Dallas. The court says the "words of the Constitution must be taken to refer to the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of England, but no case, no authority, has been produced to show that such a prosecution would be sustained as a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." Admiralty jurisdiction is conferred on the judicial department in terms no more general than the power of Congress to regulate commerce, except that the commerce to be regulated is indicated by the Constitution.

Congress may prescribe the form and mode of proceeding in admiralty courts, but the question of jurisdiction must be determined by the courts, agreeably to the laws of commerce.

The power to regulate is not intended to confer on Congress a supreme law-making power over the subject to be regulated. It could not execute such a power for want of territorial jurisdiction. The power conferred is merely a subordinate authority to adjust and apply existing laws of commerce, navigation, and admiralty, and provide for their proper administration and enforcement, under such regulations as it may prescribe. No law of Congress can confer rights, privileges, or immunities on the high seas or in foreign countries. Congress may and has made "rules concerning captures on land and water," but these rules are made with reference to long-established laws of nations and of war.

To define and punish felonies committed on the high seas is the only power delegated to Congress by which it can constitutionally extend the jurisdiction of admiralty beyond its ancient limits and usefulness, and this power was intended to cover precisely such a case as I have cited, and which appears not to have been, at the time, provided for by any law of this country or England.

Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction are wisely separated in the Constitution from the power to regulate commerce, being confided to different departments. If both these ancient powers were united in the legislative department of the Government of the United States, it would be omnipotent beyond the power of restraint. If to the power now claimed for Congress by the advocates of the pending measures you superadd the power to extend admiralty jurisdiction over the land, it carries with it the power to abolish trial by jury. Admiralty recognizes no right of trial by jury. In criminal cases only the right would exist under the Constitution.

Navigation, admiralty, and commerce go hand in hand—they are the trinity of navigable waters. Commerce follows navigation, and admiralty follows both, and the power of commercial regulation in Congress, and the jurisdiction of admiralty in the judicial department, are as coterminous as the boundaries of land and water. They are co-ordinate powers relating to the same subjects and are limited to the same territory, and cannot be exercised independent of each other. Courts of admiralty originated in England for the administration of the laws of commerce. They have jurisdiction of all causes of merchants and marines, all offenses of treason and piracy, robbery, murder, and other felonies committed on the seas, its branches and navigable streams up to tide-water; also of all duties, toll, tribute, or tariff upon merchandise, mariner wages, and contract for building ships, of things done in navigable waters, such as damages to persons, ships' goods, and the annoyances of passengers as well as of contracts, and other things done beyond but relating to the seas. To these and like things the regulations of Congress may extend. The jurisdiction of Congress and the jurisdiction of admiralty are alike confined to water.

It was enacted in the time of Richard II that the admirals and their deputies shall meddle with nothing done within the realm, but only with things done upon the sea. It was further enacted in the same reign that of all contracts, pleas, and quarrels and other things done within the bodies of counties, by land or water, the admiral shall have no cognizance, but they shall be tried by the law of the land. It will be seen that admiralty jurisdiction is confined to the sea, its coasts and other navigable waters not being within the body of a county, for it is further declared by the same law that "all ports and havens are infra corpus comitatus, and the admiral hath no jurisdiction of anything done in them." If the captain of a vessel were to commit a felony at sea, such as robbing his passengers, admiralty would have jurisdiction, and the regulations of Congress as to trial and punishment would apply; but if the offense be committed on land at a hotel in New York, neither admiralty nor Congress could take cognizance of the offense, because it is committed infra corpus comitatus, and the laws of the State of New York must govern the trial and punishment. Admiralty has never claimed jurisdiction of crimes committed on the navigable rivers of the United States above tide-water.

If the regulations of Congress can be extended to the internal trade and carriers of a State, the jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty may follow and attach to any transaction between man and man, and thus be made the mere bailiffs of Congress, as was attempted to be done by an act of the British Parliament in 1793, and subsequently held by Chief-Justice Mansfield to be a violation of the British constitution. The code Oleron-Wizbey Consolato del Mare, Lex Mercatoria, and the articles of the Hanse Confederation were sources of information to the convention on all subjects relating to navigation, commerce, and admiralty, to be consulted now in construing as they were then in forming our Constitution. The laws of admiralty settled by universal custom recognize that broad and important distinction between commerce and trade so necessary in defining the boundaries of its jurisdiction.

The Colonies in their address to the Crown, October 26, 1774, protest against the exercise of such a power by the King and Parliament; and from that document I extract the following:

By several acts of Parliament, made in the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth years of Your Majesty's reign, duties are imposed on us for the purpose of raising a revenue; and the powers of admiralty and vice-admiralty courts are extended beyond these ancient limits, whereby our property is taken from us without our consent; the trial by jury in many civil cases is abolished.

The English law dictionary compiled by Giles Jacobs before the Revolution, and recognized as a standard of authority at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, says:

There is a distinction between commerce and trade; the former relates to our dealings with foreign nations, or our colonies abroad, the other to our mutual traffic and dealings among ourselves at home. For this reason the affairs of commerce are regulated by a law of their own called the lex mercatoria, which all nations agree in and take notice of, and in particular it is held to be part of the law of England which decides the causes of merchants by the general rules which obtain in all commercial countries.

A distinction—

Says Burrill—

is frequently made between commerce and trade properly so called, the latter, intercourse between citizens and subjects of the same nation, (cites Wharton's Lex.,) and the former seems almost ex vi termini to import intercourse by means of shipping as to be used as the synonym of maritime.

The lex mercatoria, with which every lawyer of the Convention was familiar, thus defines the word:

Commerce is that intercourse with foreign nations which is carried on from one country to another by means of navigation, either for the exchange of commodities or for the sale or purchase of them through the medium of money. Commerce, then, has its basis in navigation, and is supported by exports and imports, whereas simple trade may be transacted independent of these elements of commerce. And herein chiefly consists the difference.

This definition is concurred in by all respected authorities.

Navigable rivers are truly the wards of Congress for the purpose of keeping them unobstructed and free for foreign commerce as well as domestic trade and traffic. Its regulations may extend to the seaworthiness of the vessel, its boilers and machinery, its captain and pilot, and other officers charged with the navigation, so far as the same may relate to the safety of persons and property, but, however desirable it might be to have a vessel leaving the port of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for the port of New Orleans, Louisiana, stop at all the cities, towns, and landings upon the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, between the two ports named, for the purpose of accommodating trade and travel, passengers and freight, Congress has no power to prescribe such a regulation, because the Constitution has explicitly commanded that "vessels bound to or from one State" shall not be obliged to enter or pay duties in another. The restriction applies with equal force to vessels engaged in the carrying trade between Boston and Charleston. Congress is prohibited to interfere with this trade between two States. Its powers of discrimination are wisely and properly confined to foreign nations and their goods, wares, and merchandise. President Madison in stating his objections to a bill for internal improvements, on the 3d of March, 1817, says:

The power to regulate commerce among the several States cannot include a power to construct roads and canals in order to facilitate, promote, and secure such a commerce without a latitude of construction departing from the import of the term.

On the 13th of July, 1784, Mr. Monroe, chairman of the committee having the subject in charge, reported the following amendment to the ninth article of confederation:

The United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive power of regulating the trade of the States, as well with foreign nations as with each other.

This is the identical power claimed by the advocates of this bill, that was rejected by the States and refused by the convention that formed the Constitution.

Mr. Monroe, who submitted and advocated this proposition, and who was a member of the congress of the Confederation and took a leading and active part in all the measures that brought about the convention, thus speaks:

Commerce between independent powers or communities is universally regulated by duties and imposts. It was so regulated by the States before the adoption of the Constitution—equally in respect to each other and foreign nations. The goods and vessels employed in the trade are the only subjects of regulation. It can act on none other. A power then to impose such duties and imposts in regard to foreign nations, and to prevent any on the trade between the States, was the only power granted.

In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden the Supreme Court of the United States says State inspection laws, health laws, and laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are not within the power granted to Congress.

If turnpike roads and ferries are not, as Judge Marshall says, "within the power granted to Congress," I would like to know by what process of reasoning or power of legerdemain railroads and bridges, which are but the substitutes of turnpikes and ferries, can now be embraced. At the time this decision was made, ferries formed an important if not the only mode among many of the States of conducting their intercourse with each other, and still retain much of the same importance. At my own home a large share of the trade of the city of Quincy comes from the State of Missouri, and is brought over by a ferry-boat. There is also a railroad bridge above the ferry over the same river, within the limits of the same city and State. Why, I ask, should Congress exercise control over the one, and not over the other? If the power of Congress does not extend to turnpike roads, it will not be pretended that it extends to the ordinary highways laid out, and maintained by the States, and it must follow, then, as a matter of absolute necessity, that the power conferred upon Congress is confined to water, because all other known avenues of trade, transportation, and intercourse between the States are excepted from the power. Turnpike roads, common highways, and ferries constituted at that time the only means of inter-communication that could be employed between many of the States.

I have no connection with or interest in any corporation; not one dollar of stock or bonds of any kind are mine; I own nothing but the land I cultivate and the stock upon it, and I dare to do justice when I say the railroads are more sinned against than sinning. It is a mistake to suppose that the States or people are in their power; they can "starve them," as the gentleman soon to preside at the White House might truthfully exclaim if he were now present participating in this discussion. If railroad corporations engage in combinations whereby competition is destroyed and the cost of transportation increased, it is such a fraud upon the public as would justly forfeit their charter and franchise to the State or States from which they are derived; but railroad corporations, whatever errors and wrongs they may have committed, have rights that Congress should respect, and duties to perform that the States alone can enforce.

Our system of railroads that now permeate all the States of the Union was commenced and carried on and completed under special grants or contracts with the several States, whereby rights have vested in corporations, individuals, and communities, which cannot be taken away or impaired without an utter disregard of all constitutional restraints, the adjudication of all the most enlightened courts of modern times, and the mutual and relative obligation of government and citizens. A grant of authority by the Legislature of a State to one or more persons to build and operate a railroad is a contract between the State and such individuals. The Supreme Court of the United States says:

> A grant from a State is as much protected by the operations of the provisions of the Constitution as a grant from one individual to another; and a State is as much inhibited from impairing its own contracts, or a contract to which it is a party, as it is from impairing the contracts between two individuals. (Fletcher vs. Rich, 6 Cranch.)

Again, in Ferrit vs. Taylor it was held that a legislative grant vested an indefeasable and irrevocable title; that there is no authority or principle to support the doctrine that a legislative grant was revocable in its nature, and held only durante beneplacito, nor can the Legislature repeal statutes creating private corporations or confirming to them property acquired under the faith of previous laws, and by such repeal vest the property in others without the consent or default of the corporations. Such a proceeding would be repugnant to the letter and spirit of the Constitution and to the principles of natural justice. (9 Cranch, 43.)

In the celebrated Dartmouth College case it was held that the charter granted by the British Crown to the trustees of Dartmouth College in 1769 was a contract within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States and protected by it.

Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Jersey, Delaware, and New York have each established a system of railroads for internal transportation; built and operated by private capital and enterprise. Neither has the power to prevent the trade and commerce of the other from passing over those roads, nor have they or either of them ever attempted it.

These roads have been located for mutual accommodation and interchange of commodities and friendly intercourse, and thus form a continuous line to the seaboard, so that each State may enjoy that share of foreign commerce by exporting and importing, which Congress by existing laws has long since regulated among them.

Common carriers are of two kinds: First, such as pursue their business or calling for hire upon the public highway, made and maintained at the public expense. This class of carriers, in this country as well as in England, may have their compensation as well as their duties and liabilities regulated by law, but such regulation must be prescribed by the State.

The other class of common carriers, known as railroad corporations, are not subject to the same restrictions. This latter class pursue their calling or business under a franchise which implies exemption or immunity from ordinary jurisdiction. This franchise is granted by the State upon a consideration sufficient in law to support a contract. In England it was regarded as a part of the royal privilege or branch of the king's prerogative, subsisting in the hands of the subject. This franchise or branch of the king's prerogative may be vested either in natural persons or in body-politic, in one or many, but when once granted cannot be taken away or bestowed on another, for that would prejudice the former grant. The rights of railroad corporations in this country to collect reasonable tolls is founded upon the same principle of reason and law that the right to take tolls at bridges, wharves, &c., is in England.

The rights presuppose something done or to be done as the consideration, such as the building of a road and keeping it in repair. A grant to A and B of the exclusive use as common carriers of a public highway, made and to be kept in repair at the public expense, would I suppose be illegal and void in this country as in England. When justice is not done by railroad corporations under their franchise, the courts may compel the owners of the franchise to do justice. Railroad corporations like other owners of a franchise are liable to forfeiture for abuse, misuser, or non-user.

If a railroad corporation should fail to keep its road in proper repair for the safe transportation of persons and property over the same, the State courts might upon quo warranto inquire into the same and declare the franchise forfeited. A failure to keep the road in such repair is a failure of consideration which the State may take advantage of on information.

A railroad corporation is the creature of the State—an artificial citizen, in whose hands, temporarily, and for a special purpose, subsists a portion of the State's sovereignty; and if that portion of the State's sovereignty can be appropriated by Congress, the whole may.

Mr. Speaker, I shudder for posterity when great and good men lend their names to such heresies. I find a small tract circulating among the members of this House, purporting to emanate from the Board of Trade of the city of New York, containing a letter from a distinguished and honored citizen of Pennsylvania on this subject, with the following extracts from the report of a United States Senate committee on the subject of the power of Congress to regulate commerce. The committee are made to say:

> That in the selection of means by which interstate commerce shall be regulated, Congress may—
> 1. Prescribe the rules by which the instruments, vehicles, and agents engaged in transporting commodities from one State into or through another shall be governed, whether such transportation is by land or water;
> 2. That it may appropriate money for the construction of railways or canals, when the same shall be necessary for the regulation of commerce;
> 3. That it may incorporate a company with authority to construct them;
> 4. That it may exercise the right of eminent domain within a State in order to provide for the construction of such railways and canals; or,
> 5. It may, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, take for the public use, paying just compensation therefor, any existing railway or canal owned by private persons or corporations.

If the power of eminent domain in the Federal Government extends to taking canals and railroads why may not Congress condemn every State in the Union for a "public use," of which it claims to be the sole judge, and as a pretended recognition of constitutional restraint tax each State to provide the compensation for the destruction of its own sovereignty?

If, as is asserted, the horses, wagons, and drivers of the farmer that convey the products of a Virginia farm to a Maryland market are to be made the subjects of congressional power and regulation, then, indeed, will home government, the foundation of our edifice, be swept away forever?

What, sir, is this power of eminent domain, claimed for the Federal Governments, under which it may enter the States and appropriate the property of its corporations to its own use?

"Eminent domain," says Kent, "is the inherent sovereign power of a State which gives the Legislature the control of private property for public use." (2 Kent, 339.)

It is the ultimate right of the sovereign power to appropriate, not only the public property, but the private property of all those within the territorial sovereignty to public purposes. (11 Peters, 641; 6 Howard, 531.)

The right of eminent domain is as inherent in the States as the right of life and liberty is in the individual man.

The States surrendered no part of their sovereignty to the Federal Government, but only their jurisdiction over specified subjects, and with that jurisdiction their aggregate of power to maintain it.

I know of no case in which the Federal Government has exercised the power claimed. On the contrary, the Constitution utterly negatives the idea of such a power existing in the Government of the United States. First article, eighth section, seventeenth clause of the Constitution is as follows:

> That Congress shall have the power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district, not exceeding ten miles square, as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the States in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

Congress was not permitted to exercise the power of eminent domain, even to the extent of providing a place for the seat of Government, or to provide the grounds for forts, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings. It has no power to accept a grant of land without consent of the State. Its right of eminent domain is confined to such territory as it may acquire by cession from the States, and that territory cannot exceed ten miles square, with the addition of such other territory as may be granted for the purposes specified.

If there is a species of treason not contemplated by the Constitution, which has one friend more deserving than another, it is him who claims for the Government of the United States the power of eminent domain within the States of this Union.

He who would destroy the very foundations of liberty by blotting out the autonomy of the States and deprive the people of home government and domestic rule, with the power of eminent domain in the hands of the Federal Government, carries in his heart, unconsciously perhaps, rank treason to all the traditions and precious memories that recall the trials and sacrifices of our brave ancestors to establish and maintain that right. A treason too abhorrent and unnatural to be thought of or conceived by the authors of our Government, and consequently too vile and unprecedented to find its definition and punishment in the Constitution and laws of the country.

The opinions and heresies of Senators, and others no less distinguished, to the contrary should not be accepted by this House as its rule of action until they have been subjected to the crucible of reason and the Constitution.

Let us bring ourselves up to the level of this high and important duty imposed on each and every member of this House, by forgetting the prejudices local wrongs have engendered, discarding all opinions but our own, as having no binding force upon our action, to be considered and valued only for the light they may throw upon the path of duty to our constituents and country.

If the dogmas of paid professional service are to countervail convictions of duty drawn from the Constitution by each one for himself, and thus mold the action of this House, there is nothing I can do but implore the people to resume the power committed to our hands before we perpetrate the threatened violence on their rights of enlarging the powers of the Federal Government to redress private grievances, conceived and urged upon us by the mercenary advocates and employés of boards of trade, and gamblers, who lose their money because the manipulation of the cards is in other hands than their own. We cannot afford in this insidious manner to weaken the bonds that bind our consecrated structure dedicated to liberty, equality, and justice.

This Government, sir, cannot be contracted or expanded in any of its parts without destroying their relative equality and thereby impairing the strength and endangering the usefulness of the whole.

Beginning, as it does, with helpless families in search of shelter from oppression, rising and expanding with each course of organized society employed in its structure, villages, cities, counties, colonies, and States succeeded and rose, and expanded one above another, until the grand structure of popular and domestic government was complete, and surmounted by a Federal power as the shield and armor of all beneath. Thus it began, and thus it ended, rising like an inverted pyramid from the solitudes of a new world. Shall we to whom its preservation has been committed allow the superincumbent weight and power of Federal authority to be increased until it sinks the whole in one indistinguishable mass? God forbid!

Yeates vs. Martin.

SPEECH OF HON. E. K. VALENTINE,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 29, 1881,

On the contested-election case of Yeates vs. Martin.

Mr. VALENTINE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: There seems to be a manifest disposition by the other side of the House to avoid discussion of the pending case. At their action I am not surprised when I think of the outrage they are about to commit on the sitting member, on the electors of the first district of North Carolina, and upon this House. This is no ordinary case. It is one calling upon every member of this House for a careful examination and investigation.

We of the North have heard very much concerning the methods adopted by the democrats of the South for the purpose of electing themselves to office, and so successful are they that it is a very rare occurrence for a republican to secure a certificate of election. This case, however, is one of the exceptions, a republican having been fortunate enough to secure a certificate. But not to be thwarted by this circumstance, his democratic opponent is here asking this House, a majority of which are democrats, to give him the seat, and a majority of the Committee on Elections by their report have decided so to do. I shall not enter into all of the details touching this election, but desire to call attention to some circumstances which appear from the evidence. If the sitting member is deprived of his seat it will be because certain democratic officials failed to perform their sworn duties, and by the contrivance and machinations of leading democratic supporters of the contestant.

Let me call your attention briefly to

PROVIDENCE AND SALEM TOWNSHIPS.

The record shows that the returns of these two townships were taken by the registrars (they having been selected for that purpose by the election boards of their respective townships) to the board of county canvassers. The election laws of North Carolina require the returns to be carried to the board of county canvassers by one of the judges of election. By referring to the majority report of the committee you will notice that they count Providence Township which returned a majority of 39 for Mr. Yeates, but exclude Salem Township where the sitting member received a majority of 135; thus in two cases precisely alike they count the one which benefits the democrat, and exclude the other which if counted would elect the republican.

On page 2 of the majority report, in referring to Providence Township, the committee say:

> The action of this board (election board) seems to have been arbitrary and unjustifiable. There was no allegation of fraud or irregularity in the conduct of the election. * * * To reject this return in this county was manifestly illegal, and the evidence shows that the contestant is entitled to have 39 votes added to his aggregate vote by the rectification of this error, this being contestant's majority in that precinct.

But a little further along on the same page of the report, when they reach Salem Township, they adopt a very different mode of reasoning. They say:

> The committee are not asked to reject this vote. It is already rejected by the proper authorities of the county, and this record furnishes a conclusion only. * * * This board, in the absence of proof to the contrary, is entitled to the legal presumption that they have done their duty.

Why not apply the same rule in both instances? But they say we should count Providence because of the fact that the minority report of the committee is in accord with that of the majority, namely, "that the action of the county board in excluding Providence was illegal;" and so say I. The fact that the returns were carried to the board of county canvassers by one not expressly authorized by law, the election having been honest and fair, and it being conceded that the returns were delivered as received, is not sufficient to exclude the vote of this township. It is disputed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] that Salem and Providence Townships were excluded by the board of county canvassers for the same reason. In this assertion the gentleman is mistaken, as is clearly established by the record from which I read, page 56, being part of deposition of James S. Wilcox:

> Q. State whether you were a member of the county canvassing board for the county of Pasquotank, who canvassed the returns from the several precincts in said county at said election.
>
> A. I was registrar of the election at Salem precinct, and brought the returns of the election from that precinct to the county canvassing board of said county at the request and by the direction of the poll-inspectors who conducted the same, and claimed the right to act as a member of said returning board, but by a majority vote of the board I was not allowed to do so.
>
> Q. Were you present when said board considered said returns, and do you know what action they took in regard to them?
>
> A. I was present; they proceeded to canvass the returns from Salem precinct and refused to count them.
>
> Q. State whether there is in your office, as register of deeds for said county, any record of the action of the canvassing board for the county of Pasquotank in reference to the returns from said precinct at said election?
>
> A. Yes. It appears from a book among the records of my office styled "Election book," which book I now hold in my hand, that the following entry was made on page 47 of the same, headed "Record of an election held for Representative in Congress and senators and representatives in the General Assembly, on Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1878, in the county of Pasquotank, North Carolina," to-wit:
>
> "The votes as returned by the board of canvassers from the precincts of Salem and Providence were not received and counted by the board on account of informality, and therefore not counted in the above statement. Signed, R. F. Overman, clerk board county canvassers."

The committee make some further objection to the counting of this township which I will consider more particularly further along.

I shall not take up the time of the House in reviewing all of the tawnships and precincts rejected by the majority report of the committee, but content myself by referring to two or three of them.

VANDEMERE TOWNSHIP,

in Pamlico County, is the next that I desire attention to. The record shows that the polls were not opened until between ten and eleven o'clock a. m., and for this reason the majority of the committee have decided to reject the whole vote.

The registrar in this precinct, one H. C. Holton, a democrat, swears that the polls were not opened sooner because the judges appointed were not there. Under the laws of North Carolina it became the duty of this registrar to appoint from the electors present to fill the vacancy, taking them equally from each political party. The registrar testifies that he arrived at the polling place about seven o'clock a. m.; that there were five or six persons there then; swears that he could not get persons to serve on the board until shortly before the time he opened the polls; says he appointed two democrats "some time before eleven o'clock," but could not get a republican who would serve.

Now, sir, this same witness, a democratic official charged under the law with organizing this election board, on his cross-examination admits that he only asked one republican to serve, and that he was a colored man who could neither read nor write, and that the person so informed him at the time and asked him to get some one else who was better qualified to fill the position.

I read from the testimony of Mr. Holton, page 17 of the record:

Cross-examined by defendant:

Q. What hour did you go to the place where the polls were to be opened?
A. About seven o'clock.
Q. Who did you find there?
A. I do not remember at present.
Q. How many persons were present?
A. Five or six.
Q. How long did you wait before you took steps to supply the place of the absent inspectors?
A. About one hour.
Q. How many republicans did you apply to to act as inspector?
A. I only applied to one, that I remember.
Q. Did he refuse?
A. He did.
Q. Did he assign any reason for his refusal?
A. The only reason that he assigned was that he did not care about it, and thought that I could get somebody that would do better; he could not read and write.
Q. Was this person a white man or a colored man?
A. He was a colored man.

You will observe that this man testifies that for one whole hour after he arrived at the polling place he did not even try to organize the board, asking no one to serve, either democrat or republican.

The vote of other precincts are excluded for similar reasons as this. I shall, however, refer to them only in general terms. Under the law of North Carolina, which requires the registrar to fill vacancies occasioned by the absence of any of the regularly appointed board, some delay is absolutely necessary. How much thus necessarily required, it seems to me, should be determined by the facts in each particular case.

It is maintained by the minority report, and rightfully, I think, that the mere fact that the polls of these precincts were not opened at the exact time prescribed by law does not form good ground for the exclusion of the whole vote of the poll, more especially as it is shown in these cases that there was ample time for every man registered in the precinct to have voted. That there were a few persons who left before the polls were opened is admitted on all sides. But, sir, it is clearly shown that they were aware of the fact that the polls would soon be opened. If they desired to vote they should have remained.

There are many decisions to the point that when the polls are closed at an hour earlier than that fixed by law, and electors are deprived thereby from voting, to a sufficient number to have changed the result, the whole vote of the precinct should be rejected; but where in the books do you find a decision that where the mere opening of the poll was delayed beyond the time fixed by law that the whole vote should be rejected? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] seems to think he has found such a case, and cites Chadwick vs. Melvin, reported in Brightly's Leading Cases on Elections, page 257. I have that case before me. It is from the supreme court of Pennsylvania, March term, 1871, and is inserted in this work under the heading, "Place of holding elections." There are seven pages of the opinion in the case, all devoted to the subject indicated in the caption, with exception of the following, which appears at the close of the opinion, and as you will notice is mere dictum, not being necessary to the decision of the case:

We think that if the facts be as stated in the petition in regard to Corydon Township, namely, that the election was not opened until two o'clock p. m. of the day, instead of between six and seven a. m., as required, the return should have been rejected; but I think the cause of complaint is not sufficiently averred.

The committee, after citing this case in support of their decision to exclude the whole of these precincts, say:

The soundness of this rule is indisputable; otherwise the door is opened for unmeasured frauds. Suppose, for instance, in a heated election, one party should by accident be prevented from polling its heavy vote until late in the afternoon, how easy would it be for a partisan board of managers to defeat a man who otherwise would be the choice of the people.

The committee, sir, could not have chosen language more apt than this to illustrate just what was done by their "partisan board of managers" in these precincts. Knowing them to be republican, these officials adopted just the case "supposed" by the committee of this House as a reason why the poll should be rejected.

I desire to call the attention of the House to another point touching the precinct of Vandemere, which to my mind seems quite convincing as to the deliberate scheme of the democrats to exclude the vote of this precinct. In Pamlico County, as shown by the record, (page 27,) there are eleven voting precincts. Now, sir, in none of these precincts (save one, where he received 5 majority only) did the sitting member receive a majority, except Vandemere, where he had a majority of 41. It will thus be seen that the banner, or in fact the only republican, precinct in the county was the one selected by these democratic managers to be so conducted as to afford a pretext whereby the vote could be excluded.

In my opinion, sir, and I think I am warranted by the facts as shown by the record in saying, the opening of this poll, as also those of Salem and South Mills, was purposely and willfully delayed by the democratic managers; and, sir, we find this House, or a majority of its Committee on Elections, ready and anxious to avail themselves of this pretext to oust a republican and seat one of their own party. But, sir, this is not all they propose to do. Count out, if you please, Salem, South Mills, and Vandemere, and give to the contestant the 39 from Providence, and still the record shows that the sitting member is entitled to the seat he now occupies; that he was fairly and honestly elected thereto.

Allow me to next call your attention to HAMILTON PRECINCT.

At this precinct the votes returned and counted are, 161 for Yeates, and 225 for Martin. The contestant contends that the vote of this precinct should not be counted on account of the conduct of contestee in "discharging the duties of registrar, and checking off the names of persons who presented themselves to vote." The law of North Carolina is, "that no person who is a candidate for any office shall be the registrar, or judge, or inspector of an election." The rejection of this vote is recommended by but five of the Committee on Elections, two democrats and five republicans deciding that the vote of this precinct should be counted. The report of the committee, as submitted by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER,] in speaking of the action of the contestee in this regard, says:

It is conceded by the contestee in his brief that he did for a time act as registrar at this precinct. In the interest of the purity of elections, the committee are compelled to reject the vote of a precinct where a practice so reprehensible has been adopted by the claimant of this honorable and responsible office. * * * The evidence fails to show that the conduct of Mr. Martin was justifiable, fair, and impartial while acting in this important official character.

Now, sir, I desire to take issue with the committee on these statements of facts. The contestee does not admit that he acted as registrar at that poll; neither does the evidence show it. The evidence, sir, shows simply this: that one Jonathan G. Carraway was the registrar, and acted as such on election day. The sworn statement of Mr. Carraway is that at said election poll there was a counter dividing the election board from the electors; that at some time during the day the contestee, being upon the side of the counter opposite from the election board, did, for and on behalf of the registrar, check off some forty or fifty names on the registration list as they voted. The evidence of the registrar, who, of course, was a democrat, is in direct opposition to the statement of the committee, and shows distinctly that the action of the contestee was "honest and fair;" that he did not act corruptly; that no elector was prevented from casting his ballot, or none permitted to vote who were not legally entitled to do so, as fully appears from the testimony of the registrar, to wit:

Q. How many names did Mr. Martin check off the poll-book?
A. I can't say positively, but I think he checked off some forty or fifty.
Q. Was the checking off done in the presence of the poll-holders?
A. I think it was, or a majority of them.
Q. Did Mr. Martin act corruptly in checking off the names?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. Who received the votes?
A. W. K. Gladson.
Q. Was any man's ballot deposited in the box before his name was checked off of the poll-book?
A. None that I know of.
Q. Were you one of the judges at said election?
A. I was acting as registrar for Mr. Justus Everitt, who was the legally appointed registrar.
Q. Was the election conducted fairly?
A. So far as I know.
Q. What party do you belong to?
A. To the national democratic party.
Q. Who did you vote for?
A. I voted for Jesse J. Yeates.
Q. How was the party divided of those votes that were checked off by Mr. Martin?
A. I don't know.

Now, sir, will this House reject the vote of this entire precinct because the contestee inadvertently, and as an act of kindness to the registrar, relieved him for a short time by checking a few names from the registration book as they voted, when every particle of evidence submitted by the record shows that no wrong was committed upon any one thereby? I think, sir, that as to this precinct the opinion of the majority of the committee should prevail; that it should be counted, thereby giving to the sitting member the 64 majority received by him.

The next precinct to which I desire the attention of the House is MERRY HILL.

Merry Hill is the name as given in the report and also in the record, but I am of the opinion, sir, from the manner in which they conducted themselves in that precinct, that there is a typographical error in the last word of the name—an "e" should be inserted for the "i." The name thus corrected would be more appropriate. What are the facts? Section 18, chapter 275, of the laws of North Carolina, 1877, provides—

The ballots shall be on white paper and may be printed or written, or partly written and partly printed, and shall be without device.

The evidence shows that a few days prior to the election one J. B. Martin, a democrat, an active supporter of Yeates and one of his counsel in this case, went to one William M. Bond, editor and manager of the Chowan Gazette, a democratic newspaper, and procured the printing of several hundred tickets, one of which I now hold in my hand, as follows:

REPUBLICAN TICKET.
For Congress:
J. J. MARTIN.

That he took these tickets and distributed them among republican electors of the precinct in such manner as to lead them to believe that they came from the republican campaign committee. One hundred and eight of these tickets were voted, and rejected by the election board at the instance of this same J. B. Martin on the ground that the words "republican ticket" was a device. The object of the statute was, I think, to prevent the electors from placing upon the ticket a device by which they could be easily distinguished, such as the portrait of the candidate, a flag, an eagle, or other device of this nature, which when printed on ordinary white paper would be distinguishable on the reverse side of the paper, whether open or folded.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUSSELL] told this House on yesterday that previous to the passage of this act it was very common in that State for such practices to prevail; that the national tickets usually had printed on them the portraits of the candidates for President and Vice-President. This was done so that the colored voter who could not read might easily distinguish the ticket he desired to vote; but as soon as the democrats came into power in that State they enacted the law now in force on this subject. I think it is fair to say that the object of the enactment of this law was to prevent this practice, and that the words "republican ticket" printed on this ballot is not a device within the meaning of the statute.

An examination of the ticket which I have here shows that the words "republican ticket" are printed in brevier caps; the words "for Congress" in long primer, and the words "J. J. Martin" in paragon—rather a peculiar combination. You will observe that the name of the candidate is in large, bold type, distinguishable through the paper, while the words "republican ticket" are in a small type and not distinguishable through the paper. There is nothing in the statute regulating the size of the type to be used, so that our democratic friends could not seize upon the only thing on this ticket which might under any circumstance aid the unlettered in determining the kind of ticket to vote.

The committee in their report say:

The contestee advances the claim that he is entitled to 108 votes not counted for him at Merry Hill precinct. The committee are of the opinion that under the stringent laws of North Carolina Mr. Martin is not entitled to these votes. The committee come to this conclusion with much reluctance.

Very magnanimous indeed! "With much reluctance." I should say that this conclusion ought to have been reached "with much reluctance;" so much, sir, that it ought never to have been reached at all; and, sir, I believe never would have been reached but for the purpose of furnishing a precedent, to be used and urged in the next Congress, where we all know contests will arise in more than one instance where the question of a "device" upon the ballot voted will be considered, and you will find, sir, that if the vote of this precinct is rejected because of the "device" thereon, the case of Yeates vs. Martin will be cited by the other side of the House as a precedent established upon this question. I now desire to have read the depositions of William M. Bond and J. B. Martin, found on pages 79, 80, 81 of the record:

Deposition of Wm. M. Bond.

WM. M. BOND, a witness on part of the contestee, Joseph J. Martin, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

Q. What is your name, age, and occupation?

A. Wm. M. Bond; age, twenty-one; occupation, newspaper man.

Q. In the fall of 1878 were you editor and manager of the Chowan Gazette, a democratic newspaper published in Edenton, North Carolina?

A. I was.

Q. Do you know James B. Martin, of Merry Hill precinct, Bertie County?

A. Yes.

Q. Was he then and is he now a leading democratic politician in said county?

A. Yes. He was an active democratic politician of that county.

Q. Did he hold any official position in said county at that time?

A. I think he was chief justice of the inferior court of that county.

Q. Was he, in the congressional election in November, 1878, an active supporter of Jesse J. Yeates?

A. I think he was.

Q. Who were candidates for Congress in the first congressional district of North Carolina in November, 1878?

A. J. J. Yeates, J. J. Martin, J. B. Respass, and I. S. Chamberlain.

Q. Were you, just previous to said election, requested by any one, and, if so, by whom, to print several hundred tickets, of which the one attached is a copy? Please state if the said tickets were printed and delivered or received by any one; and, if so, by whom; and any other facts connected therewith.

A. I was requested by J. B. Martin to print said tickets for him, of which the attached is one. I printed several hundred of them, and sent them to Mr. J. B. Martin, and he stated afterward that he received them.

Q. Were they printed and received prior to the November election, 1878?

A. They were.

(Contestant's counsel declines to cross-examine.)

Further this deponent saith not.

W. M. BOND.

Witness:
WM. P. GURLEY.

REPUBLICAN TICKET.
For Congress:
J. J. MARTIN.

Deposition of J. B. Martin.

J. B. Martin, a witness on the part of the contestee, Joseph J. Martin, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

Q. What is your name, age, and occupation?

A. James B. Martin; age, thirty-five; occupation, attorney-at-law; resident of Bertie County.

Q. Just previous to the congressional election in 1878 did you have printed some tickets as follows: "Republican ticket. For Congress: J. J. Martin;" if so, who printed them, and how many were received by you?

A. I did. I did not receive to exceed one hundred and fifty. William M. Bond, of Edenton, printed them.

Q. Were those received by you prior to the election?

A. I received them night before election.

Q. What did you do with them?

A. A part of them were put in an envelope and directed to Daniel Cooper, and deposited in Nicholls's store, at Merry Hill precinct, in a box, where the public got their mail. I think some of them were placed near the voting place, in a box near the polls.

Q. Who directed the envelope?

A. I did.

Q. Who is Daniel Cooper?

A. A negro politician of the republican party.

Q. Was he an active supporter of Mr. J. J. Martin at said election?

A. I presume so, from the fact that he distributed those tickets very rapidly.

Q. Who did you support?

A. Jesse J. Yeates.

Q. Did you and James B. Nicholls put up those tickets in packages, at the time and place mentioned?

A. We put them up in one package and directed them to Daniel Cooper.

Q. Who requested you to have those tickets printed?

A. No one.

Q. Is Cooper an ignorant man?

A. I judge he could read, from the fact that he examined those tickets and compared them with others.

Q. Was any representation made to Cooper that those tickets were sent by J. J. Martin?

A. No such representation made to him by myself, nor any other person to my knowledge.

Q. Was the envelope containing the tickets stamped with a United States postage-stamp?

A. It was not, to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Q. Were any of these tickets voted at Merry Hill precinct at said election?

A. Tickets similar in appearance were voted at said election—about one hundred and nine, as I am informed. I am not positive as to the number.

Q. Were the said tickets so voted refused to be counted for J. J. Martin, candidate for Congress, at said November election held at Merry Hill precinct, Bertie County, in said congressional election and State?

A. I do not know of my own knowledge.

Q. What is your best information and belief as to that?

A. Basing my answer on hearsay evidence, they were not counted.

Q. By whom were the said tickets thrown out and refused to be counted?

A. I do not know of my own knowledge.

Q. What is your best information and belief on that point?

A. From hearsay testimony, by the judges of election at said precinct, on the ground of device and voting more than one ticket. The device consisting in the words "Republican ticket" printed on the said ballot.

(Answer to the two preceding questions objected to on the ground of hearsay.)

Q. What was the political complexion of the board of judges of election?

A. My impression is that J. E. Nicholls, J. H. Brown, T. J. Webb, and James W. Smith were the judges of election, all of whom were democrats, and supported J. J. Yeates for Congress.

Q. Did you not advise the judges of election that these tickets were illegal and should not be counted?

A. I did.

Q. Did you send or give any tickets to D. C. Winston in form, "Republican ticket. For Congress: J. J. Martin?"

A. I did.

Q. About how many?

A. About twenty-four.

Q. Is D. C. Winston a resident of Windsor, Bertie County, a lawyer, and a strong supporter of Joseph J. Yeates in said election?

A. He is and was.

Q. Do you know if D. C. Winston received said tickets?

A. I was informed by D. C. Winston that he received them.

Cross-examined:

Q. Did you see any official connected with said November election take any of those tickets, "Republican ticket. For Congress: J. J. Martin," and publicly exhibit them to republican voters, and advise them that said tickets were illegal?

A. I did; Mr. J. C. Freeman, the registrar. My impression is they were so exhibited by him before any of them were voted.

Redirect by counsel of contestee:

Q. Did Mr. Freeman do this at your request?

A. He did not. Further this deponent saith not.

J. B. MARTIN.

Witness: W. P. GURLEY.

I shall now briefly consider the last precinct, to which I shall call the attention of the House.

GOOSE NEST.

The contestee claims that 139 votes should be counted for him that were not received at this precinct. The vote as received and counted at this precinct was, for Yeates, 184; for Martin, 52, (page 77, record.) Prior to September, 1876, Goose Nest precinct and Hamilton precinct were separate precincts in the same township. September 4, 1876, Goose Nest precinct was abolished and the names of its registered electors transferred to the registration books of Hamilton precinct. From that time up to August 5, 1878, all the electors of Hamilton Township were required to be registered and to vote at Hamilton precinct. On the 5th day of August, 1878, the precinct of Goose Nest was re-established and a registrar for Goose Nest appointed, who was required to transfer from the registration books of Hamilton precinct the names of such registered electors as were then resident in Goose Nest precinct, which he did. (See record, page 69.)

This was done under the sixth and seventh sections of the election laws of North Carolina, approved March 12, 1877, which are in these words:

SEC. 6. Registrars shall be furnished with a registration book, and it shall be their duty to revise the existing registration books of their precinct or township in such a manner that said books shall show an accurate list of electors previously registered in such precinct or township, and still residing therein, without requiring such electors to be registered anew, &c.

SEC. 7. No elector shall be entitled to register or vote in any other precinct or township than the one in which he is an actual and bona fide resident on the day of election, and no certificate of registration shall be given.

The registration book of Goose Nest precinct having been prepared in this way, the judges of election met on the afternoon of the day preceding the election for members of Congress, when their attention was called to the twelfth section of the North Carolina election laws, which is in these words:

Every person who shall present himself for registration shall state, under oath, how long he has continuously resided in this State, and in the county in which he offers to vote, whether he is an alien or native born, when he became twenty-one years of age, whether married or single, and where and with whom he resides. Upon the request of an elector, the registrar shall require the applicant to prove his identity, or age, and residence, by the testimony of at least one elector, under oath. And if an elector has previously been admitted to registration in any ward, township, or precinct in the county in which he resides, he shall not be allowed to register again in another ward, precinct, or township in the same county, until he produces a certificate of the registrar of the former township, ward, or precinct that said elector has removed from said township, ward, or precinct and that his name has been erased from the registration books of the ward, township, or precinct from which he has removed; and the identity of any person claiming the right to be registered in any precinct of the same county, by virtue of such certificate, with the person named therein, shall be proved by the oath of the claimant, and, when required by the registrar, by the oath of at least one other elector. Every person found qualified shall take the following oath: "I, ——, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of North Carolina; that I have been a resident of the State of North Carolina for twelve months, and of the county of —— for ninety days; that I am a duly qualified elector, and that I have not registered for this election in any other precinct, and that I am an actual and bona fide resident of —— township (or precinct.) So help me God." And thereupon said person shall be permitted to register, and the date of his registration shall be noted opposite his name in the registration book.

The judges of election thereupon decided that under section 12 no elector whose name had been transferred to the Goose Nest registration book should be allowed to vote on the next day unless he should produce a certificate that his name had been erased from the Hamilton book, and on the next day they refused 154 votes offered by republicans for the reason that they had no certificate.

The evidence in this case discloses the fact that one J. T. Hyman, a democrat, was appointed registrar for this precinct; that he transcribed from the registration books of Hamilton precinct the names of all electors who resided in the newly organized precinct as required by law to do; that he kept the books open for the necessary time required by law for registration of new voters. It is also further shown that this registrar, J. T. Hyman, was present on the day previous to the election when the judges decided that a certificate was necessary to entitle those whose names had been transferred to vote. He immediately called to his assistance one J. T. Weldo, a prominent democratic politician, and taking with him the registration books went to the house of the registrar of Hamilton precinct and procured a certificate for every democrat in Goose Nest precinct, it taking until about ten o'clock at night to write out and sign the several certificates; whereupon the registrar of Goose Nest precinct wrote upon his book opposite the name of each democrat the word "certificate." On election day the ballots of the democrats were received and those of the republicans rejected.

When it was ascertained on election day, by the republicans, that they would not be permitted to vote without a certificate, they went in large numbers to the registrar of Hamilton precinct and demanded certificates, but they were refused them, and by the same man who received the aid and kind assistance of the sitting member on election day, and for which act that precinct is now rejected by the committee. Thus the act of this registrar causes, if the report of the committee be adopted by this House, the disfranchisement of one entire precinct, and of 154 republicans in another. Now, sir, this may be considered a clever trick on the part of the democrats, but by reference to section 12, which I have heretofore cited, it will be noticed that the following language appears:

And if an elector has previously been admitted to registration in any ward, township, or precinct in the county in which he resides, he shall not be allowed to register again in another ward, precinct, or township in the same county, until he produces a certificate of the registrar of the former township, ward, or precinct, that said elector has removed from said township, ward, or precinct, and that his name has been erased from the registration books of the ward, township, or precinct from which he has removed; and the identity of any person claiming the right to be registered in any precinct of the same county, by virtue of such certificate, with the person named therein, shall be proved by the oath of the claimant, and when required by the registrar, by the oath of at least one other elector. Every person found qualified shall take the following oath.

I claim that under the law no certificate was required. These voters did not change their place of residence—move from one precinct to another. The transcribing of their names to the new registration book was all that was required under the law. But, sir, suppose we adopt the position taken by the election board, and adhered to here by the majority report of the committee—i. e., that a certificate was required. Then in that event each elector should have appeared in person, answered all necessary questions, and taken the oath prescribed in section 12. This was not done but by a very few of the democrats who voted, they voting on the certificate procured for them by the registrar, without their request or knowledge, and in plain violation of the law. Their votes should not be counted for the contestant.

One W. A. Johnson testifies that he was present on the day of election and personally inspected each ballot offered by the republicans that were rejected; that the name of the sitting member, J. J. Martin, was on each and every ballot thus rejected. The names of the electors whose ballots were refused were carefully noted down by him at the time they were called from the registration book and rejected, and will be found on page 72 of the record.

Now, sir, to briefly sum up this case. It will be observed that three precincts are rejected by the committee because the polls were not opened at the precise hour prescribed by law; that the cause of this failure is clearly and wholly attributable to the action of democratic officials, and we find a democratic House of Representatives about to take advantage of the wrongs of their own partisans; another precinct is to be rejected because the contestee inadvertently accommodated a democratic registrar by checking a few names from the registration book on election day; and the republican vote of another precinct is to be rejected because they did not have a certificate not required by the law.

It was boldly asserted on yesterday by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUSSELL,] and has not been denied by any one on the other side, that there was a deliberate attempt on the part of the democratic officials in the first district of that State to "count out" the sitting member, and that they supposed they had succeeded in doing so, but that the returns from a "back county" elected the sitting member by the meager majority of 51.

Has it ever occurred to any gentleman on the other side of the House that the action of these democratic officials was premeditated and purposely done, that you might here at this time seize upon it for the purpose of doing that which the returning board failed to do? Is it not a little singular that none of these "informalities" occurred in a single democratic precinct in that entire congressional district?

If the democracy of this House oust the sitting member, a republican, and seat the contestant, a democrat, upon the case made and submitted, it will be a most damnable but fitting crown of infamy to place upon the brow of a once honorable but now dishonored and rejected party, and thus close the chapter of its history for 1880, which is one of fraud, forgery, and frustrated ambition.

Moneys Advanced for Military Purposes.

SPEECH OF HON. F. E. BELTZHOOVER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 3, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 2272) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to examine and settle the accounts of certain States and the city of Baltimore, growing out of moneys expended by said States and the city of Baltimore for military purposes during the war of 1812.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill now under consideration provides—

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and instructed to examine the accounts between the United States and the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, South Carolina, and between the United States and the city of Baltimore growing out of moneys expended by such States and by the city of Baltimore for military purposes in the war of 1812 with Great Britain, and apply in each examination, computation of interest, and settlement the provisions and principles of the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1857, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1858," and that there be paid to such States and to the city of Baltimore any sums that shall so be found to be due them at the time of payment, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, The Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, required in such settlements to observe the act entitled "An act prescribing the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury in certain cases therein named," approved March 25, 1870, and make the deductions as therein required.

This bill is therefore intended to secure the repayment to the States of Pennsylvania, New York, Delaware, Virginia, South Carolina, and the city of Baltimore of balances of moneys advanced by them for military purposes to the General Government in a great financial exigency which occurred in the war with England in 1812. These balances, computing interest down to this date, amount to about one million six hundred thousand dollars, to wit:

Maine	$21,223 92
Tennessee	1,411 78
Georgia	30,831 25
South Carolina	202,230 90
Virginia	1,076,683 35
Delaware	18,540 97
New York	48,896 21
Pennsylvania	218,507 71
City of Baltimore	23,662 55

There is no contention as to the amounts which were advanced originally nor as to the amounts which were repaid by the Government on account. The controversy arises from an unjust and fraudulent basis for the calculation of interest adopted by the Government in its settlement with its creditors. The rule adopted and insisted on by the Government was to compute interest on the sum advanced by the State from the date of advancement up to the time of repaying to the State by the Government of any portion of the sum advanced, deduct the sum repaid from the advancement, and then compute interest on the balance, and so on until the final payment of the principal. In other words, the payments were applied first to the payment of the principal, and after the principal was wholly extinguished then to the several items of interest. The Government under this rule paid back sums on account from time to time on their indebtedness to the States and insisted on crediting the whole of such payments on the principal debt. After the whole principal was extinguished in this manner the Government then paid the interest in similar installments.

The very great and palpable injustice of this method of computation can be shown better by illustration than argument. In 1812 we will suppose that the State of Pennsylvania borrowed $1,000,000 and loaned it to the General Government. In 1828 the Government repaid $1,000,000, the amount of the principal debt, and insisted that it be credited on the principal and thereby extinguish it. The simple interest at that time was just $1,000,000. In 1844 the Government concluded to pay its interest and arbitrarily handed over the $1,000,000 due in 1828, and claimed to have extinguished its whole liability. It is plain that in this transaction the State would lose exactly $1,000,000, as the reward for having stepped forward patriotically and helped the Government in its hour of peril. Now this method of computing interest has no precedent or authority or support in law or equity. It has been repudiated by the General Government in all other transactions long ago. It has been rejected by all the States. It has been discarded and denounced by the Supreme Court of the United States, by all the subordinate Federal courts, by all the State courts, by all the disbursing and financial bureaus and departments of the General Government and of the State governments. Against this mode of computing interest the States formally protested at the time of payment; but it was not until the act of March 3, 1857, that partial redress was obtained.

By that act a re-examination and readjustment of the account of the State of Maryland was directed to be made, and it was provided that in the calculation of interest due under the act aforesaid the following rules should be observed, to wit: Interest shall be calculated up to the time of any payment. To this interest the payment shall be first applied, and if it exceeds the interest due, the balance shall be applied to diminish the principal. If the payment falls short of the interest, the balance of interest shall not be added to the principal, so as to produce interest. Second, interest shall be allowed the State of Maryland on such sums only on which the said State either paid interest or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund.

In the settlement made under this act the State of Maryland was paid the sum of $275,770.23.

Maryland, having thus succeeded in obtaining a just and proper settlement under the act above cited, South Carolina was prepared to take the same course for relief; and other States coming forward at the time, the passage of a bill in the Senate in 1857-'58 was obtained providing for a settlement with them upon the same terms as obtained in the case of Maryland. This bill went to the House of Representatives, where it met with temporary opposition, the House requiring a statement of the claims and the amount of money necessary to pay them; and to get at this information an amendment was put on the sundry civil appropriation bill in the House calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a report in the premises. (See ninth section in act of June 12, 1858, making appropriation for the sundry civil expenses of the Government.)

The Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to this call on him, transmitted to the House of Representatives on the 8th January, 1859, (see volume 5, second session, Thirty-fifth Congress, Executive Document,) a report, accompanied by full and thorough statements from the Second and Third Auditors of the Treasury, showing generally and in detail the character and merits of the claims in question, and what amounts would be then required to pay the claims—that is, up to the 1st January, 1859, to which period the interest claimed was computed.

Unfortunately no further action was taken on the claims of these States during the short period that passed between the date of these reports and the initiation of hostilities between the States in 1861; and they were, of course, during the war and for some years after in a measure lost to view, and no effort made to bring about a settlement such as was contemplated by both Houses of Congress when the report from the Secretary of the Treasury was called for and transmitted as above stated.

In the report of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, accompanying that of the Secretary of January 8, 1859, it is remarked by the Auditor that the "new method contemplated of computing the interest (as prescribed by the act of March 3, 1857) is understood to be this: To compute interest on the sum advanced up to the time of any payment, and then deduct the interest from the payment, and apply the balance to the extinguishment of the principal, and so on, except in those instances where the interest is found to exceed the payment. In cases of this kind, cast the interest on the principal up to the next succeeding payment, or until the payment will exceed the interest, and then deduct the interest from the payment."

This calculation, remarks the Auditor, is based upon the payment of simple interest on the sums advanced.

Massachusetts made the next successful movement to that of Maryland, by an appeal to Congress for payment of interest on advances made by her for the use and benefit of the United States during the war of 1812, obtaining the passage of an act, approved July 8, 1870, under which a settlement was made by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and interest on such advances was allowed and paid to the amount of $678,362.42. One-third of this amount was in favor of Maine as an integral part of Massachusetts when the advances were made; and by the terms of separation from the latter, in 1820, the former became the owner of one-third of the amount of said claim.

WHEN INTEREST IS ALLOWED.

Interest is generally regulated by statute, but in the absence of any statute a reasonable rate may be allowed as damages. (1 Cal., 422.) Interest is regarded as an incident to the debt, and is given in the form of damages without being especially claimed in the declaration. (3 Ill., 313.) Equity should follow the law in decreeing interest. (3 Marsh., 480, 483—Ky.; 23 Ala., 296.) Interest attaches as an incident to a debt or money demand from the time of its maturity. (30 Ala., 668; 29 Ala., 558; 8 Florida, 161.) Interest should be allowed on all liquidated demands, whether tested by writing or not. (1 Marsh., 576—Ky.; 19 Ark., 487; 2 Ga., 370; 19 Ga., 537.)

THE CORRECT RULE FOR COMPUTING INTEREST.

The correct rule in respect to interest in general is, to calculate interest whenever a payment is made, to the interest then due to apply the payment first, and if it exceeds the interest, to apply the residue to diminish the principal. (31 Miss., 51; 14 Mo., 500; 13 Peters, 359; 2 McCord. ch., 188, 207—S. C.; 1 Marsh, 584—Ky.; 53 Maine, 351; 28 Indiana, 488; 1 H. & J., 42—Md.; 17 Mass., 417; 1 Pick., 194; 5 Minn., 508; 2 N. H., 169; 6 N. J. L., 408; 1 Johns, ch., 13—N. Y.; 2 Johns, ch., 209; 8 S. & R., 452—Penn'a.; 5 Yerg., 310—Tenn.; 3 Iowa, 76; 35 Cal., 692; 4 H. & M., 431—Va.)

By examining the statutes of the United States it will be found that the Government collects interest on every kind of obligation due to it in conformity to the rule just stated, and which the claimants seek to have applied in this case. It sues the bonds of its defaulting officials and collects interest to the last cent, and penalties besides. It demands interest on all the judgments it obtains in its courts. It sends out its swarms of tax-gatherers and exacts interest from all poor and embarrassed and impecunious tax-payers at the rate of 12 per cent. and 5 per cent. penalty after ten days' notice. Under the same rule and in conformity to the same principle the Government pays interest on every other obligation it owes. From the year 1861 down to this hour there is no one end and object to which all the power and ingenuity and energy of the legislators of this nation have so earnestly and undeviatingly co-operated as to securing the certain, full, prompt, and honest payment of interest to the holders of the Government debt. Loyalty to the public faith and credit has become a part of the regulation creed of all true patriots. This point is so palpable as to need no comment. If this be true to so great an extent with regard to those who aided the Government in the late war, and who received besides and beyond their interest an hundredfold on their investment, why should not the Government render a tardy return to those who came to its aid in its infancy and poverty and peril, when a great common foreign enemy were invading our shores and threatening destruction to the young Republic. There is not and cannot be any answer except that which prompts and approves repudiation of the most sacred and honorable obligations.

The claim was earnestly pressed and payment demanded in 1832, and from that time down to this hour. The great State of Pennsylvania, by a solemn act of her Legislature and by a strong and urgent memorial signed by her governor and auditor-general and State treasurer, on file in this House, now demands payment of the sum due that Commonwealth.

The States are not concluded by the acceptance of the sums already paid. The doctrine which prevails in the courts between individuals that the acceptance of the principal under certain circumstances bars any subsequent demand for interest, can have no bearing upon transactions in which this Government is concerned. Settlements between individuals are made on terms of equality, remedy in the courts being open to both parties. But this Government does not permit itself to be sued, and those who have claims upon it have no other alternative than to accept whatever it may determine to pay. This Government may itself be bound by the acts of its own officials, and by its own appropriations; but nobody else is concluded thereby. Certainly this is not the case, unless there is a requirement that a particular sum offered shall be accepted in full payment of a claim, if accepted at all.

The claims have been fully and clearly recognized by Congress in paying the claim of the State of Alabama of a similar character. Again, by the act of March 3, 1857, under which Maryland was paid, and again by the act of July 8, 1870, under which Massachusetts and Maine were paid. The last bill passed the House by a vote of two to one. The very bill now pressed was passed in 1857, and but for the intervention of the war these claims would doubtless have been adjusted and paid long ago. The claims have received the unanimous approval and recommendation of the Judiciary Committee of the House at the first session of this Congress. The committee say:

> This bill proposes to apply to the other States that made similar advances of money in the war of 1812 with Great Britain the same rule of computing interest which has been applied in the cases of Alabama and Maryland, a rule which has been established by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, by the practice of every State in the Union, and followed for many years past at the Treasury Department of this Government.
>
> The bill gives simple (not compound) interest on any balance of principal that may be found unpaid, upon the proposed basis of settlement, until its payment by the United States. It provides for any and all proper offsets which the United States may have against any of the States hereby entitled. Both Virginia and South Carolina are largely indebted to the United States, and will receive but a part of what is reported in their favor.
>
> In conclusion the committee recommend a settlement of the accounts of the United States with the other States by the same rule of computing interest that has been applied in the cases of Alabama and Maryland. It makes this recommendation because the rule itself is just and equitable; because it has already been applied to some of the States, and if applied to one should be applied to all; because it has been repeatedly approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, sanctioned by the practice of every State in the Union, and for many years past followed, in similar cases, at the Treasury Department of this Government.

The bill is founded on plain, even-handed, old-fashioned principles of honesty and square dealing. It is based on the rules for computing interest which are adopted and approved and followed by all the courts, from the highest to the lowest, in the nation and in the State; by all financial agents and disbursing authorities; by all business men, and by all people in every pursuit and avocation in the land. It is supported by the precedents set in the acts authorizing payment of the claims of those States which have received their money years ago. It has the sanction of the law which was elaborately and ably discussed and passed by Congress before the war, and which was intended to pay these claims. It appeals far more strongly to the justice and generosity of the nation than the thousands of claims which, with less merit and less obligation, Congress has assumed and paid during the last decade. It is an old and honorable war debt of the nation, and rests upon the same plighted and implied faith which sustains with such unparalleled fidelity the obligations incurred by the Government in the late war. In the light of every reasonable consideration of law and equity and justice Congress should promptly and cheerfully pass this bill.

Sugar Tariff.

SPEECH OF HON. JOSEPH H. ACKLEN,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 4, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 6094) in relation to customs duties on sugar.

Mr. ACKLEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Many questions of grave importance have come before the Forty-sixth Congress for consideration—the funding of the national debt, the interstate-commerce bill, the interoceanic canal, the joint rule for counting the electoral vote, national quarantine and educational bills, besides numerous other measures familiar to members of this House—but I venture to say that none of these properly take precedence of the sugar question.

Politics, which tend to mold so much of our national legislation, fortunately need not enter into a discussion of this question. The presidential election of 1880 is a thing of the past, and the country has quietly acquiesced in the result. Four years are now before us when the people will justly expect the National Legislature to turn its attention to the material interests of the country and not waste time in making brief political capital for coming campaigns.

The opinions I entertain on the sugar question are not restricted to the local interests of any particular section; it is not merely to the present but to the future I look when expressing my views as to what legislation should be enacted on this subject. We have within the boundaries of the United States a country as fair as the sun ever shone upon; we have a population which is increasing in a ratio unknown in the history of the world. Our mode of life and republican institutions are producing a people peculiarly distinct and eminently fitted to [illegible] to its full the measure of our country's future greatness. Therefore it becomes especially our duty to see that legislation here furthers and assists the splendid future lying before the United States and does not retard its growth or check its increasing prosperity.

Before proceeding to the merits of the bill under consideration, I ask the attention of the House to a short history of sugar and the progress made in its manufacture in the last few centuries. Sugar produced by boiling the juice of canes and plants is mentioned as early as the fifth century, although even prior to that time it was in use, exclusively, however, as medicine. At what date it became first known to the inhabitants of China and India, it is impossible to say. Certain remarks of Pliny lead us to believe that the Chinese, at an earlier date than any other nation, were well advanced in its production from canes.

In the ninth century canes were introduced into Sicily, Crete, and Cyprus, and in 996 sugar was exported to Venice. In the twelfth century exportations were largely made from Egypt. The first historical mention of a mill for grinding canes was made in 1166; it was not, however, until some centuries later that its use became sufficiently general to make it an important article of commerce.

Saint Domingo appears to be the first of the West India Islands where the sugar-cane was successfully cultivated; from 1493 to 1518 the production here rapidly increased and supplied after this latter date many of the European markets.

In the seventeenth century we find production of sugar general throughout the West Indies, central and the northern States of South America. The first introduction of the cane in Louisiana appears to have been in 1751, from which time forward its cultivation has largely increased. The mills of these times were of the rudest description, and it was not until 1822 that steam was used in Louisiana as a motive power.

Sugar was discovered in the beet-root in 1747. In 1796 a factory was established in Silesia to extract sugar from beets. France, however, gave the greatest impulse to the manufacture of beet sugar under the first Napoleon, and its production in that country under a high protective tariff has enormously increased.

The history of the production of sugar in the United States must necessarily be of interest in connection with this subject. I have already reverted to the first introduction of cane in the State of Louisiana in 1751. Since that date, however, the cultivation of the cane had largely increased, particularly in Louisiana, where from 1822, the date of the first introduction of steam, plantations were rapidly increased in number; and after the annexation of the State, in 1803, an impetus was given to the cultivation of cane which prior to that time it had never received. The following table, taken from Mr. Bouchereau's sugar report, gives from the year 1823 to 1879 the annual production of sugar by hogsheads:

Statement of the Louisiana sugar crops from 1823 to 1876, inclusive.

Year.	Hogsheads.	Year.	Hogsheads.
1823	30,000	1853	449,324
1824	32,000	1854	346,635
1825	30,000	1855	231,427
1826	45,000	1856	73,296
1827	71,000	1857	279,697
1828	88,000	1858	362,296
1829	48,000	1859	221,840
1832	70,000	1860	228,753
1833	75,000	1861	459,410
1834	100,000	1862	No data.
1835	30,000	1863	76,801
1836	70,000	1864	10,387
1837	65,000	1865	18,079
1838	70,000	1866	41,000
1839	115,000	1867	37,647
1840	87,000	1868	84,256
1841	90,000	1869	87,090
1842	140,000	1870	144,881
1843	100,000	1871	128,461
1844	200,000	1872	108,520
1845	186,000	1873	89,498
1846	140,000	1874	116,867
1847	240,000	1875	144,146
1848	220,000	1876	169,331
1849	247,923	1877	127,753
1850	211,201	1878	213,221
1851	236,547	1879	169,972
1852	321,934

A much better, more lucid and correct statement, however, will be found in the following table:

Crop years.	Total crops.	Total value.	Crop years.	Total crops.	Total value.
	Pounds.			Pounds.
1835–'36	30,000,000	$2,700,000	1857–'58	307,700,000	$17,900,000
1836–'37	70,000,000	4,200,000	1858–'59	414,800,000	25,000,000
1837–'38	65,000,000	5,063,000	1859–'60	225,100,000	18,200,000
1838–'39	70,000,000	4,375,000	1860–'61	263,200,000	14,469,000
1839–'40	115,000,000	5,750,000	1861–'62	528,300,000	25,100,100
1840–'41	87,000,000	4,785,000	1862–'63	96,000,000	7,750,000
1841–'42	90,000,000	3,600,000	1863–'64	84,500,000	13,800,000
1842–'43	140,000,000	4,750,000	1864–'65	10,800,000	2,000,000
1843–'44	100,000,000	6,000,000	1865–'66	19,900,000	2,847,000
1844–'45	200,000,000	9,000,000	1866–'67	42,900,000	5,360,000
1845–'46	186,600,000	10,266,000	1867–'68	41,400,000	5,800,000
1846–'47	140,000,000	9,800,000	1868–'69	95,100,000	11,610,000
1847–'48	240,000,000	9,600,000	1869–'70	99,500,000	10,442,000
1848–'49	220,000,000	8,800,000	1870–'71	168,900,000	14,261,000
1849–'50	269,800,000	13,396,000	1871–'72	146,900,000	13,911,000
1850–'51	231,200,000	12,678,000	1872–'73	125,300,000	10,900,000
1851–'52	257,100,000	11,827,000	1873–'74	103,200,000	8,555,000
1852–'53	368,100,000	15,453,000	1874–'75	134,500,000	11,265,000
1853–'54	495,200,000	15,726,000	1875–'76	165,450,000	11,578,000
1854–'55	385,700,000	18,025,000	1876–'77	194,960,000	15,646,000
1855–'56	254,600,000	16,200,000	1877–'78	149,469,200	11,957,536
1856–'57	81,400,000	8,137,000	1878–'79	245,319,150	18,398,936

This latter table is not open to the objection, so far as accuracy is concerned, of the other; the computations in the first being, solely by hogsheads, do not offer a very definite idea of the actual amounts, since the weight in hogsheads varies from two to often four hundred pounds. Just prior to the war the aggregate amount of sugar produced in Louisiana, as it will be observed, was 528,300,000 pounds. This production was nearly equal to the quantity of foreign sugar imported in 1862, which was 661,185,215 pounds. The effects of the war, however, well-nigh, for eight or ten years, destroyed the sugar industry of Louisiana; and it was not until 1870–'71 that this industry began to revive in proportion to its importance in the United States.

It has been demonstrated as a fact beyond dispute that if the proper protection is afforded the sugar industries of this country, Louisiana, with her splendid climate and fertile soil, can unquestionably produce the largest proportion of sugar required for consumption in the United States.

Continental Europe, Great Britain and her dependencies, with the United States, annually consume upward of three million tons of raw sugars; but for purposes of assimilate comparison, the United States and Great Britain present the essential elements, the people of these countries being the largest consumers of sugar per capita in the world, the relative consumption being, according to the official data of both countries and deductions therefrom, as follows:

Consumption per capita of raw sugar in Great Britain.

Year.	Population.	Pounds raw sugar.	Pounds per capita.
1870	31,000,000	1,492,664,320	48.00
1874	32,200,000	1,912,612,800	59.40
1875	32,400,000	2,111,650,240	65.17
1876	32,700,000	1,909,461,120	58.39
1877	33,000,000	1,869,710,080	56.66
1878	43,800,000	2,103,427,200	62.25

Consumption per capita of imported raw sugar in the United States.

Year.	Population.	Pounds raw sugar.	Pounds per capita.
1870	38,558,000	1,183,089,146	30.68
1874	42,856,000	1,511,456,915	35.27
1875	44,060,000	1,575,893,948	35.77
1876	45,316,000	1,561,880,545	34.47
1877	46,624,000	1,486,072,996	31.87
1878	47,983,000	1,583,243,440	32.99

The above tables relate to all dry raw sugars consumed in Great Britain, which is not a sugar-producing country, but relate only to imported dry raw sugars consumed in the United States; consequently an average annual consumption of fully five pounds per capita should be added to the latter for Louisiana and maple sugars annually consumed, which would make the total consumption of raw sugars per capita in both countries compare as follows:

Year.	Pounds per capita.
	Great Britain.	United States.	Excess Great Britain.
1870	48.00	35.68	12.32
1874	59.49	40.27	19.13
1875	65.17	40.77	24.40
1876	58.39	39.47	18.92
1877	56.66	36.87	19.79
1878	62.25	37.99	24.26

The people of the United States actually eat as much sugar per capita as do the people of Great Britain; but the latter feed large quantities of cheap raw sugar to cattle and use sugar more extensively in brewing than is the case in this country, which partly accounts for the difference in consumption per capita. But the fact is evidenced that the people of Great Britain are enabled to eat and profitably use more sugar per capita than the people of this country, simply because they could obtain the raw sugar without restriction as to grade under a classified tariff. When the duty on sugar was high in England consumption was small.

For instance, in 1860, under high duty on sugar in England, her people, numbering 28,984,000, consumed 1,003,676,800 pounds of raw sugar, or 34.63 pounds per capita, while in 1870, under a reduced tariff, the consumption rose to 48 pounds per capita, and after the abolition of duty on sugar, in 1874, the consumption reached 59.40 pounds per capita for that year, and 65.17 pounds per capita in 1875. This too rapid increase has now settled down to about 62 pounds per capita.

The sugar-maple also contributes to the sugar supply, but the constantly increasing cultivation of the cane, beet, and sorghum indicates that as a source of sugar supply it will continue to be restricted, and used mostly by local producers.

The annual product of this sugar in the United States, however, appears to be rapidly diminishing, 28,443,000 pounds, according to the census returns, being produced in 1870, as compared with 40,120,000 in 1860; while the present annual supply is admitted to be much smaller than in 1870. The cause of this decrease is undoubtedly due in part to the destruction of our forests; and also to the fact that such increased facilities are afforded by the railroads for transportation that sugar from the maple tree cannot be sold as cheap as sugar produced from the cane.

Another feature of the sugar supply which prominently presents itself is the manufacture of sirups and sugars from Indian corn and sorghum. No one can visit the chemical-room in the Agricultural Department without being surprised at the quality of the samples of these sugars there on exhibition and impressed with the great possibilities for the future of this industry.

For the latest statistics and important facts connected therewith I have drawn largely upon Mr. Henry A. Brown, whose statements before the Committee on Ways and Means and whose last work on the existing condition of the sugar-tariff question have done more to direct public attention to this subject than all the sugar literature extant.

The production of cane sugar throughout the world for the crop year ending in 1880 will certainly exceed 4,000,000 tons, or 8,960,000,000 pounds of cane sugar produced, appproximately, as follows, according to the most reliable statistics and reports as compiled by Mr. Brown:

	Tons.
British India	1,550,000
Cuba, Porto Rico	700,000
Other Spanish possessions	50,000
British West Indies, Demerara, &c	250,000
China, Hong-Kong, &c	250,000
Dutch India, Java, &c	220,000
French West Indies, Guiana	175,000
Brazil, South America, &c	130,000
Louisiana	125,000
Mauritius	125,000
Philippine Islands	120,000
Egypt, &c	75,000
Peru, South America, &c	55,000
Mexico	35,000
Other countries	140,000
Total cane sugar	4,000,000

In addition to cane sugar, it is estimated that the production of maple, palm, and sorghum sugars in the crop year ending in 1880 will exceed 150,000 tons, and the amount of beet-root sugar produced in Europe the present crop year is estimated at 1,670,000 tons, apportioned as follows:

	Tons.
Germany	500,000
France	425,000
Austria	410,000
Russia, Poland	225,000
Belgium, Holland, &c	110,000
Total beet sugar	1,670,000

Total known production of sugars, crop year ending in 1880:

	Tons.
Cane sugar	4,000,000
Beet, Europe	1,670,000
Maple, &c	150,000
Total sugars	5,820,000

There are, however, good reasons for believing that the world's annual production of cane and assimilative sugars exceeds 6,000,000 tons, and that China, from whence sugar-cane first found its way to Europe, alone produces enough more sugar than she reports to more than justify such statement.

Of this vast quantity the people of this country consumed in the year ending 1880 nearly 1,000,000 tons, say one-sixth part, or, as officially reported, 2,087,527,625 pounds of sugars, as follows:

	Pounds.
Dutiable sugars entered into consumption	1,592,261,957
Dutiable melada entered into consumption	33,709,344
Hawaiian sugars, duty free, consumed	61,556,324
Louisiana, Texas, &c., 250,000 hogsheads, or	300,000,000
Maple, sorghum, and beet sugars	100,000,000
Total consumption of sugar for 1880	2,087,527,625

Total consumption of sugars in 1880 per capita in the United States, 41.75 pounds.

Naturally, when the consumption of sugar became great throughout the world, one of the questions of importance which presented itself to the different nations was the imposition of a tariff or duty on sugar for purposes of revenue. I deem it, therefore, proper to give somewhat in detail the tariffs levied in the United States from 1789 down to the present time; and also those of some of the principal sugar-consuming countries, as condensed in Mr. Brown's revised analyses of the sugar question. Duties on sugar have been levied as follows:

1789.—On all raw sugar, 1 cent; on refined, 3 cents per pound.
1790.—On all raw sugar, 1.50 cents; on refined, 5 cents per pound.
1794.—On two grades sugar, 1.50 and 2.50 cents; on refined (*3), 9 cents per pound.
1797.—On two grades sugar, 2 and 2.50 cents; on refined (*3), 9 cents per pound.
1804.—On all raw sugar, 2.50 cents; on refined (*3), 9 cents per pound.
1812.—On all raw sugar, 5 cents; on refined (*6), 18 cents per pound.
1816.—On all raw sugar, 3 cents; on refined, (*4), 10 and 12 cents per pound.
1832.—On all raw sugar, 2.50 cents; on refined (*3½), 10 and 12 cents per pound.
1842.—On all raw sugar, 2.50 cents; on refined (*4), 6 cents per pound.
1846.—On all raw and refined sugar, 30 per cent. ad valorem.
1857.—On all raw and refined sugars, 24 per cent. ad valorem.
1861.—On all raw and refined sugars, 7.50 mills per pound.
1861.—August 5, the Dutch color standard was adopted.
1861.—Not above No. 12, D. S., 2 to 2.50 cents; above 12, D. S., 2.50 to 3 cents.
1862.—To No. 12, D. S., 2.50 cents; to 15, D. S., 3 cents; above 15, 3.50 cents.
1864.—To No. 12, D. S., 3 cents; to No. 15, D. S., 3.50 cents; above 15, 4 cents.
1870.—December 20, the present sugar-tariff schedule was adopted.
1875.—March 3, 25 per cent. ad valorem was added to said schedule.

The duties now supposed to be levied upon sugars are as follows:

Sugar not above No. 7, Dutch standard in color, per lb., 1¾c. plus 25 per cent., 2.1875 cents.

Sugar not above No. 10, Dutch standard in color, per lb., 2c. plus 25 per cent., 2.50 cents.

* White clayed or powdered advanced beyond a raw state.

Sugar not above No. 13, Dutch standard in color, per lb., 2¼c. plus 25 per cent., 2.8125 cents.

Sugar not above No. 16, Dutch standard in color, per lb., 2¾c. plus 25 per cent., 3.4375 cents.

Sugar not above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, per lb., 3¼c. plus 25 per cent., 4.0625 cents.

Sugar not above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, per lb., 4c. plus 25 per cent., 5 cents.

On sirup, melada, tank bottoms, &c., per lb., 1½c. plus 25 per cent., 1.8750 cents.

On molasses, per gallon, 5c., plus 25 per cent., 6.25 cents.

The rates allowed as drawback on refined sugar exported as being entirely the product of foreign duty-paid sugar have from time to time been fixed by the Government; since the Dutch standard was adopted sugar drawback has been allowed, the rates having been fixed as follows:

August 5, 1861.—On refined hard sugar, 3 cents per pound; on B and C lower grades, 2 cents per pound; on sirup, 5 cents per gallon; all less 10 per cent. to the Government.

March 29, 1875.—On refined hard sugar 3.75 cents per pound; on B and C lower grades, 2.50 cents per pound; on sirup, 6.25 cents per gallon; less 1 per cent. on sugar and 10 per cent. on sirup to the Government.

December 17, 1875.—On refined hard sugar, 3.60 cents per pound; on refined coffee sugar above No. 20, D. S., 3 cents per pound; on refined coffee, No. 20, D. S., and under, 2.50 cents per pound; on sirup, 6.25 cents per gallon; less 1 per cent. on sugar and 10 per cent. on sirup to the Government.

October 1, 1877.—On refined hard sugar, 3.18 cents per pound; on refined coffee sugars above No. 20, D. S., 2.58 cents per pound; on refined coffee sugars, No. 20, D. S., and under, 2.08 cents per pound; on sirups, 6.25 cents per gallon; less 1 per cent. on sugar and 10 per cent. on sirups to the Government.

Reviewing the foregoing sugar-tariff tables, it will be observed that from 1789 to 1846 sugar was in fact divided into two classes for levying duty—raw and refined. In 1846 Congress was beset by a mania for reducing the revenue and for ad valorem duties. Among a multitude of articles sugar was changed from specific to ad valorem duty. In 1857 the work was continued by Congress, and in that year a further reduction of 20 per cent. from the tariff of 1846 was made.

With the adoption of the Dutch standard in 1861 specific duty was again levied upon sugar, virtually dividing it into three grades—raw, semi-refined, and refined. This classification continued until the adoption of the sugar tariff of 1870, which subsequent events have shown was evidently demanded in the interests of consumers, in order to introduce low grades of raw sugar for refining to meet the growing demand among the great mass of consumers for cheap refined sugars which could not be made in sufficient quantity from high grades of raw sugars, unless such were adulterated for the purpose. (See section 2 for classifications.)

Great Britain abolished duty on sugar in 1874, having a manufacturing competitive eye to windward, and a natural desire to favor consumption of her colonial sugars. Duties were levied on sugars in England in 1870 to 1874 as follows:

English classification of and duties on sugar in 1870.

Classification.	Per cwt., (112 pounds.)	Per pound, reduced to cents.
	s. d.
Sugar, refined, or equal in quality thereto	6 0	1.339
First class, not equal to refined	5 8	1.258
Second class, not equal to refined	5 3	1.169
Third class, not equal to refined	4 9	1.053
Fourth class, including cane juice	4 0	0.892
Molasses	1 9	0.383

In 1874 England reduced the sugar duty on the above-named classes to the following rates per cwt.: Refined, 3*s.*; first class, 2*s.* 10*d.*; second class, 2*s.* 8*d.*; third class, 2*s.* 5*d.*; fourth class, 2*s.*; molasses, 10*d.* Shortly after this almost inoperative schedule was enacted, the duty on sugar was abolished, as above stated. The chances now are that it will ere long be restored, in order to counteract the heavy export bounties of France, and encourage the sugar-planters of the British colonies to compete with Continental beet sugars.

The following sugar tariff was in force in the Dominion of Canada, (40 Victoria, Chap. XI,) but has been superseded by the new tariff:

On sugar above 16 D. S., 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem.
On No. 9 to not above 13 D. S., ¾ cent per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem.
On below No. 9 D. S., ½ cent per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem.
On cane juice and sirup, ⅝ cent per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem.
On melada and concrete, ⅝ cent per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem.
On molasses for refining, 75 cents per 100 pounds.
On molasses not so used, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

The new sugar tariff of the Dominion of Canada proposes to levy duty substantially as follows:

On melada and concrete, per pound, ⅝ cent and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

On sirup of cane, per pound, ½ cent and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

On raw sugar below No. 9, D. S., per pound, ½ cent and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

On No. 9 to not above 14, D. S., per pound, ¾ cent and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

On all sugar above No. 14, D. S., per pound, 1 cent and 35 per cent. ad valorem.

It will be observed that Canada aims at two important objects in the above tariff: First, to admit all low grades of raw sugar at low rates, under an equitable adjustment of classes and duty thereon, in order to encourage consumption and the re-establishment of Canadian refineries; and next, to restrict the importation of refined sugars from the United States by counteracting our drawback, thus virtually placing her trade in refined sugar in the hands of English refiners until Canada can again refine sugar for home consumption. For instance, the duty on all sugar above No. 14 would be 1 cent per pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem; refined sugar costing 7 cents would pay 3.45 cents per pound duty, 8-cent refined sugar would pay 3.80 cents duty, 9-cent refined sugar would pay 4.15 cents per pound duty.

The sugar tariff of France is as follows: Duty is levied on each 100 kilograms by the Paris standards; a kilogram is about 2.2 pounds, (2.204621 pounds.) Raw sugar below No. 13, per 100 kilograms, 65.52 francs; Nos. 13 to 20, both inclusive, 68.64 francs; above No. 20, 70.20 francs; refined, 73.32 francs.

The Netherlands levy duty on foreign sugars practically as follows: Per each 100 kilograms, on first class, 25.38 florins; second class, 23.76 florins; third class, 21.6 florins; fourth class, 18.9 florins.

Belgium levies duty on foreign sugars as follows: Per each 100 kilograms, on first class, Nos. from 15 to 18, D. S., inclusively, 48.07 francs; second class, Nos. from 10 to 15, D. S., exclusively, 45 francs; third class, Nos. from 7 to 10, D. S., exclusively, 40.9 francs; fourth class, under No. 7, D. S., 34.26 francs.

Germany levies duty on foreign sugars as follows: Per each 50 kilograms or 110¼ pounds, on refined and all raw sugars above No. 19, D. S., 15 marks; below No. 19, D. S., 12 marks; sirup, 7.5 marks. Germany employs the Dutch standard for imported sugars, and polarization for exported sugars.

In the United States dutiable sugar and melada constituted 24.03 per cent. of all dutiable merchandise entered into consumption in the fiscal years 1876-'77-'78, and yielded 27.93 per cent. of the duty received in those years, while dutiable dry and wet sugars and molasses constituted 26.52 per cent. of all dutiable merchandise entered into consumption in the years named, and yielded an average of no less than 29.41 per cent. of the total revenue from customs; the yield being in 1878 30.61 per cent. Had the full duty on the higher grades of dry sugars been collected during 1876-'77-'78, the revenue, under the present tariff from sugar, melada, and molasses, would have exceeded 35 per cent. of the entire revenue from customs in those years.

In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1879, the total value of dutiable merchandise entered into consumption was $296,742,215; total value of sugar and melada, $67,153,667, or 22.63 per cent. of all dutiable merchandise. The total amount of duty received in the same year was $133,159,025, of which $38,065,803, or 28.58 per cent., was received from sugar and melada; if molasses be added, the per cent. of duty received from sugar and molasses in 1879 is 30.24.

I am satisfied that had there been no foreign centrifugal machines in motion to increase frauds, with reasonable official diligence, at least 37 per cent. of the customs revenue would have been derived from sugars and molasses; that is, we should have received $50,000,000 in the fiscal year 1879 from sugar and molasses instead of $40,275,402.

As some members may not understand fully what is meant by the Dutch standard, I will explain it before proceeding to show how, under the present tariff, artificially colored sugars were imported and the Government defrauded of its just revenue. The Dutch standard was first founded on the theory that color in sugar was coefficient of its purity, or rather of its saccharine strength, and was adopted by the Dutch Government, who, at the time of its initiation, was the great merchant marine power of the world, and in the broad bottoms of whose great ships were imported the major part of the sugar brought from the East Indies and the island of Java. This standard originated in Holland, where sworn sugar brokers annually classify the sugar crops of Java and other Dutch dependencies according to the natural color of the raw product; numbering the different shades from 1 to 20 and 22, beginning with wet sugars, nearly black, and ending with white sugar. Having separated the sugar into grades of natural color, the samples are placed within glass bottles, sealed, and numbered accordingly. Sales are then made of the coming crop, to accord with the samples in sealed bottles.

The frauds which have been perpetrated upon the revenue have sprung principally from the practice of outwardly discoloring sugars. The West Indies were not content with supplying us with raw sugars; greed of gain and tariff facilities furnished by depending entirely upon the color standard for levying duty led Cuba and Demerara to manufacture melada and drained raw sugars into large, dry, almost pure crystals, by clarification, vacuum-pan boiling, and centrifugation, and induced the producers to outwardly discolor the sugar crystals while completing the vacuum-pan and centrifugal process, for the purpose of evading duty on the actual or intrinsic color, quality, and value of sugars known as centrifugals, by false classification for duty when entering this market.

Centrifugals, or semi-refined foreign sugars, are consequently manufactured and doctored in Cuba and Demerara for this market, at an extra expense to American consumers of at least 1½ cents per pound more than the industry would cost in this country; in other words, American refiners can profitably produce centrifugals from melada and low grades of raw sugars, exclusive of cost of raw sugars, for 1 cent per pound or less, while we pay Cuba and Demerara about 3 cents per pound for raw material, and 2½ to 3 cents per pound for Cuban industry, or 5½ to 6 cents per pound in the country of production for dry centrifugals outwardly discolored to represent low-grade raw sugars, and thus evade duty.

It was found necessary by the government of the Netherlands to take some action to protect their revenues against this same practice, as will be seen by the following letter:

ROSENDAAL, September 26, 1879.

GENTLEMEN: We have the honor to inform you that two days ago the minister of finance has presented a law to prevent artificial coloration of sugars and the use of artificial mixtures intended to deceive as to the true value of sugars. Their value will be determined by chemical analysis.

Please, gentlemen, accept the assurance of our distinguished consideration.

B. JAEGER,
President
B. REIGER,
Secretary.

To the PRESIDENT AND MEMBERS,
Of the central committee of the sugar manufacturers of France.

Some slight indication of the great extent to which these practices were carried will be shown in the following table classifications of sugar for duty, which expose the discoloration practices. In the more honest classifications of 1880 will be found the good effects of the efforts of Mr. Brown in exposing the dishonesty of the importers and of certain refiners who advocate the Carlisle sugar bill, in his analyses of the sugar question, and in his remarks before the Committee on Ways and Means. The following table is taken from his "condensed summary of the sugar-tariff question" recently published:

Classification by the Dutch standard.	1873.			1876.			1877.
	Quantity.	Value.	Duty.	Quantity.	Value.	Duty.	Quantity.	Value.	Duty.
Sampled and classed for duty.	Pounds.			Pounds.			Pounds.
All not above No. 7, Dutch standard	200,588,712	$9,781,864	$3,510,302	534,822,824	$26,344,948	$11,654,445	757,946,855	$37,501,481	$16,580,087
All above No. 7 and not above No. 10, Dutch standard	860,454,194	46,342,844	17,209,084	869,785,687	36,593,778	21,628,822	604,317,151	29,748,890	15,107,929
All above No. 10 and not above No. 13, Dutch standard	250,842,299	14,584,126	5,643,952	150,107,868	6,543,106	4,092,846	88,462,336	4,371,003	2,488,003
All above No. 13 and not above No. 16, Dutch standard	60,881,348	3,891,750	1,674,257	6,127,732	318,830	207,593	4,536,195	218,943	155,932
All above No. 16 and not above No. 20, Dutch standard	5,407,628	370,308	175,748	1,011,458	58,045	40,107	92,477	6,182	3,757
All above No. 20, loaf, and other refined.	324,651	22,172	12,986	24,976	2,003	1,248	32,840	2,590	1,642
Total dry sugar	1,378,498,832	74,993,073	28,226,309	1,561,880,545	63,860,710	37,625,061	1,455,387,854	71,849,089	34,337,350
Melada entered into consumption	107,084,690	4,872,353	1,606,270	96,751,914	3,151,183	1,813,354	49,650,354	1,923,427	930,944
Total sugar and melada	1,485,583,522	79,865,426	29,832,579	1,658,632,459	67,011,893	39,438,115	1,505,038,208	73,772,516	34,268,294

Classification by the Dutch standard.	1878.			1879.			1880.
	Quantity.	Value.	Duty.	Quantity.	Value.	Duty.	Quantity.	Value.	Duty.
Sampled and classed for duty.	Pounds.			Pounds.			Pounds.
All not above No. 7, Dutch standard	860,287,182	$41,516,497	$18,818,784	890,801,182	$36,627,477	$19,486,276	299,298,496	$11,394,541	$6,547,154
All above No. 7 and not above No. 10, Dutch standard	618,019,876	33,232,883	16,450,497	671,574,592	27,614,075	16,789,365	1,222,747,078	52,407,812	30,568,677
All above No. 10 and not above No. 13, Dutch standard	72,316,574	4,110,502	2,033,904	35,556,456	1,649,309	1,000,307	67,726,078	3,085,292	1,904,796
All above No. 13 and not above No. 16, Dutch standard	1,474,118	73,831	50,673	483,110	25,627	16,607	2,353,604	118,229	80,905
All above No. 16 and not above No. 20, Dutch standard	561,068	35,491	22,793	20,221	1,160	821	118,582	8,453	4,817
All above No. 20, loaf, and other refined.	216,294	16,866	10,814	16,425	1,283	821	18,119	1,502	906
Total dry sugar	1,552,875,112	78,986,070	36,387,463	1,598,461,986	65,918,931	37,294,197	1,592,261,957	67,015,831	39,107,256
Melada entered into consumption	36,691,376	1,383,482	687,963	41,152,357	1,234,736	771,606	33,709,344	1,036,808	632,050
Total sugar and melada	1,589,566,488	80,369,552	37,075,426	1,639,614,343	67,153,667	38,065,803	1,625,971,301	68,052,639	39,739,306

In 1872 these practices of discoloration were in their infancy, as will be noted in the table of 1873, wherein the classifications of the low grades of sugars for duty are approximately correct, but they rapidly increased in frequency and volume, as will be seen by the tables of 1876, 1877, 1878, and 1879; it was not until 1880 that the beneficial effects of the exposure of these frauds are notable in the apparently decreased quantity of importations of the low-grade sugars, which fell off from 890,801,182 pounds to 299,298,496 pounds in a single year, when properly classified, as will be observed in the classification in the table of 1879 and 1880. Imported centrifugal sugars assimilate intrinsically to refined sugars. However skillfully the intrinsic color, quality, and value of centrifugals may be disguised by outwardly discoloring the crystals in order to falsely represent No. 7 or No. 10, Dutch standard in color, and evade proper duty, the simple process of grinding cargo samples of such sugar produces, instead of No. 7, Dutch standard, a disguised No. 16, Dutch standard, sugar; instead of No. 10, Dutch standard, a disguised No. 20, Dutch standard, sugar; and instead of No. 13, Dutch standard, a beautiful pure white sugar above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, 98 to 99½ per cent. pure cane-sugar crystals; whereas the same grinding process applied to cargo samples of No. 7, No. 10, No. 13, Dutch standard, raw sugars of all kinds, naturally produced merely by boiling, evaporation, and draining, produces no effect upon the color of such sugars as outwardly represented, simply because actually raw sugars contain the molasses and dark impurities which have been eliminated from foreign centrifugal sugars by semi-refining.

From Cuban and Demerara centrifugals only the very highest grades of refined sugar can be made, such as granulated and standard A sugars; thus, unless we can obtain raw sugar material from other countries, the great mass of consumers would be without any adequate supply of cheap sugar food, which refiners can only obtain from low grades of raw sugar and melada. Centrifugal sugars doctored in color, as at present, to evade duty, or admitted under a uniform duty to No. 13, or even to No. 10, Dutch standard, or under a specific duty on all sugars, absolutely prohibit the importation of all raw "grocers' sugars," and undersell Louisiana sugars, a No. 13, Dutch standard, and often a No. 10, Dutch standard, foreign centrifugal sugar being, when ground, far whiter and purer than the best "raw grocers' sugar," and equal to the best Louisiana sugar.

The dry centrifugal or semi-refined sugars, testing from 94 to 99 in crystals, while their market or intrinsic value approximates that of refined sugars, should certainly pay duty on their actual value. The cost of refining these centrifugal sugars does not exceed twenty-five to thirty-five cents per hundred pounds as against sixty-five cents to one dollar per hundred pounds, the cost of refining ordinary and low grade of foreign raw sugars. The effects of these frauds upon the revenues by discoloration have an important effect upon the Louisiana sugar interests. Although in Louisiana there is produced a sugar of superior quality, both in grain and flavor, yet, owing to the difference in climate and condition of soil, she cannot be expected to compete with Cuba on equal terms as a sugar-producing country.

The contest, as it may be termed, between the Louisiana sugar interests and those of Cuba is not properly between the low grades of imported foreign sugars and sugars of a like or nearly like quality produced in Louisiana, but entirely between the intrinsically high grades of imported sugars which have been outwardly discolored to defraud the revenues, and grades of the highest quality produced in Louisiana. As has already been shown, the centrifugal sugars of Cuba which have been outwardly discolored to represent raw sugars contain intrinsically from 93 to 99 per cent. of pure sugar crystals, and consequently bring in this market a higher price than the sugars of Louisiana, even though the latter may be very much higher in color and suitable for immediate consumption. Thoughtful consideration upon this point will at once convince that there is no contest between the producer of sugar in Louisiana and the refining industries of this country, although frequently it has been believed that to a great extent this constituted the existing difficulties in regard to the sugar-tariff question. The evil, therefore, is that Cuba, aiming to possess control of this market, having overreached herself in these practices, now finds it necessary to endeavor to legalize the importation of these high grades of semi-refined but outwardly discolored sugars in order to retain possession of this market as against American producers and other sugar-producing countries of the world.

Perhaps no greater legislative mistake was ever committed by Congress than the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Hawaii in the matter of admitting sugars to this country duty free. Mr. Brown in his last book exhibited this treaty in its true colors, and shed much light upon the practices which have lately prevailed, of landing large quantities of China and Hong-Kong sugars in Hawaii, there to be reshipped to San Francisco as Hawaiian sugars, duty free; and it may be justly remarked that these manipulations of China sugars by way of Hawaii, and the introduction of free sugars, are even more detrimental to Louisiana interests than to those of the refiners; and while such transactions are not only a fraud upon the Government, and injustice to the sugar-producing interests of this country, they invariably tend to increase the actual cost of the article to the consumer. Although the amount of sugar imported from Hawaii is comparatively small, it is large enough to furnish means to enhance and control prices of sugars to American consumers on our Pacific coast, and invite the landing of large quantities of China and Hong-Kong sugars at Hawaii, to be reshipped to San Francisco as Hawaiian sugars, duty free, while we pay dear for such sugars, lose the duty thereon, and receive no adequate return, which becomes palpably plain in the following exhibit:

Hawaiian sugars, duty free, entered into consumption in the fiscal years ending June 30, 1878, 1879, 1880:

Year.	Grade.	Pounds.	Value.
1878.	Above No. 7, not above No. 10, Dutch standard	2,437,920	$161,922
	Above No. 10, not above No. 13, Dutch standard	10,805,283	757,735
	Above No. 13, not above No. 16, Dutch standard	12,227,780	963,549
	Above No. 16, not above No. 20, Dutch standard	4,897,345	391,224
	Total consumed, duty free	30,368,328	2,274,430
1879.	Above No. 7, not above No. 10, Dutch standard	8,174,146	501,850
	Above No. 10, not above No. 13, Dutch standard	16,615,686	1,099,164
	Above No. 13, not above No. 16, Dutch standard	15,670,564	1,118,117
	Above No. 16, not above No. 20, Dutch standard	1,232,673	92,061
	Total consumed, duty free	41,693,069	2,811,192
1880.	Above No. 7, not above No. 10, Dutch standard	7,793,349	450,030
	Above No. 10, not above No. 13, Dutch standard	28,416,596	1,892,737
	Above No. 13, not above No. 16, Dutch standard	23,868,886	1,689,060
	Above No. 16, not above No. 20, Dutch standard	1,477,493	103,659
	Total consumed, duty free	61,556,324	4,135,486

Total Hawaiian sugars entered into consumption during the three fiscal years ending June 30, 1878, 1879, 1880, value, duty lost, estimated at 60 per cent. ad valorem, and total value of domestic merchandise, exclusive of specie, exported to Hawaii during the same years.

Year.	Hawaiian sugars, duty free.	Value.	Duty lost.	Domestic merchandise to Hawaii.
	Pounds.
1878	30,360,328	$2,274,430	$1,364,658	$1,683,446
1879	41,693,069	2,811,192	1,686,715	2,288,178
1880	61,556,324	4,135,486	2,481,291	1,985,506
Total	133,617,721	9,221,108	5,532,664	5,957,130

Average price paid for sugar in Hawaii, three years, per 100 pounds $6 75
Average price paid for sugar in other countries, 1880, per 100 pounds 4 20
Average price paid for sugar in Hawaii, 1880, per 100 pounds 6 71

By the above exhibit of facts, officially verified, and palpable deductions therefrom, two subjects of vital importance to American interests present matter for grave consideration in connection with the sugar question:

First. The apparently rapid increase in sugar production and exports to this country in the Sandwich or Hawaiian Islands, under the reciprocity treaty, exceeds relatively that of all other sugar-producing countries in this regard. The islands of Hawaii send most of their sugars to this country. We received from them in 1878, 30,368,328 pounds; in 1879, 41,693,069 pounds; in 1880, 61,556,324 pounds. Meantime, China and Hong-Kong, where sugar production is extensive and regular in increase, supplied this country with 21,677,177 pounds of sugar in 1877, and with 31,695,743 pounds of sugar in 1878.

But this supply fell to only 1,677,507 pounds of sugar in 1879, in which year Hawaii increased her exports to us by 20,000,000 pounds. China sugars are largely above No. 7, D. S. in color, and correspond in color with many grades of sugar imported from Hawaii, while the falling off of imports of sugars from China and Hong-Kong in 1879 corresponds with the wonderful increase of imports of sugars from Hawaii in 1880. The temptation to buy China and Hong-Kong sugars in those countries, at about 2½ to 3 cents per pound, and land them at Hawaii, to be reshipped thence to this country as Hawaiian sugars, duty free, at 6¾ cents per pound, is not only very great, but the opportunity is supplied by the reciprocity treaty between the United States and the kingdom of Hawaii.

Second. Taking the article of sugar imported from Hawaii, duty free, during the fiscal years 1878, 1879, 1880, the people of this country bought sugars to the amount of $9,221,108, paying $2.55 per 100 pounds more than similar sugars cost us in the great cane-sugar producing country of the world, as seen above, besides losing $5,532,664 duty on sugars imported duty free from Hawaii in the years named, under a reciprocity treaty which only enabled us to sell the paltry sum of five million nine hundred and fifty-seven thousand one hundred anp thirty dollars' worth of domestic merchandise to Hawaiians during the aboved-named fiscal years, 1878, 1879, 1880.

Thus, under the treaty, we have thrown away $5,532,664 sugar duty, paid an extra price for sugar, and been obliged to pay a cash balance over and above our $5,957,130 exports of merchandise to Hawaii of $3,263,978 for the single article of sugar; in plain words, the loss of duty on sugar and other merchandise imported from Hawaii free annually exceeds the value of our exports to the Hawaiian Islands; while the importation of Hawaiian sugars, duty free, at San Francisco only serves to injure home production, keep out competing sugars, and enhance the cost of refined sugars to consumers in California and sections of country contiguous to our Pacific coast. Hawaiian sugars should unquestionably be made dutiable.

THE REMEDY.

What shall this Government do to counteract the present evils existing in the collection of customs duty? Plainly and clearly, they cannot be checked by playing into the hands of the Cuban producer, as would be done in the adoption of the Carlisle bill or, in a more modified form, in the Tucker bill, but rather by adopting efficient means whereby the intrinsic color, quality, and value of imported sugars may be accurately determined without question. The enactment of any tariff law without provisions insuring its proper enforcement results in a simple farce in legislation. Nor is it wise, or in the interest of the Government, to leave the interpretation of tariff laws to subordinate officials. Their provisions should always be so clearly defined and their manner of enforcement so fully detailed that no question or room is left for misapprehension.

The following bill, which has received the careful attention and supervision of Mr. Henry A. Brown, looks to the best means of correcting these existing evils; and after a full consideration of the subject, I feel assured that if its provisions are enacted into a law these disgraceful practices to which I have already referred will cease to exist. The Secretary of the Treasury can then put a check upon the illegal transactions of those dishonest parties who have stood with one hand filching from the revenues of the Government, while the other has been extended praying a change of the tariff in their favor. The interest of millions of consumers in this country demands more at the hands of this Government than these few who, winking at fraud, if not openly guilty themselves, have made the sugar business profitable out of the pockets of the poor. It is the duty of Congress as a conservator of public morals, and it is our duty here as legislators, not only to protect the industries and revenue of the country, but to make fraud difficult and unprofitable if we cannot make it impossible.

The bill reads as follows:

A bill to regulate the collection of customs duties on sugar.

Be it enacted, &c., That melada, concentrated molasses, sirups of cane juice, wet sugars, and all sugars not above No. 7, Dutch standard in intrinsic color, when testing not above 84° in the polariscope, shall pay a duty of 2$\frac{4}{10}$ cents per pound.

That all sugars above 7 and not above No. 10, Dutch standard in intrinsic color, when testing not above 88° in the polariscope, and all sugars not above No. 7 in color, when testing above 84° and not above 88° in the polariscope, shall pay a duty of 2½ cents per pound.

That all sugars above 10 and not above No. 13, Dutch standard in color, when testing not above 92° in the polariscope, and all sugars not above No. 10 in color, when testing above 88° and not above 92° in the polariscope, shall pay a duty of 2$\frac{11}{16}$ cents per pound.

That all sugars above 13 and not above No. 16, Dutch standard in color, and all sugars testing above 92° and not above 96° in the polariscope, shall pay a duty of 3$\frac{1}{16}$ cents per pound.

That all sugars above 16 and not above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, and all sugars testing above 96° in the polariscope, shall pay a duty of 4 cents per pound.

That all sugars above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, all refined sugars, and all sugars that assimilate to refined sugars, shall pay a duty of 5 cents per pound.

That raw muscovado or drained sugars, and raw beet sugars, when above No. 13, Dutch standard in color, and testing less than 92° in the polariscope, shall be classed for duty as not above No. 13, Dutch standard in color.

That all sugar-candy, and confectionery made wholly or in part of sugar, and all sugars that are colored, tinctured, or adulterated, shall pay a duty of 50 per cent. ad valorem.

SEC. 2. That all samples of imported sugars used to classify such sugars for the purpose of levying duty thereon shall be crushed or ground to the consistency of raw muscovado and molasses sugars before levying duty; and such samples shall be made to assimilate in grain to sugars contained in the official Dutch standard samples with which imported sugars are compared for the purpose of levying duty; and all samples used for levying duty shall remain on public exhibition until the duty on the sugars they represent has been finally liquidated.

SEC. 3. That all dutiable sugars not above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, shall be tested in the polariscope, and such other means shall be employed as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary to accurately determine the intrinsic color and quality of all imported sugars in order to levy duty thereon correctly.

The provisions and safeguards of this bill are definite, equitable, and lucid. In it the well-known trade classifications of sugar are maintained, and the interests of the sugar consumers, importers, producers, refiners, and revenue of this country will be adequately and fairly protected by its enactment. Not only this, but under the provisions of this bill our commerce with distant sugar-producing countries, which are relatively far better customers for our merchandise than Cuba, would enormously increase, and the practice of discoloring sugars for this market would be unprofitable and cease.

Contrast the honest provisions of this bill with the Carlisle sugar bill, which attempts to dispose of imported sugar, which constitutes a fourth of our dutiable commerce and yields about three-tenths of our customs revenue, in seventeen lines, six of which are devoted to protecting the King of Hawaii and eleven to the gigantic interests and sugar industries of fifty millions of consumers and tax-payers in this country.

The Carlisle sugar bill would not only virtually prohibit four-fifths of the actual raw material now consumed by three-fourths of the refining capital, labor, and machinery of this country, and thus increase the cost of sugar to consumers and reduce revenue, but would compel Louisiana to continue the unequal contest now waged by cane, beet, and sorghum sugar producers in this country against the surreptitious entry for duty of dry centrifugals or foreign semi-refined sugar crystals, outwardly discolored with a film of molasses impurities—foreign practices which Cubans propose to legalize in the Carlisle bill.

The Carlisle sugar bill utterly ignores all provisions for the proper enforcement of tariff laws, and thus assumes that fraudulent practices in the entry of sugar have not and cannot exist. Casual examination of classifications of sugar for duty for several years past disposes of such assumption; but the enactment of a sugar tariff without adequate safeguards for its enforcement would be legislative blundering.

Nor is the Tucker sugar bill of the Committee on Ways and Means any better than the Carlisle sugar bill. The provisions of the Tucker sugar bill are pernicious and subtly worded. To all intents and purposes it is a Cuban centrifugal bill, and should be so named. Starting off with apparent liberality toward raw-sugar material, not above No. 7, Dutch standard in color, it next prohibits the same by ignoring No. 8 to 12 in color sugars, which constitute the bulk of sugars imported for refining purposes, and winds up by admitting all dry centrifugal or semi-refined sugars that may be and would be outwardly discolored, below No. 14, at two cents and one-half per pound, the present duty on sugar above 7 and not above 10, Dutch standard in color.

The provision of the Tucker bill for an 85° test is simply farcical, as under it dry semi-refined centrifugal sugars testing 99° in pure white crystals, but outwardly discolored with 1 per cent. of molasses impurities to represent not above No. 13 in color, would pay the same duty as actual raw sugars above 7 in color testing only 86° in crystals, thus admitting the highest grades of sugar at the lowest rates, and virtually prohibiting the low grades of raw-sugar material; under such circumstances the authority conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury in the Tucker bill is meaningless.

Both the Carlisle bill and the Tucker bill prohibit light muscovado or grocers' sugars, because said bills would admit dry centrifugals, which are better sugars, far richer in crystals, and more valuable, at lower rates of duty than grocers' sugars would pay if imported; whereas under the ad valorem basis of the bill herein presented all sugars would be admitted and pay duty according to their intrinsic color, quality, and value. The Carlisle and Tucker bills do not provide a single practicable safeguard against existing abuses. On the contrary, both bills seek to remove all obstructions to fraud and leave the construction and execution of the tariff to Cuban and Demerara sugar producers, who have too long dictated the methods of levying duty on outwardly discolored but intrinsically refined sugars. On the contrary the bill herewith presented provides an equitable tariff on a sound ad valorem basis, with the necessary safeguards to insure its further enforcement, and its enactment will afford relief and protection to the sugar consumers, importers, producers, refiners, and revenue of this country.

In the bill presented herein provision is made that all samples of sugar shall be ground, and the polariscope shall be employed as an adjunct to the Dutch standard of color, in order to accurately determine the intrinsic color, quality, and value of sugar and levy duty thereon correctly. There is no uncertainty about the language of this bill; no loop-hole appears therein through which semi-refined centrifugals, doctored in outward color to evade duty, can be smuggled through the customs under loose constructions and arbitrary rulings of Treasury and customs officials. The bill adheres to commercial usage in employing the Dutch standard. The polariscope, grinding, and so forth, are merely adjuncts to its proper enforcement.

The Dutch standard is perfectly competent to determine the intrinsic colors of all raw sugars of natural color when such sugars are reduced to the consistency of Dutch standard samples in grain; as regards low grades of raw sugar, the importation of which it is sought to prohibit by adopting a uniform duty to No. 13, evasion of duty is impracticable under the Dutch standard alone, except through official fraud in sampling or weighing. Crush such sugars thoroughly, still their color remains the same. Neither analysis nor polarization are required to determine the intrinsic color and quality of melada and sugars not above No. 10 Dutch standard in natural color. Muscovadoes and molasses sugars, made by natural draining alone, although from No. 10 to No. 14 in color, can also be accurately classed for duty by the use of the Dutch standard only.

Discolorations to evade duty begin with the higher grades, namely, with centrifugals, Javas, and vacuum-pan sugars, and such foreign sugars as would naturally be about No. 11 to No. 16, Dutch standard in color, when honestly made, and which almost invariably test above 92 and to 98 in crystallizable strength in 100 parts of raw sugar material.

Natural discoloration of raw sugar to evade duty, especially as regards centrifugals, consists simply in the retention of molasses impurities or in adding an excess of lime, sulphuric acid, burnt sirup, or caramel to the juice in defecators, in the pan, or in the mass in the centrifugal machine. Vacuum-pan sugars and clayed sugars may be similarly discolored by injection and leaching. Lowering of color may be carried to any desirable extent in centrifugal sugar, and still maintain therein 93 to 98 per cent. of crystallizable sugar, varying in color and strength in crystals at the option of manipulators.

That the polariscope is almost invariably employed in connection with the Dutch color standard by refiners, producers, and the sugar trade is an incontestible fact, well evidenced in the testimony of Mr. T. A. Havemeyer, who represents the most extensive sugar refineries in this country, given before the Committee on Ways and Means. From his statements on this point I extract telegrams from London, showing that when raw sugar is offered for sale the grade by the Dutch standard, as well as the polariscopic test, is always given:

[From F. Englehardt, London, November 7, 1879.]

HAVEMEYER & ELDER, New York:

We offer you, firm, for reply thence same day, 950 Trinidads, average sugars, under No. 7, Dutch standard, polarizing 86°, 26*s.* 3*d.*, c. & f.; 750 sugars, No. 7 to 8, Dutch standard fully, polarizing 88½°, 27*s.* 3*d.*, c. & f.; 500 Jamaica sugars, under No. 10, Dutch standard, and over No. 10, Dutch standard, polarizing 89½°, 27*s.* 9*d.*, c. & f.; 150 tons Vincents, polarize 88°, 27*s.* 3*d.*, c. & f. Shipment by steamer from London.

[From F. Englehardt, November 7, 1879.]

We offer you, firm, for reply thence same day, 6,000 tons vacuum-pan Demeraras, No. 7 to No. 10, Dutch standard; hogsheads, usual stowage, polarizing 93° to 94° basis, maximum polarizing, 94°; three pence allowance, 30*s.* 9*d.*; cost and freight, commission, and shipping charges included; steamer, equal quantities.

Two hundred and fifty tons concrete Peruvian bloc[illegible], under No. 7, Dutch standard; advise bought 27th ultimo, test, 82°.90; immediate instructions required. Refined market strong, rising.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, October 31.

HAVEMEYER & ELDER, New York:

Receipts to date, 2,200 hogsheads, ⅞ clarifieds; kettle sugar very green; test low, 75 to 82, owing to cane first rolled not being matured; selling at 5¾ at 6¾; expect increased receipts next week and lower prices; will then send samples, and make shipment if possible to give you an idea of quality; weather favorable for maturing cane.

Market strong, with upward tendency. What price can you pay for 3,000 hogsheads vacuum-pan Demeraras, No. 10–13, Dutch standard, or sugars under No. 10, Dutch standard, free on board, sellers willing to guarantee any polarization and color? November and December, (delivery.) Cable us your outside limit; we will save on it if possible.

The above are specimens of telegrams received daily from London. The last of these telegrams will enable one to form an opinion as to whether or not sugar can be made in Cuba and the West Indies of high intrinsic value, but of low color, to escape paying the proper duty. It is to be here noted that the duty thus saved does not go to the American buyer, as these colored sugars are sold at within a fraction of the same price as the uncolored ones, the fractional difference being allowed on account of the expense of decolorizing them.

Specimen of New York market report sent to Havana by each steamer, showing that, with prices paid for raw sugar, the polariscopic test is invariably given:

Market Report per City of Vera Cruz.

[15th instant to date.]

NEW YORK, January 21, 1880—11 a. m.

Sales: 1,297 hogsheads, 60 boxes, and 60,217 bags, including 50 hhds. 60 boxes centrifugals, $95\frac{89}{100}$°, $96\frac{19}{100}$°, at 8¾ cents; 40 hhds. molasses sugar, 89°, at 7⅞ cents, 28 hhds. inferior refining, 76°, at 6½ cents; 50 hhds. centrifugals, $96\frac{42}{100}$°, at 8⅞ cents; 45,156 bags Philippine Islands, 80°–81°, at 6⅛ cents; 194 hhds. Porto Rico, 86°–60°, at 7⅛ cents; 150 hhds. centrifugals, 96°–90°, at 8⅞ cents; 150 hhds. centrifugals, 96°–30°, at 8⅛ cents; 4,079 bags Brazil, 90°–60°, at 8⅛ cents; 151 hhds. Porto Rico, 83°–30°, at 7⅜ cents; 10,400 bags Manila, 80°, at 6¾ cents.

We quote fair to good refining muscovadoes, 88°–91°, 7⅛, at 8⅛ cents; centrifugals, 95°–98°, 8⅛ @ 8⅛ cents; molasses-sugars, No. 6 to 10, 85°–90°, 7⅛ @ 7⅛ cents; melada, 70°–80°, 5¼ @ 6¼ cents.

We note sales of fair refining at 4.95 cents, and of good common, 88°, at 4.90 cents.

Refined: Trade has been slow, and prices of some sorts are off. We quote A sugars, 9, at 9⅛ cents. Exports since our last, 801 tons.

Molasses: Sales of new-crop Cuba have been made, to arrive, at equal to 32 cents, landed, basis 50°.

London sugar market is weak at 24.0 for fair refining, afloat; 23.6 for centrifugals, 96°.

Havana acceptances, 4 and 5 per cent. for best names.

Exchange on London, 60 days, $4.82½.

GRINNELL, MINTURN & CO.

The following extracts from sale notes will show that not only is the polariscope test of all sugar bought and sold given, but that such tests are guaranteed. Further, that additions to and deductions from the quoted price are made in case a sugar either exceeds or falls below the guaranteed test, and even fractions of a degree are sometimes proportionately allowed for. These are merely specimens of thousands of such documents which are constantly passing from firm to firm all over the world:

NEW YORK, October 30, 1879.

Sold, for account of Messrs. S. & W. Welsh, to Messrs. Havemeyers & Elder, about 1,500 hogsheads centrifugal sugar, of the estate Neda, below No. 10, Dutch standard, and average 96° test, to arrive. Sugar to be received ex-ship. Should the average test be under 96°, an allowance of one-tenth of a cent per pound to be made for every degree below, fractions in proportion.

SKIDDY, MINFORD & CO., Brokers.

NEW YORK, November 11, 1879.

Sold, for account of Messrs. Fernandez & Calvo, to Messrs. Havemeyers & Elder, about 40 hogsheads molasses sugar, guaranteed 87°; about 300 bags centrifugal sugar, guaranteed 93°; 40 hogsheads and 300 bags Cuba sugar. Should the test be under that guaranteed, an allowance to be made of one-tenth of a cent per pound on the centrifugals, and one-sixteenth of a cent per pound on molasses sugars for every degree below, fractions in proportion.

SKIDDY, MINFORD & CO, Brokers.

[Memorandum.]

NEW YORK, October 4, 1879.

Sold, for account of Burdick, Frisbie & Co., to Messrs. Havemeyers & Elder 456 hogsheads Porto Rico sugar; 89° test guaranteed.

BURDICK, FRISBIE & CO.

[Memorandum.]

NEW YORK, September 18, 1879.

Sold, for account of Burdick, Frisbie & Co., to Messrs. Havemeyers & Elder, 246 hogsheads, 122 tierces, and 30 barrels Trinidad sugar, at 6⅞ cents per pound. Basis of 86° test. If 85° test, ⅛ of a cent deducted; if 87° test, ⅛ of a cent added.

BURDICK, FRISBIE & CO.

The subjoined New York market report of Minford, Thompson & Co. shows that the information given their subscribers not only includes the price of raw sugar, but invariably the polariscopic test and the name of the seller and buyer:

Daily market report.

OFFICE OF MINFORD, THOMPSON & CO.,
90 Wall Street, New York, January 8, 1880.

Receipts reported this a. m., 888 hhds.

Received by refiners direct out of above, 579 hhds.

Est'd stock in importers' hands this a. m., 26,810 hhds., 9,531 b'xes, 584,494 bags, 103 melada.

Sales: 160 hhds. Cardenas centr'fs, test 93°, "Himely to B'klyn," 8⅜; 250 hhds. Martinique, good com'n, test 87°, "Trowbridge to H. Brs. & E.," 7⅝; 114 hhds. Demerara, good com'n, test 8[illegible], "Armstrong to H. Brs. & E.," 7⅜; 315 hhds. P. R., to come from N. Haven, test 87°, "Armstrong to H. Brs. & E.," 7⅝; 571 hhds. P. R., infe'r to good r'f'g, test 80°–91°, "Rivera to B'klyn," 7–7⅝; 396 c'sks Mexican clayed and musc., test 85°–86°, "Thebaud to H. & E.," 7½; 42 hhds. Sagua mol's-sugar, test 83°, "Youngs to B'klyn," 7¼; 31 hhds. Sagua mol's-sugar, test 87°.6, "Youngs to B'klyn," 7⅜; 37 hhds. Sagua, good com'n to sct. fair, test 86°–88°, "Youngs to B'klyn," 7⅛–7⅜.

MINFORD, THOMPSON & CO.

The advisability of employing the polariscope in the collection of customs duties on sugar has been widely discussed, and while its merits as a test of the saccharine strength of sugar have been broadly heralded by many, some of its defects as a "modus operandi" for the collection of duties have been pointed out by others. Let us examine it from an impartial stand-point. In the application of this instrument for determining the amount of pure crystallizable sugar in a given volume of sugar of cane solution, the following process is necessary: Weight of cane-sugar crystals, 26,048 grams; dissolve in 100 cubic centimeters of water, gently heating the preparation; add acetate of lead sufficient to precipitate; filter through prepared bone-dust to clarify; reduce to the proper temperature, and fill a glass tube 200 millimeters in length with the solution; place the tube in the polariscope; turn on the light, look through and adjust the instrument until both hemispheres of the circle that appears in the instrument to be divided by a dark line present to the eye precisely the same shade of color. The test is then completed, the per cent. of pure sugar will be found registered in degrees and fractions on the scale attached to the polariscope, and may be read through the magnifying-tube. One hundred degrees represent entirely pure sugar crystal in solution.

A few of the reasons urged against the use of this instrument for the collection of duties are well taken, and in so far as they apply to its use alone, and not in connection with the Dutch standard for gauging the value of all sugars imported, there can be no doubt whatever that it would open still wider the gates for frauds upon the revenues.

If the color standard were abolished and the polariscope made the sole and only mode of testing sugars and assessing duties thereon, it would be a very great temptation to dishonest refiners to bribe and corrupt the Government officials to vary the gauge in their favor.

Some arguments against its use which I have heard border upon the ridiculous. Here is a sample:

In order to accurately determine the grade of a cargo of raw sugar by the polariscope test, the whole cargo must be reduced to a prepared solution of the proper proportions of sugar, of cane, water, and acetate of lead, and samples thereof be tested.

And it is further said "that, without providing further safeguards, which do not now exist, to use the polariscope would be to prostitute a beautiful and valuable scientific instrument and the science of chemistry to base purposes of fraud." And further statements that it is utterly useless as a test, because it is unable to detect such adulterations as glucose, grape sugar, flour, starch, &c., may be placed along with other puerile criticisms.

All must admit that the polariscope is used in commercial transactions for the sale and purchase of sugar to a very large extent throughout the world. Sugar is now described generally as color number so-and-so and testing so much by the polariscope. Why, then, I would ask, should not the Secretary of the Treasury be allowed to supplement his present means by this instrument, which is so extensively used in the civilized world? We know that probably the most scientific men in the world are in Europe, and we know also that a crop of nearly fifteen hundred thousand tons of sugar is sold in Europe annually by polariscope tests, and in the United States every large importer or refiner would tell you that they seldom or ever buy or sell cargoes of sugar except after applying to it such tests, as I have fully shown by telegrams already quoted.

The difficulties under which the Treasury Department has labored are set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1878, as follows:

The embarrassments alluded to in the last annual report in regard to the collection of duties on sugar have not ceased. Seizures have been made of cargoes of sugar claimed to be artificially colored for the purpose of reducing the duties at the custom-house, and a suit involving one of these cases was tried at Baltimore at great expense to the Government and to the importers, and was recently concluded, the verdict being that the sugars were artificially colored after the process of manufacture was completed, but that it was not proven that the importer of the sugars had a knowledge thereof at the time of making entry. Though the claim of the Government that the sugars had been artificially colored for the purpose of defrauding the revenue is maintained, it is powerless, under the anti-moiety act of June 22, 1874, to enforce fines, penalties, and forfeitures against persons or property, unless there is proof of guilty knowledge of fraud.

It is deemed imperative that some change in the mode of collecting duties on sugar should be had, and it is preferred, as stated in the last report, that the duty should be at one rate on all sugars up to a point which will exclude temptation either to color sugar for the purpose of reducing the duty or to commit fraud by means of sampling and classification. The duties now are, to a large extent, dependent upon the fidelity of the sampler, one of the lowest-paid officers in the public service.

In the event that duties upon sugars are made dependent to any considerable extent upon color by the Dutch standard, it is recommended that authority be given to this Department to ascertain the true saccharine strength of imported sugars by means of the polariscope, and that the relations between the color of sugars and their saccharine strength be definitely prescribed by Congress.

The main features of the recommendations in the above are completely covered by the bill which I have introduced.

Mr. Havemeyer, when before the Committee on Ways and Means, said:

In order to explain the reason for the introduction of the polariscopic test in the proposed duty on sugar, it should be understood that the grades of raw sugar may be classified under five heads:

POLARISCOPIC TEST.

Melada, Concrete, } average 82 per cent. and below.
Common, average 82 per cent. and below.
Fair, from 82 to 87 per cent.
Good, from 87 to 92 per cent.
Centrifugals, above 92 per cent.

These are all below No. 13, Dutch standard in color, and all must be refined before fit for consumption.

All sugars ranging from No. 13 to above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, have been partly or wholly refined in the producing country, and therefore may go direct into consumption; they are known as grocery or refined sugars, and the color only of these sugars gives them their commercial value. When the existing tariff law was introduced color alone was the standard for all sugars, but the foreign producer (not the American refiner) has manipulated the natural color of the product of the plantation, and thus destroyed the equality and equity of the system, conforming to the wording on the law, but not to the intention, for a centrifugal sugar (the highest grade of raw sugar) can be lowered in color and pay therefore a less duty under the present tariff than its intrinsic value should permit.

The refiners have suffered with the Government, and therefore have earnestly advocated the introduction of a check, namely, polarization, as proposed in the bill presented by the Committee of Ways and Means. The polariscope will act simply as a detective, and confine to its proper class such sugars as might under a color condition only claim entrance into United States ports at a reduced duty. This test is strongly opposed by the foreign producers and their agents in this country. Those who deny its accuracy use it continually, and to-day hardly a pound of raw sugar is sold to be refined without the polariscopic test being made the basis of value. The system will not introduce too radical a change.

The grades of raw sugar are well known, and disputes would not arise if the Government is authorized to apply the polariscope to detect an attempted evasion.

A still further objection would naturally arise were the polariscope, however, to be the sole test applied, and the question of color entirely abrogated. Foreign producers would under such circumstances immediately flood the country with a highly refined sugar, which by excessive washing and the introduction of glucose would contain but little saccharine strength, and these sugars would not only greatly injure the refiners themselves but utterly ruin the sugar-planters of Louisiana.

The conclusions to which we are therefore forced in a consideration of the polariscope as a means of collecting duties is that as an agent to be used alone, and not in conjunction with the color test, it would prove not only dangerous to the interests of the Government by assisting the perpetration of frauds upon the revenues, but that its use is impracticable.

That in connection with the color test, however, it will effectually put a stop to the importation of artificially colored, or perhaps, more properly speaking, discolored sugars, for the purpose of evading the revenue laws. The adulteration of cane sugar with manufactured glucose is of importance in this connection. Whatever the merits of corn glucose for food may be, it is a manufactured substance greatly inferior to cane, beet, and sorghum sugars in sweetening qualities; its market value—less than half that of ordinary cane sugar—accurately determines its value as a substitute for the pure sugars of commerce.

The Carlisle and Tucker sugar bills both discriminate to prohibition against the lower grades of raw-sugar material; consequently both of those bills offer a premium for the adulteration of dry centrifugal sugars, the importation of which is encouraged therein, to the detriment of consumption and revenues, and apparently for the destruction of American sugar-producing industries.

It is impossible to produce an adequate supply of cheap refined sugars for consumption from semi-refined centrifugal sugars that test from 92° to 99° in crystals before being refined, but the cost of the refined outturn from centrifugal sugars may readily be reduced by adding glucose thereto before and after the refining process has been completed without impairing the outward appearance of the product. The mixture can be sold at pure refined cane-sugar prices.

Under the provisions of the Carlisle sugar bill centrifugal sugars testing 99° in crystals, but outwardly discolored below No. 14, Dutch standard in color, would be admitted at the same rate of duty as melada and other low-grade raw-sugar material, or 2.4 cents per pound. Almost the same percentage of crystals would be obtained in the refined outturn from such sugars, which, if exported, would claim a drawback of from 2.58 to 3.18 cents per 100 pounds. Should the refined product from dry centrifugals be stretched with glucose, the drawback would be about 3.50 cents on the outturn from material which only paid 2.40 cents duty.

Under the provisions of the Tucker sugar bill those conditions would be only slightly modified, centrifugal sugars testing 99° in crystals, but outwardly discolored below No. 14, Dutch standard in color, would pay the same duty as raw sugars, No. 8 in color testing only 86° in crystals, or 2.50 cents per pound, while the refined outturn from the dry centrifugals (99° test) would if exported pure obtain a drawback of from 2.58 to 3.18 cents, and if glucosed would claim a drawback of about 3.50 cents on the outturn from material which paid only 2.50 cents duty. It is almost needless to say that these conditions are impossible with actual raw-sugar material, and would be impossible with centrifugal sugars and all other sugars should the bill presented herewith become law.

Before closing I want to notice the claims of a State ruined and wrecked by the war, and whose fair fields since have been so often submerged by the turbid waters of the Mississippi, and whose recovery to prosperity has been so checked by the political vampires who fastened themselves upon her just after the war. Has Louisiana no claim upon the Government for proper protection of her sugar interests?

She is one of the States of our great Union, and her weal and her woe should appeal to the hearts of citizens of other States. The slave labor which existed before the war, and which was one of the peculiar institutions of the South, no longer exists. It has been forever swept away, and with it went the fortunes of many of the best and worthiest of our people.

The sentiment of the civilized world sustained and justly the act of the North in giving freedom to four million bondsmen. Yet that sentiment has not been sufficiently strong to force Spain to emancipate her slaves in Cuba; on the contrary, when the gallant little band of revolutionists who had struggled for years in that island to free themselves from the heavy hand of Spanish rule had fallen one by one under the guns of Spain's yearly imported veterans, the captain-general saw fit to sow the seed of discord in their few remaining camps by offering freedom to those slaves who had joined the insurgents if they would come in and lay down their arms; while those who had been faithful to their masters, who had by night watched their fields as a guard against fire, and had by day toiled in the heat of the broiling sun, were left still to be "hewers of wood and drawers of water." Can the people of the North who gave brothers and sons to swell the great Army of the Union, whose banners flaunted in the southern breeze from Atlanta to the Gulf, and whose blood dyed red the streams and soaked the ground of many a battle-field, can they have aught of sympathy with men whose actions so stink in the nostrils of the world? Surely there cannot be in this House a man who would sacrifice the interests and enact the ruin of a sister State to pander to the wish and fill the pockets of the foreign owners of slaves.

Then, if not for this, why do northern Representatives in Congress hesitate in the clearly marked path of duty?

Is it in the belief that our 50,000,000 of people demand a cheaper sugar? Let me tell you then that Louisiana alone, with her rich soil, can produce sugar enough to supply all the States if the promise of the fruit is not killed before the bud is blown. Have you forgotten the cry of distress that came upon the western breeze from starving thousands when Pittsburgh was all aflame, and the strikers for higher wages seized railroads, captured towns, and caused the rich man to tremble for his money, his stocks, and his bonds? Do you know what that cry meant? It meant demand for work, demand for living wages; it was the outpouring of anguish from the souls of strong men who saw starvation sitting upon their wretched thresholds and mocking their wives and children.

When the gaunt specter of famine stalks abroad and whispers foul and bloody messages in the ears of desperate men—men who are willing to work, but find no market for their brains or "brawn"—can you wonder then that communism rears its horrid front and threatens with anarchy our fairest cities?

To ameliorate the wretched condition of the poor, to relieve their sufferings, and to give them employment has stirred the hearts and tried the brains of many of the highest and best of our land. Their unhappy condition has aroused the warmest sympathies of the philanthropist; it has loosened the purse-strings of the rich to build hospitals and found asylums that stand as milestones marking the road of our advancing civilization. Xerxes, it is said, offered a fortune to the man who could invent for him a new pleasure; but how much more does he, who by his ability adds one blessing to the lot of his fellow-man, deserve that which outweighs a fortune—the lasting gratitude of his country.

How shall we find work for our daily increasing laborers? Year by year science and invention supply by machinery the need of manual labor, and our great cities become more and more crowded with the unemployed. Had they lucrative agricultural pursuits, do you suppose that the workman would not prefer the pure air of the country and the bright sunlight of Heaven to the fetid stenches and smoky glare of the city's din? Had he not rather see his children playing on the green sward than dabbling in the gutters of the streets? Then, by all means, let legislation further the agricultural interests of our country. Do we not protect our manufacturers in every way we can? Are we not yearly building up their interests by a high protective tariff? Why is it done? Surely not for any special class, but because we think the country at large has part and parcel in the growth of a part. Do we want to find work for the thousands of unemployed hands? Do we want to provide for the thousands of mouths that cry out for food? Then make our agricultural pursuits profitable by protecting these industries even as we have and are protecting our manufacturers. Do you know what we are paying for labor in Louisiana? Why, from $18 to $20 a month, and when the crops are taken off $30 a month, and often more. "Why, then, have not thousands gone South?" is asked. The answer is simply this: Capital will not risk itself in business where little or nothing can be gained. Sugar cannot be profitably cultivated under an imperfect enforcement of the present tariff, which is not, in its lack of safeguards, sufficient to protect Louisiana, being evaded by artificially colored sugars that are handled by foreign agents in co-operation with our importers and refiners to the ruin of the planting interests of my State.

The agricultural prosperity of a nation is its surest and safest source of wealth, and if Representatives of the North, who have legislated against riots and strikes want employment for the many thousands now idle in this land, let them protect our agricultural interests, improve our rivers, build up our levees, and the great valley of the Mississippi, whose fair lands border the banks of that noble river, will furnish employment not to thousands alone but to millions.

We are now paying nearly $90,000,000 annually to foreign countries for sugar. If this money were kept in the States and annually expended among the poor it would be quite sufficient to relieve their wants. If Louisiana and the beet and sorghum growing States with proper protection can make all the sugar we require, this enormous sum will not yearly leave our shores to fill the pockets of Spanish slave-owners. Do not think that it would enrich Louisiana alone; she requires grain from the West, mules from the Middle States, and machinery, tools, and other merchandise from the great manufactories of the East and North. Enlarged sugar cultivation there would give a new impetus to trade, revive the drooping interests of many manufacturers who stand upon the brink of ruin, assist the farmer in the West and the stock-raiser in the Middle States, and quiet that angry, ominous growl that, coming from hungry men, strikes more terror through the land than fire or plague.

The West, whose people are engaged in the increasing cultivation of the sorghum-cane, the East, where the sugar-beet is raised, and to perfect which France spent millions, are both interested in this question. It is not for the protection of Louisiana's sugar interest alone I speak. It is for a protection whose benefits would stretch far beyond the limits of my State, and whose blessings would be felt throughout the land.

We have a country whose destined greatness no man can foresee. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the great lakes of the North to the warm waters of the Gulf, lies a territory as richly endowed by nature as it is vast in extent. We need depend on no country for the necessities or luxuries of life; raising more in wheat and corn, live stock, cattle, and wool than we need for consumption; oil from our wells, coal, iron, gold, and silver from our mines, why should we continue to depend upon other lands for our sugar? Why let this be the only great necessity of life that we do not sufficiently raise within our own borders? When, perhaps in the near future, we measure our strength with other nations in war, can we safely rely upon importations alone for sugar food? Would not the increased price then in one year be a greater burden to the country than the just and limited protection at the hands of the Government we ask in the bill herewith presented? Let us, then, stimulate and sustain our agricultural interests, and tender, rather than take from, the laboring classes the bread they would earn with this encouragement and aid.

With no great standing army as a menace to the rights and liberties of the people; with our laboring classes contented, peaceful, and happy, we can move on to the grandeur of a future far beyond the most sanguine hopes of those past patriots and statesmen whose lives have lent undying luster to the earlier days of our Republic.

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. E. W. ROBERTSON,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. ROBERTSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: While I have always deprecated sectional controversy and avoided partisan discussions in this House, a sense of duty compels me to answer some of the unjust charges made during this debate against the fair fame of the people whom I have the honor in part to represent.

The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR,] although he did not open the debate on the apportionment bill now under consideration, was the first to give the discussion its sectional character. After basing his argument upon an apportionment made by himself, and which was entirely irrelevant, he went on to state, in effect, that at the South a systematic intimidation was practiced by one portion of the people against the other so as to prevent a free and fair expression of the will of the people at the polls. Although he did not charge it directly, yet the tenor of his remarks was that systematic intimidation had been practiced upon the colored people of Louisiana to an extent sufficient to disfranchise them. And he significantly asked of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] why there was such a disparity between the vote of 1876 and that of 1880, the apparent object of the question being an insinuation that the small vote of 1880 in Louisiana was caused by intimidation. I propose to briefly answer the gentleman's question, and trust I will do so to his entire satisfaction.

The attention of the gentleman is called to the fact that the vote in 1876 was the largest ever cast in the State. The whole strength of both parties was brought to the polls and voted, except in the parish of East Feliciana, where but one republican vote was cast. The cause of that one exception was not intimidation, but a part of a preconcerted plan by the carpet-bag leaders who, for political effect, had given orders to the colored voters to keep away from the polls. As is well known, the State government was at that time in the hands of the republican party, which had been in power for eight years, and had enacted the laws governing the elective franchise and the conduct of elections. The machinery to carry these laws into effect was also wholly within their hands, so of course it cannot be said that any undue influences were brought to bear to control that machinery in the interest of the democratic party. The contest that year was almost exclusively confined to questions of State policy. The paramount question with the democrats was the establishment of law, order, peace, and good will among the people of all classes, against carpet-bag rule, rapine, plunder, and violence under the forms of law. The names of Tilden and Hayes were hardly mentioned during the campaign.

It was a contest on the one hand headed by Francis T. Nichols, and upon the other by S. B. Packard. A state of lawlessness had existed for eight years, under carpet-bag rule, supported and sustained by the strong arm of the Government. It has frequently been asserted by republican stalwarts that the responsibility of these disorders rested upon the white people of Louisiana, and that it was their duty to put them down. What a humiliating and disgraceful admission! It is a political axiom the world over, undisputed by any party or government, free or despotic, that the party or government in power is responsible and must be held accountable for the peace and order of the community over which it rules. Who was in power? Who exercised all the functions of government? Who were in possession of the offices? Who was the governor? Who were the judges to interpret and administer the law? And who were the sheriffs and officers to execute it? Republicans in almost every instance—bad men of both races, utterly unfit by character or capacity honestly and patriotically to discharge the duties devolving upon them. The temples of justice were transformed into dens of thieves and places for corrupt bribe-taking. Trial by jury, where ignorance reigned supreme, was a mockery. The social structure was shaken to its foundation by raising a servile race suddenly and without preparation to rule over the white people through the instrumentality of force and coercion. Take, for example, the mass of the colored people now living in Washington City, recruit them from all parts of the South, in the condition they were left at the close of the war, and distribute them in sufficient numbers in the States of Massachusetts and Maine to give them the numerical majority; change the fundamental law of those States; place there a standing army and put them in control of the State governments: I ask you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Representatives from those States upon this floor, how long would peace, law, and order be maintained? Sir, the aggressive and liberty-loving people of Massachusetts and Maine would rise in their might and drive the colored race from their borders. Not so with us. There had always been a kindly and friendly feeling existing between the slave and his owner before the war, and be it said in all honor to the colored slaves of the South, that when Abraham Lincoln issued his proclamation which invited them everywhere to rise in their might in insurrection against their masters, instead of obeying that proclamation they were true and loyal, peaceable and quiet; and although loving liberty and yearning for it, and many prompted by the impulses of human nature to fly to the Federal Army, they left no murdered women and children, no smouldering ruins behind them. There was no antagonism of race, no animosity, until the firebrand of discord was thrown into their midst by carpet-bag demagogues—until these enemies of both races stirred up strife in order that they might prey upon the community and eat out the substance of the poverty-stricken people.

Then it was that the good people of my State rose in their might, not with arms, but peaceably and in order, to overthrow at the ballot-box the power of ignorance and plunder. The result was, as I have stated, a full vote—the largest ever polled in my State—the total vote as cast being 160,897, of which Tilden received 83,723 and Hayes 77,174.

This election placed the State in the hands of the conservatives, and confidence was restored among the people. The administration of Governor Nichols established peace and order in home affairs. In accepting the nomination he did so with the distinct declaration that if elected he would cease to be a partisan, and would be the governor of the whole people. He redeemed this pledge by appointing to office good men from both political parties. He made no distinction on account of race, but appointed many colored men to places of trust.

The cause of education was earnestly supported and advanced, the grade of teachers was raised, and, as far as possible, colored teachers were appointed to conduct colored schools. This conservative course offended some of the radical democrats, but it was a wise policy, and did much to rebuild the party as a whole. It was also a blow to the republican party, for it gained the confidence and support of the best element of the blacks, particularly those who were anxious for the advancement of education. The "carpet-bag" element being left without officers and opportunities for plunder, left the State to prey upon other communities. In this way the republican party of Louisiana lost largely in numbers.

In 1878 there was an attempt to reorganize the republican party under the countenance of President Hayes's administration, and to vindicate the action of the returning board of 1876. But as the policy of the Administration was neither robust nor consistent and was without the support of Federal bayonets, the attempt proved abortive.

In the campaign of 1880 the republicans were lukewarm and disappointed. They had hoped that the stalwarts would control the convention at Chicago and nominate a ticket which would revive the power of the carpet-baggers. But the nomination of General Garfield was a disappointment—in brief, a wet blanket upon their hopes and unholy aspirations. They were further discouraged by the action of the national republican campaign committee, which made no canvass except in the third congressional district.

Again, there were two factions in their party in Louisiana: one composed of the custom-house officials and employés and the other of the adherents of General Grant. Crimination and recrimination among themselves was the order of the day.

A cause for apathy on the part of the democrats of my State was the tariff plank of the Cincinnati platform. The sugar industry of Louisiana is a matter of vital importance to our prople, and they believed that the policy of the democratic party would be injurious in this respect. But the one great question of paramount importance to Louisiana is the improvement of the Mississippi River. The republican platform contained a clause in favor of appropriations for the great water-ways of the country, and General Garfield in his letter of acceptance stated that the Mississippi was entitled to exceptional consideration. The democratic platform and letters of acceptance were silent upon this important subject. No wonder, then, that many democrats of Louisiana failed to see where their material interests would be subserved by supporting General Hancock, notwithstanding they had the highest regard for him as a man and as a friend and advocate of their political liberties.

Again, there was no local election in 1880 to attract to the polls a large portion of each party which in Louisiana, as elsewhere, usually care more for questions relating to home affairs than for national politics. This was owing to the new State constitution of 1879, which provided for State elections on a separate day.

This constitution was most liberal and just in its provisions. It contained no educational or property qualification for suffrage as exists in Rhode Island and other States. It made no distinction on account of race or color, but guarded the rights of all classes alike. The intelligent colored people were so well satisfied with it, and felt so secure under its provisions, that at the first presidential election thereafter, that of 1880, they took little interest in political questions. Evidences of this feeling of security may be found in the proceedings of the constitutional convention, which contains speeches to this effect from Demas, Pinchback, and other representative colored men who were members of the convention.

The result of all these circumstances and the neglect by each party of a suitable campaign organization was an unusually small vote at the presidential election of 1880, the total vote being but 97,201; of which the democratic ticket received 65,310 and the republican 31,891.

It is idle to talk about a discrepancy between the vote cast at this election and the population as shown by the new census returns. That is a frequent occurrence in every State of the Union, as the gentleman who raises this point well knows. If a light vote is an evidence of intimidation, then the voters of Michigan and other Northern States have frequently been intimidated. As 25,000 white voters of Louisiana remained away from the polls at this election, the gentleman might as well say they were intimidated.

The real trouble about Louisiana is that certain stalwart republicans want it to be republican, and because it is not they raise the senseless cry of intimidation. They should bear in mind that the State has ever since the war been democratic and conservative whenever an effort was made to carry it. This is shown by the returns of the votes cast at each presidential election. In 1868, the first presidential election after reconstruction, Seymour and Blair carried the State by 46,962 majority. In 1872, Greeley and Brown had a majority of 6,492; in 1876, Tilden and Hendricks a majority of 6,549; and in 1880, Hancock and English a majority of 33,419.

I might discuss this question in detail in reply to the insinuations of the gentleman from Michigan, but I believe the country is heartily tired of listening to speeches on Louisiana returning boards and carpet-bag manipulations. At least Louisiana is tired of it and wants a rest. She is awaking to her new industrial and commercial opportunities and would put partisan politics in the back-ground. She has in good faith accepted the results of the war and the constitutional amendments. The successful opening of the mouth of the Mississippi River; the improvement of its channel above the mouth; the emphatic indorsement of this great national work in the letter of acceptance of the President-elect; the new transportation movement down the river of the surplus grain products of the great valley; the construction of new railways through the cotton, sugar, and rice plantations of Western and Northwestern Louisiana; new commercial relations with the Spanish-American islands and countries on the south; a short and direct commercial outlet to the Atlantic by means of a canal across Northern Florida; direct communication with the California coast and the foreign countries resting upon the Pacific Ocean, by means of ordinary and ship railways across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, are matters of transcendent importance to my State and have eclipsed her former interest in returning-board history.

In brief, the people of Louisiana believe that a new era of material progress is dawning upon the Republic, and they are ambitious to contribute their share to the development of its agriculture, industries, commerce, and wealth. They want more business and less politics, and my excuse for these brief remarks on an exploded political subject is the uncalled-for and unnecessary remarks by the gentleman from Michigan against the good name of my State and people.

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. SAMUEL S. COX,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 2, 1881.

Numbers are the only certain things. They can neither be controlled nor perverted. Every nation has its own ideas of right and wrong; every law can be rendered invalid by circumstances; but the results obtained from numbers can never be overthrown. Numbers determine the contents of every existing thing whatever is, is equal to its contents; numbers, therefore, are the true being, the essence of all that is.—Professor Ebers.

A moderate oligarchy, in which men of a certain census elect a council entrusted with the deliberative power, but bound to exercise this power according to established laws.—Aristotle, Polit. book vi.; ch. 14.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census—

Mr. COX said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The abstract idea in this quotation has its concrete application. If government is founded upon a true enumeration of the people, it is the only certain government of the people. From the ancient time when the priests of Egypt calculated the course of stars and the limitations of life to the latest calculus of the moons of Mars, numbers fill uncertain voids with absolute truths.

Alone, sir, among the nations, this country founds her law-making power upon an actual enumeration of all the people. The only exception is, Indians not taxed, which is inconsequential. Another exception, not as yet acted upon, is that of citizens whose right to vote is denied or abridged under certain circumstances. But practically, the "whole number of persons" of all sexes, ages, races, and conditions are, by the first clause of the second section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, to be counted for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to their respective numbers.

This clause was, in substance, borrowed from the resolve passed by the Continental Congress on the 18th of April, 1783, recommending the States to amend the articles of confederation in such manner that the national expenses should be defrayed out of a common treasury, "which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the whole number of white or other free inhabitants, of every age, sex, and condition, including hose bound to servitude for a term of years, and three-fifths of all other persons not comprehended in the foregoing description, except Indians not paying taxes in each State."

PRIMARY OBJECT OF CENSUS.

In other ages and countries there has been a dynastic demand for the listing of persons and property; but it was not because rulers desired right returns for the weal of the people, nor was it because such returns were the groundwork of social science and political order; such returns were made for war levies and tax exactions.

The framers of our Constitution solved the problem of direct taxation and representation by the second section of its first article. It was the first government in the world which by an organic law so founded its free fabric on a legally ascertained census that the liberty of the people to meet through their delegates should go hand in hand with taxation. It is one of our anomalies, that, with fair representation, we have had but four laws for direct taxation. It was not intended, however, at first, to require of the Federal Government more than an enumeration of the people.

SECONDARY OBJECT OF CENSUS.

Efforts were faintly made to enlarge its scope, but it was not until the law of 1850 that this clause spread out into a prescript to register agriculture, manufactures, mortality, social conditions, civil relations, and industrial and other interests. In this advancing age and with our progressive people, such returns have become indispensable to wise legislation and scientific research. Their statistics are both cause and effect. They are annals, vital with those things which make for peace and prosperity. They enable the historic Muse to trace with luminous pencil the development of society and its industries and liberties, under the influences of soil, waters, climate, and position, so as to educe those physical and spiritual laws which affect civilization.

Mr. Speaker, when on the 6th of May, 1878, I offered the resolution for a special census committee, I did not dream of the labor involved in framing a new and efficient law fitted to our changing conditions. It is one of my felicitations, however, that not only was the law passed timely, so as to get ready good machinery, but that in many of its minutiæ and particulars, it was such an improvement on the law of 1850 as will make the result the most complete history of an active society ever compiled by any government. When this result shall have been accomplished, may I not say, as the builder of the Eddystone light-house said when, with praise to God, he crowned his work: Finis coronat opus!

When the results shall have been digested, tabulated, and printed, the marvel will stand confessed. The great facts in the life of this century-old Republic will astonish more than the fictions of other nations.

The story of the beginning and unfolding of races and nations is more or less legendary and mythical. Most of the monuments of their civilization have been buried by time and warfare. If it be so with the refined and victorious, is it not more so with the uncultured and vanquished nations? Wherever the plastic hand of man cannot be distinctly traced in molding institutions, miraculous interventions of some divinity are called in to encircle its dim history and doubtful heroism with a halo. Few solid landmarks, few granite facts remain to tell their rise and fall.

But from our returns at this decennial period every leading fact in our prodigious progress will be recorded. No poetic license, party bias, or philosophic prejudice interferes to distract. The nation will be seen with the anatomical distinctness of a skeleton, and yet as in a mirror of diamond, inspired and clothed with the glowing life of a Hercules. Not only will all our natural resources and physical labors and their divers causes and effects, together with the hinderances to our progress—the defective, dependent, and delinquent elements—be displayed, but under this constitutional requirement every man, woman, and child is registered for a grand purpose. The babe just cradled and the aged just coffined, the old inhabitant and the newcomer, the Senator and the scavenger, the scientist and the scamp, the sane and insane, male and female, the diseased and blind, the halt and maimed, the deaf and dumb, all are included in one vast mass, out of which the intellect may evoke its science, legislation its law, and even poetry its genii. One by one the little drops of fact ooze out of this enormous labor, until the whole is a mountain of crystal. More than fifty millions of our kind are seen to have their being in one orderly organism, out of which the Government, in its representative capacity, is to be reinvigorated and exalted.

HOW TO ASCERTAIN THE QUOTA SO AS TO APPORTION.

The prime object of this enumeration is the apportionment of members of Congress. This duty now devolves upon us. It cannot be shirked. It is a simple and easy duty. The data are before us. The difficult part is already done.

After we determine the number of our members, the quota of population for each member and State is easily ascertained by the rule of three. The whole population, omitting Territories and the District of Columbia, is divided by the number of members, and the quotient is the basis of representation for each member. But on the division of the population of the States so as to ascertain the number of members for each State is there no fraction, no residuum? Certainly. Shall it go unrepresented? No. Such has not been the practice. It is counted. The loss in the number of members caused by the fractions in the several States is compensated for, as near as may be, by assigning to so many States having the largest fractions, an additional member each for its fraction, so as to make up the whole number of Representatives.

THE MOIETY FALLACY.

This has not been the practice uniformly. A party has always appeared favoring simply the largest fractions, or fractions over a number arbitrarily assumed, or a number above the moiety of the ratio. The gentleman from Illinois has printed in the RECORD an estimate of population, and a ratio on our present basis of two hundred and ninety-three members, and also the fractions to which he assigns additional members. He finds out somehow that there are twenty-one highest fractions, and, by accident or otherwise, all these are over one hundred thousand and none under, and these fractions entitle the States named to one more member each, and the sum is two hundred and ninety-three members. But he goes further. He then adds eight other States with fractions less than one hundred thousand, which would, if the number were increased beyond two hundred and ninety-three, have each one more member.

This sort of calculation, with all respect to my diligent friend from Illinois, tends to confusion. Whether the States having over one hundred thousand happen to have the highest fractions for a sufficient number of Representatives so as to make up the total number, I do not inquire. The plan is faulty, and misleads. It is on a parity with the argument for a member for a State having more than the moiety of the ratio, which has been so persistently urged on other apportionments.

To show the sophistry of such an irrational mode, peruse the letter and tables which General Walker sent to me on the 15th instant and published in the public document ordered by the House. It will appear that if an additional member be assigned to each State on account of a moiety the ratio may be altered. The work is then spoiled, and it has to be done over again. On the new ratio another State might be found to have a fraction in excess of the moiety, and therefore entitled to an additional Representative. That would make a new total; and again the ratio would be changed, and so on.

Take the tables which detect the moiety fallacy. Here are twenty-three counties in a State, having 120,000 population. Fix the Representatives at 200. That gives 600 a ratio. Apply this ratio to the population of the several counties, and lo! 190 Representatives. This is on equal division. But there is an aggregate of fractions; they number 6,000. Assign the ten additional members to those States having the highest fractions, and the total is 200, the original and proper number. Here the equitable work of fractions ends. Beyond that comes confusion. Whether it come by having a fixed limit as a fraction, say 100,000, or a moiety of the ratio, no matter. The confusion is complete. If assignments are to be made upon a moiety, and there should be one county too many having a moiety, then, if one is added, the Representatives would not be 200, but 201. The moieties are in that case more than sufficient to exhaust the number of members originally selected. Again and again and again this will occur. The ratio changes, first, from 600 to 597; second, to 594; third, to 591, and last, to 588; and their aggregate changes with them while the total number of members is increased.

HISTORY OF APPORTIONMENTS—FRACTIONS.

The first apportionment was made by the Constitution itself. It limited the number of Representatives. They should not exceed one for every 30,000; and each State, however much below the ratio in population, should have at least one member, thus showing that fractional differences were not altogether ignored in small States; still the practice has been to count these very small States in the general division as having a full ratio for one member.

On the first apportionment bill by Congress, in December, 1791, fractions were the main topic of debate. The effort was made to reduce them by fixing a ratio to produce the least fractions; and a member suggested the plan adopted by the bill of May 23, 1850, and since, namely, that the Representatives shall amount to a certain number according to the whole number of the people.

This would have given a surplus number which might have been assigned to those States that have the largest fractional numbers. (Annals of Second Congress, page 243.) At that time there was an apprehension that the large States would combine; but this had its offset. It was argued that by the equal representation in the Senate the small States were equipollent with the large States. Again, it was said that the injury to the small States by rejecting fractions is more severely felt by them than by the larger States. These jealousies led to a scuffle as to fractions, in which the bill was killed.

Another bill, after much incubation on fractions, was passed. It met a veto from Washington, April 5, 1792. [Here Mr. COX sent to the Clerk's desk, to be read, the message of Washington.] The veto was, first, because no proportion or division applied to the respective numbers of the State would yield the allotment of Representatives in the bill; and second, because the bill gave to eight of the States more than 1 for every 30,000, and was therefore unconstitutional. The veto was sustained and made the policy for forty years. Another bill was tried. Its ratio was 33,000. It passed.

The Seventh Congress fixed the same ratio, January 14, 1802, with little friction. Only Delaware complained; for she had a fraction of 28,811 unrepresented. She appealed to her bloody sweat and patriotic trial in the Revolution, [laughter;] and her member more than hinted that the rule of taxation was not according to representation. He contended—but in vain—for a smaller ratio, 30,000, as having fewer fractions; so as to give Delaware two members.

The fourth apportionment in 1811 did not give rise to much debate. It was here and now that the maiden effort of Calhoun was made on this topic. The fractional question arose again. He called it "a squabble among the States which should bear the loss of large fractions, rather than a serious division on principle." He was jealous of the Senate passing on the representation in the House, believing that that body would by the strength of precedent ultimately control the House.

The next apportionment was in 1822, and on a basis of forty thousand. It produced little discussion, except as to dilatory returns from Alabama and one trenchant speech from John Randolph, who, picturing the rising and sinking States, exclaimed:

> From whom do we hear of this unrepresented population? From the States beyond the mountains; beyond the Mississippi; not, indeed, beyond Aurora and the Ganges, but where the setting sun allays his golden axle—not in the steep Atlantic stream, but in the Pacific; from States which, with a population of sixty thousand souls, have for years been admitted in the Senate to a voice potential as the greatest.

In the following decade, 1830, Representatives were apportioned upon even divisions. Up to 1840 the apportionment was not made upon the aggregate mass of the representative population of all the States, but that of each State without regard to fractions. It was held by some that fractions, whatever they were, were unconstitutional, and a total departure from the rule of the veto and the Constitution. But after 1840 the practice was fixed. Fractions were counted, and even when less than a moiety. The rule of equal division was abandoned. It was in the discretion of Congress to add members at pleasure for fractions.

General Garfield epitomizes this history in a paragraph wherein he says, (December 9, 1869, page 39:)

> I desire to say to the House in regard to the whole matter of representation, that there are just two ways in which the Government has settled the question. For the first fifty years of the Government it was settled by fixing not the number of members of the House, but the number of population which should be entitled to a Representative; and when that was fixed dividing the total population by that number and letting the size of the House be the result of that division. For fifty years the size of the House of Representatives was so determined. In 1840 a change was made in that respect, after a long and most searching debate. The result of that debate was that they fixed the number of members of the House, and finding the total population, divided that by the number of members and got the basis for each Representative.

After all, he and all of us agreed on the present mode.

There is no rule better than that which the committee has adopted, the first step of which is the ascertainment of the number of members.

PROPOSITIONS AS TO NUMBER—GAINS AND LOSSES.

At every increase of the number of members there will be unrepresented fractions, and consequently local complaint.

It is the object of my bill, originally introduced, fixing the number at 301, to remove as many objections as possible, growing out of the "scuffle for fractions." There is not any partisan, local, or sectional inclination in that number. That will appear to any one who will observe the tables and the care I have taken for the fullest scrutiny.

But, sir, I may, likely shall, find it necessary, since I cannot get the lesser number of 301, for wise purposes, introduce an amendment which I have prepared for 307. This will not make any difference in gains North or South different from 301, for the net gain of four remains on each number, but it may assist a useful purpose.

Under my bill the old slave States gain eight and lose two; the Middle States lose three; the New England States lose three; and the Western States gain ten and lose two. The old slave States make a net gain of six Representatives, while the rest of the States gain two net. The West gain eight net, with loss to New England, New York, and Pennsylvania of six!

Classifying the States into the old slave States, the Middle States, comprising New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, the New England States, and the Western States, including all the West, we find that their gains and losses under my proposed apportionment are:

Classification.	Gain.	Loss.	Present total.	Proposed total.
Old slave States	8	2	106	112
Middle States	.....	3	67	64
New England States	.....	3	28	25
Western States	10	2	92	100

If any one complains that this is sectional or partisan, let him calculate the net gains North and South from numbers 290 to 319, and he will find that on every number the South has a net gain over the North. The annexed table marked "Exhibit A" will show that, beginning with a net gain to the South of nine on 290, that gain runs as follows, namely: 291, eight; 292, seven; 293, six; 294, five; 295, six; 296, five; 297, four; 298, three; 299, four; 300, three; 301, four; 302, five; 303, four; 304, five; 305, six; 306, five; 307, four; 308, five; 309, four; 310, five; 311, six; 312, five; 313, four; 314, five; 315, four; 316, three; 317, two; 318, one, and 319, naught. After 320 the loss of the South over the North begins, with one at 320, two at 321, three at 322, two at 323, one at 324, and two at 325.

Here, then, is the dilemma to the northern legislator if he is opposed to an increased number. As the Northern States will gain more (being larger States) at each increase, he gives up to party or section what was meant for a reasonably sized body. He adds twenty-six members to the House to reconcile some State which may lose. In other words it is the bill of my friend from Illinois [Mr. SHERWIN] who, after his arithmetic, finds neither gain to North or South at 319, and favors that number, and at the expense of the representative population; for he leaves more of them out of the count than by my bill of 301 or 307 or 311.

It is true that this is a plausible but a dangerous increase. Surely I do not object to his bill because it restores New York to her present number, thirty-three. Other States, large and influential, are placated at 319. Ohio gains one over her present number, and so does Pennsylvania, Michigan, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Virginia, Illinois, &c. The scheme is adroit for votes; is it so wise for legislation? Is not the increase of eight, as I propose, better every way? It is an odd number, and in the ties we have had since I have been here, a wise precaution. Besides the average, from 290 to 320, (as per "Exhibit A,") is a gain of nearly five to the South. My bill is a gain of four only. Is it not fair? It is fairer than 311, which gives a larger gain to the South than the average, for it gives six.

The New York Times, with its intelligent interest in this large question, in a recent article says that the bill for 301 secures equity by giving to each State as nearly as possible its proportional representation, and allows the sections an aggregate number of members, corresponding as closely as practicable with their percentage of population. The sections it selects are as follows:

Northeast, including New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania with New England, containing 29.4 per cent. of the population.

The West, embracing all the free States west of Pennsylvania, containing 33.1 per cent. of the population.

The South, the sixteen old slave States, containing 37.5 per cent. of the population.

My bill gives to the northeast 89 members, to the west 100, to the south 112. The exact percentage of members corresponding to that of population, would be about 88½, 99½, and 112½. No number will come so near as this to exactness.

Besides my bill re-enacts the single district and contiguous territory clause; and that ought to be the law, as all will admit. The only difference would be as to the proper bill upon which to place the section.

I know that certain States must lose. Some lose who can hardly brook it. Florida, Ohio, and Indiana, by my proposition, lose one each, which they regain on a rise. Florida adds one at 302, because of a large fraction of 103,876. Missouri adds one more at 309, Indiana one at 311, Ohio one at 303, New York at 307, Pennsylvania at 306, and Georgia one at 308; so that the scheme for 311 is a taking one for some States. But the line must be drawn somewhere. It should follow two considerations: First, the convenient number for business, and second, it should be as fully representative as possible by lessening the fractions.

That 301 or 307 is more convenient than 311 or 319 all will agree. That 301 produces as little inequality as any other number will be seen. It regards an "equal division," and the fractions for each member allotted are of fair size, if not the largest.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the gentleman to say his bill provided that the districts should be composed of contiguous territory. I do not see that provision in the bill.

Mr. COX. The committee did not report that back. I say that I shall offer that as an amendment myself. The bill which I originally introduced, providing for 301 Representatives, contained that provision.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman does not object to such a provision?

Mr. COX. I do not myself. But the committee struck it out.

NUMBER OF MEMBERS.

In 1869 I favored 250 as most fit for business and fully representative of the people. The House thought it best to increase the (then) number 243 to 293.

The House, however, had increased with the ratio and population, though not in as great a proportion. In 1869 we added fifty members. This was done partly to conceal losses—or comparative losses—and to save the amour propre of certain States, and from a desire to preserve the number or influence of the House while the Senate was growing. The arguments for a large House were these:

First. That large districts were apt to have adverse interests and were not so homogeneous.

Second. That the House grew less than the population and should share its growth.

Third. That the increase of business required more Representatives.

Fourth. That it was more republican to have smaller districts and more members.

Without pursuing the order here indicated, let me ask, Is there any force in the objection that the larger the districts the more adverse the interests? Why should not the interests of one district be varied? It is impossible to make a district with only one interest. To be sure a district may be half agricultural and half manufacturing, and the tariff may torture its candidates, but why should not the question and the candidates receive inquisition, pitiless and exhaustive, under these adverse yet enlightening conditions?

In sparsely populated districts a small House and large ratio may make the district inconvenient for canvassing and communication, and its interests may be more varied and antagonistic than in dense communities. Still these disadvantages are to be balanced by the inconveniences of a large House.

Now, does it add political consequence and power to the most popular branch of Congress if we only add to its number? May it not tend to weaken the body? Is corpulency health? If its efficiency as a factor is destroyed by its ponderosity, where is the increase of relative strength? Is the Senate less potential for its smaller number? Ah! sir, what we need is, not new members, but more studious attention to business. Increase will only add to idleness unless wise industry help. Not that the number of the House should be so reduced as to make it more corruptible; for it is a fact that larger bodies are less pliable to the allurements, wheedling, and bribery of the lobby. Besides, larger bodies have a virtue, because of their dilatory ways and unwieldly proportions; and this is to be considered.

Mr. Hamilton disfavored (No. 58 Federalist) large assemblies as tending to beget weaker representatives; the more multitudinous the assembly the more infirmities appear. For local information, diffusive sympathy, and safety he urged the smaller number. In this he agreed with the commentator upon the Constitution. Judge Story held that the question is one of sound policy and discretion; that it is a fallacy to found political calculations on arithmetical principles, and that the main object is "to secure the benefits of free consultation and discussion, guard against too easy a combination for improper purposes, and to prevent hasty and ill-advised legislation." He advises a moderate number, to avoid the confusion, intemperance, and inconvenience of a multitude. He combats the idea that a small number would be fools and a large number a mob, and rebuts the suggestion that a numerous representation is necessary to obtain the confidence of the people.

The extract from the Federalist, in the article by Alexander Hamilton, may not be altogether acceptable to this side, but it will to the other. It is as follows:

> The people can never err more than in supposing that by multiplying their representatives beyond a certain limit they strengthen the barrier against the government of a few. Experience will forever admonish them that, on the contrary, after securing a sufficient number for the purposes of safety, of local information, and of diffusive sympathy with the whole society, they will counteract their own views by every addition to their representatives. The countenance of the government may become more democratic; but the soul that animates it will be more oligarchic. The machine will be enlarged, but the fewer, and often the more secret, will be the springs by which its motions are directed.

Out of which Judge Story made his wise comment:

> Nothing can be more fallacious than to found political calculations on arithmetical principles. Sixty or seventy men may be more properly trusted with a given degree of power than six or seven. But it does not follow that six or seven hundred would be proportionately a better depository. And if the supposition is carried on to six or seven thousand, the whole reasoning ought to be reversed. The truth is, that, in all cases, a certain number seems necessary to secure the benefits of free consultation and discussion; to guard against too easy a combination for improper purposes, and to prevent hasty and ill-advised legislation.
>
> On the other hand, the number ought to be kept within a moderate limit, in order to avoid the confusion, intemperance, and inconvenience of a multitude. It was a famous saying of Cardinal De Retz, that every public assembly consisting of more than one hundred members was a mere mob. But surely this is just as incorrect as it would be to aver that every one which consisted of ten members would be wise.
>
> The question then is, and forever must be in every nation, a mixed question of sound policy and discretion, with reference to its size, its population, its institutions, its local and physical condition, and all the other circumstances affecting its own interest and convenience.

It all comes to this, Mr. Speaker, that good legislation will inspire faith and respect, and however large or small the number, this is as indispensable as intelligence. Pondering all these matters, still is not the present number, or something near it, a sufficiency—sufficiently large for honesty and sufficiently small for business? Whether the number should be smaller or not, the House is not likely to lower it. There is a tendency to aggrandize power in each State, and the ambition of members to make sure of being returned from their respective States has its weight in fixing the number.

This question is one which every member will likely decide for himself. Argument will not help him to a determination. It requires little logic and less learning, save such as spring from the practical wisdom, biased, it may be unconsciously, by selfish and local motives, for the House to say what the number should be. My impression is that it will settle down upon some number as a golden mean between extreme opinions.

OUR OWN CONGRESS AS TO NUMBERS.

In our own experience, we have run the number from sixty-five in 1789 to two hundred and ninety-three in 1870, adding two hundred and twenty-eight members while increasing the ratio from 30,000 to 131,425. The increase of members and ratio has run together; but both are behind the growth of population. If population and interests are eliminated from the question and only convenience is consulted, we might well be content with about three hundred members.

In 1842 there was a desperate encounter of wit and wisdom in the House over the number of members. Should there be large districts with a larger ratio, or should there be small districts and a larger number of members? The fractions again play their part here, but subordinately. The star-part is the ratio. Mr. Underwood claims that 141,000 is not too much, as the "shake-hand and grog-shop influence" at elections would be lessened if not abolished by larger districts and fewer members. Sixty amendments, running from 141,000 down to 30,000, are offered. "In the multitude of counselors there is wisdom," cries out one. "Nay," says another; "in the paucity of numbers there will be no crowing of cocks, braying of asses, and the coughing, noises, and deviltry of the English Commons, with neither business done nor dignity preserved."

At last the House strikes a mean, and all acquiesce.

Mr. McCOOK. Will my colleague, out of his wealth of wisdom on this subject, give the House a statement of the number of members in other representative bodies in this country and in other countries?

Mr. COX. I will say to my distinguished Representative, for I live in his district, [laughter,] that I have anticipated his very intelligent question, and shall publish with my remarks a table of the numbers of members of all the known legislative bodies in all the world.

OUR STATE LEGISLATURES AS TO NUMBERS.

If we draw any analogies from our own local Legislatures, we would not greatly increase the number. There is not a senate among our States which has more than fifty members. Indiana, Iowa, and Pennsylvania have precisely that number. The representatives average over one hundred to the State, although Connecticut has 246, Massachusetts 240, Pennsylvania 201, and Vermont 242. Only one, New Hampshire, has a greater number than Congress, to wit, 300. If it be said that the business is small in these States compared with that of our Congress, where seven thousand bills are produced in one session, it may be answered that it would be best not to forward so much legislation; and next, if it must be forwarded, let it be done properly, as it would be by fewer members. It is a question whether this Chamber is commodious enough for an increase of more than we propose. The experiment of removing the desks was a failure, and we know that one-half of our present number is cut off by remoteness from the Chair from taking part in or hearing anything of our proceedings.

OTHER DELIBERATIVE BODIES AS TO NUMBERS.

It might, however, be interesting, if not instructive, to review the constitution of other deliberative bodies, a list of which, from our Librarian's Almanac, I have appended hereto, and marked "Exhibit B." It will be observed from it that our American legislatures are not heavily weighted in either the upper or lower house. Brazil has 122 and Chili 108 representatives; Mexico rejoices in 331 members of Congress, and Canada 206 in her Commons. All the rest of the American legislatures have less than one hundred.

Austria seems to be fond of numbers. Her Herrenhaus (which is the "gentleman's House") has 191, and her Reichstag (which is the "Empire's day" in court) 353, while Hungary's House of Magnates is 731, and her lower house 444. The Bundsrath, representing the federal relations of Germany, is small, only 59; but the lower federal house is 397. The subordinate legislatures of Germany are small, excepting Hamburg, whose House of Burgesses is 196, and Prussia, whose upper house is 302, and lower 434. Sweden has 198, and Switzerland 135, while France and Great Britain lead, the former having 300 senators and 532 deputies, and the latter 497 peers and 652 members of Parliament. Spain has a single chamber of 406 members; and I must say, from personal observation, that the conduct of her Cortes is elegant, decorous, and dignified compared with the French Chamber and English Commons.

If it be said that large bodies are more republican, I answer that the largest bodies are born of monarchy or oligarchy. They are not necessarily democratic or representative of the people; but of classes and orders. If Parliament be urged as an example of the efficiency of a large number, it may be answered that but forty are a quorum for public, and twenty for private business; and that except on division days and crucial questions, when the fate of the government is at stake, there is no need and no presence of more than a quorum. To be sure Parliament legislates for hundreds of millions of people, all round the world; and Great Britian has no local legislatures in Scotland, Ireland, or England. How immense, then, is the work of her few statesmen, under her constitution which gives to Parliament transcendent and unlimited power.

But it is said that we can decrease our number of Congressmen, because in the last two decades our physical progress has created greater facilities of communication, so that larger districts are lessened by reason of the more familiar relation of people through railroads and telegraphs. However this may be, it is impossible to increase the number of members in the proportion of the increase of the people. If in 1910 we shall have 100,000,000 of people, we should then have six hundred members on the present basis. But numbers do not depend on a principle. The bulk of the people of early Greece and later Switzerland met to make laws. The inconvenience was great, but the true principle of the popular assent was maintained. In northern climates, and in our time, it is impossible for the masses to meet to make laws. The meteorological and other conditions limit a pure democracy. Modern peoples meet by representatives; not as Poland did by her nobles, to vindicate her sovereignty and elect a king, but under conditions of popular existence which indicate advancement in the art and philosophy of government.

POSTPONEMENT OF APPORTIONMENT.

It may be objected that this apportionment might well be postponed until the next Congress. The same reason might as well have been made against the passage of the new law approved March 3, 1879, namely, that it was not absolutely necessary, as the census taking did not begin until the 1st of June, 1880. But it is now seen that our promptitude was a great benefaction. It gave ample time for the preparation, the labor of which, to the uninitiated, would seem incredible. Under the new law, the business began in season, and the results show our wisdom. So will it be with the apportionment. It is a prerequisite before the States can redistrict. It is absolutely necessary. It is a constitutional command. If we postpone it until next winter, 1881–'82, (supposing no extra session,) there may be many collisions and omissions, to say nothing of personal ambitions, party bickering, and subtle negotiation, to delay and hinder the performance of this duty. Let us take warning from the troubles which followed our delay in 1870 and other years.

The 1840 apportionment was behind. Judge Clifford, who had charge of it, admonished the House of the great expense likely to occur by extra sessions of the Legislatures. This was on the 22d of January, 1842. In 1852, as late as July 22, the House was hurried; the elections were to come off in the fall of 1852; returns were not adequate; California's fractions were in dispute, and the districting yet to be done. The apportionment under the eighth census (1860) was not made until March 4, 1862, and gave rise to great inconvenience; and under the ninth, (1870,) not until February 2, 1872. As to the last, many here will remember the harassing difficulties. There had to be a supplemental bill as to certain States which had to elect at large. The delay was partly because of the quarrels as to the fractions and as to the fourteenth amendment, and because the Legislatures had not been advised in time of the number and ratio. In Texas, the Legislature had adjourned sine die, and could not be convened. Besides, difficult local questions were raised as to the increase of population since the census in certain growing States. They claimed to have added to their ratio by the increased population, and that they should have, consequently, increased representation. This led to long, heated, and fruitless discussions, for the apportionment had to be made on decennial returns, and by no other statistics than those taken the tenth year.

MOST CONVENIENT TO APPORTION NOW.

Besides, unless we have prompt action this session there will be great inconvenience. Many of the States whose Legislatures meet this winter have biennial sessions. They do not meet again until the winter of 1883. This is after the time of the next congressional elections, which occur in the fall of 1882. Among these are twenty States, namely, Arkansas, Alabama, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, West Virginia. Their Legislatures are limited in their sessions to a certain time, from forty to ninety days. They represent in the present Congress one hundred and fifty-seven members or more than one-half. But as to the States whose Legislatures meet annually, as in New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, South Carolina, and Wisconsin, or which, like Iowa, meets in January, 1882, or like Kentucky, which meets in December, 1881, would it not be even for them the most convenient to be told in full time the number of Representatives to which they are entitled, so that the difficult task of redistricting be well done,—done with such heed and considerateness as to satisfy a jealous people?

Prior to 1850, the apportionment was not made until after the census. This produced, as might be supposed, much wrangling among the States and sections. And the longer the apportionment is postponed, the more difficult its adjustment. I append a table ("C") of these Legislatures and their date of meeting.

PARTY ADVANTAGE—IF ANY.

Is there any advantage to either party, by the apportionment this session, or its postponement? If there is, let us ignore it. The last census law was not conceived, passed, or executed in a partisan spirit; far otherwise, as its clauses testify. So far as I am concerned, the work shall not be crowned by the ugly effigy of party.

In New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, and a majority of the large States, the republicans will have the redistricting, if the apportionment is made this session. There are changes that may occur in these and other States—the "annual" as well as "biennial" States. These might inure to the benefit of the democratic party; so that if the matter were postponed until the next winter, some advantage might be gained by the democracy. No party feeling, therefore, can possibly influence the action of the committee in reporting this measure now, and urging its passage.

THE COST OF POSTPONEMENT.

It is a useless waste of money to postpone this legislation until the next Congress. It compels extra sessions of the State Legislatures in the twenty-two biennial States. A republican member from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARMER] thought an extra session would cost his State $400,000. If so, then the cost to the twenty-two States would not be less than $6,000,000. Why may not this be saved by provident action this session? The same urgency was made in other years, so as to avoid useless and heavy expense.

INACCURACY OF RETURNS.

If it be said, as a reason for postponement, that the returns from certain States are not correct, and that time is required for investigation, it may be answered that there is no foundation for the suspicion, and no reason, therefore, for the postponement.

EXAGGERATED ESTIMATES.

Even the most philosophic of our statisticians are apt to be disappointed in census returns. Their inflated estimates often collapse on the appearance of the veritable figures. Local enthusiasms and pride are then dampened and the best guesses "gang aft a-gley."

The President-elect, in a speech at Cleveland, with all his accomplishments and studies in the matter of census, mistook the relative growth of the North and South. A prescient statesman, Senator EDMUNDS, entranced by the "all-hail hereafter" of his party and country, in a speech at Burlington, on the 29th of October, 1880, gave a graphic and glowing picture of our future population and resources North as compared with the laggard South. With such imagery thrown in exaggerated proportions upon the canvas by the camera obscura of party, it is no wonder that the totals reported from the South were for a time discredited.

ERRORS IN RETURNS.

Of course we cannot pretend in census-taking to perfect,—only to proximate exactness; but as to population, where the work is simple and the expert is not needed, we may generally rely on the returns for all practical purposes. In 1870 there were many odd errors made in certain classes of statistics. There were reported 131 out of 151 colored children in one family as insane in a city in Massachusetts; infants died of delirium tremens, and old men of teething, and people were frozen to death South in August, and sunstruck North in January. These were some of the eccentricities under the law of 1850 by deputy marshals, but they do not apply to the enumeration of the people.

THE INEVITABLE.

Why do not our politicians prepare for the inevitable? Let them compute the past percentages for the relative strength of the sections! They will find that New England fell from 28 per cent. in 1790 to less than 10 per cent. in 1870; that the Middle States since 1820 fell from 32 per cent. to 23 per cent. in 1870, and that the Southern States only fell from 45 per cent. in 1800 to 34.8 per cent. in 1860; while the West and Southwest has bounded from 3 per cent. in 1810 to 31 per cent. in 1870. In 1880 the States along the Mississippi, west and east, have made astounding advancement. The general increase of the country is 30.07 per cent. We are coming to our ante-bellum growth. If this rate be continued, we will have sixty-five millions in 1890, eighty millions in 1900, and nearly one hundred millions in 1910. It may not be accurate to say that the Southern States have increased the most, though they seem to have done so, owing to the defective census of 1870. Probably they have. Whether true or not, these divisions of North and South, especially in the West, have lost their significance. In any event, the North continues to exceed the South, in Congress, the electoral college, Senate, and population. But the wonderful increase of five States west of the Mississippi is the salient feature of the census. In twenty years they have doubled their numbers, leaping from one-tenth of our whole people to one-fifth! These five States have increased 87.3 per cent. No State east of the Mississippi has attained to 50 per cent., while the Pacific States have gained 58.80 per cent. during the ten years.

This computation represents the percentage of increase, and will be especially useful in reconciling members and States to inevitable yet comparative losses in membership:

Southern States.
Alabama	.26
Georgia	.30
Louisiana	.29
Maryland	.19
Missouri	.26
South Carolina	.41
Texas	.94
West Virginia	.39
Florida	.42
Kentucky	.24
Arkansas	.65
Mississippi	.37
North Carolina	.30
Tennessee	.23
Virginia	.23
New England States.
Connecticut	.15
Massachusetts	.22
Rhode Island	.27
Maine	.03
New Hampshire	.09
Vermont	.005
Middle States.
New Jersey	.25
Pennsylvania	.22
New York	.16
Delaware	.17
Western States.
California	.54
Illinois	.21
Iowa	.36
Michigan	.38
Nebraska	2.68
Ohio	.19
Wisconsin	.25
Colorado	3.88
Indiana	.17
Kansas	1.73
Minnesota	.77
Nevada	.46
Oregon	.92

The orb of power may be departing from the east, but yet with its radiance full. It is the star of empire holding its western way for new conquests. Along with it arises above the horizon the Southern Cross, to add its symbolic cluster to the constellation.

IMPEDIMENTS AND FACILITIES UNDER THE LAW.

It must be remembered that our census does not aim to photograph the nation at once. England and France do this in one day—France in May, and England in April. These may be better months for the purpose of a census than June. Doubtless in some States the law as to the time of taking the census is inconvenient. People west move on April 1; at the East, on 1st of May; in the South the summer is not a good time; but the one answer is: the period of ten years ends 1st of June.

Besides, the new law was an improvement on that of 1850, which General Walker proved to be clumsy, antiquated, and barbarous. It was unfit for the work. The new agencies were found more efficient than was expected. Besides, the shorter time prevented much doubling of the names in the returns, owing to the locomotion of persons. The greater number of enumerators and the small area of the districts aided accuracy, removed doubt, and prevented negligence. In 1870 we had but sixty marshals, who had but 6,390 assistants, with an average district of 6,000 population, and no definite limit as to the time of taking. Under the new law we had one hundred and fifty districts and supervisors, and 31,265 enumerators and districts, with an average of 1,600 inhabitants each. The time was shortened for the returns, and the work went along with alacrity and energy. The most stringent instructions, as to courtesy, patience, copying, reporting, and returning, gave accurate results. When these results come to the Superintendent they are at once sifted. The totals are not verified until the crude reports out of which to make up the record of fifty-one millions are twice examined, and the names twice counted. It is then tabulated; and out of the chaos arises in columnar grandeur the superb consummation.

SOUTHERN GROWTH.

To be sure, parts of the South, like Texas, have grown by interstate and foreign immigration at the enormous rate of over 94 per cent. in ten years. It is easy to account for this advancement. Mineral, agricultural, and grazing interests have drawn people to Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, and Virginia, as well as to Texas, while skilled labor has found reward in new manufacturing centers, as at Richmond, Lynchburgh, and Atlanta. Better governments have supervened since 1870, and black labor has rivaled white, in its efforts to better its condition. A productive soil and balmy climate attract industry and trade, and as a consequence the Southwest has no rival in its progress except the Northwest.

Are we of the East and North to have no pride in these victories because won over western and southern soil and climate by the hand of toil? May we not raise our hymn of praise to that Providence which has lifted the fallen South from the slough of despondency? The vanity which swaggers over a fallen foe will soon be forever vanquished by patriotic love; so that we may say with Whittier:

> No victor's pride is ours,
> Who bend above our triumph won,
> Like David o'er his rebel son.

The victories in which our pride is aroused are those over wood land and lake, prairie and gulf, and mountain and river, achieved by the energy of our whole people, with their "varying intensity of settlement," over our vast area!

Sensible on other topics, some of our philosophers refuse to believe in the census of their own locality or section, unless its growth tallies with the dreams of their prophetic souls. Unless the returns disparage a rival section or party, they are incredulous of the most authentic results.

Notwithstanding the rapid and wild internal changes of the country, defying previous calculation, the sanguine patriot denounces the census as partisan or partial if it does not fill his extravagant vaticinations. Was it not so in 1870? Philadelphia then bragged of 800,000 or 850,000; the return was 657,277. A new census showed 674,022, or 2½ per cent. greater; a normal increase. A second census was taken in 1870, for New York. It developed 2 per cent. only increase since the first census. This was accounted for by the births between June, 1870, and January, 1871. Saint Louis complained of the present census. It was retaken and by the chief complainant. The result vindicated the office and was satisfactory to all.

SOUTH CAROLINA RETURNS.

Yet, in despite of all this care and labor, complaints were made against the accuracy of the population returns from certain States, mainly South Carolina. It was a partisan clamor against its own party. It was accounted for at once; not by the stupendous growth of the State, or portions of it, since 1870, but by the spurious and negligent returns of 1870. The census of 1870 was taken in the South by idle, if not corrupt, dependents on party patronage. What cared they for the good and progress of these States? Wherever they could record names—at camp-meetings, musters, or political meetings—they did so in their illiterate way, and drew their pay.

If there were no general reasons for this marvelous southern growth, we cannot resist the testimony of republican officials, thrice verified, as to the present condition of South Carolina.

Each time of the retaking of this census the normal gains appeared, giving proof of carelessness, if not something worse, in 1870, and of heedfulness in 1880 which is not merely irreproachable, but commendable—fit to fix the highest prerogative of governmental representation!

What need, therefore, of postponing the apportionment to verify what is already so completely confirmed?

Mr. LOWE. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him whether the committee took into consideration the provisions of the fourteenth amendment in fixing the basis of representation?

Mr. COX. The committee may not have fully considered that; but I will give the gentleman from Alabama the full statement on that point as I understand it. Under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, with which the House is familiar, a law was passed in 1870 which re-enacted the provision of the Constitution which declared that—

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

The committee did not consider themselves bound to take that question into consideration. It was not taken into consideration in 1870, for the reason, first, that there were no authentic data on which the committee could base any deduction. This will appear if my friend will be patient. Secondly, the intent of that second section never was to cut off men from being counted because of illiteracy, of failure to register, insanity, idiocy, &c. This will appear also if my friend will be patient with my slow process.

Mr. LOWE. Does the gentleman express his own opinion or the opinion of the committee?

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Alabama will not anticipate me, I am sure that I shall meet every question legitimately arising in connection with this bill.

Mr. LOWE. I am sure the gentleman can answer any question I can possibly propound; but I wanted to know in this connection whether the opinion he expresses as to the construction of the fourteenth amendment is his own opinion merely or the opinion of the committee.

Mr. COX. Well, sir, I will come right to the logic of this matter. I have here the speech of Hon. Michael C. Kerr, formerly the Speaker of this House, in which he takes the ground that the second section of the fourteenth amendment was never intended to apply except to negro suffrage. I am inclined to agree with it just now. He held that it applied only in cases where there is some disqualification on account of race or color or nationality—something adhering to the person—not any disqualification which may be overcome by the voter, as by paying a capitation tax in Pennsylvania, or by learning to read the Constitution as in Massachusetts. A mere disqualification of that kind, which may be overcome by the voter, does not constitute a ground for a deduction of representative population. I hold, sir, representation very high.

Now I will ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. Will he undertake to say that Alabama should lose in the allotment of representation a certain portion of her population because she provides that idiots and insane persons should not be suffragans?

Mr. LOWE. Such persons are non compos mentis, and consequently have no right of suffrage. I will answer the gentleman in the terms of the fourteenth amendment, that "if the right to vote is denied or in any way abridged except for crime, the basis of representation shall be reduced in proportion."

Mr. COX. I am familiar with that provision; the gentleman need not read it.

Mr. LOWE. The language is so plain that it needs no construction.

Mr. COX. Now I take my friend on his own statement. If he says that where the right of suffrage is abridged on account of insanity or lunacy, as in the State of Alabama, there is no reduction, then, by parity of reasoning, for illiteracy as in Massachusetts or non-registry as in New York, or as in Pennsylvania for non-payment of a capitation tax, the same will happen. Where can he stop? When we came to consider this matter in 1870 and 1871, we found, as General Garfield said, from seventy to eighty different kinds of disqualification. Who is to judge as to these disqualifications? Who will make the discriminations? Must Pennsylvania, which forbids all voting except on payment of a tax, be forever unrepresented?

REDUCTION UNDER THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

An objection may be raised to the present bill for apportionment. Gentlemen may be inclined to raise a party or sectional issue out of article 14 of the amendments, and seek to postpone this measure for further inquiry, on the ground that suffrage has been abridged in the Southern States by law or by fraud and intimidation. While the same may be urged against certain northern communities, where laws abridge suffrage and where "mill hands" and others may have been unduly influenced, the answer to such an objection to present action is complete. In fact, I am not sure but the House gave it in their vote on the Massachusetts election case the other day. It may require an elucidation of the principle and practice under our Constitution.

ORIGINAL PLAN—THREE-FIFTHS.

The plan adopted by the framers of the Constitution was the result of a compromise. It regarded the slave as two-fifths property and three-fifths person. The South insisted then on his being all person. The North said, "No, he is a chattel like a horse." After much contention and some trading as to other matters, the three-fifths plan obtained and continued until the abolition of slavery. It disregards all idea of representation based on property, or on voting or on a mixed basis, or anything else than human nature. Whether that nature be of any sex, age or race, color or condition,—the blind, crazy, young, deaf, dumb or colored,—the principle remains. It is the broad base of our human kind, in all its strength and weakness, which furnishes the foundation for our political pyramid. When civil war came, and riddled slavery with the bullet till it died, and the two-fifths property disappeared beneath its ensanguined flood, the principle of representation remained, and its application was enlarged. The South received an accession of representatives as a consequence of the enlargement of each one of her slaves. But this question I discussed fully in 1871. I ask leave to append my remarks at that time to this speech. They are marked "E," (Globe, second session Forty-second Congress, part 1, page 108.)

ATTEMPTED CHANGE IN REPRESENTATION.

Let me call attention to article 14 of the amendments of the Constitution, which provides as follows:

> SEC. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. * * *
>
> SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

This amendment became a part of the organic law in 1868, and under its provisions, a new apportionment of Representatives was made upon the basis of the census of 1870.

In this act of apportionment (act of February 2, 1872, chap. 11, Stat. at Large, vol. 17, p. 29) it was provided:

> SEC. 6. That should any State, after the passage of this act, deny or abridge the right of any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years and citizens of the United States, to vote at any election named in the amendments to the Constitution, article 14, section 2, except for participation in the rebellion or other crime, the number of Representatives apportioned in this act to such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall have to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

This provision of the statute added little or nothing to the Constitution, as it provided no means to effectuate it.

Before I proceed to ascertain the effect of this attempted change in representation, let me repeat that emancipation added two-fifths to the representation of the slave population. This was a consequence of the thirteenth amendment, without the fourteenth amendment. The basis, therefore, (not speaking of "Indians not taxed,") was the whole population.

VOTERS AS A BASIS—DEBATE AND RESULT.

As, however, certain States had disfranchised the rebels, as in Missouri for instance, where one-half of the voters were disfranchised, and as negro suffrage had not been adopted in many Southern States, it first occurred to the dominant party, in the winter of 1865–'66, to re-establish representation on the basis of voters.

This was the policy of President Johnson. It was introduced into the House by General Schenck. It was the egg out of which came the second section of the fourteenth amendment, and from which so much confusion has grown. It is surprising that with such an advocacy as "voters" had, as a basis, it did not succeed. Such statesmen as Sherman, Sumner, Schenck, Professor Lieber, and others, were its champions; but President Johnson favored it, and it was lost.

When the attempt was made to change the grand idea of the whole population as our basis, and substitute therefor the suffragans, as fixed by the variant will of the States, the spirit of republicanism revolted. Representative BLAINE led the revolt. Why? Because the females of New England, being non-voters, exceeded the males West and South who were voters. This was local reasoning. It was not of a high order of patriotism or philosophy, but it won. Others revolted because aliens, not naturalized, as in New York and elsewhere, would not be counted and so much representation would be lost to the East and West. Still others revolted because certain Southern States had disfranchised the rebel, as Maryland, and had not enfranchised the negro; and they desired a penalty to compel the latter, in which "rebellion and crime" were excepted. But sturdy Thaddeus Stevens stuck to the principle that population, not property; people, not voters—the entire people—should be counted; only this, that he would punish by the loss of representation wherever the negro was denied or abridged his suffrage. Even this idea seems to have been enlarged verbally, in the final amendment, so as to give representation as a premium to liberality in granting the largest suffrage possible. When the matter was mooted in the Senate it took the form of an amendment offered by Senator Clark founding representation on electors. On that occasion Senator ANTHONY was somewhat confused, as appears by his remark on the 9th of March, 1866. (Globe, page 1284.)

> The State of Maryland, the State of Tennessee, and some other States, have disfranchised all their rebel voters, all those persons who have been engaged in the rebellion, or in any way have given aid or comfort to the rebellion. Now, if this amendment is passed, those States, having disfranchised about one-half their voters, will be reduced to one-half their present number of representatives. It will be an encouragemnt for those States to restore the franchise to the rebels, and it will be a discouragement to other States to follow the very good example which they have set.

He was answered that the contingency of restoring voting to rebels was too remote. It would be postponed at least until the census of 1870–'71. It was answered further by Senator Conness who said "that it presents as strong an inducement for those States (Maryland, Missouri, and Tennessee) which have deprived the colored man of the right to vote to extend the franchise to him, and thus gain in their basis of representation."

It was not much debated until formally presented on the 31st of January, 1866, as an amendment to the proposition of the Reconstruction Committee. General Schenck contended that his suffrage basis would "leave no room for discussion, wrangling, difficulty, or difference" when the apportionment was called for. As the elector was to be fixed by the State, and Congress was to apportion on that basis, the matter seemed simple to him. He forgot that there was a Charybdis to his Scylla. Who was to find out the legal voters under the law, and their number? What judge? So that whichever way these statesmen turned there was trouble; for they were leaving the principle of the Constitution, which is, the whole people as a basis. Mr. Stevens bitterly responded to General Schenck. "If a State," said he, "abuses the elective franchise and takes it from those who are the only loyal people there, the Constitution (as he would amend it) says, by way of penalty, 'You shall remain a shriveled and dried-up nonentity.'" He proceeded to argue that if the South excluded colored people they would lose thirty-five members. If they did not, they will have 83 votes. Take the right to disfranchise away from them and they will have only from 45 to 48 votes, all told, in this Hall.

The motive of the proposition was more tersely stated by Mr. Stevens, at another time, in the following:

> The effect of this provision will be either to compel the States to grant universal suffrage or so to shear them of their power as to keep them forever in a hopeless minority in the National Government, both legislative and executive.

As it passed the House, (page 538, Globe,) the proviso was:

> That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State, on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race and color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

This could have reference only to Chinese and Africans. It made a whole race pay the penalty for the exclusion of one of its number. But this did not become the law. After various amendments and discussions in the Senate and House, it took its present form, and passed the Senate on June 8, 1866, and the House on June 13, 1866. (Globe, first session, Thirty-ninth Congress, page 3149.) It was submitted to the States and became a part of the Constitution.

But, Mr. Speaker, it has never had a practical application. All the prophecies of the statesmen of that day have failed. The freedmen are voters by law in their States, and by the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution. They are counted in the representation, and cannot by any census or return be counted out. The Constitution must be amended, if they are to be excluded from representation or voting.

WHAT IS DENIAL AND ABRIDGMENT, AND BY WHOM?

The first question which arises under this second section of the fourteenth amendment is, What is a denial or abridgment of the right to vote as contemplated? Must it be by law or by individuals? What constitutes a denial or abridgment if otherwise than by law? What is the amount of private force and intimidation, or the kind of device or fraud which constitutes a denial or abridgment? The last act of apportionment was passed on the 2d of February, 1872. It did not pretend to settle this or anything else as to this fourteenth amendment. It re-enacted the clause of the Constitution, and fixed the power which must deny or abridge.

It says "should any State" deny or abridge. It does not say person or community or other organism; so that, in so far as any interpretation may be drawn from the law of 1872, the only constraint on suffrage must be from the State and by legal enactment. No practical application has been made of the constitutional clause or the law. It has been hitherto a dead letter. Nor is it possible now, with any known data ascertainable with reasonable accuracy, to apply either the Constitution or the law to the apportionment. In the absence of any expression in the Constitution as to what is denial or abridgment and through and by whom it must occur, we can but guess at its meaning, or take the interpretation given by the law of 1872. The right of voting remains even if individual wrong-doing impede its exercise. The act of an individual cannot set aside, shorten, or modify the legal right. If the right remain and its exercise be obstructed the remedy and penalty are by law, civil and criminal. The remedy is found in State and Federal statutes and at common law.

EFFECT OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In 1870 the attempt was made to ascertain what would be the effect of the constitutional amendments upon the representative population of the several States. Returns were made by the governors of States to the Census Committee. They showed the cause of disqualification in various States. A section was incorporated in the bill at that time empowering the Secretary of the Interior to make the deductions under the fourteenth amendment, but the bill failed to become a law. No provision was made for the deduction.

GENERAL GARFIELD'S PERPLEXITY.

The debate which took place at that time on this topic is instructive, especially as the republican leader of the House (General Garfield) endeavored, but in vain, to meet the difficulty. (Globe, December, 1869, page 37 et seq.) He had charge of the bill, and tried to readjust the schedule of population so as to conform to the fourteenth amendment.

> It is a curious fact—
>
> Said he—
>
> perhaps not new to every gentleman in this House, though it certainly was to me, that the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution change the representative basis of the National Legislature in a way that no one, so far as I remember, supposed it would when that amendment was before Congress.

He further said:

> Everybody knew, of course, that there was a change, but none seemed to be aware how radical and sweeping that change was. I observe my friend from New York [Mr. COX] is disposed to understand the word "radical" in a more literal sense than I used it. I admit that he is entitled to that view. The fourteenth amendment, so far as it related to suffrage, was generally understood as referring exclusively to the denial of the right to vote on account of race or color. But the language of the Constitution is much broader. It is in substance that wherever the right to vote is denied or abridged in any State, not merely on account of race or color, but for any other reason than rebellion or crime, in that State the basis of representation shall be reduced proportionately. The committee found it necessary, in view of that provision, to inquire what were the other grounds in the several States on which the right to vote was abridged or denied except for rebellion or crime.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> Without going into the matter more minutely, I will say in general that there are seventy or eighty grounds on which men are excluded from the right to vote under the laws of the different States besides rebellion or crime. How far those different causes will operate to reduce the basis of representation is a grave question.

In concluding his remarks General Garfield confessed the difficulty of arranging any plan or schedule to carry out the sweeping clauses of the fourteenth amendment. The schedule which he proposed, but which never passed, as to male citizens over twenty-one, did not help. Where any one is denied or abridged suffrage, who has or can ascertain it?

WHO DECIDES ON THE DISQUALIFICATIONS.

It will not do to allow the Superintendent of the Census or the Secretary of the Interior, or their subordinates, enumerators, or others, to decide who are to be deducted. That encroaches upon our duty. Their duty is not judicial, only ministerial. Congress, on a report of authentic facts, may decide it, if they believe that the tenor and intent of the fourteenth amendment demands it.

NUMBER OF DISQUALIFICATIONS.

"There are seventy or eighty grounds of exclusion," says General Garfield. Now I say that it was never intended by the framers of the fourteenth amendment to do more than carry out what was afterward expressed in the fifteenth, viz, "that the rights of citizens of the United States shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." This I affirm and will prove. The second section of the fourteenth amendment was a penalty and command for universal suffrage. It meant that the representative quality of the negro should not exist except it go hand in hand with his voting quality.

Among the many disqualifications from voting gathered from the Constitution and laws of the States, in addition to rebellion or crime, are the following:

1, Those who have inflicted cruel or unusual punishment in the "rebellion," or violated the rules of civilized warfare; 2, embezzlers of public funds, or those guilty of malfeasance in office; 3, idiots and insane; 4, United States soldiers, sailors, and marines; 5, those disqualified in States from which they came; 6, duelling, or challenging, or aiding; 7, test oaths; 8, reading; 9, tax-paying—county and other tax; 10, pauperism; 11, persons under guardianship; 12, not presenting certificates of naturalization, if naturalized; 13, betting on elections; 14, education; 15, time of residence; 16, non-registered persons; 17, locality; 18, capitation or poll-tax; 19, dishonorable discharge from United States service; 20, defrauding United States or State; 21, students; 22, read English, and write his name; 23, property qualification; 24, imprisonment; 25, Chinaman; 26, rental; 27, nativity; 28, certain Indians "taxed;" 29, persons living on United States lands ceded by State; 30, read an article in Constitution, &c.; 31, not good moral character; 32, not of quiet and peaceful behavior; 33, not citizens ten days before the election.

For a more recent catalogue of these alleged abridgments, I refer you to the debate on the Massachusetts case. The very disputation there as to the tenor and effect of the fourteenth amendment shows how useless it is to try to extract any authentic facts bearing on this question.

Some of these disqualifications may have been removed since their collation ten years ago, and since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment; but most of them remain. Doubtless others have been added. So that in a hurried glance, and without going into the divisions under each head, some thirty-odd cases seem to be within the strict category of the fourteenth amendment, whether intended or not.

INTENT OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

If we take the intent of those who passed and adopted the fourteenth amendment, it is clear that they meant it only as a punitive or forceful mode of compelling negro suffrage, which was denied in the South when the amendment was declared ratified on the 16th of June, 1866. No one understood that it meant to reduce representation, because States had made regulations concerning the exercise of the right of voting, such as previous residence, registration, or taxation which do not absolutely deny or abridge voting. It was only understood to apply to denial or abridgment of a class which had individual and fixed peculiarities inherent in the person, such as race, color, or nationality. That this was the understanding of Congress is apparent, when we recall that new constitutions, as in Georgia, which required registration and a poll tax before voting, were approved by Congress after this fourteenth amendment was a part of the Constitution. Why, if this be not so, Pennsylvania, which requires a poll tax should have no representation; for the right to vote of every voter in the State is thus abridged. If this be not so, then a State is to be punished for not allowing crazy people to vote.

In debating upon the list of the disfranchised in 1872, Ohio was put down as having some twenty-five hundred disqualified. "Who are they?" it was asked. Senator Sherman replied, "They must be lunatics and insane." That was before Ohio had given so much grace and glory to the Republic.

If this be not the true rendering of the meaning of the fourteenth amendment, then a mode by which the voter comes into the exercise of his right, as by learning to read and write, or by registration, or by the acquisition of property, is a denial of the right itself instead of a step toward its enjoyment! If this view be correct, then we are authorized to adopt the opinion of Mr. Speaker Kerr, who contended that any attempts of this kind to settle representation by deducting all the disqualified would prove abortive. He believed that no discrimination, except as to the denial of negro suffrage, should be made. Congress finally, in 1872, acted upon this belief, or its necessity was obviated, by increasing the number of members, and thus avoiding the difficult problem of the fourteenth amendment.

CONTEMPORARY OPINION.

On the 16th of December, 1869, (Globe, second session Forty-first Congress, page 181,) in speaking on his bill just before its passage by the House, General Garfield again declared that when the fourteenth amendment was adopted the exclusion applied only to colored people who were denied the ballot by the laws of their State. But as the language was broader and covered all grounds of exclusion, he felt the embarrassment. He specified nine general classes, with various subdivisions, and specified the number of States where the exclusion existed. Sixteen States then excluded for color, thirty-six as to residence in the State, and thirty-seven as to local residence, eight as to taxes and property, twenty-four as to pauperism, idiocy, and insanity, and so on. I send to the Clerk the statement to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

	States.
1. On account of race or color	16
2. On account of residence on lands of the United States	2
On account of residence less than required time in the United States	2
On account of residence in State less than required time, (six different specifications)	36
On account of residence in county, city, town, district, &c., (eighteen different specifications)	37
3. Wanting property qualifications, or non-payment of taxes, (eight specifications)	8
4. Wanting literary qualifications, (two specifications)	2
5. On account of character or behavior, (two specifications)	2
6. On account of services in Army or Navy	2
7. On account of pauperism, idiocy, and insanity, (seven specifications)	24
8. Requiring certain oaths as preliminary to voting, (two specifications)	5
9. Other causes of exclusion, (two specifications)	2

Mr. COX. It was meekly proposed to get information from the census as to these citizens thus excluded from the suffrage. I need not again remind the House how it failed. The statesmen who passed the fourteenth amendment utterly ignored it. They seemed satisfied with its sequence, the fifteenth amendment.

A Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] in discussing this matter on the 7th of February, 1870, (page 1079,) held that the fractional enumeration of the slaves was superseded by the fourteenth amendment. So Mr. Speaker Kerr held. In their judgment the fifteenth amendment obliterated the last distinction as to color in representation. Both, therefore, disfavored the proposition to reduce the representative population by counting out any excluded persons. The Senate agreed to this. An Ohio member who was foremost in leading the House on these new amendments (Mr. Bingham) strenuously contended that no matter if the discrimination existed when the census was taken, if thereafter the State redressed the wrong no reduction should take place. He regarded color and race as the only objective points of the fourteenth amendment, and these were no longer obstacles to a full representation of all the people.

On the 14th of December, 1869, General Garfield, after showing that in 1860 there were in fourteen States 726,635 people to whom the right of suffrage was denied by reason of color or race, and that the number must have increased since 1860, insisted that the representative basis of these fourteen States would have been proportionately reduced by the fourteenth amendment. But he held that if the fifteenth amendment forbidding the denial or abridgment of the rights of citizens "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude" should be adopted, (as it was afterward,) there would be no such reduction. In view of the difficulty then, he struck out of his census bill all that referred to representation, deferring it to another time, which never came.

PLANS IN 1871-'72.

When the apportionment was considered in the last session of the Forty-second Congress, on the 6th of December, 1871, two plans were offered. One was the old plan of fixing arbitrarily upon the ratio and dividing the population of each State by that number, so as to obtain the number of members for each State. This cut off Missouri and Illinois from one member each, although their fraction was above the moiety of the ratio and larger than that of other States, which obtained another member by that plan. The other plan was the one which our committee adopts. It divides the whole number of the population by the number of members, and thus fixes the ratio, and then following out the logic of figures by dividing that ratio into the population of each State, obtains the number of members for each State The fractions which were largest receive the additional member until the whole number of members fixed upon was complete.

When the debate occurred on fixing the ratio and number of members in December, 1871, this same fourteenth amendment was a lion in the path. Again General Garfield reiterated the facts as to exclusion from suffrage. He again failed to find any proper calculations under the amendment in the report of the Census Office or in the pending bills. He said that he did not know how large was the sum to be subtracted in any State; that the facts were difficult to ascertain, and he insisted very timidly on further information before further action.

A BLADE WITH TWO EDGES.

Finally, on the 12th of December, 1871, (Globe, 83,) a table was presented from the Census Office showing reductions from the total populations of each State, according to the proportion of their disfranchised persons. This, on a basis of two hundred and eighty members, left 2,329,983 of fractions. Much complaint was made of this statement and its effect, as in some States, like Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Wisconsin, Virginia, and Texas, owing to alienage and other disqualifications, there were large reductions from the ratio. The table did not particularize the separate causes of disqualification, and I demonstrated in that debate, from that table, that if the fourteenth amendment was to be executed Rhode Island and Ohio were entitled to one member less each, and that Massachusetts came within one thousand of losing one, if moiety was the rule and two hundred and eighty the number. Mr. Garfield admitted that I was justified in my criticism, (Globe, 82,) and bemoaned again the unfortunate language of the fourteenth amendment. He repeated:

> I do not believe that those who put it into the Constitution saw at the time the full scope and extent of its meaning. As a matter of history it was intended to declare simply that where suffrage was denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color or previous condition of servitude, representation should be diminished in the proportion of such denial and abridgment. And that was a wise and a just proposition. But I believe, as a matter of historical fact, that when the article was pending in Congress some one suggested, in the spirit of a similar criticism made by Madison in the constitutional convention, that the word "servitude" or "slavery" ought not to be named in the Constitution as existing or as exercising any influence in the suffrage; and hence this negative form was adopted to avoid the use of an unpleasant word. But in adopting the negative form, with a view to the exclusion of only two classes, they did, as a matter of fact, exclude many classes, who were manifestly not in the mind of the authors of the amendment at the time. Thus they made the back of the blade cut as sharp as the edge itself. The whole case is a striking illustration of the danger of attempting to reach an object indirectly where there was a direct road which led to the same end.

As both the back and edge of the blade were made sharp beyond any intent, no one has had the temerity to insist on the practical application of the blade, which cuts north, south, east, and west. Still he insisted, feebly, that the deductions should somehow be made;

but, as the Constitution did not execute itself, and as the Senate had refused to make any law to collect the needed data, and as the Interior Department, after having made some little effort, gave an unsatisfactory and indefinite result, the matter subsided into the limbo of departed Utopias.

Upon so important a matter as the popular foundation of our legislature, and with the quick jealousy of representatives as to local interests, Congress in a searching debate unraveled as best it could the tangled skein; but when it was unraveled the labor and material were found not worth the pains. One difficulty arose after another until there was nothing left but a mangled or dead fourteenth amendment.

COMPLICATIONS FROM THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Aside from the fourteenth amendment, complications grew out of the question whether Nevada with 42,491 population, Delaware with 125,015, and Oregon with 90,923, should be deducted from the whole population, out of which the ratio is made, and which is the proper divisor to ascertain the number of members for each State. Each of these States being entitled to one member, irrespective of its population, must not the dividend be reduced by their population and the divisor reduced by the number of these little States? This was settled more easily than the fourteenth-amendment imbroglio.

In the debate which occurred in the House on the 10th of May, 1866, another difficulty appeared in an inquiry made by you, Mr. Speaker, to which no answer was vouchsafed. This second section of Article XIV, in your opinion, was ambiguous, and you asked this question:

What does this amendment mean? Does it mean that those males over twenty-one years not allowed to vote shall not be counted in the basis of representation? If so, why not say so in terms; but if it means, as it may, that the diminution of representation is to be in the proportion they bear to the voters, it may deny all or greatly abridge representation. Suppose, for instance, a State with 100,000 voters, and a similar number excluded; if proportions are considered, this State would seem to have no Representative.

I cannot find that this question was answered; and the second section continued to present this arithmetical problem: that the basis of representation shall be reduced in the proportion which the male inhabitants and citizens of twenty-one years of age who are excluded shall bear to the whole number of those twenty-one years of age in such State. When the matter came up for practical action in 1871–'72 I endeavored to make this plain by an illustration, which showed the tangle into which representation was drawn by departing from the principle of the Constitution and by making a mixed basis of suffrage and population.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT OVERBOARD.

So great were these complications that at last it was agreed to throw overboard the fourteenth amendment. The ratio was fixed without heeding it, at 131,425; which, by allowing an additional Representative to each State that had a fraction greater than a moiety of the ratio, made the House consist of two hundred and ninety members. Then a supplemental bill came in on the 8th of May, 1872. It gave to two States a member each, for a fraction less than a moiety, namely, New Hampshire 55,450, and Florida 56,323. Other States, Indiana, Louisiana, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, New York, and Alabama, had the fraction above the moiety, and altogether made up two hundred and ninety-two, to which Colorado added one more, to make our present number two hundred and ninety-three.

But the greatest difficulty, insuperable to the execution of the fourteenth amendment, is the various grounds of exclusion. Doubtless, counting all the subdivisions, the estimate of General Garfield of seventy or eighty grounds of exclusion, beside rebellion and crime, will be found to be correct. Since no State by law excludes or abridges any one from suffrage now on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and since the facts for the reduction are not forthcoming, is it possible for Congress to execute this amendment? Not according to its letter. According to its spirit and intent it has no binding force; it operates on nothing.

THE CASE OF RHODE ISLAND.

If there be any case where disqualification should reduce the ratio it is the case of Rhode Island. It is a most flagrant case of disfranchisement. A report has been made upon it (No. 572, Senate report, Forty-sixth Congress, second session) by Senator WALLACE.

Under the constitution of that State naturalized citizens, who are equal under all laws with native-born, must possess a qualification not required of native-born citizens. This is an odious real-estate disqualification, and is altogether less republican than the disfranchising laws of Massachusetts, which concern illiteracy. The number thus deprived of suffrage is variously reckoned. Dr. Snow, the Superintendent of Census, a competent judge, estimates the disfranchised at from three thousand to five thousand. "It is possible," says the report, "that from twenty thousand to twenty-five thousand foreign-born citizens of Rhode Island might be qualified to vote if naturalized;" the number reported in the Rhode Island census of 1875 as qualified being only 5,364. Others estimate the disfranchised as not less than ten thousand to fifteen thousand.

In Rhode Island the vote for President and Congressmen, as compared with other thickly populated States, is significant. The averages in 1878 are nearly one-half those of Vermont, and about a third of those of Maine, Connecticut, and New Hampshire, and more than half of those of Massachusetts. The vote in 1878 of Rhode Island per district, average, was 9.198; of Massachusetts, 22.707; Vermont, 16.358; Maine, 25.749; Connecticut, 26.089; and New Hampshire, 25.257. Not only does this denial and proscription vitiate the political life of the State, giving a low tone to its morality, but it goes further. It is a scandal to republican government. The population of Rhode Island, for the year ending June 1, 1880, is 276,528; for the year ending June 1, 1870, it was 217,353. The quota for the past decade was 131,425. Deducting 9.96 per cent. as the disqualified people of Rhode Island, then, the representative population would have been reduced to 190,000. Rhode Island would have lost one representative in Congress, and consequently one in the electoral college; and one vote would have decided the Presidency in 1876.

This is the substance of Senator WALLACE'S report. He justly inveighs against this discrimination against the foreign-born. He recognized the legal difficulties in construing the fourteenth amendment; but he found more difficulty in the absence of facts which might serve as an intelligent basis of legislation. The committee therefore recommended the passage of a bill referring both law and facts to the Superintendent of the Census. This officer was to construe the amendment and count up the citizens who were abridged and denied in their suffrage.

This bill never passed. No steps were ordered to ascertain the facts. We are utterly helpless, because of the lack of this knowledge, even if we should construe the amendment as reducing the basis.

The minority of that committee, through Senator BLAIR, made a counter-report. It held that Congress had no power whatever under that amendment to reduce the basis of representation.

STATE CONTROL OVER SUFFRAGE.

The Senator held that the State, in its discretion, could fix such conditions upon voting as the property-ownership of aliens, and that such a condition was no worse than the registry and tax conditions in other States. After quoting from the majority report, to show that it held that the States were sovereign over suffrage, the minority refer to the Report on Frauds, &c., in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, page 8, where the majority, speaking of alleged wrongs brought to the attention of the committee in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, say:

Wrongs upon the ballot or interference with the right of suffrage or with the modes of qualifications of the voter, are questions which are to be corrected and controlled by the States, and not by the Federal Government. Suffrage is under the control of the States, and not of the Federal Government. The latter has no voters of its own creation; it cannot define who are voters; it cannot qualify voters, nor can it protect voters from wrong by inflicting punishment upon those who compel them to improperly exercise their right of suffrage. It may punish for crimes committed in regard to the manner of voting, but an offense against the right itself must be punished under State law, and not by Federal statute.

See, also, pages 12 and 13 of their report above upon alleged discrimination in Rhode Island.

The whole question is one of the right and power of the State to regulate the rule of suffrage as it affects presidential electors and members of Congress. This power and right under the Constitution of the United States is with the States, and not under the control of Congress. The Federal system bases its very existence upon the rights of the States to regulate the rule of suffrage.

The existence of the Federal Government depends upon the existence of the State governments. Without their existence in their entirety it absolutely falls into chaos. It cannot continue itself for an hour. There are three great parts of the Federal Government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. The legislative has two branches—the House and the Senate. There can be no House of Representatives of the United States after the State governments have ended. The governments of the States must exist or the popular branch of Congress fails to exist. * * * We cannot and dare not entertain the thought suggested by those who suffer in Rhode Island. Their remedy lies in another field.

The doctrine of the majority—

Says this minority, (in which I cordially concur)—

is thus seen clearly to be that the States have the absolute right to deny or abridge the suffrage. The majority then stand upon this position, namely, that the States are supreme and absolute in their control of the right of suffrage. They, perhaps, ought not to destroy it; but if they do, there is no remedy. The fifteenth amendment confers no power over the right generally. It only forbids discrimination by reason of race, &c., and all conceivable limitations, and even final destruction, may be imposed upon the exercise of this right, provided that there is no discrimination by reason of race, color, or previous servitude. The outrage, if partial, may be prevented. If it reaches all citizens alike, even though absolutely destructive, it is lawful and remediless, so far as the National Government is concerned.

Whatever, Mr. Speaker, may be our duty in guaranteeing to each State a republican form and displacing thereby an oligarchical form of government, under article 4, section 4, of the Constitution, I should be reluctant, on the grounds stated, to interfere with the State right to regulate suffrage. Each State should provide the qualifications of is own voters, subject to the Constitution; but where naturalization supervenes and confers the right of citizenship, there is no right in the State to discriminate between one class and another class of citizens.

The variety of qualifications and abridgments of suffrage in the States would, however, render the work of reducing representation interminable and complicated. In other States than Rhode Island qualifications and denials of suffrage are applied equally to native and foreign, black and white. It is reserved to Rhode Island, in effect, to nullify the naturalization laws of the United States, leaving many of our best white inhabitants, who pay their taxes and are liable to military duty, and who had abjured allegiance to the land of their birth, without a country. The remedy, however, is not in reducing her representation.

MASSACHUSETTS' CASE.

The report of the minority in the Massachusetts election case claimed that of the 376,332 citizens of the United States 136,859 were disfranchised from other causes than criminality, idiocy, and insanity, the causes being illiteracy and failure to pay tax and pauperism. This is indeed startling, if true. It would be more so if the other disfranchised, idiots, &c., were added, as by parity of reasoning they should be. Leaving out those above excepted and adding aliens, it was claimed that 105,109 citizens had their immunities abridged and could not vote. This, it was held, would reduce the Massachusetts representation in Congress from eleven to eight, and in the electoral college. This holding was stoutly denied, and the right of Massachusetts is cogently stated and defended in the speeches of the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Mr. FIELD and Mr. LORING.] It is the best doctrine as to suffrage; for it is the right of the State to regulate her own suffrage, and it was roundly asserted.

RECENT ACTION AS TO THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

During the last Congress there was some action taken in regard to the census of naturalized citizens. By the seventeenth section of the law of March 3, 1879, in schedule No. 1, there was an inquiry required as "to all foreign-born, whether alien or naturalized persons." This was inserted as an addition to the schedule of the law of 1850. The Senate sent us a bill proposing its repeal. After much debate on the 1st of April, 1880, (RECORD, volume 10, pages 20-32,) in which my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] took a leading part, and notwithstanding a careful letter from General Walker against its retention, the House refused to strike out. I opposed striking out, and the House agreed to let it remain for a conference. The animus of the movement to strike out was apparent from the remarks of my friend from Rhode Island. He evidently thought that the inquiry was intended to elicit facts, so as to reduce the number of Rhode Island's Representatives by reason of her denial of the suffrage to naturalized persons lacking $134 real property. He was right in his surmise, and he has gained his point.

The communication read to the House from General Walker, (second session, Forty-sixth Congress, page 2033,) held that the census was not a competent agency for prosecuting an inquiry as to naturalized persons. He gave his reasons: First, that the inquiry was generally made of women by the enumerators, and they could not decide as to the record or process of naturalization. Second, mere voting was no test, as many voted who were not finally naturalized. On the whole, the Superintendent of the Census could not insure any result worth having by the inquiry. If not as to this inquiry as to naturalization, how could he expect answers as to the seventy or eighty kinds of disqualification? Our courts have differed on these points. Even if you should send around your best judges they would not agree as to what was a denial or abridgment of suffrage under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution; and, a fortiori, how could you expect it of officers unfamiliar with such nice legal questions? Certainly you should raise their pay and the standard of selection if this should be required of the ordinary enumerator.

However, when the conferees met on the Senate bill of last session the question was still open. I presented it to them. It was considered, and, on the whole, it was decided to be impracticable to execute the fourteenth amendment as it was interpreted. This was the opinion of northern and southern Senators. The House conferees acquiesced. The gentleman from Rhode Island was gratified. No account was to be taken of the amendment. Its inhibition against enumerating those who were denied suffrage was treated as null; and so it has remained.

More than that; the Senate absolutely denied to Senator WALLACE the enactment of his bill to enumerate the class in Rhode Island which was disfranchised.

REPRESENTATION OF THE WHOLE PEOPLE.

Why should we be so eager to apply penalties to States, so as to compel a certain kind of suffrage? Why, by construction, refine away the principle of representation? Is it not a more comprehensive principle than that which underlies voting? It includes voting. Voting concerns one in five; representation concerns five out of five—all. In representation there is no sex, color, or condition; no division of the black into fractions, the unrepresented part, two-fifths, being property, and the remainder represented as persons. Is it not democratic and republican—now that the object of the amendment, colored suffrage, is attained as well in the States as by the fifteenth amendment—to strengthen, by widening and cementing the foundation of our Federal structure?

Let it be remembered that we are not here as the exponents of suffrage, the servitors of wealth, or the choice of education. We do not sit here for the few nor for the many. We are for all. All—this is the source of our system. This is our best credential. It requires no tabulation of votes or great seal. It is our pride that before any other nation we made it a part of our fundamental law, that the census of all should be taken, and taken as the fons et origo, the essence and genius of our polity.

In the thirty-ninth number of the Federalist, Mr. Madison placed this polity in its lofty light. He declared that it was essential to such a government as ours, that it be derived from the great body of the society, not from an inconsiderable portion or a favored class. The whole number of the people was his standard of representation. Every tradition, utterance, and principle of our early statesmen condemn the sophism that a non-voting population have no interests to be represented, and that female and minor, idiot, insane, and poor are not entitled to protection; and that aliens, ay, and rebels, too, who are not voters, do not make up that living mass in whose veins, in the eye of God, runs a more precious purple than ever gave its Tyrian dye to the robes of royalty!

THE STATES—AS SAMPLES.

Our own States, following Federal example, based their representation on a census taken by themselves in some cases and in others upon the Federal census. Twenty States include the total population in the representation; while New York, less republican, excepted aliens and colored people not taxed, and Nebraska and Wisconsin except Indians not taxed and Navy and Army officers. Oregon, Illinois, and Texas limit the representative basis to white inhabitants; Indiana to white males over twenty-one years of age; Kentucky and Tennessee to voters, and Pennsylvania, still less republican, limits it to the taxable inhabitants.*

OTHER GOVERNMENTS NOT TRULY REPRESENTATIVE.

So that with these few exceptions, all our Commonwealths have a thoroughly popular basis, ascertained by legal methods. Volumes have been written to show the representative quality of ancient and modern governments, but I have yet to find one, even in the ideals of Plato, More, Bacon, and Harrington, so instinct with the spirit and so grounded on the fact of popular supremacy as our Federal Government and its constituent States. Approaches may have been made to enlightened liberty; well-ordered republics have survived for centuries without this substantial groundwork; but after all, nations which have risen and flourished have decayed, because not founded on the will of the people. If the power of the people be not asserted as well by a body of legislators as by its full representative capacity, it is no republic.

The democracy of Athens was overthrown by a coup d'état, accompanied with assassination, and by the substitution of a council of four hundred and limiting the franchise to five thousand. Legislature as it was, still it was an oligarchy, and soon died a violent death. Nowhere in the varied history of Greece do we find the principles or practice of representation. Aristotle nearly guesses out, á priori, our federal system, when he speaks of a moderate oligarchy, in which men of a certain census elect a council intrusted with the deliberative power, but bound to execute this power agreeably to established laws. (May's Democracy in Europe, volume 1, page 130.) Greece had her leagues, international and municipal, but they were not founded, like our Congress, upon a count of the whole people.

Rome had a senate, but it was made up of the rich and ambitious, men chosen to high magistracies, or who had done the State some conspicuous service. But the senate was continually at war with the tribunes and the comitia. It had no popular element in it, and like the English House of Lords, it could not bear the brunt of popular tumult. Attempts were made in the Middle Ages and in the Italian republics to revive the old Roman senate, but its glory had departed. A senate which was a travesty on ancient Rome met in the old capitol. It had fifty-six members. It grew less and less, until only one senator remained. It had no popular basis. The "bannerets" of Rienzi were chosen by districts, and the democracy of Florence was sustained by popular meetings in the square of the Signoria, voting by acclamation, as in the agora and forum; but it was only a family arrangement. The Hebrews, after their exodus from Egypt, acknowledged but one God and king. The several tribes followed their own leaders, but general decrees required the ratification of the whole people, like the Saxon laws described by Tacitus. The popular councils of Switzerland, modeled after those of Germany, where laws were made in the open assembly without the bidding or hinderance of kings or chiefs, were the forerunners of that pact, by which the barriers of lake and mountain were removed, so that distinct nationalities sat side by side in a federal diet, drawing the federal bond tighter and tighter till it assumed a form that ranks beside Achaia and America. (Freeman, volume 1, page 6.)

The Witenagemote of early England, made up of the earldormen, bishops, abbots, thanes, and courtiers, had its final outgrowth in the Parliament just assembled on the Thames. From the Conquest to the time of King John, prelates, earls, and barons formed the legislative power, except for taxes. The landed estate afterward made up the Parliament. Judge Story, writing his Commentaries, in 1833, in vindication of our system, says that the House of Commons is made up of representatives of old and decayed boroughs, in some cases with scarcely a single inhabitant; and of the five hundred and fifty-eight members then and there, one-ninth were elected by 364 persons, and one-half by 5,723 persons, and the half are representative of other than popular interests. (Book III, chapter ix, sections 642 and 661.)

There has been much improvement, owing to household suffrage, since that time; but still one only out of twenty of the British people at the present time vote; there is no trace of representative government, based on a census. (Todd, page 36, volume 1.)

* Since speaking I am informed that the new constitution of Pennsylvania has changed this.

The legislature has its history in France; and the French Chamber, like the Spanish Cortes and German Reichshräth, are growths from the crude councils which in all ages, countries, and under various names, have made laws for mankind. The Champ de Mars was the origin of the Frank assemblies. They were called to divide the loot of armies, at first; and after many vicissitudes, and long gaps amounting to five centuries, they died out. In 1779, provincial assemblies were revived. They discussed grievances; they became masters. The Parliament of Paris called for the states-general. It had been two hundred years obsolete; but it was based on "orders"—three estates, one of which was the commons. It grew into the national assembly, and the revolution began. But what is the French Chamber as a representative element? Had the body been representative of the people, its leaders would not have been carted away in the dead of night, on the 2d of December, 1851, to ignominious cells by the De Mornys, Fleurys, Persignys, Saint Armauds, and De Maupas of the coup d'état, while Louis Napoleon replaced, under a sham plebiscite, the Roman eagle on the national standards.

Mr. Speaker, in none of these legislative organisms do we find the semblance of the American system of enumeration and representation. Opulence, dignities, titles, vassalage, municipalities, and classes have had their obsequious representatives in all ages and countries, and now and then, by some convulsion, the common people, in a fierce, wild, unequal way, had their will expressed in legislation, but as a general rule the people were unrepresented, either because of unfair local distribution of the representation or by the suppression of the franchise.

MINORITY REPRESENTATION.

It has been said by John Stuart Mill, in his book on Representative Government, that our American system is a collective despotism, as it ignores the representation of minorities. In discussing Mr. Hare's famous plan, he inveighs against our system, and mourns over our "faulty models," under which the highly instructed members of the community, except such as become the servile mouth-pieces of their inferiors in knowledge, do not even offer themselves for Congress or the State Legislatures, so certain is it that they would have no chance of being returned. (Page 160.)

Believing that under the Hare plan every member would be the representative of a unanimous constituency, Mr. Mill would provide a point d'appui for individual and minority resistance to the majority, or, in other words, organize a "function of antagonism." Without inquiring into the truth of these statements, or the despotism of majorities, or the practice in Illinois, and the New York board of aldermen, or even whether the plan of the gentleman from Illinois is workable or not, Utopian or not, comprehensible or not; without showing, as I can, that the plan of the gentleman is not a minority plan, but an awkward attempt to help a minority that needs no such help to be heard, it is no time now and this bill is no place for the consideration of propositions so unfamiliar and whose consequences are so problematical. Besides all innovations in cases of doubtful improvement have this disadvantage: they supplant the established which is already understood. But, sir, I deny that our representative system is the despotism of the majority. We have minorities, if not local, yet sufficiently distinguished by "the function of antagonism."

REFINEMENT OF OUR SYSTEM.

The history of our Federal representation in every sense is republican in fact, form, and spirit. What is representation in a political sense? Rousseau has denied its legitimacy as an agent of society; Guizot combats that theory of individual will as the source of sovereignty, and holds to the doctrine that no individual will has in itself any right to power except it conform to reason. These metaphysical distinctions have been spun into such a thin fiber that the one side has held that when you have supplied yourself with a representative you are no longer free. You have lost your sovereignty, your will, and given them to a master. The other side retorts, "Your personal will is insufficient for order and security. You employ a servant. He is your slave. You give him your suffrage only to execute your sovereign will."

So that, whether we individually consent to that which our deputy does or not, we are bound by his act as representing us. Even the minority, by the theory of our system, consents impliedly to the will of the majority, and there is practical unanimity, and this is the refinement of our system.

OUR DANGERS AND SUCCESSES.

But it may be said that with all this popular basis and its results, have we not the same greed for gain, ambition to excel, love of rule, desire to intrigue, and play of unruly prejudice, jealousy, and passion, which have made the history of other nations tragical even to their decline and fall?

Still, in spite of this demoralization in its worst aspect, it may be answered; who shall compete with us in our abundant harvests, our rich balances of trade, our increase in commerce and expansion of labor, our influx of precious metals, and our own inexhaustible mines of coal, copper, gold, and silver; our unexampled exportations and importations, our attractive forces and their marvelous immigration, our stupendous intercommunications and their incomes and outgoes by rail, canal, lake, river, and sea; our inventive faculty, with its miracles of manufacture; and above all and beyond all, what can rival the star which as it moves westward from ever-renewing centers of a restless population has in a century, added 47,000,000 to its active energies?

Again, it may be said, that with a tendency to corruption and decay, where is the warrant that this immense gathering of figures and facts in a census for the splendid generalizations of political philosophy will not prove a dead aggregation of mere material facts and not a vitalizing and ennobling principle of civilization? That warrant is in the virtue, schools, and intelligence of the whole people, who, receiving their inheritance of natural wealth, endowed in the æons past, by geology and its changes,—with an opulence of fertility and wealth, have transmuted it beyond the dreams of alchemy into manifold and magnificent values, spreading their domain since 1790 from a little strip along the Atlantic into continental proportions, reaching from sea to sea. These extraordinary advances in greatness and glory are due to the representative system which strikes no name, however humble or dependent, from its roster of nationality.

France and Spain may indulge in their revolutions; Russia and Germany may tremble before communistic and nihilistic terrors; England may boast of her rule in Asia, Africa and Ireland, and proudly echo the praise which her laureate lavishes on her, as > A land of settled government,

> A land of just and old renown,
> Where freedom broadens slowly down,
> From precedent to precedent;

but she has no popular representation in her Parliament founded on the people. It was left for us—her colonies—a century ago, in this new hemisphere, and in a written Constitution, to erect a muniment, high and splendid, around the temple of our liberty, and to guard it, with a unity and force which the division and variety made by mountain and river, and the strong passion of hostile armies, could not sever. By it our composite society is assured of protection, stability, and progress.

In rearing this muniment every one has builded over against his own house as in the days of dismantled Jerusalem; so that by the whole mass of our living people, freedom broadens decennially, not from precedent to precedent, but it expands and strengthens like the boles of the oak, by its inner growth drawn from the soil, sun, and sky, into an intense robust life which, thanks to a kind God, has defied the tempests of the past century, and under His guidance will defy the storms of centuries to come! [Loud and continued applause from both sides.]

EXHIBIT A.

Gains and losses North and South.

Number of Representatives.	North.				South.				Gain of South over North.	Loss of South over North.	Totalnorthern Representatives.	Total southern Representatives.	Northern members by fractions.	Southern members by fractions.
	Total.		Net.		Total.		Net.
	Gain.	Loss.	Gain.	Loss.	Gain.	Loss.	Gain.	Loss.
290	7	13	....	6	7	4	3	....	9	....	181	109	11	7
291	8	13	....	5	7	4	3	....	8	....	182	109	12	7
292	9	13	....	4	7	4	3	....	7	....	183	109	12	7
293	10	13	....	3	7	4	3	....	6	....	184	109	13	7
294	10	12	....	2	7	4	3	....	5	....	185	109	13	6
295	10	12	....	2	7	3	4	....	6	....	185	110	13	7
296	10	11	....	1	7	3	4	....	5	....	186	110	14	6
297	10	10	....	....	7	3	4	....	4	....	187	110	15	6
298	10	9	1	....	7	3	4	....	3	....	188	110	14	5
299	10	9	1	....	7	2	5	....	4	....	188	111	14	6
300	10	8	2	....	8	3	5	....	3	....	189	111	13	5
301	10	8	2	....	8	2	6	....	4	....	189	112	12	6
302	10	8	2	....	8	1	7	....	5	....	189	113	11	7
303	10	7	3	....	8	1	7	....	4	....	190	113	11	7
304	10	7	3	....	9	1	8	....	5	....	190	114	10	8
305	10	7	3	....	9	....	9	....	6	....	190	115	7	9
306	10	6	4	....	9	....	9	....	5	....	191	115	7	8
307	10	5	5	....	9	....	9	....	4	....	192	115	8	8
308	10	5	5	....	10	....	10	....	5	....	192	116	8	8
309	11	5	6	....	10	....	10	....	4	....	193	116	7	9
310	11	5	6	....	11	....	11	....	5	....	193	117	7	9
311	10	4	6	....	12	....	12	....	6	....	193	118	6	10
312	11	4	7	....	12	....	12	....	5	....	194	118	6	10
313	12	4	8	....	12	....	12	....	4	....	195	118	7	9
314	12	4	8	....	13	....	13	....	5	....	195	119	7	10
315	13	4	9	....	13	....	13	....	4	....	196	119	8	10
316	13	3	10	....	13	....	13	....	3	....	197	119	9	9
317	14	3	11	....	13	....	13	....	2	....	198	119	8	8
318	15	3	12	....	13	....	13	....	1	....	199	119	9	7
319	16	3	13	....	13	....	13	....	....	....	200	119	10	6
320	17	3	14	....	13	....	13	....	....	1	201	119	11	5
321	18	3	15	....	13	....	13	....	....	2	202	119	10	3
322	19	3	16	....	13	....	13	....	....	3	203	119	11	3
323	19	3	16	....	14	....	14	....	....	2	203	120	10	4
324	19	3	16	....	15	....	15	....	....	1	203	121	10	5
325	19	3	17	....	15	....	15	....	....	2	204	121	10	5

EXHIBIT B.

Legislative bodies of the world, with their numbers.

Country and name of legislature.	Number of chambers.	Number of members.
		Upper.	Lower.	Single chamber.
Argentine Confederation—Congress:
Senate	2	28	50	.....
House of Deputies
Austria—Reichsrath:
1. Herrenhaus	2	191	353	.....
2. Abgeordnetenhaus
Belgium:
Senate	2	68	136	.....
Chamber of Representatives
Bolivia—Congress:
Senate Chamber of Censors	3	30	30	30
Chamber of Tribunes
Brazil—Legislative Assembly:
Senate	2	58	122	.....
House of Congress
Chili—Congress:
Senate	2	37	109	.....
Chamber of Deputies
Colombia—Congress:
Senate	2	27	66	.....
House of Representatives
Costa Rica:
Congreso Constitutional	2	25	29	.....
Denmark:
Landsthing	2	66	102	.....
Falkething
Ecuador:
Senate	2	18	30	.....
Chamber of Deputies
France:
Senate	2	300	532	.....
Chamber of Deputies
Germany—Empire:
Bundesrath	2	59	397	.....
Reichstag
Anhalt—Diet	1	.....	.....	36
Baden:
Upper Chamber	2	29	63	.....
Lower Chamber
Bavaria:
Chamber of Reichsräthe	2	72	156	.....
Chamber of Deputies
Bremen:
Senate	2	18	150	.....
Bürger-Convent
Brunswick—Diet	1	.....	.....	46
Hamburg:
Senate	2	18	192	.....
House of Burgesses
Hesse:
First Chamber	2	34	50	.....
Second Chamber
Lippe—Chamber of Deputies	1	.....	.....	21
Lübeck:
Senate	2	14	120	.....
House of Burgesses
Mecklenburg-Schwerin and Mecklenburg-Strelitz—Diet	1	.....	.....	73
Oldenburg—Landtag	1	.....	.....	33
Prussia:
Herrenhaus	2	302	434	.....
Abgeordnetenhaus
Reuss-Greiz—Chamber of Deputies	1	.....	.....	12
Reuss-Schleiz—Diet	1	.....	.....	19
Saxe-Altenburg—Diet	1	.....	.....	24
Saxe-Coburg-Gotha—Diet	1	.....	.....	21
Saxe-Meiningen—Diet	1	.....	.....	24
Saxe-Weimar—Diet	1	.....	.....	31
Saxony:
Upper Chamber	2	48	80	.....
Lower Chamber
Schaumburg-Lippe—Diet	1	.....	.....	15
Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt—Chamber of Representatives	1	.....	.....	16
Schwarzburg-Sondershausen—Diet	1	.....	.....	15
Waldeck—Diet	1	.....	.....	41
Würtemberg:
Standesherrenhaus	2	45	93	.....
Abgeordnetenhaus
Great Britain—Parliament:
House of Lords	2	538	658	.....
House of Commons
Canada, Dominion of—Parliament:
Senate	2	78	206	.....
House of Commons
Cape of Good Hope:
Legislative Council	2	21	66	.....
House of Assembly
Natal—Legislative Council	1	.....	.....	28

County and name of legislature.	Number of chambers.	Number of members.
		Upper.	Lower.	Single chamber.
Great Britain:
New South Wales—Parliament:
Legislative Council	2	21	102	.....
Assembly
New Zealand—Parliament:
Legislative Council	2	45	88	.....
House of Representatives
Queensland—Parliament:
Legislative Council	2	30	42	.....
Legislative Assembly
South Australia—Parliament:
Legislative Council	2	18	46	.....
House of Assembly
Tasmania—Parliament:
Legislative Council	2	16	32	.....
House of Assembly
Victoria—Parliament:
Legislative Council	2	30	36	.....
Legislative Assembly
Western Australia—Legislative Council	1	.....	.....	21
Greece—Boulé	1	.....	.....	188
Guatemala—Congress:
Council of State	2	24	52	.....
House of Representatives
Hayti—National Assembly:
Senate	2	30	.....	.....
Chamber of Deputies
Honduras—Congress:
Senate	2	7	11	.....
Chamber of Deputies
Hungary—Reichstag:
House of Magnates	2	746	444	.....
House of Representatives
Italy—Parliament:
Senato	2	270	508	.....
Camera de Deputati
Liberia—Congress:
Senate	2	8	13	.....
House of Representatives
Mexico—Congress:
Senate	2	56	227	.....
House of Representatives
Montenegro—Council of State	1	.....	.....	18
Netherlands—States-General	2	39	86	.....
Nicaragua—Congress:
Senate	2	10	11	.....
House of Representatives
Norway—Storthing:
Lagthing	2	28	83	.....
Odelsthing
Paraguay—Congress:
Senate	2	.....	.....	.....
House of Deputies
Peru—Congress:
Senate	2	44	110	.....
House of Representatives
Portugal—Cortes Geraes:
Cámara dos Parés	2	123	149	.....
Cámera dos Deputados
Roumania—Parliament:
Senate	2	70	145	.....
Chamber of Deputies
Russia—No Legislature	.....	.....	.....	.....
San Domingo—Congress:
Consego conservador	2	12	15	.....
Tribunado
San Salvador—Congress:
Senate	2	12	24	.....
House of Representatives
Servia:
Senate	2	17	160	.....
Skupstina
Spain—Cortes:
Senate	2	.....	.....	408
Congress
Sweden—Diet:
First Chamber	2	136	204	.....
Second Chamber
Switzerland—Parliament:
Ständerath	2	44	135	.....
Nationalrath
Turkey—No Legislature	.....	.....	.....	.....
United States—Congress:
Senate	2	76	293	.....
House of Representatives
Uruguay—Parliament:
Senate	2	13	40	.....
Chamber of Representatives
Venezuela—Congress:
Senate	2	.....	.....	.....
House of Representatives

United States—the State Legislatures—number in senate and house.

States.	Number of senators.	Number of representatives.	States.	Number of senators.	Number of representatives.
Alabama	33	100	New Jersey	21	60
Arkansas	31	93	New York	32	128
California	40	80	North Carolina	50	120
Colorado	40	80	Ohio	37	114
Connecticut	21	248	Oregon	30	60
Delaware	9	21	Pennsylvania	50	201
Florida	32	92	Rhode Island	36	72
Georgia	44	175	South Carolina	33	124
Illinois	51	153	Tennessee	25	75
Indiana	50	100	Texas	31	93
Iowa	50	100	Vermont	30	240
Kansas	40	125	Virginia	40	100
Kentucky	38	100	West Virginia	25	65
Louisiana	36	120	Wisconsin	33	100
Maine	31	151	Territories.	Coun.	Ho.
Maryland	26	84
Massachusetts	40	240	Arizona	13	26
Michigan	32	100	Dakota	13	26
Minnesota	41	106	Idaho	13	26
Mississippi	37	120	Montana	13	26
Missouri	34	143	New Mexico	13	26
Nebraska	30	84	Utah	13	26
Nevada	25	50	Washington	13	26
New Hampshire	24	300	Wyoming	13	26

EXHIBIT C.

Time of meeting of the Legislatures of States.

States.	Sessions.	Limit of session.	Next Legislature meets—
Alabama	Biennial	Fifty days	Nov. 7, 1882
Arkansas	Biennial	Sixty days	Jan. 10, 1881
California	Biennial	Sixty days	Jan. 5, 1882
Colorado	Biennial	Forty days	Jan. 5, 1881
Connecticut	Annual	None	Jan. 7, 1881
Delaware	Biennial	None	Jan. 4, 1881
Florida	Biennial	Sixty days	Jan. 4, 1881
Georgia	Biennial	Forty days	Nov. 3, 1882
Illinois	Biennial	None	Jan. 5, 1881
Indiana	Biennial	Sixty days	Jan. 6, 1881
Iowa	Biennial	None	Jan. 12, 1882
Kansas	Biennial	Fifty days	Jan. 11, 1881
Kentucky	Biennial	Sixty days	Dec. 31, 1881
Louisiana	Biennial	Ninety days	Jan. 12, 1882
Maine	Biennial	None	Jan. 5, 1881
Maryland	Biennial	Ninety days	Jan. 4, 1882
Massachusetts	Annual	None	Jan. 5, 1881
Michigan	Biennial	None	Jan. 5, 1881
Minnesota	Biennial	Sixty days	Jan. 4, 1881
Mississippi	Biennial	None	Jan. 6, 1882
Missouri	Biennial	Seventy days	Jan. 5, 1881
Nebraska	Biennial	Forty days	Jan. 4, 1881
Nevada	Biennial	Sixty days	Jan. 3, 1881
New Hampshire	Biennial	None	Jan. 1, 1881
New Jersey	Annual	None	Jan. 11, 1881
New York	Annual	None	Jan. 6, 1881
North Carolina	Biennial	Sixty days	Jan. 5, 1881
Ohio	Biennial	None	Jan. 5, 1882
Oregon	Biennial	Forty days	Jan. 13, 1882
Pennsylvania	Biennial	None	Jan. 4, 1881
Rhode Island	Annual	None	Jan. 18, 1881
South Carolina	Annual	None	Nov. 23, 1881
Tennessee	Biennial	Seventy-five days	Jan. 3, 1881
Texas	Biennial	Sixty days	Jan. 3, 1881
Vermont	Biennial	None	Oct. 6, 1882
Virginia	Biennial	Ninety days	Dec. 18, 1881
West Virginia	Biennial	Forty-five days	Jan. 12, 1881
Wisconsin	Annual	None	Jan. 12, 1881

EXHIBIT D.

[Extract from S. S. Cox's speech, December 13, 1871.]

Mixed basis.

The idea of population is not altogether the idea on which suffrage is based. You, gentlemen, in the fourteenth amendment, in making a basis counting out "numbers," who are disfranchised, have departed from the original constitutional order. You gave us in the fourteenth amendment a mixed basis. It is a basis of numbers and suffrage; and they are not akin or correlative. Our representation, according to the original structure and theory of the Government, is one of numbers. Any fair construction of the instrument should be on that principle. It should be so, unless we depart from the genius and form of our Federal system.

In 1830 the representation in the House was two hundred and forty members. In 1840 it dropped down to two hundred and twenty-three, although the ratio of representation had grown from 47,700 in 1830 to 70,680 in 1840. At the beginning of the Government in 1790, when the States numbered sixteen, and the ratio was 33,000, there were only one hundred and eight members of Congress. In 1800 there were one hundred and forty-two; in 1810 there were one hundred and eighty-two; in 1820 there were two hundred and sixteen; 1830 there were two hundred and forty; in 1840 there were two hundred and twenty-three; in 1850 there were two hundred and thirty-three; in 1860 there were two hundred and forty-three. The following tables will show these figures in detail:

Representatives.	Year.	States represented.	Ratio.	References.
65...	1787	13	30,000	Constitution.
108...	1790	16	33,000	Statutes-at-Large, volume 1, p. 253.
142...	1800	17	33,000	Statutes-at-Large, volume 2, p. 128.
182...	1810	18	35,000	Statutes-at-Large, volume 2, p. 669.
216...	1820	27	40,000	Statutes-at-Large, volume 3, p. 651.
240...	1830	28	47,700	Statutes-at-Large, volume 4, p. 516.
223...	1840	29	70,680	Statutes-at-Large, volume 5, p. 491.
233...	1850	33	93,420	Statutes-at-Large, volume 9, p. 432.
243...	1860	37	126,823	Statutes-at-Large, volume 12, p. 353; also supplementary act, volume 12, p. 572.
293...	1870	38	131,425	Revised Statutes, chapter 2, section 1, p. 28; supplementary act, p. 192.

Apportionment of Representatives in Congress and ratio of representation by the Constitution and at each census.

States.	Admitted to the Union.	Representatives to which each State was entitled by—
		Constitution, 1789—ratio 30,000.	First census from Mar. 4, 1793—ratio 33,000.	Second census from Mar. 4, 1803—ratio 33,000.	Third census from Mar. 4, 1813—ratio 35,000.	Fourth census from Mar. 4, 1823—ratio 40,000.	Fifth census from Mar. 4, 1833—ratio 47,700.	Sixth census from Mar. 4, 1843—ratio 70,680.	Seventh census from Mar. 4, 1853—ratio 93,423.	Eighth census from Mar. 4, 1863—ratio 127,381.	Ninth census from Mar. 4, 1873—ratio 131,425.
Alabama	1819	.....	.....	.....	.....	3	5	7	7	6	8
Arkansas	1836	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	1	2	3	4
California	1850	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	2	3	4
Colorado	1876	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	*1
Connecticut	.....	5	7	7	7	6	6	4	4	4	4
Delaware	.....	1	1	1	2	1	1	1	1	1	1
Florida	1845	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	1	1	2
Georgia	.....	3	2	4	6	7	9	8	8	7	9
Illinois	1818	.....	.....	.....	.....	1	3	7	9	14	19
Indiana	1816	.....	.....	.....	.....	3	7	10	11	11	13
Iowa	1846	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	2	6	9
Kansas	1861	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	1	3
Kentucky	1792	.....	2	6	10	12	13	10	10	9	10
Louisiana	1812	.....	.....	.....	.....	3	3	4	4	5	6
Maine	1820	.....	.....	.....	.....	7	8	7	6	5	5
Maryland	.....	6	8	9	9	9	8	6	6	5	6
Massachusetts	.....	8	14	17	20	13	12	10	11	10	11
Michigan	1837	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	3	4	6	9
Minnesota	1858	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	2	2	3
Mississippi	1817	.....	.....	.....	.....	1	2	4	5	5	6
Missouri	1821	.....	.....	.....	.....	1	2	5	7	9	13
Nebraska	1867	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	*1	1
Nevada	1864	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	*1	1
New Hampshire	.....	3	4	5	6	6	5	4	3	3	3
New Jersey	.....	4	5	6	6	6	6	5	5	5	7
New York	.....	6	10	17	27	34	40	34	33	31	33
North Carolina	.....	5	10	12	13	13	13	9	8	7	8
Ohio	1802	.....	.....	.....	6	14	19	21	21	19	20
Oregon	1859	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	*1	1	1
Pennsylvania	.....	8	13	18	23	26	28	24	25	24	27
Rhode Island	.....	1	2	2	2	2	2	2	2	2	2
South Carolina	.....	5	6	8	9	9	9	7	6	4	5
Tennessee	1796	.....	.....	3	6	9	13	11	10	8	10
Texas	1845	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	2	4	6
Vemont	1791	.....	2	4	6	5	5	4	3	3	3
Virginia	.....	10	19	22	23	22	21	15	13	11	9
West Virginia	1863	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	3
Wisconsin	1848	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	3	6	8
Whole number	.....	65	105	141	181	213	240	223	234	243	293

* These States admitted subsequently to the apportionment.

EXHIBIT E.

[Remarks of S. S. Cox, December 13, 1871, from the Congressional Globe, second session, Forty-second Congress, page 109.]

Basis of representation.

It was urged that equality means equality of votes by States, not equality by representation of individuals. It was shown that in the Amphictyonic confederation of Greece each city, however different in wealth and strength, sent the same number of deputies, and each had an equal voice. So, too, in the seven provinces of Netherlands and in Switzerland. It was insisted, on the other hand, that taxation and representation ought to go together, and that wealth as well as numbers ought to be considered in fixing the number of Congressmen and their votes. It was urged that representation should depend on the quotas of money furnished. Mr. Rutledge argued that money was power, and was entitled to be heard in the affairs of the Federation. To this it was answered by Mr. Wilson that wealth was measured fairly by population, and that numbers represented as well the wealth as the people.

Again, it was replied that if one State had byreason of its excess of people more votes than another, the smaller ones would become the slaves of the larger ones.

"Each State," it was said, "like each individual, had its peculiar habits, usages, and manners, which constituted its happiness, and could not give to others a power over it, any more than an individual when he could avoid it." Here, indeed, was a difficulty almost insurmountable. Finally, through the wisdom and efforts of these great and good men, the present plan of the Constitution was adopted. Early in the sittings of the Convention the number of inhabitants was taken as the basis. Then arose a question of details. Shall untaxed Indians and enslaved negroes be counted? If untaxed Indians, then is not representation given for those who pay no taxes? Accordingly, the red men who had the felicity of being untaxed (what a blessing, if they lived now!) were dropped out.

As to the enslaved Africans, the three-fifths rule was adopted on the motion of Mr. Wilson, seconded by Mr. Pinckney. Eleven out of the thirteen States agreed to it. Mr. King, who was strongly anti-slavery, agreed to this as the rule of equality between the "Eastern and Southern States." He argued that as the eastern had more population and the southern more wealth the slaves should be partially counted to attain equality. Accordingly the slaves were carved into five parts, three parts counted as persons and two parts property. The property parts were ignored and the persons counted three for five. This was not done without conflict. Mr. Gerry contended "that the blacks were property, and are used to the southward as horses and cattle to the northward, and why should their representation be increased to the southward on account of the number of slaves than horses or oxen to the North?" Why, indeed, except that it was intended to approximate to the principle of population as the basis voted by the convention? I maintain that this is the only just and stable principle. Any other is a fraud on the representative system. By the abolition of slavery, since our war, all the negroes are counted one for one, and not one for three-fifths of one. If there had been no slavery in 1787 all would have been thus counted then. Unless this had been done there could have been no Union. There was no other plan of equality possible unless every State had been given one vote each in the House of Representatives, as when the House elects a President. The object of representation is not to protect States simply, but the interests and rights of individuals in the States.

What, then, is the principle of the fourteenth amendment? Is it population? Or is it suffrage? Is it both or neither? It purports, in its terms, to be based on the principle of the Constitution—population. "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State." "But"—ah, how much in this monosyllable! The exception contains the swindle, the threat, and the bribe. See! "But, whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens, not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except"—another swindle in the form of a preposition—"except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall have to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age."

This is your boasted fourteenth amendment, about to be discarded by your disregard of the disfranchised. Any one who will take the pains to read the Madison report of the debates of the constitutional convention will find that the question of State rights was involved in the question of representation. In the first place, the larger States claimed that they should have the same voice in the Senate proportionate to their size. The smaller States said, "No; we must have equal representation in the Senate." You have seen how that was settled. That settlement remains; but the House is subject to the vicissitudes of every decade, and we are called upon to decide about this decade. Our representative basis is not based on money or wealth. It should be, as it was intended, based on population.

After much controversy, which almost drove the good people of that day to distraction and the Union nigh unto failure, our fathers struck the idea of "numbers" as a safe rule.

River and Harbor Improvements.

SPEECH OF HON. W. H. KITCHIN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 7, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. KITCHIN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to record my protest against the passage of this bill in its present shape and for the purposes therein specified, believing as I do that the system is fraught with untold evils, and is antagonistic to both the letter and spirit of the Constitution as well as wrong in principle and practice.

If this bill becomes a law, as it will—for no power short of Divine interposition can prevent it—one more precedent of this corrupt legislation will be established, one more violation of the Constitution recorded, and one more step taken in the direction of the ultimate consolidation of the Government; and this, too, by a Congress claiming to be democratic. No gentleman who votes for this bill ought ever again to raise his voice in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution, or in favor of the reserved rights of the States, or in favor of strict economy in the administration of the Government. Its passage will certainly be a departure at right-angles from republican and democratic doctrines as they have been understood from the foundation of the Government up to 1860. No statesman of democratic antecedents or of State-rights persuasions up to that time ever gave countenance to or advocated such a measure. It was, until since 1860, universally held to be sound constitutional democratic doctrine that the Federal Government was one of limited and specified powers, that it had no constitutional power to invade the jurisdiction of the States, to float up their rivers, to anchor in their inland waters, or to force navigation up their creeks, rivulets, and swamps.

So jealous were our forefathers, the early expounders of the Constitution, of the rights of the States, that the Federal Government did not assume to exercise jurisdiction over the harbors on the sea-coast in the different States, but allowed the States to improve the harbors, to plant buoys, beacons, and light-houses on the coast, in the harbors, and in the mouths of the rivers; and not until 1820 did the General Government assume and take control of the harbors on the coast and up the rivers, and in the sounds and bays as far as the ebb and flow of the tide. And this is as far as the Federal power ever claimed jurisdiction over State territory, until the reorganization of the States and the Federal judiciary. And the power now claimed and exercised by the Congress of the United States to invade the State jurisdiction and cross with impunity the State lines, is not set up as a new grant of powers from the States to the Government, by any of the recent amendments to the Constitution, for none such exist, but is claimed as inherent in the Constitution and as a natural outcome of a liberal construction of that instrument. But no such construction was ever placed upon it by Washington, Madison, Jefferson, Jackson, Monroe, Polk, or Pierce, nor by any other democratic statesmen or eminent lawyer or jurist of that period.

The only grant of power to Congress found in the Constitution for this system of internal improvements by the Federal Government is in this clause of the Constitution:

> Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Now, if this clause can be so construed as to give Congress power to go into a State and make its unnavigable rivers, creeks, and branches navigable, it could be so construed as to give to this body power to levy and collect taxes, build merchant ships, employ navigators, dig canals, build locks, and furnish money to float the commerce of the whole country, at a cost of one hundred or two hundred million dollars per annum, with no limit to taxation or the exercise of power save the discretion of Congress. Such enormous, dangerous, and despotic power was never intended by the States or the people to be granted to the Federal Government in the clause to regulate the commerce among the several States. If such a sweeping, reaching, grasping construction is to be placed upon the word "regulate," and State lines are to be blotted out and State jurisdiction disregarded, would it not be better to so amend the Constitution that there should not be room for cavil, so that we could all agree that this is one grand consolidated Government with unlimited powers and unlimited jurisdiction?

I may be mistaken; I hope I am; I fear I am not; but it does appear to me that every sound, fundamental principle of State authority, jurisdiction, and rights, and every democratic doctrine are surrendered in the advocation of this bill and in the submission to such an odious and obnoxious construction of this clause of the Constitution. I am not antagonizing the appropriation for improving the national harbors and rivers running through and between the sovereign States of this indissoluble Union, floating the commerce of large communities and whole States upon their waters. This I recognize as constitutional and within the scope of the powers and authority granted to Congress by the States and the people in the Magna Charta of American liberty, the Constitution. But it is against the abuses and corruption and extravagance growing out of this manner and style of legislation, and the unconstitutional paragraphs of this bill, the encroachments upon the rights of the people, and the absolute disregard of the republican and democratic spirit of the Constitution, that I am contending.

I know it is said that some of us are opposed to the bill because our States or districts do not get as big a grab as some others. I speak for myself. I am opposed to this bill from conviction, because I believe it unconstitutional in its present shape; because it does great injustice to a large body of the American people, by levying an unjust tax upon them for the benefit of others; because, if the object is to get the money out of the Treasury and distribute it among the people or the States, the distribution is unequal, unjust; and because it violates every principle of my democracy, and, in my judgment, tramples the Constitution under foot.

My friend [Mr. HAZELTON] was right when he defied this side of the Chamber to produce just one precedent of a democratic President or statesman favoring the system of internal improvements adopted by the republican party. He said one precedent could not be produced, that it had its origin in the old whig party in its days of prosperity. That is a grand commentary and eulogy on the democracy of this country, when a republican takes from its shoulders the responsibility of this unjust, unequal, corrupt, unconstitutional legislation. If there be any glory in it, to that glory they are entitled, and far be it from me to rob them of it. In this bill we find a large number of rivers and creeks not known to the geographers of my school-boy days, but I suppose they have since been discovered, invented, or created. It would startle the civilized world to know the amount of commerce floated on the placid bosoms of the Chickahominy, the Pamunkey, the Mataponi, and a hundred other such creeks and swamps named in this bill. I will venture the assertion that one steamship could transfer at one trip to Liverpool all the commerce that floats on forty of these streams in the space of twelve months. I am sure a catfish could not navigate some of these streams in the summer season without great damage to his bottom side.

If the brakes are not put on this kind of legislation, in a few short years $100,000,000 will not suffice to improve the rivers and harbors of this country. We now have ports of entry over one thousand miles from the sea; and if we progress as fast in the next decade as in the last, I expect to see ports of entry on the tops of the Alleghany and Rocky Mountains, and I am not sure there is not one now in my own State on top of the Blue Ridge, on the French Broad River, amid the falls, rocks, and cliffs, and about seven thousand feet above the level of the sea. It seems to me that we have been outside of and above the Constitution long enough. Let us return to its protection, hide behind its shield, and use it as an armor of defense, and all will be well and the people will be safe.

Hear what James K. Polk said in his veto message of August 3, 1846, on the river and harbor bill:

The Constitution has not, in my judgment, conferred upon the Federal Government the power to construct works of internal improvement within the States, or to appropriate money out of the Treasury for that purpose.

Further on in the same veto message:

A construction of the Constitution so broad as that by which the power in question is defended, tends to a consolidation of power in a government intended by its framers to be thus limited in its authority. The obvious tendency and inevitable result of a consolidation of the States into one sovereignty, would be to transform the republican system of the United States into a monarchy.

There is a rule well settled in the construction of the Constitution, and that is that Federal officials ought never to exercise doubtful power; and if the power claimed in this bill to dig out creeks, rivers, and swamps so as to make them navigable is not a doubtful power, I cannot conceive of any power claimed in that instrument which is. Further on, the same author says, speaking of the river and harbor bill:

It not only leads to a consolidation of power in the Federal Government, at the expense of the rightful authority of the States, but its inevitable tendency is to produce combinations of local and sectional interests, strong enough when united to carry propositions for appropriations of public money, which could not of themselves, and standing alone, succeed, and cannot fail to lead to wasteful and extravagant expenditures. The treasures of the world would hardly be equal to the improvement of every bay, inlet, creek, and river in our country which might be supposed to promote the agricultural, manufacturing, or commercial interests of a neighborhood. Should this bill become a law, the principle which it establishes will inevitably lead to large and annually increasing appropriations and drains upon the Treasury, for it is not to be doubted that numerous other localities not embraced in its provisions but quite as much entitled to the favor of the Government as those which are embraced will demand through their representatives in Congress to be placed on an equal footing with them. With such an increase of expenditures must necessarily follow either an increased public debt or increased burdens upon the people by taxation.

President Madison says in his verbal message on the same subject:

The power to regulate commerce among the several States cannot include a power to construct roads and canals and to improve the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and secure such commerce, without a latitude of constructive departing from the ordinary import of the terms.

All the democratic presidents, including Buchanan, held the same views and advocated the same doctrine. I am aware this is an age of progress, advancement, and civilization, and that it is urged that we must keep apace with the times, and that times have changed, and that we must change with them; but, sir, principles never change. Times change, men change, principles never. If this kind of legislation was wrong and unconstitutional, and undemocratic, and nonrepublican twenty years ago, it is equally so to-day. If protecting one interest at the cost of another, and robbing one locality to enrich another, and encroaching upon the reserved rights of the people by Federal authority are democratic doctrines, I am no democrat. This ten millions will soon become fifty millions, and the people will have the bill to foot yearly, and it is hard to tell how big the amount will eventually be, as it seems to be the maxim of politicians to make the Government rich and keep the people poor.

Aside from the unconstitutional feature of this measure, from my stand-point, there are other insurmountable reasons and obstacles to its support. This $10,000,000 intended to be appropriated was collected from the people of the whole country, and if distributed for the benefit of the same people ought to be more equally and equitably distributed than this measure proposes. It will be expended entirely upon the harbors, bays, sounds, inlets, rivers, creeks, branches, and swamps in special localities, while those who are not so fortunate as to live near these favored spots are deprived of any participation or benefit in this their common fund. Now, I am unable to see any good reasons why the Government should provide for the transportation of the products of those who live near unnavigable streams by digging out such swamps. To build railroads out of the public funds to every other section of the country, for the free use of the transportation companies, would be as reasonable, as just, and as constitutional as at least one-half of this work proposed to be done.

The legal, natural, and constitutional meaning of the word "regulate," as used in the Constitution, is to fix the rules, terms, and conditions of commerce by which the parties thereto are to be governed, such as the tariff, taxes, customs, and duties. In other words, Congress has power under the Constitution to fix the terms of the contract between individuals and the States and the General Government under the restrictions and limitations of the Constitution. But Congress cannot go beyond the power granted or implied in that instrument without becoming a usurper and a tyrant. I do not know as a matter of fact, but I believe over half of this appropriation will be squandered or wasted for other purposes than for the commerce of the country. This money, if this bill becomes a law, will go into the hands of the dominant party, and much of it will indirectly be turned to the use of and made to serve that party. This will unavoidably be so; and I shall never give my consent to place the public funds in this way in the hands of any political party, unless it shall be redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled from their present attitude.

Now, sir, in my opinion, this whole log-rolling system and combination legislation ought to be cut up by the roots. Each measure in this House ought to stand or fall on its own merits.

This principle, you tickle me and I will tickle you, you support my measure and I will support yours, strikes at the very root of honest, wise, and economical legislation. It breeds corruption and laxity in morals, and hoists high and opens wide the flood-gates of reckless extravagance.

I am not ignorant of the fact that many gentlemen will vote for this bill because, if they did not, it would appear to some that they were voting against appropriations to their own States and districts; and there is much force in that fact, unless the bill could be defeated, because, if ten or eleven millions of dollars are to be taken from the Treasury for common distribution, common honesty and fair dealing would suggest and demand its distribution on grounds both of equity and justice, which would give it to all sections in proportion to the amounts contributed by them to the common fund from which this is drawn. And as the members of this body are human and possessed of human frailties and weaknesses, they may be excused in giving their support to a measure of this kind. But $68,000 to the State of North Carolina, out of $10,000,000, is too small an inducement, even for the reason above given, to carry her delegation for this unconstitutional, unjust, and extravagant measure.

River and Harbor Improvements.

SPEECH OF HON. G. A. BICKNELL,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 15, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BICKNELL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: So far as this bill provides for any object of national concern I should be glad to support it, but its beneficial and national provisions are so intermingled with appropriations for individual benefit merely, appropriations which promote no national interest, that the bill as a whole is exceedingly objectionable. It authorizes the use of public money for private purposes only in more than a hundred cases, making appropriations which are mere gifts of money to be expended within congressional districts.

The members of the Committee on Commerce have spoken largely about the labor they underwent in preparing this bill, and the fairness of their intentions to make an equitable distribution, or, in other words, a fair bill.

I think nobody will deny that the committee undertook to do their best under the difficult circumstances surrounding them. It required labor and management and nice calculation to arrange this bill so as to secure its passage. It required ingenuity to discover plausible reasons for many of the appropriations in this bill. Perhaps it was deemed a sufficient reason for any appropriation that thereby some member of Congress might be induced to support the bill because his district, or somebody therein, would get the benefit of the money. Such bills have been carried heretofore by a judicious distribution of the people's money among private interests. There are indications of some such arrangement on every page of this bill. A great many of its provisions may help individuals, but can do no more; and the inference from this fact is obvious.

This inference is corroborated by the fact that the advocates of the bill voted in a solid column against every amendment tending to give the bill a national character, and to confine its appropriations to streams and harbors within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States. The bill is full of cases of this kind: a stream never claimed to be navigable, a blacksmith shop, or furnace, or mill, or brickyard near it; the owner of it, if he could have it dug out, might float his property to or from market with more profit than by hauling it over muddy or sandy roads; he would be glad if the Government would do it, but he would not incur the risk and expense of doing it himself; whether the work would be profitable or not may be doubtful, but the money will be spent in his neighborhood and he will have the benefit of it.

In other cases a man owns the shore around a small estuary of a northern lake; it is shallow, it is obstructed by sand-bars, it will not float a vessel of fifty tons burden. If it could be deepened without expense to the owner of the shore, he would have the advantage of it. There is no commerce there, but commerce might perhaps be brought there; and whether the commerce be brought or not, the money expended upon the improvement would help the neighborhood. These examples explain many of the appropriations in this bill. The owner of the property to be benefited prevails upon his Congressman, the Congressman prevails upon the committee, the committee makes the appropriation, and a vote is gained for the bill. The Congressman claims credit with his constituents for promoting the expenditure of public money in his district.

I cannot vote for a bill with such provisions, apparently the result of such combinations. If the bill could be amended so as to strike out all except national features, I should be glad to support it; but as it stands it is merely a bill to divide ten millions of the people's money among the several congressional districts on the pretense of improving the commerce of the country.

Agriculture and its Needs.

SPEECH OF HON. J. T. UPDEGRAFF,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 7, 1881.

"The plow was man's first creditor."—BURKE.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4909) for the creation of a Department of Agriculture—

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Not being a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I am under special obligations to that committee and to the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. AIKEN] for the courtesy of an opportunity at this time to address the House in favor of this measure. I feel too deep an interest in this bill and too strong a conviction of its importance, indeed of its necessity, to give it merely a silent support. It is true it does not embrace all the interests which should, in my judgment, be combined in this reconstruction of the Agricultural Department. A fully organized "Department of Industry" should embrace both mining and manufactories. Commerce is now very properly united with the Treasury Department.

A BEGINNING.

But it is a move in the right direction. It is some official recognition of AGRICULTURE as the great industry which is the underlying source of all our wealth and national prosperty. For years its delay or denial has been a wrong to that interest, and therefore of necessity a damage to every associated interest. The great fact of modern history is the creation of values by the development of natural resources. The great poblem of wise government is the just recognition and fostering care of these productive forces; for material development is itself an important element of civilization. Millions of dollars of our national wealth have been created by what meager aid our Government has given to the enlargement of our agricultural productions. Millions have been lost by the utter inadequacy of the appropriations which have been doled out to this immense industry. And yet the Department of Agriculture, weaker in working force than most of the bureaus in other Departments, stinted in its endowments and hampered by hostility and disparagement, has been of incalculable value, not only to the agricultural interests, but to our marvelous material development. Every year these facts are becoming more generally appreciated, not only by farmers, but by progressive men in all ranks of activities.

WHY THIS BILL?

This bill simply proposes an act of long-deferred justice. It elevates this Department to the full rank of other Executive Departments, with all their rights and dignities. Why shall it not be? It is the direct representative of more than one-half of the people of the whole country. They constitute largely the productive element of our population. No class can justly claim any superiority over them as intelligent, patriotic, usefu citizens. Their industrious habits and conservative virtues are no small factors in the strength and security of our institutions. However trade may enrich and art may adorn our progress, the nation dwells largely in the cottages and farmhouses of the country.

The farmers of the United States, though not largely active in mere political strifes, are earnest in their intelligent appreciation of the recognition due not only to their material interests but to the just elevation of that great industry. They fully understand that their branch of our productive forces has been ignored, or recognized in a grudging, half-hearted way. Indeed, it would seem as if the Government was half ashamed of that industry that is the bed-rock of its wealth and power. Indeed, in this House it is receiving less ridicule only as its strength is becoming more obvious and formidable. This bill may be defeated to-day, but its success you cannot long postpone. This Department has, in spite of manifold obstacles, attained to such national importance that its just rank and representation in the Cabinet cannot be defeated. I trust it may be done now. For many years the attention of Congress has been asked to the importance of an Agricultural Department worthy of its name and necessities. Its capacity for good should be enlarged to an extent somewhat commensurate with its present benefits and its grand possibilities. It would be not only a substantial service to every industrial interest, but a just and graceful recognition of that large class, the farmers of the country, who have always been modest in their demands on the Government.

OBJECTIONS.

We have to-day heard some of the well-worn arguments against this measure. My excellent friend from New York, [Mr. COVERT,] learned, eloquent, and accomplished, still in himself as well as in his speech affords a striking illustration of what I have been saying in regard to the neglect or injustice with which the great agricultural interest is treated here and elsewhere. He is a good lawyer, and as such has held high positions in his district. He is a polished gentleman. He is an entertaining speaker, and I always enjoy listening to him. But I have never heard that any reckless admirer suspects that he knows practically anything about agriculture. And yet in utter disregard or sheer contempt of its fair claims, or for some mysterious reasons, he was made chairman of that committee, and now opposes this bill reported from his own committee and so important to the interests, development, and rank of agriculture. What stronger proof could we have that it will be treated fairly only when it comes to full dignity and power?

But let us turn to what we will call the argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COVERT,] chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. He says:

> I assume that perhaps the only important argument which is submitted for the adoption of this measure is in the fact that a large proportion of the people of this country who are engaged in industrial pursuits are engaged in some branch of the business of agriculture. It seems to me therein lies one great reason why this bill should not be adopted by this House and should not be enacted into law. We have, sir, the strange spectacle presented of a large class of the people, already strong in number, strong in material resources, and abundantly able to protect their own interests, clamoring for the elevation of this Department and for the dispensing of special favors to them, when, with the same glance, we see our commercial interests lying prostrate and our manufacturing interests by no means such as they should be; yet no demand comes up from those engaged either in commerce or manufactures asking special governmental intervention in their behalf.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that this request is not made by the real agriculturists of this country or by any relatively large number of thoughtful or intelligent men engaged in that business throughout the length and breadth of this land. The intelligent and thoughtful farmer belongs to his local grange, to his town, county, or State agricultural society, and has the benefit of periodicals and newspapers published specially for his uses and needs. These give him the latest experimental information on all questions in which he takes an interest in connection with his business; he is self-reliant, and does not come to besiege the doors of Congress, asking that this be made a Cabinet Department, or that the Commissioner be made a Cabinet officer.

I have quoted his argument thus fully, since his place at the head of the Committee on Agriculture gives it the added weight of his position, and also because he is an honest, able opponent of the measure. But it evinces a sturdy disregard of facts and an affluence of misinformation which probably it is not unreasonable to expect when a New York lawyer expounds the subject of agriculture. The assumption that the "only important argument" for this measure is that the large proportion of the people are engaged in agricultural pursuits is simply to misapprehend the real points in issue. The fact that a majority of the people of this country are engaged in this industry furnishes of itself no proof that this should be made a full Executive Department. But that the demand comes from a class so vast in number and so commanding in character and influence is a reason why it should be respectfully heard and favorably considered. Then the justness of the measure, its obvious benefit to that mighty industry and necessarily to every other productive industry of which it is the underlying source, its earnest approval by so large a class of the most intelligent and valuable portions of our population, and, not least, its healthy and ample recognition of that honorable labor which in the highest sense, as an intelligent and ennobling husbandry, is distinctively an American occupation, do furnish "argument" and "reason" abundant and conclusive that it should receive the approval of Congress and the authority of law.

Then the gentleman involves himself in a greater absurdity. He claims first, as I have quoted, that the farmers, "a large class of these people, strong in numbers, strong in material resources," come "clamoring for the elevation of this Department." He reproves them sharply for their presumption and seems specially annoyed by this clamor of such a multitude. But in the next paragraph he declares that "this request is not made by the real agriculturists" at all. They are at home quietly reading the "periodicals and newspapers published specially for their uses and needs," and doubtless pondering the mysteries of legislative wisdom so far as it is revealed to him in those rural journals suited to his "needs." Is it not a little unfair that this measure shall be refused because those most vitally interested come "clamoring" for it, and so do not deserve it because most earnestly and most respectfully they ask for it. And if not denied on that account they shall be, since they did not ask at all, and of course by default have lost all rights. One or the other of these positions may be good. That both can be is impossible, and I deny the truth of either.

It is true that petitions, courteous and earnest in terms, have come to this and former Congresses asking for this measure, bearing the signatures of hundreds of thousands of men of various occupations and representing largely the most intelligent and valuable elements of American citizenship. But, my friend says, this request does not come from the "real agriculturists." Still he describes them "as a large class, strong in numbers, strong in material resources." Among the farmers of this country there is no such class, save the "real agriculturists." The theorists, the bummers, and the laggards in that noble but laborious pursuit never fill the last condition as to "material resources."

Since the opening of this Congress I have presented to this House petitions signed by thousands of the "real agriculturists" of the district I represent in favor of this measure of justice and public good. No more intelligent, useful, or productive class exists in this or any other country. It is a rapidly progressive class. Science and invention have somewhat relieved the drudgery of their occupation, and they can give more time to improvement and culture.

I assert that the real agriculturists by a vast majority are heartily in favor of this measure of practical benefit and just recognition. In large and long intercourse with the farmers of this country—a class to which I have always been proud to belong—I have found this opinion almost universal. The only exception I can recall is a man whose crops and fields attest that he has faith in neither industry nor fertilizers nor what he calls "book-farmin'." As a class they are neither clamorous nor aggressive, but they are earnest in their convictions and progressive in intelligence. They do not confine themselves strictly to any special "papers and periodicals," but find "uses" and "needs" as well as pleasure alike in science, history, and literature, in liberal culture and wise development. This morning I read the report of a "farmers' institute" just held at Barnesville, Belmont County, in the district I have the honor to represent, and the proceedings, participated in largely by the farmers of the vicinity would do honor to this or any other deliberative body. Among a crowd of good things in the proceedings I was struck with this, which I have long wished we could realize fully in this House: "The Government assumes the right to take the farmer's land for railroad purposes, paying him a price fixed by some one who has no interest in the matter. Why has it not the same right to regulate freight charges for transportation, which absorb the price of products?"

The Ohio State Board of Agriculture has just put in operation a plan for reliable statistics in regard to growing or recently harvested crops. It has also organized and is now conducting a series of "farmers' institutes" throughout the State with great interest and benefit. All over the United States institutes, granges, and agricultural societies are demanding the elevation of the Department of Agriculture to the full rank of other Executive Departments. Only last week the New England Agricultural Society strongly indorsed this measure, believing that it would enable that Department "to attain a broader field of usefulness and more securely reach the standard contemplated in its original construction." Agriculture is daily advancing in the scope of its powers and the magnitude of its results. Already its dignity and domain are the broadest realms of science and its benefits are the support, comfort, and prosperity of civilized nations.

"NO WARRANT IN THE CONSTITUTION."

But "the unkindest cut of all" is dealt when the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture arraigns and repudiates that whole Department of which he is supposed to be the titulary exponent and defender. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] says:

> The design of the framers and founders of our Constitution was that every person and every class of industry here should stand entirely upon its own basis, without reference to governmental aid or special privileges. There is absolutely no warrant in the Constitution for the so-called "elevation" of this Department of Agriculture, and no warrant even for the establishment or existence of a Department of Agriculture as it stands to-day. That Department stands to-day as the illegitimate child of the Government.

Being a rural member and not a great constitutional lawyer, if it was only my own judgment against the "opinion" of the gentleman from New York I would at once consent to a nonsuit. But it generally happens you can offset the opinion of one great constitutional lawyer by that of another equally learned who maintains the exact opposite. This very question was up in the United States Senate upon a time when I happened to be present, when a great constitutional lawyer triumphantly demanded to be informed what clause of the Constitution gave Congress any power to establish an Agricultural Department. Fortunately a still greater constitutional lawyer was ready to make it plain. So we are left at last to contemporaneous interpretation, common sense, and public necessity. Indeed the very highest legal authorities can bring us no better guides. And this measure is one which comes fully within the scope of that power to "promote the general welfare" affirmed in the first lines of the Constitution as one of its special objects. No less is it completely covered by that ample provision of section 8 which affirms the power of Congress:

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof.

And so since the foundation of our Government it has been an accepted principle of interpretation to deduce the existence of "implied powers" from one or several of the substantive powers expressly affirmed and defined. Such construction of the Constitution is plainly recognized in its own provisions. A careful study of the debates of the convention which framed the Constitution makes it clear that in the opinion of its founders powers are there created which are neither expressly specified nor deducible from any one specified power, but which grew out of "the aggregate of powers conferred upon the Government or out of the sovereignty instituted." More than fifty years ago Chief-Justice Marshall said:

> A constitution to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which it may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a political code and would scarcely be embraced by the human mind. * * * Its nature, therefore, requires that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of those objects themselves.—4 Wheaton, 405.

In the same decision Chief-Justice Marshall, in speaking of the discretion which must be allowed to Congress as to the means by which the powers conferred are to be carried into execution, with great directness further says:

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

But we are not left to legal theories or judicial opinions alone in regard to the intention of the framers of our Constitution, not only as to the general scope of its implied powers, but even as to the constitutionality, the necessity, and utility of some such measure as the one now before this House. Facts must dominate theories, however plausible or attractive. One of the profoundest thinkers of this age, himself not only an interpreter of law but of the rules of its interpretation, wisely says:

> On doubtful points of high importance, especially in constitutional matters, we may by a precedent leave the sea of theory and cast anchor in the solid ground of practical life. We moor in reality, and it requires an additional power to weigh anchors, which, for good or evil, have buried their flukes in substantial ground.

"AN ANCHOR IN SOLID GROUND."

And on this very question we have precedent and authority as old as the convention which framed our Constitution, but to which, so far as I know, reference has never been made. In that convention various outlines of plans for the basis of the Constitution were proposed. On the 20th of August, 1787, a plan was offered by Morris, of Pennsylvania, and seconded by General Pinckney, of South Carolina, providing for "a council of state composed of the following officers: 1. Chief-justice of the supreme court. 2. The secretary of domestic affairs, whose duty shall be to attend to matters of general police, the state of agriculture and manufactures, the opening of roads and navigation, and the facilitating communication through the United States. 3. Secretary of commerce and finance. 4. Secretary of foreign affairs. 5. Secretary of war. 6. Secretary of the marine."

This plan, with the others, was "referred to the committee of detail," and no Cabinet officers were provided for in the constitution. But it is a significant fact that in this detailed plan of a constitution, brought forward by two of the ablest men in that august body, the first Cabinet officer named was one whose duties would be such as to make him substantially a secretary of "agriculture and manufactures." And such first place for that first industry of our country was in exact conformity with the consideration in which it was held by these founders of our Government.

In further proof of this it may be mentioned that Washington in his first message to Congress brings this subject to its attention very forcibly in saying, "The advancement of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, by all proper means, will not, I trust, need recommendation."

But, contrary to his expectations, no active measures had been taken to carry into effect his suggestions. And in his last annual message, December 7, 1796, he not only urges Congress to do something practically to promote agriculture, but suggests the plan by a board organized and supported by national law. He says:

> It will not be doubted that, with reference to individual or national welfare, agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population and other circumstances of maturity, this truth becomes more apparent, and renders the cultivation of the soil more and more an object of public patronage. Institutions for promoting it grow up, supported by the public purse; and to what object can it be dedicated with greater propriety? Among the means which have been employed to this end none have been attended with greater success than the establishment of boards charged with collecting and diffusing information, and enabled by premiums and small pecuniary aids to encourage and assist a spirit of discovery and improvement. * * * Experience accordingly hath shown that they are very cheap instruments of immense national benefit.

HISTORY.

Washington's views on this subject came from practical knowledge.

Himself devoted to agricultural pursuits, he spoke from wide experience and observation when he said, "I know of no pursuit in which more zeal and important service can be rendered to any country than by improving its agriculture, its stock of useful animals, and other branches of the husbandman's cares." To all these details on his own farm he gave the most careful attention. While he was President he continued his interest and personal control of his agricultural affairs. It is interesting to trace this in the correspondence he kept up on the subject throughout both terms of his Presidency with some of the most distinguished men in this country and Europe. In a letter to Sir John Sinclair, of England, dated 1794, he says:

> After the peace of Paris in 1783, and my return to the occupations of a farmer, I paid particular attention to my breed of sheep, of which I usually kept about seven or eight hundred. By this attention at the shearing of 1789 the fleeces yielded me the average of five and one quarter pounds of wool equal in quality to the Kentish wool. But in that same year I was again called from home, and have not had it in my power since to pay such attention to my farm, the consequence of which is that my sheep at the last shearing yielded not more than two and one-half pounds.

But his interest in these pursuits was that of the statesman no less than the personal interest of the farmer. He recognized this as an industry which is the basis of manufactures and commerce, and the source of the wealth and prosperity of the nation. To the end of his life, both privately and publicly, he urged that it should receive recognition and benefit by congressional legislation. In a letter to Sir John Sinclair, March 6, 1797, only two days after the expiration of his second term, this was the main theme of discussion. After speaking of the pleasure he anticipated by the change "for a more tranquil theater and for the indulgence of rural pursuits," he says:

> I am sorry to add that nothing final in Congress has been decided respecting the institution of a national board of agriculture, recommended by me at the opening of the session. But this did not, I believe, proceed from any disinclination to the measure, but from their limited sitting and the pressure of what they conceived more important business. I think it highly probable that next session will bring this matter to maturity.

DID WASHINGTON KNOW?

I have quoted this more fully not only for the weight and wisdom of this great authority, so moderate, so sagacious, and so venerated, but because we have been told by the gentleman from New York that "the design of the founders and framers of our Constitution was that every person and every class of industry should stand entirely upon its own basis, without reference to governmental aid or special privileges." The gentleman adds that there is absolutely no warrant in the Constitution for an Agricultural Department.

Was not Washington one of the "framers?" Ah, how densely ignorant he lived and died of the "design" of the illustrious body which framed that great charter of national power! Is it not passing strange that month after month he sat at the head of that august council, and then for eight years carried their work into successful execution, urging upon Congress substantially such measures as have given us the Department of Agriculture, believing it failed "not from any disinclination to the measure," died hoping for its early "maturity," and yet never fathomed the great secret which a grateful country now receives with some wonder, that there is in that Constitution "no warrant" for such work. Irreverent iconoclasts have attempted to rob us of the beautiful legend of the tree and hatchet, but now we are to be told that George Washington, in the maturity of his years and the ripeness of his wisdom, did not even understand the Constitution of his country, and its full interpretation was reserved to the sage of "Sumpawamus." The marvel is that the gentleman from New York, so strict a constructionist against expenditure for an Agricultural Department, had no constitutional scruples when he procured to be inserted in the river and harbor bill of the present session an appropriation of $5,000 for the improvement of Sumpawamus, an inlet of Long Island, whose location is so obscure as to be in dispute between the gentleman himself, his senior colleague from New York, and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and whose very existence is still stoutly denied by a leading New York journal. This constitutional power to improve rivers and harbors once so stoutly denied by the gentleman's party, he now claims for the benefit of commerce by a liberal construction which he denies to agriculture, that mighty industry which is the source not only of commerce, but of all prosperity.

MORE AUTHORITY FOR IT.

The Agricultural Department has gradually grown up to meet, to some extent, the needs of that interest and the demands of the country. In 1839 $1,000 were appropriated to be expended in collecting agricultural statistics, to be done under the control of the Commissioner of Patents. In 1849 the Department of the Interior was created by law, and in this agriculture was allowed a clerkship. By 1851 the appropriation for it had gone up to $3,000.

In his first annual message, December 2, 1861, Abraham Lincoln urged Congress to do something commensurate with its importance and predicted that the "results will be of great practical value to the country." He says:

> Agriculture, confessedly the largest interest in the nation, has not a department, nor a bureau, but a clerkship only assigned to it in the Government. While it is fortunate that this great interest is so independent in its nature as not to have demanded and extorted more from the Government, I respectfully ask Congress to consider whether something cannot be given voluntarily with great advantage.

This, too, was at a period when every resource and energy of the nation seemed fully engaged in the struggle to preserve its own existence. But the far-reaching wisdom of Lincoln recognized the development of agriculture as an element inseparable to national growth and power, whether in peace or war. The unfitness of the time was urged by the fogies of both parties. The debate on the measure of creating an Agricultural Department at that time is full of interest and instruction. The constitutional objections were raised and answered. Then, as now, there was much law and little agriculture in either House or Senate. But one of the greatest lawyers and statesmen then in the Senate (Mr. Fessenden, of Maine) so well stated a principle which might constantly assist us, and its application to the present measure is so doubly forcible, that it may be adduced. Alluding to what had already been done in that direction by the collection of statistics and the distribution of seeds, which by that time amounted to $60,000 per annum, he said:

> There is such a thing as having a constitutional question settled by legislative construction to such an extent at least that Senators feel compelled to follow the precedents that have been set, and are perfectly justified in following them, because they cannot be raised always in reference to matters of this description.

Years before President Madison had said:

> Repeated recognitions under varied circumstances, in acts of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government, accompanied by indications in different modes of the concurrence of the general will of the nation * * * afford to the President sufficient authority for considering such disputed points as settled.

Now appropriations have been made by Congress for forty-two years for this purpose. Success has lent its sanction. Every year's experience emphasizes the fact that all the money expended is returned over and over in absolute increase of wealth and prosperity. Legislative construction multiplies its authorities. Executives and courts accept it as settled. Abundant indorsement, by resolutions, by the press, and by petitioners, indicate unmistakably the "concurrence of the general will of the nation." The present Executive year after year wisely urges the necessity of enlarging the scope and "facilities of the Department of Agriculture." And yet in the House or Senate every opponent of this measure who has ever in a law office become "versed in title pages" or drawn a brief, rushes to rescue the Constitution imperiled by the distribution of a meager and most inadequate supply of seeds and plants. They know it stood the shock of civil war, that its ample powers have been large enough for every need of progressive development and yet strong enough to resist every encroachment, and yet they refuse to be comforted or to believe it can survive the deadly assault of a few thousand packages of incendiary "Minnesota sorghum" or treasonable Fultz wheat.

"CLASS LEGISLATION!"

It is sometimes urged that this would be class legislation. I once heard it flippantly declared in the United States Senate that a shoemaker's bureau might as legitimately be established by the Government as an agricultural department. As an argument, this simile is not formidable. The Constitution has no obstacle to Congressional care for all those interests which lie at the foundation of our prosperity as a people. Commerce has received the special protection of the Government since its foundation. The improvements of our harbors and navigable rivers, the establishment of light-houses and signals along our shores have always been liberally made in its behalf. The manufactures of our country have been developed into their present vast proportions by the wise and direct protection and fostering care of the Government. Amply has this cost and care been repaid, not only in the actual return of increased wealth and utilized resources, but more important and higher far in the vast employment of intelligent labor, in awakened inventive powers, and in the new life and energy which their productive forces infuse into all our industries. Indeed, while commerce and manufactures combined employ about half as many of our people as agriculture, the Departments of the Interior and the Treasury are very largely occupied with their interests.

Agriculture is a fundamental and universal interest, for it involves not only our material prosperity but the welfare, comfort, social condition, and progressive growth of the American people. The laws, both physical and economic, which govern it still need for their interpretation every light of science and every aid of art. Government alone, with its wide opportunities and organizing capacity, can give this success. And agriculture can speedily return all this outlay, however magnificent. Just now no more important work awaits reward than that of classifying its resources and products, exploring its great opportunities, improving its processes, and giving it, as the grant and guarantee of all this, the support and recognition of Government in its organization and progress. A department devoted to this work and combining the associate industries, such as manufactures, mining, and inland transportation, is what the country needs. If such a department is entitled to a Cabinet position, as it certainly is, why shall it be denied? There is no bar to it either in law or Constitution. The ministers which now stand around the President have from time to time been called there as the demand and necessities of our country justified it.

THE GRADUAL GROWTH OF THE CABINET.

In September, 1789, six months after the inauguration of Washington, three Executive Departments were created by statute, and to them special duties were assigned. These were the Departments of State, of the Treasury, and War. The several heads of these alone composed the Cabinet, which sat in council with Washington. In 1798 a Navy Department was organized by law, and its first Secretary, Benjamin Stoddard, took his seat in the Cabinet of John Adams with Pickering, Wolcott, and McHenry. The Constitution authorizes Congress "to establish post-offices and post-roads," but that Department was never by statute elevated into a full Executive Department. That was done by the edict of Jackson, who, in March, 1829, appointed John McLean, of Ohio, Postmaster-General, and called him to a seat in his Cabinet with Van Buren, Ingham, Eaton, and Branch. In 1849 the Department of the Interior was created, and its first Secretary, Thomas Ewing, became a member of the Cabinet. The Attorney-General, of course, was a member of the Cabinet also, though he had no Executive Department until 1870, when Congress by law established the Department of Justice. Thus the Cabinet has been enlarged from time to time as the new demands and needs of our rapidly progressive development indicated the wisdom of such change. We have an Army of only 25,000 soldiers, but a Secretary of War in full cabinet rank. We have no Navy worthy of the name, but the Secretary of that Department sits at the council of the President. The Secretary who supervises mail contracts, and the Secretary who has charge of the Indians and of the wild lands of the Government, each, by virtue of his office, belongs to the President's council.

Twenty-seven millions of our population are directly interested in agriculture, and all the rest indirectly. The capital invested in it is estimated at more than $14,000,000,000, equal to full one-third of all our property. It is furnishing direct from the farms more than four-fifths of our immense exports. When commerce was stagnant; when our manufactures, overwhelmed by the late panic, were prostrate and pulseless; when our great financial fabrics went down, burying fortunes and enterprise in their ruins, then this great and enduring productive force displayed its full measure of beneficent power and came, with the measureless affluence of its varied resources, to bring back prosperity, and to fortify the nation's credit with the bounty of the nation's surest wealth. Why shall it still be condemned to secondary rank? This injustice involves not only the wrong and indignity to this greatest and most necessary of all human industries, but by limiting its benefits and neglecting its grand possibilities the loss falls on all other industries of which it is either the primal source or the indispensable reliance.

Fogyism derides all change, and therefore necessarily resists all progress. In this age, and under free institutions, new epochs rapidly succeed each other, instinct with the principles of an expansive life. So in our development many of our wisest, most necessary, and now most universally accepted systems were at first opposed by fogies as innovations, and by the technical as unconstitutional. Just thirty-seven years ago Congress made an appropriation of $30,000 to Morse that the world might have the telegraph. For six years its full success only awaited the needed means. The chief argument against it was ridicule. The serene wisdom of Congress waited long; some for its success, more for its failure. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, pronounced it "unworthy the notice of sensible men." The vote was close, and after the aid was given its opponents stood ready with the cowardly "I told you so," awaiting the failure of the great invention.

There is in our Constitution ample powers for wise progression. There is in it no express authorization of our Life-saving service, or a Coast-survey, or an Arctic expedition, or a Fish commission, or a Geodetic survey, or a Soldiers' national cemetery, or a Soldiers' home, or a Yorktown centennial. But if that charter is not vital with possibilities of progress, it is a fetter upon our national life. Burke wisely says, "He only is a statesman who unites the ability to improve with the disposition to preserve."

It has been only a few years since the judges of our Supreme Court sat in horse-hair wigs of the English fashion, and as late as 1825, says the reliable author of Reminiscences of Washington, "No lawyer had ever addressed that court with boots on or wearing whiskers." Now the judges wear only their own hair, or none as the case may be, and lawyers come before it in all styles and no style, and yet the Constitution survives the innovation and the country moves on in its career heedless of the shock or the peril.

RESOURCES AND PRODUCTS OF AGRICULTURE.

Professor Johnson estimates that nine-tenths of the fixed capital in the United States is embarked in agriculture. It pays nearly four-fifths of the taxes collected in the country. Over 51 per cent. of our population, or more than 26,000,000 are engaged in this industry. Our country is rapidly becoming the food-field of the world. Less than forty years ago wheat was imported from the Black Sea to New York. Last year ending June 30, 1880, we sent two hundred and eighty-eight millions thirty-six thousand eight hundred and thirty-five dollars' worth of wheat and breadstuffs to feed Europe. In July The London Times said: "American harvests ripen for the food of Lancashire and London. All mankind gain by the prosperity which the American people has succeeded in extracting from that noble land." Besides wheat and breadstuffs our last year's export of other provisions to Europe was more than two hundred million dollars' worth. The value of the cotton crop of 1879 was $242,140,987. But cotton is no longer "king." The value of the corn crop of that year was $580,486,217. Corn is king. The value of the wheat crop of same year was $497,030,-142. Wheat is queen. The value of the hay crop was $330,804,994. Hay is heir apparent. Within the last year the farmers of this country have enlarged their business capital $416,000,000. The aggregate value of the various agricultural products of 1880, according to the most reliable estimates, represents the grand total of not less than $2,240,000,000 or nearly 76 per cent. of our total products. Largely from these vast resources the country is developed, our national debt is rapidly reduced, our growth in wealth and culture outruns all example, and the nation's credit and the nation's balance-sheet is the modern marvel to the world.

Our increase in national wealth since 1850, says a high English authority, would be enough "to purchase the whole German Empire, with its farms, cities, banks, and manufactories." The annual accumulation of wealth in Great Britain is $325,000,000; in France, $375,000,000. In the United States it is $875,000,000, or nearly $2,300,-000 for every day. Each decade adds more to the wealth of the United States than the capital value of both Italy and Spain. Of this vast aggregate about three-fourths has constantly been supplied by agriculture, besides the uncounted millions from that source which, in home consumption, daily contribute the necessities and luxuries of life, but of the value of which, in their infinite variety, no definite computation is possible.

Mr. Nimmo, the accurate and accomplished chief of the Bureau of Statistics, by my request, has kindly prepared for me the two following tables; the first of which furnishes interesting and reliable data of our agricultural products of 1879, the last fully known, and also of our agricultural exports for the year ending June 30, 1880. The second furnishes a valuable and suggestive comparison of the agricultural exports of 1871 with those of 1880:

Quantities and values of the following-mentioned domestic articles, produced in the United States during the calendar year 1879, and exported from the United States during the fiscal year 1880, with the percentage of the quantity of each article exported and retained for consumption.

[NOTE.—Corn-meal and flour are reduced to equivalent bushels of grain.]

Articles.	Production, calendar year, 1879.		Domestic exports, year ended June 30, 1880.		Percentage of product exported.	Percentage retained for consumption.
	Quantity.	Value.	Quantity.	Value.
Corn, bushels	1,547,901,790	$580,486,217	*87,884,892	*$54,279,608	5.68	94.32
Wheat, bushels	448,756,630	497,030,142	†180,304,181	†225,879,502	40.18	59.82
Rye, bushels	23,639,460	15,507,431	‡4,871,295	‡2,387,493	20.61	79.39
Oats, bushels	363,761,320	120,533,294	766,366	308,129	.21	99.79
Barley, bushels	40,283,100	23,714,444	1,128,923	784,819	2.80	97.20
Buckwheat, bushels	13,140,000	7,856,191	Not specified.	Not specified.
Potatoes, bushels	181,626,400	79,153,673	696,080	522,039	.38	99.62
Tobacco, leaf, pounds	391,278,350	22,727,524	215,910,187	16,379,107	55.18	44.82
Hay, tons	35,493,000	330,804,494	13,739	206,819	.04	99.96
Cotton, raw, pounds	2,367,540,900	242,140,987	1,822,061,114	211,535,905	76.96	23.04
Wool, raw, pounds	232,500,000	Not stated.	191,551	71,987	.08	99.92
Sugar, pounds	177,644,000	Not stated.	30,142,004	2,718,627	16.97	83.03
Molasses, gallons	12,200,000	Not stated.	3,596,010	539,603	29.48	70.52
Pig iron, pounds	5,483,706,000	Not stated.	2,948,773	54,115	.05	99.95
Railroad bars or rails:
Iron, pounds	840,320,000	Not stated.	1,555,840	32,746	.19	99.81
Steel, pounds	1,386,226,000	Not stated.	702,040	14,744	.51	99.49
Coal, tons	59,808,398	Not stated.	615,260	2,058,080	1.03	98.97

* Including corn-meal. † Including flour. ‡ Including rye flour.

JOSEPH NIMMO, Jr., Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, February 16, 1881.

Hon. J. T. UPDEGRAFF.

Values of products of domestic agriculture exported from the United States during the years 1871 and 1880. (Mixed gold and currency values.)

Commodities.	Year ended June 30— 1871.	1880.
Animals, living:
Hogs	$61,390 00	$421,089 00
Horned cattle	403,491 00	13,344,195 00
Horses	173,273 00	675,139 00
Mules	265,827 00	532,362 00
Sheep	86,888 00	892,647 00
All other, and fowls	28,735 00	16,688 00
Total	1,019,604 00	15,882,120 00
Animal oils:
Lard-oil	153,850 00	816,447 00
Neat's-foot and other animal oils	137 00	23,519 00
Total	153,987 00	839,966 00
Provisions:
Bacon and hams	8,126,683 00	50,987,623 00
Beef, fresh	.....	7,441,918 00
Beef, salted or cured	3,825,666 00	2,881,047 00
Butter	853,096 00	6,690 687 00
Cheese	8,752,990 00	12,171,720 00
Condensed milk	91,624 00	121,013 00
Eggs	1,428 00	14,148 00
Lard	10,563,020 00	27,920,367 00
Meats, preserved	208,362 00	7,877,200 00
Mutton, fresh	.....	176,218 00
Pork	4,302,320 00	5,930,252 00
Total	36,725,189 00	122,212,193 00
Hides and skins, other than furs	700,604 00	649,074 00
Tallow	3,025,035 00	7,689,232 00
Bones and bone-dust	55,629 00	46,431 00
Hair, unmanufactured	301,095 00	232,726 00
Glue	12,316 00	22,650 00
Total	4,094,679 00	8,640,113 00
Bread and breadstuffs:
Barley	200,625 00	784,819 00
Bread and biscuit	760,637 00	686,158 00
Indian corn	7,458,997 00	53,298,247 00
Indian-corn meal	951,830 00	981,361 00
Oats	83,080 00	308,129 00
Rye	44,678 00	2,362,765 00
Rye flour	34,135 00	24,728 00
Wheat	45,143,424 00	190,546,305 00
Wheat flour	24,093,184 00	35,333,197 00
Other small grain and pulse	357,893 00	1,272,028 00
Maizena, farina, and all other preparations of breadstuffs used for food	252,704 00	2,439,098 00
Total	79,381,187 00	288,036,835 00

Commodities.	Year ended June 30— 1871.	1880.
Fruits:
Apples, dried	$79,026 00	$192,069 00
Apples, green or ripe	136,693 00	1,190,560 00
Other fruit, green, ripe, or dried	138,353 00	272,715 00
Preserved, in cans or otherwise	195,283 00	435,290 00
Total	549,357 00	2,090,634 00
Seeds:
Cotton	29,386 00	134,116 00
Flaxseed or linseed	721 00	.....
Clover, timothy, garden, and all other	2,336,252 00	2,642,707 00
Total	2,366,359 00	2,776,823 00
Textiles:
Cotton, unmanufactured	218,327,109 00	211,535,905 00
Wool, unmanufactured	8,762 00	71,987 00
Hemp, unmanufactured	5,775 00	8,796 00
Total	218,341,646 00	211,616,688 00
Vegetable oils and oil-cake:
Cotton-seed oil	140,577 00	3,225,414 00
Linseed-oil	35,962 00	31,214 00
Oil-cake	4,160,021 00	6,259,827 00
Total	4,336,560 00	9,516,455 00
Miscellaneous:
Hay	104,261 00	206,819 00
Hops	316,288 00	2,573,292 00
Rice	22,502 00	13,366 00
Tobacco, leaf	19,908,797 00	16,379,107 00
Potatoes	432,815 00	522,039 00
Onions	79,114 00	50,074 00
Other vegetables, raw, prepared and preserved	124,760 00	222,953 00
Sugar, brown	2,453 00	1,064 00
Wax, bees'	113,070 00	48,880 00
Wine	26,444 00	123,317 00
All other agricultural products	366,939 00	4,208,353 00
Total	21,497,443 00	24,349,264 00
Total value of agricultural products above enumerated	368,466,011 00	685,961,091 00
Total value of all exports of domestic merchandise	478,115,292 00	823,946,353 00
Per cent. of agricultural products to total exports of domestic merchandise	77.07	83.25

JOSEPH NIMMO, Jr., Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, February 16, 1881.

The above tables show that the value of our exports of bread and breadstuffs for the year ending June 30, 1880, amounted to $288,036,835, exceeding the exports of raw cotton during the same year by the sum of $76,500,930. The following table giving our exports and imports for the last twenty years shows another valuable fact in our history, namely, that it has been only since our agricultural products have assumed such vast proportions and furnished so large a surplus for exportation that the balance of trade has been in favor of our country:

Value of merchandise imported into and exported from the United States from 1860 to 1880, inclusive; also, annual excess of imports or of exports. (Specie values.)

Year ended June 30—	Exports. Domestic.	Foreign.	Total exports.	Imports.	Excess of exports over imports.	Excess of imports over exports.
1860	$316,242,423	$17,333,634	$333,576,057	$353,616,119	.....	$20,040,062
1861	204,899,616	14,654,217	219,553,833	289,310,542	.....	69,756,709
1862	179,644,024	11,026,477	190,670,501	189,356,677	$1,313,824	.....
1863	186,003,912	17,960,535	203,964,447	243,335,815	.....	39,371,368
1864	143,504,027	15,333,961	158,837,988	316,447,283	.....	157,609,295
1865	136,940,248	29,089,055	166,029,303	238,745,580	.....	72,716,277
1866	337,518,102	11,341,420	348,859,522	434,812,066	.....	85,952,544
1867	279,876,809	14,719,332	294,596,141	395,761,096	.....	101,254,955
1868	269,389,900	12,562,999	281,952,899	357,436,440	.....	75,483,541
1869	275,166,697	10,951,000	286,117,697	417,506,379	.....	131,388,682
1870	376,616,473	16,155,295	392,771,768	435,958,408	.....	43,186,640
1871	428,398,908	14,421,270	442,820,178	520,223,684	.....	77,403,506
1872	428,487,131	15,690,455	444,177,586	626,595,077	.....	182,417,491
1873	505,033,439	17,446,483	522,479,922	642,136,210	.....	119,656,288
1874	569,433,421	16,849,619	586,283,040	567,406,342	18,876,698	.....
1875	499,284,100	14,158,611	513,442,711	533,005,436	.....	19,562,725
1876	525,582,247	14,802,424	540,384,671	460,741,190	79,643,481	.....
1877	589,670,224	12,804,996	602,475,220	451,323,126	151,152,094	.....
1878	680,709,268	14,156,498	694,865,766	000,051,532	217,814,234	.....
1879	698,340,790	12,098,651	710,439,441	445,777,775	264,661,666	.....
1880	823,946,353	11,692,305	835,638,658	667,954,746	167,683,912	.....

The table following shows the increase of our exports for fifty years, and exhibits the suggestive fact that when in 1830 our whole exports were $58,524,878, agriculture furnished 82 per cent. of that amount, and when last year our exports amounted to $823,946,353, agriculture still furnished 82.9 per cent. of that great total.

EXPORTS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The following statement shows the total value of exports of domestic merchandise, the value of the exports of the products of agriculture, and the percentage which the exports of such products bear to the total value of exports of domestic merchandise, for the years specified:

Year ended—	Value of exports of domestic merchandise.	Value of exports of products of domestic agriculture.	Per cent. of products of agriculture.
September 30—
1830	$58, 524, 878	$48, 095, 184	82. 18
1840	111, 660, 561	92, 548, 067	82. 93
June 30—
1850	134, 900, 233	108, 605, 713	80. 51
1860	316, 242, 423	256, 560, 972	81. 14
1870	455, 208, 341	361, 188, 483	79. 34
1871	478, 115, 292	368, 466, 011	77. 07
1872	476, 421, 478	368, 796, 625	77. 41
1873	575, 227, 017	446, 900, 004	77. 69
1874	633, 339, 368	501, 371, 501	79. 16
1875	559, 237, 638	430, 306, 570	76. 95
1876	594, 917, 715	456, 113, 515	76. 67
1877	632, 980, 854	459, 734, 148	72. 63
1878	695, 749, 930	536, 192, 873	77. 07
1879	699, 538, 742	546, 476, 703	78. 12
1880	823, 946, 353	683, 010, 976	82. 90

THE REASON WHY.

Such is the basis of resource and wealth upon which agriculture is developing. To meet its just needs it should have the aid of all the resources and authority of a full Executive Department with a Secretary at its head who as a Cabinet counselor of the President would represent its interests and thereby promote the general welfare, for he could not only increase its products but defend its policies. No department of the Government would be in its character so representative of the American people. Just such assistance the interests of the whole people now need, that it may for the common good check the power of the railroad monopolies which are robbing the industries of the country, and especially agriculture. These corporations are so combined and so powerful that they have not only risen above the control of law, but themselves dictate or defy legislation. Their power is arrayed against the common good, but the national authority resolutely used is ample for their control.

Another present need for the full authority of an executive department comes in the imperative necessity that it control the forestry of the country and protect it from wasteful use and wanton destruction. A division of forestry should be created in this department to take in especial charge this matter of public interest. The increase of our forest growth has now become a question of the supply of water and of the fertility of the soil as well as of the healthfulness and beauty of the country. Several State Legislatures have recognized its importance and have made appropriations to protect existing forests and plant new ones. But we have still a large national domain and the Government can do great good at little cost.

IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

No country on earth has an agricultural interest or product equal to ours, yet in most countries of Europe it receives such consideration as is here denied to it. In France the ministry of agriculture and commerce is one of the executive departments and its head a minister of State. In Russia one of the ten secretaries is "minister of the domains" and has charge of agriculture, mining, forestry, and stock-raising. Spain has eight cabinet secretaries of whom one is minister of agriculture. Italy and Austro-Hungary give agriculture the same full rank. In Russia one of the eight secretaries is minister of agriculture.

In England the interests of agriculture are under the control of the board of trade; but in a private letter which I lately received from John Bright he says "the demand is strong for a minister of agriculture." Why shall this country continue to degrade the rank of its greatest industry? Why shall the Commissioner of Internal Revenue receive double the salary by statute paid the Commissioner of Agriculture? Why shall the Secretary of the Navy (?) be paid three times as much? Why shall the time and work of the Commissioner of Agriculture be declared by law worth less by thousands or by hundreds than the time and work of the Commissioner of Patents, of Customs, of Lands; or of the Comptroller of Currency, or Register of Treasury, or Assistant Secretary of Treasury, or Architect of Capitol, or United States Geologist, or Librarian, or Congressional Reporter? There is no valid reason and no justification. Our Commissioner of Agriculture has worked for the interests and success of his Department with a zeal, an ability, and energy which have added millions to the agricultural productions of the country. The meager and unequal compensation is part of the stupid and invidious policy which seeks thereby to give an inferior status to that Department. The agriculturists of this country possess the power—and it is time they should make it felt—and remedy, not only an injustice, but an indignity, to that industry which is the basis of general prosperity. In his message of 1861, President Lincoln declared it was through forbearance they had not "extorted" just recognition. But each year there is better associated power among them; and it is no less resolute than it has always been moderate. In 1859 the reform bill of the English Parliament was compelled to concede that "interests" no less than population had a right to be represented.

AMERICAN AGRICULTURE MEANS FREE LABOR AND FREE HOMES.

Montesquieu, in his Spirit of Laws, says well, "Countries are not cultivated in proportion to their fertility, but to their liberty." The four million farms in the United States are mostly homes of plenty and of culture. The peasantry of Germany, the tenant of England, the vine-dresser of France, and the American farmer represent the same occupation, but in all else how different. The social and intellectual condition of the rural population of any country is no uncertain measure of its high civilization and progress. The thoughtful statesmen of Europe now admit that our system of land-holding is one of the great sources of enterprise and thrift as well as of popular content, and gives to industry the chance of permanent reward, and to labor the dignity of freedom. Popular education brings general intelligence. Industry, energy, and physical health combine to produce the elements of character which make good citizens and successful men. Loving their homes, the love of country is easier and stronger.

Schlegel, in his Philosophy of History, says:

Perhaps it is not too much to assert that many of the qualities which fitted the Romans for conquering the world, and perfecting their so celebrated jurisprudence, was acquired, or at least nourished and matured, by the skill, foresight, and persevering industry so needful for the intelligent and successful cultivation of the soil.

And in this country, since the dawn of the Revolution, when at Concord bridge,

"the embattled farmers stood,
And fired the shot heard round the world," this hardy and patriotic class has been, in every conflict, a chief source of the Nation's triumph as it is to-day a large element of the Nation's strength.

The bane of England and the curse of hapless Ireland to-day is the unnatural divorce of the soil from those who till it. One-fourth of the whole of England and Wales (more than nine million acres) is owned by 710 persons, and two-thirds of it by 10,200 persons; two-thirds of Ireland by 1,942 persons, mostly in entailed estates. Two-thirds of Scotland is owned by 330 persons. In Great Britain and Europe agriculture is loaded with the dead weights of standing armies and idle aristocracies. These it feeds from the products of its toil. No wonder that nearly six hundred thousand immigrants within the last year have sought free homes within our borders. More than three-fourths of 1 per cent. of the entire population of Great Britain and Canada have immigrated to this country during 1880! American products have filled the English markets, and this competition, with oppressive land-tenure laws, is destroying their agricultural prosperity, and producing social and political changes which will affect the structure of English society. The historian dates the decline of Spain to the expulsion of the Moors, who were the only "industrious agriculturists" of that country. Neither civilization nor prosperity has ever long remained when this fundamental industry declined.

Our country presents a grand arena for the full development of healthy national life. Our territory, without Alaska, is fifteen times as large as France or Germany, and twenty-five times as large as Great Britain and Ireland. But our free and happy homes are more than land and wealth. They and our civil institutions, our schools and churches, honored labor and equal manhood, are the expansive forces of our progress. Literally it is described in the account of the "land of promise." It is indeed "a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths, that spring out of valleys and hills—a land wherein thou canst eat bread without scarceness; thou canst not lack anything in it—a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass." The marvels of its natural resources need only wise development to return to the nation wealth beyond the dreams of avarice.

Population, wealth, and national credit have formally and definitely placed the United States among the great powers of the earth. No nation ever entered on so splended an inheritance. Its domain is large enough for independence, and enriched with every seed of national power. Here science and inventive arts have taken labor by the hand, that they might meliorate its drudgery, multiply its products, and brighten all its work with the graces of knowledge. All these advances have enlarged the scope and elevated the rank of agriculture. Quiet industries and honored labor nourish patriotism and are bribes to peace. The energy of our race developed here in open schools and free homes, elevated by the conflicts for liberty and ennobled by the opportunities and aspirations which belong to a republic, evolving wealth by the creation of real values in mine and farm, by manufactures and commerce, arms itself for independence and insures progress by the growth of indispensable interests. That career, wisely guided and expanded to the amplitude of its proper destiny, is a majestic possibility.

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. W. G. COLERICK,

OF INDIANA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 5, 1881.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census—

Mr. COLERICK said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I would gladly refrain from participating in the discussion of the bill now under consideration were it not for the unreasonable opposition that has been manifested to the bill reported by the committee fixing the number of Representatives to be apportioned among the States at 311 by gentlemen who ought to give the bill their cordial approval and zealous support. It will be remembered that the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] introduced a bill fixing the number at 301, which was referred to the Committee on the Census, of which he is the chairman and I have the honor of being a member. The bill was carefully considered by the committee, and at my suggestion, in the interest of the State of Indiana, which I represent in part on this floor, the number of Representatives to be so apportioned was increased to 311, as provided in the bill reported by the committee to the House as a substitute for the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York. The number was not increased to 311 for partisan purposes or political advantages, as asserted, but for the sole purpose of preventing a reduction in the present representation of Indiana in this House, as the number named in the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York, as well as in the amendment proposed by him fixing the number at 307, will, if either is adopted, reduce the representation of Indiana from 13, its present number, to 12, and no smaller number than 311 will preserve its present representation; and for that reason I then opposed, and will continue to oppose by my vote and voice, any proposition which if adopted will reduce its present representation. Sir, it is pardonable, if not commendable, for a member representing, as I do, one of the most populous, prosperous, and wealthy States of the Union to raise his voice in protest against the passage of any bill which will unjustly reduce the representation of his State in this body, as such a reduction will necessarily lessen the influence and impair the power of that State to secure legislation in which it may be interested and prevent legislation prejudicial to its interests.

The ratio adopted for the last apportionment was fixed at 131,425, and under it the present number of members in this House is 293. If it is deemed best neither to reduce nor increase the present number of members the ratio must be fixed at 168,497; and by adopting that as the ratio Indiana, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Ohio, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Maryland, and Tennessee will each lose a member, Pennsylvania 2, and New York 3, making in all 17. These losses will be numerically neutralized by gains of other States, as California, Iowa, Michigan, Arkansas, Mississippi, South Carolina, and West Virginia will each gain 1 member, Nebraska and Minnesota 2 each, and Kansas and Texas 3 each, making 17 in all.

If the number is fixed at 301, as provided in the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] being an increase of 8 over the present number of members, the ratio of representation will be 164,018, and Alabama, Illinois, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Texas will each secure one of the additional members. This increase will enable Alabama, Illinois, Louisiana, Maryland, and Massachusetts to preserve unbroken their present representation in the House, which they will be unable to do if the present number of members is not enlarged. If the number is to be increased to gratify the wishes and subserve the interests of those States, then I submit that the wishes and interests of other States equally deserving and alike sensitive in preserving intact their present representation should be respected, and not ignored. Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, North Carolina, Florida, and Georgia will each suffer a loss of 1 in their present representation if the number of members is fixed at 301. The gentleman from New York, realizing the wrong that he would commit by making such a discrimination between States, seeks to partially rectify such glaring injustice by offering his amendment fixing the number at 307, being an increase of 6 over the number first proposed by him, and he gives these 6 additional members to Tennessee, North Carolina, Florida, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, and thereby still deprives Indiana and Georgia of their present representation.

I fail to comprehend the true motive that induces the gentleman to disregard the desire of Indiana to preserve her present representation. Surely her claim is as well founded on right and justice as the claims of those States which he seeks to conciliate by his amendment. Why should his amendment prevail over the bill reported by the committee, which fixes the number at 311, only 4 more than the number proposed by him? By adding these 4 the present representation of Indiana and Georgia will be maintained, and no State will be deprived of a single member save Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, each of which will lose 1; but none of the three New England States which I have named will be able to preserve their present representation even if the number of members is fixed at 325, and no one has advocated or will likely advocate a proposition to increase the number so largely. While the gentleman from New York professes to be indifferent as to the manner in which his State may be affected by the apportionment, yet it is worthy of observation that if the number of members of this House is not increased New York will lose 3 members, and that by increasing the number to 301, as first proposed by him, that State will lose only 2 members, and that by his last proposition, fixing the number at 307, she will lose but 1 member. Why does the gentleman oppose the bill reported by the committee of which he is the chairman, and to whose care and management the bill was intrusted? Will it afford him any personal gratification to defeat the bill because the committee deemed it proper, over his opposition, to fix the number at 311?

The gentleman has deservedly won, in the many fierce and bitter conflicts that have occurred in this House during his long and eventful career, by his gifted and brilliant accomplishments as a debater and parliamentarian, many precious laurels of which he may justly feel proud, and he should not now covet the doubtful honor or distinction of securing a triumph over his own committee by thwarting their wish and nullifying their action. The amendment which he has offered does not emanate from the committee or meet with their approval, and I hope that it may be rejected by the House.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the substitute offered by the gentle- from Illinois, [Mr SHERWIN,] which fixes the number of members at 319, because no necessity or propriety exists for increasing so largely the size of the House. It is not offered for the purpose of preserving the present representation of States, but solely for the purpose of increasing their present representation. It is true, and I think evident to all, that this House, now consisting of 293 members, is cumbersome and unwieldy, resulting in obstructing and retarding legislation instead of facilitating and expediting it. The interests of the people in securing wise, just, and needful legislation would probably be better promoted and attained by reducing than enlarging the number of members. But it is quite evident that a determination exists to increase and not reduce the number, and in view of this fact our efforts and purpose should be to restrict the proposed increase to, and not extend it beyond, a number sufficiently large to preserve, as far as practicable, the present representation of States, and this is accomplished by the bill reported by the committee. I concede that by adopting the number suggested by the gentleman from Illinois the State of New York will be able to retain her present representation, but the generous offer which he extends to that State is rejected by her Representatives on both sides of the House, who proclaim that no such favor is asked or desired by her. Therefore I hope that he will not persist in forcing his offer on an unwilling State. If the number is fixed at 319, neither Maine, Vermont, nor New Hampshire will be able to secure their present representation. No sufficient reason can be assigned why his bill should be preferred to the one reported by the committee, which is fair and just to all the States, as none of them, save the ones that I have named, will be deprived or shorn of any of their present power in this House.

In fixing the number of Representatives to be apportioned among the States, we ought to select that number which, when apportioned, will afford the largest representation of the people, that is, which will leave the smallest fractions or fewest people unrepresented. The ratio of representation is ascertained by dividing the number of people in all the States, 49,369,595, by the number of the Representatives to be apportioned, and when the ratio is so obtained the number of Representatives to which each State will be entitled under that ratio is determined by dividing the figures representing the population of the State by those representing the ratio, which division will invariably result in leaving a fraction. As the successive divisions of the population of the different States by the ratio adopted will not produce the entire number of Representatives to be assigned, the additional ones required to complete the desired number are obtained by assigning them to those States which may have the largest fractions. To illustrate, the population of Indiana, according to the recent census, is 1,978,362. If the number of Representatives to be assigned is fixed at 301, the ratio of representation will be 164,018, and by dividing the population of the State by that ratio it will give Indiana 12 Representatives and leave a fraction of 10,146, which will be too small to entitle her to one of the Representatives to be assigned to the States having the largest resulting fractions; at 307 the ratio will be 160,813, which will give the State 12 members and leave a fraction of 48,606, which will be insufficient to entitle her to an additional Representative; at 311 the ratio will be 158,745, which will give the State 12 Representatives and leave a fraction of 85,602, which will be sufficient to give her an additional Representative, making 13, her present number; and at 319 the ratio will be 154,764, which will give the State 12 Representatives and leave a fraction of 121,194, sufficiently large to entitle her to an additional Representative.

The same resulting fractions will occur in dividing the population of each and every State by the several ratios to which I have referred, and as the additional Representatives required to complete the number to be assigned will be given to those States which may have the largest fractions, the smaller fractions will indicate the number of people who will be unrepresented, and these fractions which will be produced regardless of the ratio that may be adopted will aggregate a vast number. Hence the importance of mitigating as far as possible the wrong in depriving people of representation. It can be mitigated by selecting that number of Representatives which when apportioned will leave the smallest number of people unrepresented. Let us ascertain the number of people or fractions that will be unrepresented under the different bills or propositions that have been submitted. If we fix the number of Representatives at 301 they will amount to 648,788; at 307 to 658,844; at 311 to 641,477; and at 319 to 670,457. It will be observed that under the bill proposed by the committee the largest number of people will be represented, while the smallest number will be represented under the bill proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SHERWIN.] This, in my jugment, furnishes a potential and unanswerable argument in favor of the bill reported by the committee. If this is "a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people," a duty devolves upon us to so apportion their Representatives that the greatest number of people may be represented in this House of the people.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate and deplorable that gentlemen on the opposite side of the House seek to make this a partisan or sectional question, and evince a disposition to prevent the passage of an apportionment bill by this Congress, with the vain hope that the republican party may possibly secure some political advantage by deferring action on the subject until the next Congress convenes. No plausible pretext or excuse can be offered or given for doing so, as the census returns are before us, accompanied by elaborate tabulated estimates relating to the subject now under consideration, which were carefully prepared by the Superintendent of the Census, and by which we can now consider and determine the matter intelligently, wisely, and justly. The conduct of those who seek to evade or avoid the constitutional duty imposed on us to make the apportionment is inexcusable. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] truthfully and pertinently said in his speech:

> It is a useless waste of money to postpone this legislation until the next Congress. It compels extra sessions of the State Legislatures of the twenty-two biennial States. A republican from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARMER] thought that an extra session would cost the people of his State $400.000. If so, then the cost to the twenty-two States would not be less than $6,000,000. Why may not this be saved by provident action this session?

If the republican members of this House defeat or suspend action on this bill at this session the sole responsibility for imposing upon the people this enormous expense will rest upon them. Are they desirous of assuming the responsibility? As a pretext for their conduct they assert that under this bill the representation of Southern States will be increased, but adroitly suppress the fact that it is caused by a corresponding increase in the population of those States. We cannot deprive them of that increase unless we ignore the Constitution and disregard the law, by which we must be governed and controlled. It is probably true that many persons in the Northern States were surprised at the large increase in the population of the Southern States as shown by the census returns, but the correctness of the returns have been so strongly verified and attested by the accomplished and efficient Superintendent of the Census as to dispel all suspicion of fraud or mistakes, and we must accept them as true. The apparent increase in the population of the Southern States is largely attributable to the imperfect and defective census that was taken in those States in 1870.

We must adjust the apportionment in accordance with the census returns, regardless of the manner in which it may affect any section of the country. If the Southern States gain in representation it is their good fortune, and the Northern States should not unjustly seek to deprive them of it. By examination it will be seen that if the apportionment is fixed at 311 the gain of the South will be less than it would be if the apportionment was based on other numbers less than 311. The net gain of the South over the North on any apportionment from 290 to 311, inclusive, would be as follows: 290, 9; 291, 8; 292, 7; 293, 6; 294, 5; 295, 6; 296, 5; 297, 4; 298, 3; 299, 4; 300, 3; 301, 4; 302, 5; 303, 4; 304, 5; 305, 6; 307, 4; 308, 5; 309, 4; 310, 5, and 311, 6.

If the committee had permitted partisan or sectional interests to influence or control their action, they might have selected 290 as the number of members to be assigned, and the South would have gained over the North 9 members; or 291, by which the gain would be 8; or 292, by which the gain would be 7. By retaining the present number of Representatives, 293, the gain of the South over the North will be the same as at 311, the number named in the bill under discussion. But the committee were not influenced by such considerations. The number of members was reluctantly increased to 311 for the sole benefit of Indiana, so that she may retain her present representation. I greatly regret that the action of the committee in fixing the number at 311 for the purpose stated should be so unjustly assailed, and the motive that induced the committee to select that number so grossly misrepresented. If the bill proposed by the committee is passed the Northern States will for the next ten years be represented in the House by 193 members, nearly two-thirds of all the members, and the Southern States by 118, giving the North a majority over the South of 75.

It has been asserted that in the Southern States the elective franchise is denied to the colored man. No proof is referred to or produced to sustain this charge. It is based alone on the naked fact that the vote cast in certain Southern States for President in 1880 was less than the number cast in the same States for President in 1876, and from this it is rashly inferred that those who failed to vote at the last election were prevented from doing so by intimidation. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] in his speech said:

> You must remember that the election last fall was a general one, one in which all the people were equally interested without regard to latitude or sectional lines; that the canvass was spirited and determined in all parts of the country alike, so that the inference is fair that the great bulk of voters whose rights were not in some way denied or abridged went to the polls and cast their ballots. Therefore I affirm that the votes of that election are a better index of the people who should be taken into account in this apportionment than is the census just completed.

It is a great misfortune to the country, viewed in the light of economy, that the gentleman from Michigan was not a member of the Forty-fifth Congress when the present census law was enacted. If he had been he would probably have suggested the propriety of omitting to take the census and waiting until after the presidential election and then consulting the political almanacs or Congressional Directory to ascertain the number of voters in the country and apportion Representatives accordingly. To show the absurdity of the charge that all voters "whose rights were not in some way denied or abridged went to the polls and cast their ballots" at the last presidential election, let us compare the vote which was cast in Michigan for Tilden in 1876 with that cast for Hancock in 1880. In 1876 Tilden received 141,095 votes, while in 1880 Hancock received but 131,496 votes. Where were these 10,000 democrats who voted for Tilden and failed to vote for General Hancock? Were their "rights in some way denied or abridged?" Were they intimidated? It would be more charitable to infer that as Michigan was hopelessly republican they refrained from voting. Would it not be equally charitable and just to infer that the failure of republicans to vote at the last presidential election in Southern States strongly democratic was caused by the same apathy and indifference that kept thousands of democrats in Michigan away from the polls?

The cry of a "solid South" that was sounded so loudly and fiercely in the recent political campaign by the "stalwarts" of the republican party, to frighten the timid and harmonize the discordant elements of that party, is now heard in this Hall. It has become familiar to the people, it has lost its terrors and possesses no charms. The South is now solid in its adhesion to the Union and fidelity to the Constitution. The fact that a large majority of the people in the Southern States oppose the republican party is mainly attributable to the harsh and cruel legislation that was inflicted upon those States by the republican party after the close of the war, resulting in the creation and maintenance in those States of corrupt and infamous carpet-bag governments presided over by aliens and upheld by Federal bayonets, and so truthfully and eloquently described by Hon. Stanley Matthews, now a distinguished leader of the republican party, in a speech delivered by him at Cincinnati, Ohio, on the 1st day of May, 1872, as follows:

> Look at the South to-day. What a spectacle! We have the example of so-called civil governments bankrupting the communities they affect to represent; power usurped by strangers and not conferred by the voice of the people, and not for the purpose of restoring the prosperity of those battle-grazed fields, but for corruptly enriching the men who think that power and office belong to them as property and not as a trust. And so, gentlemen, in every department of the Government the slow poison of corruption, only not sufficiently slow, seems to have pervaded the whole civil and political administration of the country from the head to the foot.

But it is said that the republicans in the Southern States are, in the language of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR,] "eliminated from representation" in this House. There will be in the next Congress fifteen republicans and nationals from the Southern States, a gain of ten over the number in this Congress. Let us stop for a moment and examine this question of "elimination from representation," and apply it to the republican party and the Northern States. What do we find? Look at the New England States. The entire vote cast in those six States at the last presidential election was 739,518, of which General Hancock received 311,435 and Mr. Weaver 11,803, making in all 323,238, being nearly one-half of the entire vote cast. Those States have twenty-eight Representatives in this House. By dividing the entire vote, 739,518, by the number of congressional districts in those States, 28, it is ascertained that the number of voters in a district average 26,411, and by dividing the combined democratic and national vote, 323,235, by the average number of voters in a district, 26,411, we find that the democrats and nationals are fairly entitled to twelve Representatives on this floor, instead of four, the number elected at that election, while the republicans, representing about one-half of the entire vote, elected twenty-four members. In other and plainer words, it requires 80,809 democratic and national voters to elect a member of Congress in New England, and only requires 17,345 republicans to elect one. Now let us look at the gentleman's own State, (Michigan.) We find that at the last presidential election General Garfield received 185,336 votes, General Hancock 131,496, and Mr. Weaver 34,895. The republican vote represents about 52 per cent. of the entire vote cast, while the democratic and national vote combined, amounting to 166,691, represents about 48 per cent. of the entire vote. The State of Michigan has nine Representatives in this House, all of whom are republicans. It requires 20,593 republicans in that State to elect a member of Congress, while 166,691 democrats and nationals are unable to elect a single member. And yet, confronted by these facts, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] talks about "elimination from representation." When he is able to correct in his own State the evil of which he complains, by which over one hundered and thirty thousand democrats have no Representative on this floor or voice in the legislation of the country, it will be time enough for him to talk about a "solid South."

The charge that colored men in the Southern States are deprived of the right to vote is denied by gentlemen representing those States in this body, and no proof is submitted to sustain the charge. In the absence of proof no one is justified in making the charge. But, sir, it is true that the right of white men, of foreign birth, to vote is abridged in the States of Massachusetts and Rhode Island. In Massachusetts it is expressly declared in her constitution that no person shall have a right to vote or hold an office in that State who is unable to write his name and read the Constitution in the English language. This prohibition was evidently intended to apply alone to persons of foreign birth. It was the creature of the know-nothing party, and after the death of that ignoble party it was adopted by the republican party to retain and perpetuate its political control of that State. By its rigid enforcement thousands of white men of foreign birth, who mainly constitute the industrial class of that State, and whose political sympathies and affiliations are naturally with the democratic party that has always been the friend and ally of the laboring-men of the country, are precluded from voting in that State. This subject was presented to the Committee on Elections of this House in the contested-election case of Boynton against Loring, and was ably discussed by General B. F. Butler, recently an honored and distinguished leader of the republican party of Massachusetts. He said, in his printed brief:

We now approach another proposition of vital importance, both to the State of Massachusetts, to the country, and to the contestants.

By an amendment to the constitution of Massachusetts, article 20, (page 38, general statutes,) adopted the 3d day of May, 1857, it is provided as follows:

"No person shall have a right to vote, or be eligible to office, under the constitution of this Commonwealth, who shall not be able to read the Constitution in the English language, and write his name."

This article was adopted by the Legislature of 1854-'55, and ratified by the people on the 23d day of May, 1857, by a vote of 23,833 in favor, and 13,776 against, out of some 150,000, the then voters of Massachusetts.

It will be remembered that in 1853-'54 a political wave swept over the country, bringing into existence and into power in Massachusetts a short-lived, illogical, intolerant political party, rightly designated by the name of "know-nothing," whose principal article of creed was opposition to any one not born on the soil. An exhibition of that intolerance will be seen in the provision, that to vote in Massachusetts a man must be able to read the Constitution in the English language.

Under it the most learned professors of Europe, coming here and taking upon themselves the duties and privileges of citizens, could not vote, unless they were able to read English. It attracted no attention, and has not been enforced by a statute until since 1874, when the dominant party in Massachusetts began to fear for their majority.

After presenting a tabulated statement showing the number of male persons over twenty-one years old in the State, and the number of votes cast at the election of 1878, he said:

That of the 403,444 citizens of the United States made so by the fourteenth amendment, (allowing that 4 per cent. of the total vote of the State remained away from the polls,) 136,859 were disfranchised from other causes than criminality, idiocy, and insanity, the causes being what are known as "illiteracy," failure to pay a tax, and pauperism. * * * Thus it will be seen that, by the constitution and laws of Massachusetts, 136,859 persons are disfranchised in contravention of the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which was adopted by the State of Massachusetts prior to the 21st day of July, 1868, when it was declared adopted by resolution of Congress, which ratification has never been withdrawn by her, and so is at least binding upon Massachusetts.

* * * * * * *

Shall the State, by its laws and their execution, be allowed to disfranchise so many of its citizens, and have the benefit of the representation of these disfranchised citizens in Congress and in the electoral college under the present apportionment? Let the law under which this very apportionment is made answer.

Section 6, chapter 11 of the acts of 1872, approved February 2, 1872, (17 Statutes, 28,) under which the apportionment is made, enacts:

"That should any State, after the passage of this act, deny or abridge the right of any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, to vote at any election named in the amendments to the Constitution, article 14, section 2, except for participation in the rebellion, or other crime, the number of Representatives apportioned in this act to such State shall be reduced in the proportion which such male citizens shall have to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

The State of Rhode Island, unlike Massachusetts, made no efforts to conceal her purpose to disfranchise persons of foreign birth. The constitution of Rhode Island, in plain language, makes a discrimination against them. By reason of frequent complaints to Congress by persons disfranchised in that State, the special committee appointed by the Senate to inquire as to "the denial or abridgment of the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States" visited that State for the purpose of investigating the subject, and afterward, on the 4th of May, 1880, made a report to the Senate, which was ordered to be printed. I hold in my hand a copy of the report, and now read the following extracts from it:

Under the present constitution of Rhode Island a discrimination is made, and one class of citizens (naturalized) are required to possess a qualification that is not required of native-born citizens, and this additional qualification amounts to disfranchisement.

The discrimination referred to by the committee consists in prohibiting any foreign-born citizen from voting unless he owns in his own right real estate in the city or town where he resides of the value of $134 over and above all incumbrances, while a native-born citizen can vote without owning real estate.

We examined a large number of witnesses to ascertain as nearly as possible to what extent this disfranchisement of foreign-born citizens had been carried in that State. This testimony is now reported to the Senate, and an abstract of it is appended to this report.

The testimony upon the subject of the number of persons deprived of the right of suffrage by the property qualifications imposed upon foreign-born citizens by the constitution and laws of Rhode Island is somewhat conflicting, various estimates being made by different witnesses ranging from 3,000 to 25,000. * * * Carl W. Ernst, an intelligent republican foreign-born citizen, gives still another estimate, after a careful examination, and places the number at not less than 10,000 to 15,000. His judgment was based upon careful inquiry, and his position as a journalist fitted him to judge.

Mr. Ernst, in his evidence, says:

So that we have in Rhode Island the extraordinary phenomenon of a constant decrease in the number of voters, (who are almost exclusively natives,) while the number of residents who are disfranchised increases. To all intents and purposes Rhode Island has now more people of foreign birth or foreign parentage than it has of people who are natives, and that fact applies as emphatically to this city of Providence and to some of the principal towns of the State as it does to any other portion of the State. * * * Making a liberal allowance for the floating population, (and that, I think, must be considerable, because this State offers special inducements to young men in various ways, in our shops, in the mills, and in various walks of life,) I think that the number disfranchised in this State cannot be less than 10,000, and it may be 15,000.

To show the class of men affected, I will read the following evidence:

Daniel Donovan: Naturalized; came from Connecticut; lived in United States since five years old; am a skilled mechanic; ten of us work together in one room in our factory; the highest grade room in it; six of the ten are foreigners, and cannot vote for want of land; a house and lot to suit my family would cost me $3,000.

The committee, after citing and reviewing the evidence adduced before them, state:

Restricted suffrage, registry taxes upon poor men alone, statutory closing of the polls at sunset instead of at eight o'clock, as formerly, by which the operatives in the mills are prevented from voting, and the compulsory payment of the registry tax ten months prior to the general election in a presidential year, cause great complaints upon the part of the poor men and foreign-born citizens in Rhode Island; and to these features of her laws many intelligent witnesses ascribe the small percentage of voters among her people and the large amount of corrupt practices in the elections of the State. A foreign-born soldier, brevetted a major for gallantry, said, under oath, "I have never qualified myself to vote, for the reason that I consider the principle wrong; that suffrage ought to be based on manhood, and not on real estate; and that no qualification was required for negroes, their color being sufficient passport, provided they vote right." In reply to the question what action the Government of the United States could take to remove the disqualifying features of the State constitution, he said "that by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States universal suffrage was forced upon the South, and that the rule ought to work just as well on the North." Another foreign-born soldier, brevetted at Missionary Ridge as lieutenant-colonel, testified that he had tried to get many foreigners to become naturalized, telling them that in time they would become voters, but they would not do so, as they declared they would feel more degraded in becoming citizens of the United States, and not having the privilege of voting, than they felt that they were without naturalization; he said that was his own feeling, and although he owned no real estate now, but did when he voted, he felt that one who had for so long been a soldier in the service of the country ought not to need any such qualification.

* * * * * * *

Witnesses testify that a minority of her people has ruled Rhode Island for more than fifteen years past, and that the opposition to the extension of suffrage came mainly from those now in power, who fear the loss of place that would follow.

Your committee believes that there are good grounds for the complaints made, that the government of Rhode Island, under its present constitution, is nearer an oligarchy than a democracy. The disfranchisement of so large a percentage of her people, by systematic effort and rigidly enforced statutes, the small vote cast for President at a hotly contested election, the small number of votes cast for members of Congress in four successive elections, when contrasted with the number cast in other States in the same elections, the choice of members of Congress, governors, and Presidents by the votes of one out of every ten of the people, while other States cast one vote for every five of theirs, the maintenance of the rule of three-fifths for the amendment of her constitution, by which the will of the majority has been twice defeated, all compel us to recognize Rhode Island as different in her government, her institutions, and her policy from all of her sister commonwealths in the Union, and lead us to grasp at any provision of the Federal Constitution which, fairly construed, will grant us power to enforce for her people "a republican form of government," by which we mean a government by the whole people, for the whole people of the State.

Mr. Speaker, the leaders of the republican party in the States of Massachusetts and Rhode Island were active and zealous in their efforts to confer the elective franchise on colored men in the Southern States. Words are inadequate to convey their sad lamentations or express their haughty indignation over any imaginary attempt in the Southern States to deprive colored men of the right to vote, but they have no tears to shed or grief to express over the deprivation of that right to the white men of their own States.

Let us for a moment contrast the number of persons and voters in Massachusetts and Rhode Island with those in Indiana. In Massachusetts, with a population of 1,783,012, only 282,512 votes were cast at the last presidential election—the voters representing about 15.84 per cent. of the population, or one out of every six and a half persons. The State has eleven Representatives on this floor, the average number of voters in each congressional district being 25,610. In Rhode Island, with a population of 276,528, only 29,000 votes were cast, the voters representing about 10.48 per cent. of the population, or one out of every ten persons. The State has two Representatives on this floor, the average number of voters in each of the districts being 14,500; while in Indiana, with a population of 1,978,362, the number of votes cast at that election was 470,678, the voters representing about 23.79 per cent. of the entire population, or one out of every four and one-quarter persons. The State has thirteen Representatives in this House, the average number of voters in each congressional district being 36,996.

I call attention to the fact that the number of voters in Indiana is sufficient to make eighteen congressional districts of the average size of the districts in Massachusetts, and thirty-two of the size of those in Rhode Island. And yet it is proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] in fixing the number of Representatives to be apportioned at 301 or 307, to permit Massachusetts and Rhode Island to retain their present representation and reduce the representation of Indiana. I protest against such injustice in the name of a State constituting a part of the great West which reaches out to the Pacific Ocean, and from which State after State are rising like bright stars in the firmament. It is now in the power of the House to perpetrate this wrong; but, sir, the day is not far distant when the voice of the mighty West will be heard and its power respected in this House.

Interstate Commerce.

SPEECH OF HON. W. J. SAMFORD,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 10, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4748) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAMFORD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Had it not been for the fact that railroad corporations have become so powerful, that they could oppress great cities, and materially injure the commerce of commercial centers, they might have continued indefinitely unjust exactions, against rural communities and private citizens. But, grown strong by combinations of unlimited, and limitless capital, they assumed to lay tribute on forces, little less powerful than themselves, and inaugurated a controversy, which I trust will only end in salutary legislation for all concerned.

There is no member of this House, whose experience does not readily recall instances of wrong to individuals, and communities, effected by unequal, unjust, and unlawful methods, and tariffs of railroads. And no one will deny, unless he be in some way connected with these corporations, that a persistent and universal demand comes to us, for some legislation to correct these palpable abuses.

The American citizen is pre-eminently law-abiding, and though he has experienced, for many years, the heavy burdens which have been laid on his industry, he has borne them silently, almost without a protest, because he has been educated to the belief that resistance, even by legislation, would be interfering with "vested rights." It has not been until very recently, through the agitation induced by encroachments, that he is being enlightened to the fact, that there are rights of property, which railroads are bound to respect, that they owe reciprocal duties to the public, in return for the franchises and privileges granted them.

Communities, cities, and individuals, have seen their property ruinously depreciated, values dwindle away, and their utmost effort wasted, by the avarice, or even caprice, of a railroad dignitary, possessing all save the outward trappings of arbitrary royalty. The ruin has been the more galling, that it seemed to be wrought under the rights of law. There may be danger now, since discussion has shown the illegality of the tyranny, that an outraged public, may demand reparation, severe if not excessive.

I shall therefore seek to be just toward the railroads, while I will be content with nothing short of absolute fairness for all concerned.

What are the abuses complained of, and which demand correction by congressional legislation?

First. Excessive and extortionate charges.

Second. Discrimination in charges, by which favored communities and individuals are benefited at the expense of others less fortunate.

But I am met at the threshold of the argument, that a railroad corporation is but an aggregation of individuals, who should have the right to use their means according to their profit, or even whim. That is the fundamental error of their assumption. Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, is a legal maxim whose justice and wisdom, have passed beyond the realms of controversy. No man has a right to use his own to the detriment of his neighbor. And especially is this true when his private property, has added to it, public privileges. Lord Hale asserted more than two hundred years ago, that "when private property is affected with a public interest, it ceases to be juris privati only," which dotrine was emphasized by Chief-Justice Waite in a recent decision. When, therefore, private property "becomes clothed with a public interest," its use passes from the sphere, of the mere profit or caprice of its owner, and becomes a proper subject for public regulation. Even the grain-elevators at Chicago, worked in connection with the railroads, were held by the Supreme Court of the United States, to come within this principle, and subject to have their charges regulated by the Legislature of Illinois.

Not only does private property invested in railways become affected with a public interest, but it affects that interest which has, at all times, in all countries, been under the control and supervision of law. From a date long before the building of the Appian highway to Rome, down to the present hour, the highways of a country belong to its people. There can be no absolute alienation by a government of this sovereign right.

The supreme duty of a representative government is to protect the citizen from oppression, in the enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property. The power to do this is indefeasible; any granted charter used to oppress, or to violate, the rights of others is repealable. No vested right to extort or oppress can ever be ingrafted on a charter. The humblest citizen in the land has a vested right to protection. Even in private contracts between individuals, equity will modify the universality of common law, and dissipate an unconscionable advantage. A fortiori, when a public contract is obtained by legislation, and diverted to improper uses, legislation can remedy the abuses, else the creature becomes stronger than the creator. Any legislation which operates to turn loose a lawless tyrant, which may trample down all individual right, is a nullity, because it is a surrender of the sovereign power, of government, to prevent wrong. Such power was never intended to be given in the charters of railroads. An eminent jurist very recently contends that corporations "have no proprietary right, title, or claim to the roads themselves, but a mere franchise, annexed to and exercisable thereon."

To contend that the exercise of a mere franchise, may develop into rights as absolute and comprehensive, as pertain to proprietary ownership is utterly, illogical and indefensible. Again, innumerable Federal and State decisions have settled the status of railroads to be quasi-public corporations. Exercising the power of eminent domain in condemning land and material for its use, necessarily makes it public. For this, and other privileges reciprocal duties arise. Becoming a public highway, every citizen has a right to use it, by complying with the reasonable exactions of law. And the law-making power alone, can say what is reasonable. To give that power to the corporation, would be to surrender all control as completely, as if it were entirely private. When, therefore, a reasonable sum is tendered to the occupiers of these great highways for the carrying of freight or passengers, they should be compelled by law to perform the service. The Reagan bill, however, which I shall support, does not deal with the question of extortion. In the near future it will be considered. A long-suffering people will not cease this agitation, once begun, until thorough and exact justice is meted out to all alike. This bill is less comprehensive than I would like, but it may be better to settle one point at a time, and hence I support it as the best now attainable.

Its aim, as the title indicates, is "to regulate interstate commerce, and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers."

I have attempted to show that even, when private funds exclusively, are used to build railways, such railways become subject to the regulations of law. When they are constructed by the aid of Government funds, or credit, or by the donation of public lands, a moral, pervades the legal, right to control and regulate them, which admits of no refutation. Millions of dollars and hundreds of millions of acres of land, have thus been given to the railroads of this country, and yet they are operated with no regard to the interests of the public. In the recent investigations by the Legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania, railroad officials did not hesitate to testify that they acted, with no reference to the public interest, but with an eye solely to the interests of their roads. And when the official who has charge of the railroad connecting the city in which I live, with the outer world, was remonstrated with, by a committee of citizens on account of oppressive and discriminating tariffs, he coolly informed them that hewas consulting only the interests of his stockholders. Time and again the merchants and farmers of my section, have vainly demanded transportation for cotton, and were refused it, unless they would ship to certain cities specially favored by that corporation. And it is a fact, so notorious and frequent as not to provoke comment, that it is often cheaper for us to ship our produce, seventy miles west, and thence back over the same road to Charleston, Savannah, or New York, than to ship directly to those ports in the first instance. This is but one of many, yes, of very many, instances of the freaks of these modern common carriers, who are asking to be let alone, that they will be held in check by the natural laws of competition applicable to common carriers. You might as well attempt with meshes, prepared for mice, to hold royal Bengal tigers. A committee of the Senate, six years ago, reported to that august body that—

> In the matter of taxation, there are to-day four men, representing the four great trunk-lines between Chicago and New York, who possess, and who not infrequently exercise, powers which the Congress would not venture to exert. They may at any time, and for reasons satisfactory to themselves, by a single stroke of the pen reduce the value of property in this country by hundreds of millions of dollars.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> With the rapid and inevitable progress of combination and consolidation, these colossal organizations are daily becoming stronger and more imperious.

Think of it! "By one stroke of the pen" these representatives of soulless corporations, can beggar 10,000 families and reduce to want and destitution, 50,000 free American citizens! And yet Congress sits idly by, and refuses or fails to interfere; and we are told "these colossal organizations are daily becoming stronger and more imperious." Yes, "imperious" is the fitting term to characterize such imperial power. That report was six years ago. It was a prophecy then, which finds its fulfillment now.

Sir, there are 100,000 miles of railway in this country, representing more than $5,000,000,000, engaged in carrying the commerce of this people, which amounts to $30,000,000,000 annually. This vast power is not only gathering its forces for defensive warfare, but it is with lightning rapidity consolidating, combining, and concentrating, under its Vanderbilts and Goulds, for offensive and aggressive ends.

Neither is it choice as to means in attaining its objects. It demands and receives every vestige of privilege under law, and when necessary, special laws are obtained by methods not only alarming, but subversive of the institutions of all free government. Even now the dark shadows of these mammoth powers, are lengthening athwart the liberties of this land. The great and overshadowing issue of the immediate future, is whether the people shall control corporations, or corporations the people. Mark that down.

I said they hesitate at no methods to succeed; being soulless, they can afford to be Ingersollites. It is notorious that the railroads furnish large sums of money in political contests. They belong to no party, have no allegiance to anybody, or anything except their own aggrandizement. Before the New York committee, in 1873, Jay Gould had the effrontery to testify, with a swagger, in these words:

> I do not know how much I paid towards helping friendly men. We had four States to look after, and we had to suit our politics to circumstances. In a democratic district I was a democrat, in a republican district I was a republican, and in a doubtful district I was doubtful; but in every district and at all times I have always been an Erie Railroad man.

This railroad king absolutely spent so much money to help "friendly men" that he did not know the amount. Debauching suffrage, and poisoning the very fountain of civil liberty. And who are these "friendly men?" Representatives of the people, elected by them to serve the people, but being captured by the railroads, they help to shackle the people, by legislation favorable to the railroads, and grinding on the people. In the terse language of a writer in the December number of Scribner:

> The railroad statesman is found in both parties and in every legislative assembly; while perhaps not numerically in the ascendant, through packing the principal committees, and "retaining" members of the legal profession, who happen at the time to be legislators, their ends are usually obtained.

And Senator BECK, whose vigorous mind illumines whatever it touches, is no less emphatic in declaring:

> It is impossible to have an honest Legislature, State or Federal, so long as representatives are sent, who owe their election to, or are personally interested in, great moneyed corporations or monopolies. No matter whether they call themselves democrats or republicans, they are not the representatives of the people; they are simply the agents and attorneys of those who seek, by taxing the masses, to enrich themselves, whenever they owe their election to monopolists.

Not only in the political or legislative hall do we find their vast power displayed, but in the sacred precincts of temples of justice they stand, and demand favorable judicial decision, on pain of their displeasure. Mr. Gowen, of Pennsylvania, is my authority for saying, that a few months ago, the counsel of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in the supreme court of that State, threatened that court with the displeasure of his clients, if it decided against them.

But why multiply instances of obliquitous methods by which they obtain and retain unjust and unconscionable privileges? Why weary myself with an argument, to demonstrate the danger of this overgrown and usurping power? Only those who will not see, refuse to admit the truth of these glaring facts, which demand intervention if the power exists to do so; and hence I recur to the legal phase of the problem.

The question with me is, have we the power to remedy the evil? Is it lodged in Congress or in the States; for I will not admit that it is not lodged somewhere? If in Congress, then does the bill under consideration afford the remedy? That Congress has the power to "regulate commerce among the States" there can be no question, as that is expressly one of the enumerated powers of Congress, in the Constitution. Not only the power, but full and exclusive power is thus given. Full power over a given subject implies the whole and leaves no residuum. It is true, as decided in the case of Welton vs. The State of Missouri, in 1 Otto; so far as some of these instruments of commerce are concerned, and some subjects local in their operation, it has been held that the States may act.

But I regret to find that when Congress does act with reference to commerce between the States, in so far as it assumes to act, at least, all State authority, eo instanti, ceases. I shall not stop to argue the exact extent of State authority, as that question is not involved in this discussion. I am in favor of holding on for the States all power they have. As an argument of convenience and efficiency, Congress alone is adequate to remedy the evil, in a large sense. The doctrine established in 10 Wallace, "whenever a commodity has begun to move as an article of trade, from one State to another, commerce in that commodity between the States has commenced," would seem to imply that any interference therewith by the State, after congressional action, would trench on congressional jurisdiction. It is in the transportation of just such commodities as these, cotton, bacon, sugar, and cereals—articles produced in one State and destined for the markets of another—that the abuses complained of exist. If the State should attempt to lay the hand of regulation on their transportation, she could only follow them to the confines of her territory, and leave them to the tender mercies of railroads beyond her limits, whereas Congress may lay its enactment on its carriage, from State to State, and thence to foreign countries.

Therefore, for the purpose of controlling the great trunk lines, which span States, and stretch from ocean to ocean, it is absolutely the duty of Congress to provide for proper regulations.

But what are "regulations?" As early as 1823 Mr. Justice Washington decided:

> Commerce among the several States can mean nothing more than intercourse among the States, for the purposes of trade, be the object of the trade what it may, and this intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on.

Again, in 15 Wallace, it is decided that—

> The transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce, is a constituent part of commerce itself.

In a very recent case Mr. Justice Miller is in accord with the same principle when he says:

> The power to regulate commerce is a power to regulate the instruments of commerce. * * * It extends to the persons who conduct it as well as to the instruments used.

Long before any of these decisions, in the leading case of Ogden vs. Gibbons, Chief-Justice Marshall, than whom no higher authority exists in this country, settled finally and forever the true construction, when he decided:

> Commerce undoubtedly is traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse.

Railroads are nothing more than the instruments of commerce; they are, therefore, subject to legislative regulation. They are the great arteries of intercourse between the States, and the lawful objects for prescribed "rules for carrying on that intercourse."

If any doubt existed as to the constitutional power of Congress to pass this bill, that doubt is dissipated by the fact, that these great corporations have received no comfort on that score, from their learned and astute attorneys. And hence they have directed their combined energies to defeat it by other means than constitutional argument. Its constitutionality has been demonstrated beyond the possibility of cavil by the distinguished gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] who offered this bill as a substitute for the committee's bill. And I may as well say here, I shall not discuss the provisions of the bill of the committee. With all respect for its author it brings no relief, as was fully shown by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] It is the giving of a stone in response to a request for bread. And the national commission therein provided for, shackled as it is with mere dress-parade functions, will only be an apologist for the abuses it will be powerless to prevent, even if so inclined.

This brings me to the second and last and main question I propounded: Does the Reagan bill afford an adequate remedy for the evil?

It simplifies largely this discussion, by dealing alone with general principles. Its provisions do not require the assistance of experts in railroad matters to be intelligently and justly considered. They seek to protect the people, and at the same time are not unfair to the railroads. The first section is intended to prevent discrimination in charges between individuals. It provides that all shall be charged alike in the matter of transportation. The small farmer, the humble mechanic, the honest laborer, are placed on the same plane with the merchant prince and the man of wealth. All are to be charged alike for like services. One man's money is as good as another's. Is there any unfairness in this? Where is the wrong? Who objects to it? How does this hurt the railroad? Who has a right to complain? No fair-minded, just man can object to this humane regulation. It is constitutional, because restricted to property transported from one State or Territory to another State or Territory, or to foreign countries.

The second section is necessary to the effectiveness of the first. It is therein provided that it shall be unlawful, to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage upon shipments made or services rendered. The allowance of rebates has been ruinous to many men, to the advantage of a favored few. The illustration of this pernicious practice, oftenest mentioned because of its enormity, is the payment in rebates, by the trunk-lines of railroads to the Standard Oil Company in eighteen months, of over ten million dollars. They went further and guaranteed that company against loss by competition. Such an arrangement, of course, placed all others engaged in the like enterprises at the mercy of this favored company. I do not know, but it is fair to conclude, that the officials of these roads were personally interested in this company. If so, they were prostituting their trust to their pecuniary gain. Such a practice as this eliminates from enterprise and commerce the salutary and just element of competition, paralyzes earnest effort, blasts well-defined hopes, and robs honest labor of hard-earned wages. A man may be ever so prudent, be ever so cautious, honest, and industrious, and yet be beggared in a day by arts like these. And yet, I dare say, these rebates and drawbacks are of daily occurrence on every trunk-line in the United States.

The third section prevents "pooling." And what is pooling? An agreement or combination between different railroads to divide in a certain ratio their aggregate or net earnings; an agreement not to compete with one another for patronage; a combination or conspiracy, to charge the maximum rates which traffic will bear, and divide the plunder between them. They "pool their issues." It is a railroad union, by which they can effectively strike for higher wages, whenever spasms of prosperity appear in the country. It destroys all competition, and lays every industry and enterprise helpless at the feet of this vast money power. It is a device of modern invention, a refinement of that common-law crime known as conspiracy. Five cents a bushel on corn added to the freight, we are told, is a tax annually, of $45,000,000 on the western farmers. One cent a pound on cotton would be on one crop $30,000,000. Who can prevent this enormous taxation? The cotton and corn must go to market, else the fifty million people of this country must starve and go naked. Why do they not add this annual tax? Simply because a cold, selfish calculation demonstrates, that the producer cannot pay it, and continue to produce. As it is, the entire profit of agriculture is taken, and a bare subsistence left. And yet Mr. Vanderbilt says "the relations between the railroads and the people are better adjusted by the people and themselves, than by any iron-clad legislation." A repetition of the fable of the wolves advising the sheep, to drive away the dogs that peace might reign between them. No, sir, unions among laboring classes are denounced as communism, and yet here is the most powerful money union ever established among men. I do not wonder that this section is more bitterly fought by these corporations than any other.

In a recent letter from Messrs. Vanderbilt and Jewett is this language:

> The growth of a disregard of property in this country is very marked, and railroad corporations offer favorable forms of attack. The encouragement by such a body as the Chamber of Commerce to such ideas will not stop at railroad corporations, but will reach all kind of associated capital, and will not stop until it reaches all property.

Here is an artful and insidious appeal to the fears of capital, to rally to its aid, in this struggle of the people against oppression. If ever communism and socialism assume dangerous proportions in this country, (which God forbid,) it will be owing to the abuses these gentlemen are fostering, and this bill is seeking to correct. There is a point to all endurance. The Grangers of the Northwest who forced the railroads to terms were not communists. Their resistance may have been, the soft breeze, dallying before the lightning and wild winds of a coming storm.

The rest of the bill is devoted to that detail and proper penalties, necessary to the enforcement of these provisions, except the fourth section, which forbids greater compensation for transportation a less, than a greater distance. This is not an attempt to regulate the rate, nor to require even a pro rata rate, but a simple denial of the power to charge more for carrying freight fifty, than five hundred, miles. This is absolutely needed, to protect cities and communities less favored than others, from being despoiled by an arbitrary and cruel discrimination. At one time, and perhaps now, the rate from New York to Salt Lake City was $4 per hundred pounds, and but two dollars and a half to San Francisco from New York. For the purpose of building up some cities within their interests, or their good graces, they will carry commercial products many hundred miles without profit, and make up the loss by imposing double rates on intermediate local points. Ah, but they say their interests and those of the people are mutual, and naively ask if it is natural that they should damage themselves. I concede that they hold up their heavy hand before utterly destroying; a different policy would be suicidal. But the burden is made as heavy as it can be borne and leave life in the subject. But for the buoyancy and strength of this young nation it would have reeled under the load long ago. Cities, towns, and lands near markets and commercial emporiums are dearer in value than remoter sections. Proximity to these points is a natural advantage, for which the possessor pays. It is natural and right that such investments should have legitimate returns. But all these natural laws are violated and abrogated, by these great highways, and these advantages are held by the precarious tenure of their sweet will.

At the request of the gentleman [Mr. REAGAN] I have given this question some consideration, and did hope that an opportunity would be afforded for passing this bill. But the session drawing to a close forces the necessity of availing myself of the previous consent of the House to offer my views at this time.

Being public highways, owing reciprocal duties to the public, these highways ought not to be allowed unreasonable compensation for services. If it is reasonable to carry one hundred pounds, one hundred miles, for $1, how can it be reasonable to charge $2 for carrying the same amount fifty miles? At an early day I propose to ask a jury to answer that question.

Sir, I despise that political leper, a demagogue. The man who, for selfish ends and unholy objects, would array one class against another, or jeopardize the stability of property rights, for mere personal applause, deserves the withering scorn of all honest men. But the false charge of demagogy, so flippant on the lips of railroad claquers, shall not deter me, from sympathizing with the interests of the struggling people, who sent me here. To their interests alone, within the bounds of justice to all, I owe my allegiance.

I am not inimical to capital honestly won, and by no means to the railroad interests of the country. I admire the splendid achievements of that factor of our national greatness. Its magnificent strides, interlacing and interlocking the social and material industries of this great country, is a source of gratification as well as wonder. It is the modern car of progress, and capable of being the greatest civilizing agency, and blessing of the century. Wind and tide and lightning have been made subservient forces to the arts of civilization; but all these combined, fail to contribute that material advancement of a country, which springs up like magic, in the wake of the locomotive, properly managed. Waking the first echoes of the morning, this matchless steed of the nineteenth century, with iron ribs and withers of steel, fleeter far than Lampus and Phaëthon, annihilates distance through all the long hours of day; and when night comes, tireless still, breathful still, a Polyphemian eye lights his careering course along trembling valleys, and through rock-ribbed mountains, crumbling under his tread.

But when, Polyphemus-like, "caring nought for the gods, and devouring human flesh," he crushes individual rights to powder, and stamps the life out of individual enterprise, some Ulysses must be found, not to "put out the eye of the monster," but to bridle and tame him, and subdue him, for a nation's good.

One other word in conclusion. I regret that I have but a faint hope of early relief from congressional action. This whole subject is too novel and intricate for men to form accurate conclusions speedily. The public mind is, however, being directed to it, and in the near future will be aroused to inquire for a lawful remedy. I denounce all unlawful methods to secure a remedy, as tending to communism, the greatest crime against society and government, of the age. The ballot-box alone can bring relief; and in our Government that will be done only by the agency of political parties. I know this should be no political question; but I have seen enough to know, that relief will never come from the dominant party in power. Owing its recent success to the unlimited use of money, furnished by the vast money corporations of the country, it is bold enough to stand by its friends. The greenback party, subordinating the great principles of local government, and the real interests of the people, to wild financial theories, utterly subversive of the Constitution, and tending to a despotic nationalism, or what is worse, to anarchy and confusion, cannot and should not, receive any support from the conservative, law-abiding masses of this country. The only hope we have, and I say it not as a partisan, but from earnest, mature conviction, is to be found in the triumph of the everlasting and indestructible principles of democracy, the party which in all the years of its existence has fought the battles of the people against oppression. By unholy methods, it recently met defeat. It has survived defeat before, and like the Lybian giant, invincible in contact with Mother Earth, it needs only to keep in contact, with the sacred rights of the people. to emerge from defeat with renewed strength. It needs now only to gird up its loins, emblazon on its banners: The right of local self-government—Tariff for revenue only—Free education—Freedom of elections—Freedom from corporate tyranny—The payment of public dues according to contract, and leaving all trimmers, traitors, and time-servers behind, march on, over burning plowshares, to victory and dominion.

Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH OF HON. E. W. ROBERTSON,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 7, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBERTSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The press and the country seem to have an erroneous idea of the facts relative to the river and harbor bill, particularly that portion providing for the improvement of the Mississippi River. It is thought the bill is large and extravagant. I desire to correct this misapprehension by a brief statement of facts.

The total appropriations for all rivers and harbors of the United States during the first century of the Government, ending July 4, 1876, was in round numbers but $61,000,000. That total is considerably less than the single State of New York spent during the same period for the construction, enlargement, and improvement of her canals, for as early as 1866 it had spent $64,700,000 for that purpose. Those canals were but 1,308 miles in extent, while the extent of the navigable rivers of the United States was fourteen times greater, or about twenty thousand miles. In other words, one State spent more on her artificial water-ways than the General Government appropriated for all the great rivers of the United States. It is but 1½ per cent. of the sum expended by private corporations on the railroads of the United States to the beginning of 1876, their total cost being $4,658,208,630. Of said $61,000,000 the 15,000 miles of navigation of the Mississippi and tributaries received but $21,000,000, or but a fraction over one-third. In marked contrast with this total appropriation for suitable water-ways from the valley to the sea-board, the British and Canadian Governments have spent more than double the sum for the same purpose, or nearly fifty-four million dollars, for the construction and improvement of a direct water-line from our grain-producing States, via the Welland Canal and Saint Lawrence River, to the Atlantic seaboard, which route will soon be completed.

It is true that the river and harbor bills during the past four years have been a little larger than during previous years, but it is because of past neglect of needed improvements.

Again, the press, the country, and a portion of this House seem to misunderstand the facts about the proposed improvement of the Mississippi River. In June, 1879, we passed a bill providing for the appointment of a Mississippi River commission. The creation of the act was almost universally heralded to the country by the press as the levee commission. It has since been alluded to by a distinguished member of this House, in debate upon this floor, as the levee commission. Such erroneous statements and impressions are throwing discredit upon a great national work—one which the President very justly called in his recent message a matter of "transcendent importance."

For more than fifty years, or from the time when the Government commenced the work of improving rivers and harbors to 1879, no well-defined plan of improving the Mississippi was agreed upon. Rival and conflicting theories were urged, and sums of money appropriated for patchwork which accomplished little for the producers and consumers interested in the river. Finally we agreed to provide for a board of skilled engineers to review the whole subject and bring order out of chaos. They were appointed in 1879, have made the necessary examinations, and submitted to us their report. They are not a levee commission at all, but a Mississippi River commission, created for the purpose of improving that great trunk line—the nation's most important highway of commerce—all the way from its headwaters to the Gulf.

I desire the correction to be as public as the error, and therefore improve this opportunity to call the attention of this House, the press, and the country to the facts.

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. R. M. A. HAWK,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 5, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. HAWK said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Congress is about to proceed, under the authority conferred by section 2, article 1 of the Constitution and the laws in force upon the subject, to adopt a ratio under the enumeration of population of the tenth census of the United States and apportion to the several States of the Union the number of Representatives in Congress to which each may be entitled under such ratio.

In the exercise of this high and delicate power it is the duty of the Representatives of the people to ascertain the principles discussed and the basis upon which the section of the Constitution to which reference has been made and the laws enacted were founded in the formation of the same; and for the purpose of presenting in connected form the consideration of the subject, the respectful attention of the House is called to the clause of the Constitution which refers directly to this subject. It is as follows:

> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed 1 for every 30,000, but each State shall have at least one Representative.

The remainder of the clause refers to an arbitrary distribution of representation among the thirteen original States until a regular enumeration could be made and an apportionment of representation under the same.

At the commencement of the session of the Continental Congress, September 5, 1774, a resolution was adopted allowing each colony or province one vote, and care was taken that no precedent should be made that would in any manner interfere with the establishment of representation upon the basis of population. Under the articles of confederation the same plan of representative voting was agreed upon and continued until the adoption of the Constitution.

In 1789, when the Constitution went into effect, our present system of representation went into operation. When it was decided by the convention that two legislative bodies should be formed, the powers to be exercised by representatives in voting was discussed. Some favored equal State representation; others claimed that the powers of the States in legislation should be based on population. In the consideration of this question the larger States were favorable to the formation of the basis of representation upon population, while the smaller ones favored the equality of the States as organized governments in casting the representative vote. The question of apportionment with reference to population was discussed and advocated by some, while others favored a basis to be made upon property.

After the adoption of the population basis, the question of who should constitute the people referred to as population evoked some contention, such points as, for the purposes of representation, the voters should be considered as the population, and questions arose as to white or free population. The decision as stated in the clause of the Constitution quoted was finally reached that the representation should be "according to their respective numbers," which includes inhabitants of every sex and condition "excepting Indians not taxed," and a clause referring by implication to slaves uses the language, "three-fifths of all other persons." This latter clause gave certain advantages to the slave-holding States, because while slaves were denied the privilege of exercising the rights of the ballot they nevertheless gave power to the States in Congress by entering into the formation of a basis of representation, each slave exercising three-fifths of the power of a free white citizen.

The abolition of slavery by the proclamation of emancipation, and as a result of the war of 1861–'65, gives to the colored population the right to participation in the apportionment for the purposes of full representation, so that we can, as in the last census, proceed without the inequality resulting from this slavery clause of the Constitution to make a just and equitable apportionment of representation.

From the time the Constitution went into effect until 1842 the basis of representation was determined by dividing the population of the several States by the number of inhabitants, fixed by the ratio adopted, which number was established by section 2, article 1 of the Constitution at a minimum of 30,000. The same section of the Constitution fixes the number of Representatives to which each State was entitled.

From the foundation of the Government until 1842 the plan was followed of dividing the population of each State by the number taken as the basis of representation, President Washington having, soon after his first election, vetoed a bill requiring that the whole population of the United States be divided by such number.

In 1842 by act of Congress it was provided that 70,680 should constitute the number upon which each Representative should be based, and a member for a moiety of that number.

In 1850 an act of Congress was passed requiring the whole population of the United States to be divided by the number of Representatives fixed upon, and the quotient thus obtained constituted the ratio by which the population of each State was divided, the quotient resulting indicating the number of Representatives to which such State was entitled, the States having the largest fractions being entitled to extra representation until the arbitrary number is reached.

This latter plan is the one now in force, and the question for this Congress to decide is, what shall be arbitrarily fixed as the number of Representatives for the next decade.

By reference to the Constitution it will be seen that the number of members of the first Congress was fixed at 65, which number was duly apportioned between the thirteen original States.

The following table shows the number of Representatives of which Congress was composed during the several decades of the existence of the nation, and also the number of inhabitants to each Representative under the various apportionments made by Congress, to wit:

Decade ending—	Number of members.	Population to each Representative.
1793	65	.....
1803	105	33,000
1813	141	33,000
1823	181	35,000
1833	212	40,000
1843	240	47,700
1853	223	70,680
1863	234	93,500
1873	241	127,941
1883	292	130,533

The number of Representatives was increased from time to time in the various Congresses by the admission of new States; as, in the last stated number the members comprising the House should be 293, one member having been added by the admission of Colorado as a State in 1876.

Thus far I have thought best to sketch the history of apportionment and representation under the Constitution and laws, and to give a very short epitome of the early workings of the same. We have presented by the Census Committee for our consideration, and from which to form conclusions, a computation of representation upon various bases, from 293 to 325, inclusive. And upon an examination of all the facts to be considered, and in view of the expressed opinions of many of the members of the House, I have deemed it best to confine the consideration of the subject to the effects upon representation which may be produced by adopting either of the following numbers of members as a divisor of the population of the States, to wit, 307, 311, and 319, as compared with the present number, 293.

Upon a careful investigation of the tables presented to the House by the committee through their chairman, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] it is believed that for all purposes 319 will be the most satisfactory to all sections of the country. I as deeply regret as any member of this body the necessity for referring to this subject in anything like a partisan or political sense, but it is believed that the presence of two great parties in this country must of necessity enter into the discussion of this question, and it becomes absolutely necessary to so consider the subject in the light of present conditions. For this purpose I have divided the States into those certainly democratic, certainly republican, and doubtful, basing such division of the country upon the popular vote cast at the last presidential election. Upon this basis I have placed the following States as certainly democratic, to wit: Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia. Those certainly republican are Colorado, Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Wisconsin. Under the head of doubtful States are such as in my judgment are evenly divided, or nearly so, as indicated by the vote at the last election. These are as follows: California, Indiana, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, and Oregon. The population of the first named under the census of 1870 was 13,877,615. Under the late enumeration the population of these States is 18,504,203.

The second group of States, being those denominated as certainly republican, under the census of 1870 shows a population of 16,614,737. Under the enumeration of 1880 these States show a population of 21,570,517, while the doubtful have for 1870 a population of 7,663,153, and by the census of last year 9,294,873. Under the apportionment of 1870 these certainly democratic States had 106 Representatives, each based upon a population of 130,920; the certainly republican States 128 Representatives, based upon a population of 129,802 to each Representative; the doubtful States 59 Representatives, based upon a population of 129,883 for one Representative. It will thus be seen that the ratio of representation in these sections of the country under the apportionment of 1870 was as nearly equal as perhaps the computation could have been made.

By the apportionment on a basis of 319 members under the census of 1880 the representation in these three sections of the country would be as follows: Certainly democratic States, 1 to 155,497; certainly republican States, 1 to 155,183; and the doubtful States, 1 to 152,374. The general ratio, taking 319 as the number of Representatives, shows 1 to 154,764 of population. It is believed that no other figures will produce such an equality of results. In fact, after a most careful computation this is found to present a degree of equality in this respect which the adoption of no other number would do.

That these comparisons may be made by those who may have a desire to do so for themselves I present the following table, giving the population of the several States in 1870, together with a column showing the number of members allowed to each State under the apportionment of that census. The table is as follows:

Apportionment for Congressmen upon census of 1870.

States, (thirty-eight.)	Population, 1870.	Total members.	States, (thirty-eight.)	Population, 1870.	Total members.
Alabama	996,992	8	Missouri	1,721,295	13
Arkansas	484,471	4	Nebraska	122,993	1
California	560,247	4	Nevada	42,491	1
Colorado	39,864	1	New Hampshire	318,300	3
Connecticut	537,454	4	New Jersey	906,096	7
Delaware	125,015	1	New York	4,382,759	33
Florida	187,748	2	North Carolina	1,071,361	8
Georgia	1,184,109	9	Ohio	2,665,260	20
Illinois	2,539,891	19	Oregon	90,923	1
Indiana	1,680,637	13	Pennsylvania	3,521,951	27
Iowa	1,194,020	9	Rhode Island	217,353	2
Kansas	364,399	3	South Carolina	705,606	5
Kentucky	1,321,011	10	Tennessee	1,258,520	10
Louisiana	726,915	6	Texas	818,579	6
Maine	626,915	5	Vermont	330,551	3
Maryland	780,894	6	Virginia	1,225,163	9
Massachusetts	1,457,351	11	West Virginia	442,014	3
Michigan	1,184,059	9	Wisconsin	1,054,670	8
Minnesota	439,706	3
Mississippi	827,922	6	Total	38,155,505	293

That we may have a close comparison between the population and apportionment of 1870 and of our present apportionment, together with the relative ratio of our present representation, being on the basis of 293 members, and that of 307, 311, and 319, the numbers which are thought to meet with the ideas of the Census Committee as indicated by the bills presented for the consideration of the House, as well as many of the members of the House, I insert the following table upon these numbers, taken from the pamphlet printed under the instructions of the House, upon the motion of the chairman of the Census Committee. It is as follows, to wit:

States.	Population.	293			307			311			319
		Ratio, 1 : 168,497.			Ratio, 1 : 160,813.			Ratio, 1 : 158,745.			Ratio, 1 : 154,764.
		No. of Representatives on even division.	Fraction resulting.	Final number of Representatives.	No. of Representatives on even division.	Fraction resulting.	Final number of Representatives.	No. of Representatives on even division.	Fraction resulting.	Final number of Representatives.	No. of Representatives on even division.	Fraction resulting.	Final number of Representatives.
United States	49,369,595	271	3,706,908	293	289	2,894,638	307	293	2,857,310	311	301	2,785,631	319
Alabama	1,262,794	7	83,315	7	7	137,103	8	7	151,579	8	8	24,682	8
Arkansas	802,564	4	128,576	5	4	159,312	5	5	8,839	5	5	28,744	5
California	864,686	5	22,201	5	5	60,621	5	5	70,961	5	5	90,866	6
Colorado	194,649	1	26,152	1	1	33,836	1	1	35,904	1	1	39,885	1
Connecticut	622,683	3	117,192	4	3	140,244	4	3	146,448	4	4	3,627	4
Delaware	146,654	.....	146,654	1	.....	146,654	1	.....	146,654	1	.....	146,654	1
Florida	267,351	1	98,854	1	1	106,538	2	1	108,606	2	1	112,587	2
Georgia	1,539,048	9	22,575	9	9	91,731	9	9	110,343	10	9	146,172	10
Illinois	3,078,769	18	45,823	18	19	23,322	19	19	62,614	19	19	138,253	20
Indiana	1,978,362	11	124,895	12	12	48,606	12	12	73,422	13	12	121,194	13
Iowa	1,624,620	9	108,147	10	10	16,490	10	10	37,180	10	10	76,980	10
Kansas	995,966	5	153,481	6	6	31,088	6	6	43,496	6	6	67,382	6
Kentucky	1,648,708	9	132,235	10	10	40,578	10	10	61,258	10	10	101,068	11
Louisiana	940,103	5	97,618	5	5	136,038	6	5	146,378	6	6	11,519	6
Maine	648,945	3	143,454	4	4	5,693	4	4	13,965	4	4	29,889	4
Maryland	934,632	5	92,147	5	5	130,567	6	5	140,907	6	6	6,048	6
Massachusetts	1,783,012	10	98 042	10	11	14,069	11	11	36,817	11	11	80,608	12
Michigan	1,636,331	9	119,858	10	10	28,201	10	10	48,881	10	10	88,691	11
Minnesota	780,806	4	106,818	5	4	137,554	5	4	145,826	5	5	6,986	5
Mississippi	1,131,592	6	120,610	7	7	5,901	7	7	20,377	7	7	48,244	7
Missouri	2,168,804	12	146,840	13	13	78,235	13	13	105,119	14	14	2,108	14
Nebraska	452,433	2	115,439	3	2	130,807	3	2	134,943	3	2	142,905	3
Nevada	62,265	.....	62,265	1	.....	62,265	1	.....	62,265	1	.....	62,265	1
New Hampshire	346,984	2	9,990	2	2	25,358	2	2	29,494	2	2	37,456	2
New Jersey	1,130,983	6	120,001	7	7	5,292	7	7	19,768	7	7	47,635	7
New York	5,083,810	30	28,900	30	31	98,607	32	32	3,970	32	32	131,362	33
North Carolina	1,400,047	8	52,071	8	8	113,543	9	8	130,087	9	9	7,171	9
Ohio	3,198,239	18	165,293	19	19	142,792	20	20	23,339	20	20	102,959	21
Oregon	174,767	1	6,270	1	1	13,954	1	1	16,022	1	1	20,003	1
Pennsylvania	4,282,786	25	70,361	25	26	101,648	27	26	155,416	27	27	104,158	28
Rhode Island	276,528	1	108,031	2	1	115,715	2	1	117,783	2	1	121,764	2
South Carolina	995,622	5	153,137	6	6	30,744	6	6	43,152	6	6	67,038	6
Tennessee	1,542,463	9	25,990	9	9	95,146	10	9	113,758	10	9	149,587	10
Texas	1,592,574	9	76,101	9	9	145,257	10	10	5,124	10	10	44,934	10
Vermont	332,286	1	163,789	2	2	10,660	2	2	14,796	2	2	22,758	2
Virginia	1,512,806	8	164,830	9	9	65,489	9	9	84,101	10	9	110,930	10
West Virginia	618,443	3	112,952	4	3	136,004	4	3	142,208	4	3	154,151	4
Wisconsin	1,315,480	7	136,001	8	8	28,976	8	8	45,520	8	8	77,368	8

From this table it will be seen on a basis of 319 that of the sixteen certainly democratic States, as compared with present ratio of 293, six remain stationary, to wit: Alabama, Delaware, Florida, Louisiana, Maryland, and Tennessee, while Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, and West Virginia gain one each; Texas gaining four. Of the sixteen certainly republican States four remain stationary, to wit: Colorado, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin. While Illinois, Iowa, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Pennsylvania gain one each; Michigan, Minnesota, and Nebraska two, and Kansas three. Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont lose one each. Of the six doubtful States five remain stationary, to wit: Indiana, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, and Oregon; California gaining two.

To epitomize: The present representation of the sixteen certainly democratic States is 106, the representation, taking 319 as a basis, will be 119, showing a gain of thirteen. The certainly republican States under the present basis of representation have 128 members, while under the proposed basis of 319 they will have 139 members, showing a total net gain of eleven. The gain being fourteen but the three States losing one each leaves a net gain of eleven. The doubtful States under the present representation have 59, under the proposed they will have 61 members, showing a gain of two.

It is submitted that in a political sense it would be exceedingly difficult to secure a more equitable distribution of the increase between the politically divided sections on the basis of population.

It may not be uninteresting to know the ratio of representation on the basis of the late enumeration of population as applied to the electoral vote. It is as follows: Of the sixteen certainly democratic States, the ratio is 1 to 134,088; the certainly republican States, 1 to 134,815, and the doubtful States, 1 to 130,913. It is, of course, understood that the electoral vote, as such, has nothing to do with the apportionment of the population, except in so far as it affects the electoral college; but for the purpose of comparison, all these matters are of interest.

In this connection, I present for the information of the House the following table, showing the electoral vote in 1880:

Electoral vote for President and Vice-President, 1880.

States.	President.		Vice-President.
	Garfield.	Hancock.	Arthur.	English.
Alabama	.....	10	.....	10
Arkansas	.....	6	.....	6
California	1	5	1	5
Colorado	3	.....	3	.....
Connecticut	6	.....	6	.....
Delaware	.....	3	.....	3
Florida	.....	4	.....	4
Georgia	.....	11	.....	11
Illinois	21	.....	21	.....
Indiana	15	.....	15	.....
Iowa	11	.....	11	.....
Kansas	5	.....	5	.....
Kentucky	.....	12	.....	12
Louisiana	.....	8	.....	8
Maine	7	.....	7	.....
Maryland	.....	8	.....	8
Massachusetts	13	.....	13	.....
Michigan	11	.....	11	.....
Minnesota	5	.....	5	.....
Mississippi	.....	8	.....	8
Missouri	.....	15	.....	15
Nebraska	3	.....	3	.....
Nevada	.....	3	.....	3
New Hampshire	5	.....	5	.....
New Jersey	.....	9	.....	9
New York	35	.....	35	.....
North Carolina	.....	10	.....	10
Ohio	22	.....	22	.....
Oregon	3	.....	3	.....
Pennsylvania	29	.....	29	.....
Rhode Island	4	.....	4	.....
South Carolina	.....	7	.....	7
Tennessee	.....	12	.....	12
Texas	.....	8	.....	8
Vermont	5	.....	5	.....
Virginia	.....	11	.....	11
West Virginia	.....	5	.....	5
Wisconsin	10	.....	10	.....
Total	214	155	214	155

While dealing with this subject of the ballot and the electoral vote in their relation to apportionment it may not be uninteresting to present in this connection the popular vote for candidates for President for the year 1880. I have not divided this vote between the sections of the country, nor do I propose to deal with it in detail, since the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] has so fully and completely presented facts and figures upon this point for the information of the country showing the relative powers of the voters of the various sections of the Union in the election of Representatives.

For the information of the House and country I call attention to the following tabular statement of the popular vote of last November:

Popular vote for President, 1880.

States.	Garfield.	Hancock.	Weaver.	Dow.
Alabama	56,221	91,185	4,642	.....
Arkansas	42,436	60,775	4,079	.....
California	80,378	80,417	3,376	.....
Colorado	27,450	24,647	1,435	.....
Connecticut	67,071	64,415	868	409
Delaware	14,133	15,275	120	.....
Florida	23,632	27,922	.....	.....
Georgia	54,086	102,470	969	.....
Illinois	318,037	277,321	26,258	443
Indiana	232,164	225,522	12,986	.....
Iowa	183,927	105,845	32,701	592
Kansas	121,549	58,801	19,851	25
Kentucky	106,306	149,068	11,499	258
Louisiana	38,016	65,067	439	.....
Maine	74,039	65,171	4,408	93
Maryland	78,515	93,706	.....	.....
Massachusetts	165,205	111,960	4,548	682
Michigan	185,341	131,597	34,895	942
Minnesota	93,903	53,315	3,267	286
Mississippi	34,854	75,750	5,797	.....
Missouri	153,567	208,609	35,135	.....
Nebraska	54,979	28,528	3,950	.....
Nevada	10,445	11,215	.....	.....
New Hampshire	44,852	40,794	528	180
New Jersey	120,555	122,565	2,617	191
New York	555,544	534,511	12,373	1,517
North Carolina	115,874	124,208	1,126	.....
Ohio	375,048	340,821	6,456	2,616
Oregon	20,619	19,855	245	.....
Pennsylvania	444,704	407,428	20,668	1,939
Rhode Island	18,195	10,779	236	20
South Carolina	58,071	112,312	566	.....
Tennessee	107,677	129,569	5,917	43
Texas	53,298	156,528	27,405	.....
Vermont	45,567	18,316	1,215	.....
Virginia	84,020	128,586	.....	.....
West Virginia	46,243	57,391	9,079	.....
Wisconsin	144,400	114,649	7,986	69
Total majority	4,450,921	4,447,888	307,740	10,305

There is another subject in connection with this apportionment which it seems to me may be considered with profit with reference to the three politically divided sections of the country as I have presented them, and that is the question of the collection of internal revenue. It will be remembered that there is a clause in the Constitution in which occur these words:

> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers.

While it is not claimed in any sense that the collection of internal revenue comes under the meaning of direct taxation under this clause of the Constitution, it certainly will be of interest and is pertinent to the discussion to know what proportion of the tax of this character is collected from the sections of the country referred to.

The aggregates are as follows:

In the certainly democratic States there was collected for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, $30,362,089.42; in the certainly republican States, $56,850,673.61; and in the doubtful States, $29,582,862.82. It will thus be seen that while the certainly republican States pay almost one-half of this class of revenue, they will, under the 319 ratio, have 139 members, while the certainly democratic and doubtful States, under the same ratio and paying about one-half of the total revenue collected, will have 180 members. It will, by this statement, appear that the discrimination is in favor of the democratic and doubtful States, upon comparing the number of representatives with the amount of the taxes paid.

It is in no sense claimed that this should form a basis for apportionment, but since taxation and representation are so intimately connected it occurs to me that this may very properly be considered as one of the elements representing the relative business enterprise and wealth production of the politically divided sections of the Union.

It has been said since this debate began that the only duty incumbent upon Congress is to fix the number of Representatives, and this having been done the other labor necessary is the use of figures in order to distribute these to the several States under the law in proper ratio.

While the Constitution expressly says that Representatives shall be apportioned according to population, it is nevertheless incumbent upon this body to view the subject from as great a number of stand-points as possible.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CROWLEY,] in his speech of the 4th instant, opposes an increase of the number of members of this House, claiming that the body is with its present number unwieldy and at times noisy. The gentleman forgets that in the history of all legislative bodies and of legislation in the civilized world the chief protection of the people against corrupt enactments and jobbery has been in a numerous branch of the popular Legislature.

It may be urged that a few men do the business in bodies of this kind, but I submit did such arguments lie it might only be necessary for the very few who claim to do the business, when it has been demonstrated who these few are, to occupy seats in this body. It must be remembered that there is a nice distinction to be drawn upon this point, and it is an historical fact that when ambitious or designing men desire to accomplish the overthrow of personal liberty and establish monarchies, among the first steps in the programme is the reduction of the numbers in bodies representing directly the people. Again, many precedents are quoted and comparisons made of the members of which similar bodies are composed under European governments. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] in his able speech on the 2d instant, refers to the French Chamber of Deputies, which is composed of five hundred and thirty-two members, as an illustration of a representative body, and in this connection makes the statement that "the largest bodies are born of monarchy or oligarchy."

It is submitted, however, that the French Republic after the trials of years, and now possessing that wisdom which is born of experience, having resorted to this plan of a numerous representation fresh from the people, argues that the greatest safety to the liberties of the people lies in direct contact rather than a more concentrated and necessarily a further removal from constituencies. The French Republic has fixed her representation, as follows: Number of deputies, 532; population, 36,905,788; constituents to each deputy, 69,371. Our Republic, under the number proposed by Mr. SHERWIN'S amendment, would be 319 Representatives; population, 49,369,595, or one Representative to each 154,764 of population, showing that, should this number be adopted, we should have nearly two and one-fourth times as many constituents to a Representative as is deemed wise in France; and, surrounded as she is by the monarchies of Europe, it is reasonable to suppose she has adopted the system under which her people feel that their liberties are the most secure.

In my own State of Illinois the most potent reason for increasing the number of the members of the Legislature at the time of the adoption of our present State constitution was that a large body could not be so easily corrupted and organized into rings for the advancement of jobbery.

Gentlemen argue that we shall, by increasing the number of Representatives from decade to decade, soon so augment the numbers in the House as to utterly destroy its effectiveness, or at least greatly weaken the body. Let us see how the ratio of increase has progressed since the organization of the Government. The first House was composed of 65 members, on a basis of 3,000,000 inhabitants in the whole country as approximated. Upon this basis the population by the census of 1880 is more than sixteen times greater than at the organization of the Government, while the number of Representatives, should 319 be taken as the basis, would show an increase of less than five times the original number, the exact increase being 4.90, and should the number 319 be adopted we would have the lowest representation that has ever been in this country, to wit, 1 to 154,764; the lowest previous number being that under the last apportionment on the census of 1870, 1 to 130,533. In the light of these figures, will any unprejudiced gentleman, whose opinions are formed upon information derived from our past history, for one moment suppose that we are increasing the numbers of our Representatives in a too rapid ratio?

We are not here to deal with the questions that may arise under the apportionment of Representatives ten, twenty, thirty, or a hundred years in the future. Conditions may be prevailing at the next enumeration of the inhabitants that may have little connection with our actions at the present. We are here to meet the duties and questions that confront us, and not what we expect or surmise may be those of ten years from this date and that may then affect the country. I have dealt with some of the questions involved from a political stand-point; that is, with reference to the certainly democratic States, the certainly republican States, and the doubtful States, as indicated by the vote at the last presidential election, according to my best judgment. I have done this in no partisan spirit. I regret as much as any Representative in this body that our condition is such that this treatment of the subject may in any sense appear sectional or narrow.

But we must meet the conditions as they exist, not as we could wish them to be. We have two great political parties in this country opposed to each other radically upon the principles that should prevail in our governmental system, and each of these parties would be glad to obtain an advantage, if possible, in the apportionment of representation, especially as the basis now fixed must also enter into the organization of and the powers to be wielded by the electoral college in two presidential contests. The statesman, in my judgment, should meet these questions, and, acknowledging the importance that attaches to the solution of them, proceed in the broad sense of national benefit and advancement, with a full regard and care for the protection and happiness of the whole people, to deal with them. We as republicans believe that this can be best wrought out through republican doctrines, principles, and teachings; and while we do not contend for advantages over our antagonists, we do propose to see to it that no advantages are gained by our opponents, whom we conscientiously believe to be wrong in their theories of government.

We have in the course of an honest, fair-minded investigation concluded that the number under which right and justice will be meted out to all sections of the country is the number 319. And for this we stand, because, in our judgment, while it gives us as partisans no particular advantage, it also gives our political opponents none. It comes more nearly dealing out equal and exact justice to all sections and parties, and in so doing best represents the wishes and interests of the whole people in establishing a ratio of representation.

I have, in considering this question, while doing so in a partisan sense, tried to put aside all feelings of narrow sectionalism; yet at the same time, realizing that the struggle must finally come between the two great parties as to which shall secure advantages, I have attempted and believe have succeeded in taking a politically business-like view of the case, and my theories and cause must stand or fall upon the facts and figures submitted.

This subject is too great and important to sink it into personal or partisan abuse. There is nothing to gain by such a course. The progress and civilization of the age will never sanction such treatment of the question. Our motto should be the broadest, freest prosperity of the whole country under national union and the most sacred protection to the citizen in his right to a full, free, untrammeled, unforced representation in this House, and to secure these rights as well in the electoral college during the next decade.

Improvement of Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH OF HON. T. UPDEGRAFF,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 15, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Let us examine further the appropriations made by this bill in the light of the report of the engineers.

"Improving Winnepiseogee Lake, New Hampshire, $2,500." The engineers say:

Lake Winnepiseogee is about twenty miles in length, with an average width of about five miles. At its southwestern extremity (at Weirs) it has an outlet into Long Bay, which bay is navigable for a distance of four miles to its outlet at Lake Village.

The waters are navigated, when not closed by ice, by three or four steamers, drawing from four to five feet of water, and by seven or eight smaller ones of one to three feet draught. They are chiefly used from the middle of May to the latter part of November, in the transportation of pleasure travel; while the smaller boats are used principally for carrying wood and produce, and occasionally passengers, about the shores of the lake.

"Broad Creek from its mouth to Laurel, Delaware, $10,000." The engineers say:

The distance from Laurel, the head of tide-water, to the mouth of the creek is about seven miles. * * * The remainder of the creek up as far as Laurel is very shoal, the depth declining rapidly to three, two, one, and one-half feet, and even less. * * * It is stated that the depth of water below Laurel was once much greater. The creek is certainly very shoal now. It is estimated that to make a channel of seven feet depth at mean low-water, and sixty feet in width, will require the removal of 175,000 cubic yards of material—$46,500. If the creek has shoaled so much in the past, the same process would probably continue after the making of the artificial channel. The tendency to deposition might be checked to a considerable extent by regulation of the water-way by wing-dams and training-walls, and the cost of these would increase the foregoing estimate to $60,000.

"Nomini Creek, Virginia, $2,000." The engineers say:

Its navigation was obstructed by a bar of sand and oyster shells at its mouth, over which but three feet could be carried at low water.

After passing the bar a wide and navigable stream is found, in which eight and one-half feet can be carried to Nomini Ferry, three miles above the mouth, and five feet can be carried for two and one-half miles above the ferry.

The improvement proposed was the excavation of a channel one hundred feet wide and nine feet deep at low water through the bar, and the estimated cost was $20,000.

"Pagan Creek, Virginia, $5,000." The engineers say:

The flourishing town of Smithfield is at the head of navigation. Between the town and the mouth of the creek, a distance of about five miles, four shoals occur, through which Mr. Abert reports that a channel should be dredged sixty feet in width and from six and one-half to seven feet in depth. He estimated the cost of the above excavations would then be about twenty-eight thousand dollars.

"Staunton River, Virginia, $5,000." The engineers state the depth at forty-six stations or shoals within thirty-two miles between Brookneal and Roanoke as varying all the way from four inches to twenty, and the fall in these thirty-two miles at forty-five and a half feet. They also say:

The navigation between Brookneal and Roanoke is at present carried on by a small steamboat and bateaux. The bateaux float down the river with the current, and are pushed up stream by the aid of poles.

"Totusky River, Virginia, $2,500." The engineers say:

It is twenty miles long. About five miles from its mouth it is crossed by a bridge without a draw, over which passes the county road. The examination was therefore limited to the portion of the river below the bridge.

The tides reach above the bridge, the mean range at the mouth being about one and six-tenths foot.

"French Broad River, North Carolina, $5,000." The engineers say:

The part of the river which it was proposed to improve was that between Brevard and Big Buck Shoals, a distance of thirty-two miles. The obstructions were fish-traps, bowlders, and ledges of rock, and gravel shoals, and it was proposed to secure the proper depth and slope at these points by means of dredging, rock excavation, and the construction of wing-dams where found necessary. The estimated cost of securing a depth of two-and-a-half feet at low water, with a channel thirty-five feet wide, by this method was $45,500.

"Escambia River, Florida and Alabama, $5,000." The engineers say:

The work would not be permanent in its character, but would require more or less dredging and snagging from year to year. The commerce to be benefited is confined to lumber, about five million feet of which, including hewn and sawed, are annually transported down the river. Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project, $17,000.

"Suwanee River, Florida, $30,000." The engineers say:

It is proposed to expend the amount asked for in continuing the work according to the plan. It is not thought the improvement will be permanent, but that a small amount of dredging will be required from time to time. The commerce to be benefited is principally in pine, cypress, and cedar timber, 2,000,000 feet of which were shipped last year. Cotton, sirup, and other farm products in limited quantity are also annually shipped, chiefly to Cedar Keys, from points on the Suwanee River:

Amount appropriated by act approved June 14, 1880	$5,000
July 1, 1880, amount available	5,000
Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project	50,158
Amount that can be profitably expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1882	50,000

"Pearl River, below Jackson, Mississippi, $25,000." The Engineer says:

The work is not considered of a permanent character, as obstructions, caused by trees falling into the river, drift-logs, and snags are liable to reform at any time.

Original estimated cost	$95,940
Amount appropriated (last year)	30,000

"Tallahatchee River, Mississippi: Lower part, $1,000; upper part, $2,000." The engineers say:

For thirty miles above Sharkey's Landing it is almost impossible for steamboats to navigate, the leaning timber nearly meeting each other as it leans over from both banks, and at any stage of water it is next to impossible for boats of any dimensions to get through into the Coldwater. The other portion of the Tallahatchee above, and this side of the mouth of the Coldwater, is in much better condition, being wider and more free from obstructions of any description.

* * * * * *

From the mouth of Coldwater to Sharkey's Landing, on the Tallahatchee, a distance of one hundred miles, the river runs through a wild and thinly-settled country.

* * * * * * *

From inquiries made from planters living near the river, and from steamboat men running on the Tallahatchee and Yazoo Rivers, I am informed it would be no benefit to improve the upper part of Tallahatchee above Sharkey's, for the business is so small and so readily accessible to the Mississippi River on the west, and to the Mississippi and Tennessee Railroad on the east, that the business offered on the river would not be sufficient to pay a single steamboat to run.

"Tombigbee River, above Columbus, Mississippi, $1,000." The engineers say:

The present project for the improvement of this portion of the river was adopted in 1873, the object being to give good high-water navigation by the removal of snags and overhanging trees from Columbus to Fulton. The old channel was not navigable during low-water, and was so difficult and dangerous during high-water, on account of the obstructions named above, as to stop all steamers.

The amount expended to June 30, 1880, is $19,590.32, and has resulted in so opening the river that light-draught steamers were enabled to run up to Fulton, during the last high-water season, and bring down over two thousand bales of cotton.

* * * * * * *

It is estimated that a yearly appropriation of $2,000 will be required to keep this section of the Tombigbee River in navigable condition.

Before the commencement of this improvement all cotton and other produce had to be hauled about twenty miles to the railroad and pay high rates of freight. As soon as the river is made navigable cheap freights will increase the trade and tend to induce farmers to settle in this section of the country.

The original estimated cost of the work under existing project is $35,000.

Total amount appropriated, $30,667.05.

"Amite River, Louisiana, $5,000." The engineers say:

The improvement is not considered a permanent one, as the obstructions caused by trees falling into the river, drift-logs, and snags are liable to reform at any time. * * * The general character of the stream is a succession of pools, sometimes over a mile in length and not less than four feet in depth, connected by ripples or shoals, there often being not more than one foot of water over them. The bed of the stream is generally gravel or sand, and the shoals are invariably composed of these materials.

"Bayou Terrebonne, Louisiana, $8,800." The engineers say:

By act of Congress approved June 14, 1880, an appropriation of $10,000 was made for its commencement.

To do this it will be necessary to clear away the overhanging willows and bushes on the right bank of the bayou for a distance of twenty miles below Houma and to dredge the shoal spots that exist at intervals for a distance of six miles below that place.

The work is not considered permanent, as the shoals below Houma are apt to reform with each high water.

"Tangipahoa River, Louisiana, $2,000." The engineers say:

The work is not considered of permanent value, as the obstructions caused by drift trees and snags are liable to replacement by new obstructions of the same character supplied by caving banks.

Total estimated cost	$10,700
Amount appropriated (last year)	5,000

"Warrior and Tombigbee Rivers, Alabama and Mississippi, $25,000." The engineers say:

The main increase in business that will result from the completion of the Warrior River improvement will be in the transportation of coal from Tuscaloosa, which, with navigation made practicable for barges, will undoubtedly become extensive and of great importance.

Of the Tombigbee, the engineers say:

This improvement, like that of the Warrior, and for the same reasons, will need annual revision after completion; $5,000 will be a sufficient annual appropriation for this purpose.

On both rivers below Columbus there had been expended to June 30, 1880, $80,213.04; amount appropriated and then available, $54,786.96.

Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project, $203,000.

"Arkansas Pass and Bay, up to Brockport and Corpus Christi, Texas, $80,000." The engineers say, ($100,000 having been appropriated in 1879 and 1880:)

Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project, $1,100,722.75.

"Improving channel over bar at mouth of Brazos River, Texas, $40,000." The engineers say, July 1, 1881:

The first appropriation was by act of June 14, 1880, $40,000. Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project, $246,484. * * * The work is not considered as susceptible of permanent completion, and estimates will vary accordingly.

"Pass Cavallo Inlet into Matagorda Bay, Texas, $60,000," $120,000 having been appropriated in 1879 and 1880. The engineers say:

Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project, $919,180.

"Improving ship channel in Galveston Bay, Texas, $50,000." The engineers say:

Original estimate, (for channel 100 feet wide and 12 feet deep,) 1877		$146,326 42
Appropriated, (1872 to 1880)		302,000 00
Unappropriated balance of the original estimate, (1877)		144,326 42

"Neches River, Texas, $3,000." The engineers say:

The present project for improvement of this river was adopted in 1873, with a view to opening up the river to navigation, to increase the depth across the bar at the mouth of the river from two and one-half feet to five feet, and by annual grants keeping it open by dredging.

The amount expended to June 30, 1880, is $12,892.70, and has resulted in temporarily securing a channel across the bar of five feet in depth at mean low tide. The work is not susceptible of permanent completion.

July 1, 1879, amount available	$12,662 08
Amount appropriated by act approved June 14, 1880	5,000 00
		$17,662 08
July 1, 1880, amount expended during fiscal year	11,246 23
July 1, 1880, outstanding liabilities	1,308 55
		12,554 78
July 1, 1880, amount available		5,107 30
Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project		8,318 05

* * * * * * *

When the river is low in summer and early autumn the volume of flow is very small. * * * At low river very little water is running in the channel, and there are numerous shoals of sand and gravel. * * * During the summer, while the river is at low stage, there is so little water running and so many shoals and sandbars over which there is less than one foot in depth, that it would seem impossible to secure navigation throughout the year except by means of an expensive system of dams and locks, which the present state of the adjacent country does not warrant.

"Narrows of Sabine River above Orange and to deepen channel at its mouth, Texas, $7,000." The engineers say:

In several places the rocky strata cross the river, forming shoals and rapids that render navigation impossible at low water. The most noted of these rocky shoals occur just below Sabinetown, and at Goodwin's Ferry, where a fall of one and a quarter feet was observed in a distance of one hundred feet. The river is very tortuous in its course, and at low water varies constantly in its depth from ten feet and over to only a few inches.

* * * * * * *

A few farms appear on the upper part of the river, and cotton and corn are cultivated.

* * * * * * *

Belgrade, at the lower end of the "Raft," is ninety miles from Orange; one family lives here and keeps a small store.

* * * * * * *

Throughout all this part of the river very little good arable land exists in the immediate vicinity of its banks.

* * * * * * *

Last summer the small steamboat Lark, drawing a little less than two feet, was twenty-two days getting through the Narrows.

* * * * * * *

East Hamilton, the initial point of this survey, is situated in Shelby County, Texas. It contains two stores and about thirty inhabitants.

* * * * * * *

Pendleton, in Sabine County, has only one store and a cotton warehouse. Two families live here, and 1,000 bales of cotton were shipped last year.

Sabinetown is a small settlement of a half dozen families and one store.

There are no more towns on this river until we reach Orange. Some little cotton is shipped from a few landings. About every fifteen miles a single family can be found living on the river and tending a ferry. The reason of such a scarcity of population on the river is partly due to the fact that the bottoms are subject to overflows and cannot be cultivated, and partly to the prevalence of malarial fevers near the river in the summer months. * * * This year 45,000 logs were cut in the vicinity of the river, and at the time of the survey were waiting for the first rise to be floated down to the mills at Orange.

"Trinity River, Texas, $10,000." The engineers say:

Mr. Webb's report shows that above Liberty, the head of tide-water, and forty-one miles from its mouth, no sufficient improvements can be made except at a cost out of all proportion to the importance of the interests to be benefited, the river being a succession of rocky or gravel shoals, with deep pools between, very tortuous, with abrupt bends.

* * * * * * *

The river was at extreme low-water stage, not navigable in places for our light skiffs.

* * * * * * *

Twelve miles below the amount of water flowing in the river was found to be about sixty cubic feet per second. This amount was slightly increased lower down by creeks and springs.

* * * * * * *

The river is very tortuous, with abrupt bends.

* * * * * * *

Riverside, Walker County, at the crossing of the International and Great Northern Railroad, has three stores, a cotton-seed-oil mill capable of producing fifty barrels of oil per day, and three dwellings.

* * * * * * *

Newport, Walker County, on the west bank of the river, two and one-half miles below Riverside, has a store and two dwelling-houses. There is a public ferry here.

The site of Sevastopol is marked by the ruins of a warehouse.

In January, 1878, the steamer Wren went up to Ryan's Ferry, seventeen miles below Riverside, and took off a load of cotton. No steamboat has been that high up since. In 1879 six hundred bales of cotton were carried down the river without steam-power on a barge built at the ferry.

Swartwout, Polk County, on the east bank of the river, has four dwelling-houses. No business is done here.

Marianna, Polk County, seventy-five miles below Riverside and eighty-two miles above Liberty, has three stores, a school-house and warehouse, and five residences. While steamboats were navigating the river it was the most important place above Liberty. In 1879, seventy-five bales of cotton were floated down the river on a flat-boat.

Liberty, county seat of Liberty County, one mile west of the river and forty-one miles above its mouth, on the Texas and New Orleans Railroad, is by far the most important place on the river. It has three hundred inhabitants, nine stores, and is surrounded by a thickly settled country.

* * * * * * *

Moss Bluff, twenty-one miles below Liberty, has a store and post-office and two dwellings.

* * * * * * *

Wallisville, the county seat of Chambers County, six miles above the mouth of the river, has two stores, a post-office, and steam cotton-gin, and about two hundred inhabitants.

"Arkansas River, between Fort Smith, Arkansas, and Wichita, Kansas, $20,000." The engineers say:

During the coming season it is proposed to set a party at work at the upper end of the district. They will work at low water, either from flat-boats or the banks of the stream, and will remove snags and rocks from the channel, and perhaps build a few dams on the worst shoals. These operations will be carried on as far as the funds available will allow, and will, it is thought, benefit at least flat-boat navigation, which, with the impassable bridges below, is all that the stream is now capable of.

"Fourche Le Fevre River, Arkansas, $2,000." The engineers say:

Instead of building a flat-boat and placing upon it the necessary machinery for pulling snags and removing rocks, as originally contemplated in the project for the improvement of this stream, a complete outfit, consisting of three barges, was hired; one with steam-power; one for the working party engaged in clearing timber from the banks; and a third as quarters for the men.

* * * * * * *

This shoal so far was the worst we had met with, having at least eighteen inches of a fall over it, and to enable me to get the boats over this fall I had to build a temporary brush dam to give sufficient water-level to do it.

* * * * * * *

On the 5th November I arrived at Indian Grave Shoal, and found four inches of water on it; the shoal is about three hundred feet long, composed of slate rock. A passage-way sufficient for the boats to navigate was cut through.

The next place was Piney Point Shoal, about four hundred feet long and about forty feet in width; there was only three inches of water when I commenced work on it, which I deepened to about eighteen.

* * * * * * *

Taking a general view of the river since the work has been done, I think it is one of the prettiest in Arkansas.

"Big Hatchie River, Tennessee, $3,500." The engineers say:

In the year 1866 the State Legislature of Tennessee declared the Hatchie to be an unnavigable stream, and gave permission to the Mississippi Central, the Memphis and Louisville, and Memphis and Paducah Railroad Companies to construct bridges across it, which created an effectual blockade, and although many attempts have since been made to navigate the river, which has led to much litigation, and the United States remaining silent on the question, navigation has been entirely suspended.

In 1880, possibly in anticipation of the "golden stream" which so delighted the Kanawha Gazette, the act was repealed.

"Cumberland River, from Kentucky line to Smith's Shoals, $15,000; at Smith's Shoals, completing improvement, $10,000." The engineers say:

The Smith's Shoals obstructions, especially that part known as Long Shoals, has been found more formidable than was anticipated, and may require some change of plan to overcome the difficulties encountered.

While at low water a person may walk about these shoals dry shod, it is found that during the flood stages the stream becomes a torrent of such force as to pick up large stones and roll them along as a small stream does pebbles.

There has already been appropriated for the shoals $90,000.

"Duck River, Tennessee, $3,000." From Centreville to the mouth of this stream the distance is 68.50 miles. In this distance there are fifty-one obstructed places, varying from 345 to 6,639 feet in length. The least depth in channel in these fifty-one places at low water is given at from four inches to eighteen. In only fourteen of the fifty-one places does this depth reach one foot, and in only six does it reach eighteen inches. For the long stretch of 6,639 feet the depth given is four inches. The fall for the sixty-eight and one-half miles is given at 122.05 feet. Comment is unnecessary!

"Hiawasse River, Tennessee, $1,500." The engineers say:

The original project for this improvement was adopted in 1874, and contemplated the formation of a channel at least two feet deep and forty feet wide, between Savannah Ford and the Tennessee River, a distance of about thirty-three miles.

Amount heretofore appropriated, $26,000.

"Kentucky River, from its mouth to Three Forks, Kentucky, $100,000." The engineers say:

The present project for the improvement of this river is that proposed by Major W. E. Merrill, Corps of Engineers, in his report of August, 1879, on the survey of the river, contemplating a slackwater navigation of six feet depth with permanent dams for the main river, i. e., up to Three Forks, or for two hundred and fifty-eight miles. There is, at present, no regular or permanent navigation, the five old locks and dams on the lower eighty-two miles of the river having become, by disasters and neglect, practically useless, and above them there is too little water in low stages, with ripples and bars of rock and gravel scattered along the channel.

Heretofore appropriated, $200,000; amount required for completion, $942,402; total, $1,142,402. This does not include "maintenance and repairs," which in this case the engineers say, "may be considerable."

"Gasconade River, Missouri, $10,000." Of this stream from Vienna to its mouth, the engineers say:

This portion of the Gasconade, some seventy-eight miles in length, is a small stream, the low-water discharge being only four hundred and fifty cubic feet per second. The fall is heavy—one hundred and eight feet in this distance—and the river is much obstructed by gravel bars, the channels through which are tortuous and shallow. To thoroughly improve a stream of this character is a very costly operation.

* * * * * * *

The river is a series of pools and shoals.

* * * * *

The survey of the river develops seventy-six places needing improvement, as shown on the maps and in the following table.

* * * * * * *

Rafting is at present the only traffic done on the river, though several boats have been up the stream. Lumber and railroad ties are rafted in various quantities year by year. It is estimated that 80,000 ties were rafted in the year 1879. Not much lumber came down, due probably to the very low water and the small demand for that article.

* * * * * * *

Attention is also called to the existence and operation of a grist-mill, as shown on sheet 20 of the map.

How the "grist-mill" got there is not stated. It was, no doubt, discovered by the use of engineering instruments. Its engineering importance is not seen. Its commercial importance depends upon additional statistics. Whether this mill has a dam-site is not stated. For the kind of navigation, however, contemplated by much of the pending bill, it is a comfort to know the dam may be so "modified" as to occasion it no inconvenience.

Again the engineers say:

Attention is respectfully called to the condition of the bridge of the Missouri Pacific Railroad, near the mouth of the river, (sheet 31;) it has no draw-span.

This is the unkindest cut of all.

"Tradewater River, Kentucky, open navigation, $3,000." The engineers say:

The present examination covered the lower forty-one miles of the river. Further up than that the stream is so small, crooked, and obstructed as to render any examination looking to river improvement unnecessary. The results developed in the stretch examined show a succession of small pools and ripples.

The river is navigable for rafts and flat-boats descending, and small steamboats ascending, during very high water, which occurs at intervals from November to March, but as the stage of water is very uncertain steamboats do not venture far up.

"Sumpawamus Inlet, New York, $5,000." The engineers say:

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report on the survey of Sumpawamus Inlet, Long Island, with such information as I have been able to obtain in regard to the commerce and navigation of the same:

* * * * * * *

The amount of commerce and navigation to be benefited by the proposed improvement is unknown.

The amount of tonnage for the past year is unknown.

Sumpawamus Inlet is a tributary of the Great South Bay, and lies toward its western end. It is only an estuary and the supply of fresh water, which is large only after heavy rains, is stored in a pond used for milling purposes. The water in the inlet is so shallow that only very light-draught boats can navigate it, but those now employed are nearly all pleasure-boats for the use of summer residents.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can spare no more time for "extracts" from the Engineer's reports. They could be obtained by non-members of the Committee on Commerce only about the time the discussion began. I can only guess at what I could have found in the 2,556 pages of the general reports, if I could have studied them as long and as carefully as the committee has done. On what I have presented comment is hardly necessary. The bill stands condemned. It will pass this House. That is predetermined. The same causes that make the committee which framed it unanimous in its favor will secure it a majority here. Let us hope, however, that no such bill will ever again be reported.

It is said that nothing is stationary; that all created things, all systems, are either advancing or retrograding, growing or dying. May we not hope that the system of carrying home to "deestricts" large appropriations from the national Treasury to lay at the feet of admiring constituents has reached its climax? Zeal in a Representative in caring for the local interests of his people is commendable; but may it not advance so far as to degenerate, after a while, into a mere division of the contents of the national Treasury. Does not the pending bill betoken greater zeal for local interests than for national or interstate commerce? Will not too many of its supporters on their return home "point with pride" to the amount of money which under its provisions is to be expended among their constituents? Will it not some time occur to these constituents that they themselves pay this money?

The savage estimates his valor and prowess by the number of scalps he carries home in his belt. If the progress of the last few years in appropriating money to be expended on thunder-gust creeks, bayous, and bubbling brooks is to be continued, how long will it be until at every adjournment of a session the Congressman will count his appropriations as the Indian does the scalps of his enemies? That constituents have already begun to do this was too abundantly indicated by the newspaper press of the country on the adjournment of the last session of this Congress. The following is a sample, taken from the Chicago Tribune of June 30, 1880:

KENNA, of West Virginia, is one of the members of the House Committee on Commerce, and in that capacity helps to prepare the river and harbor bill. He holds his seat apparently by the indulgence of his constituents, in consequence of his activity as a ———, and after the adjournment of each Congress returns to his district with a great flourish of trumpets. The Kanawha Gazette welcomed him home after his late exploits in very cordial terms and gave him the credit of securing the following appropriations:

For Guyandotte River	$2,000 00
For Elk River	5,000 00
For New River	12,000 00
For Big Sandy River	55,000 00
For Kanawha River	200,000 00
For Charleston custom-house	75,000 00
Total	349,000 00

The Gazette commented on the appropriations as follows:

"Kanawha River receives as much as the harbor of New York; Charleston as much as the city of Philadelphia for its harbor. The third district receives more this year from the public Treasury than the net amount of all the taxes that have gone into the Treasury from the whole State of West Virginia for five years. Every dollar of it is now in the Treasury ready to be paid out as soon as it is called for. Since HEREFORD and KENNA have been our representatives the golden stream has poured steadily into our midst, refreshing the hearts and bearing blessings into the hands of our laboring-men, their wives and children."

Some of the results of democratic economy and southern supremacy may be seen in the river and harbor bill as applied to the great State of West Virginia, which has a solid democratic delegation at Washington.

Can any patriotic man witness this tendency without indignation? Can any judicious friend of river and harbor improvement see it without alarm? Is not the value of the great commercial arteries of the nation sufficient to enable them to stand upon their own merits? Must the magnificent Mississippi and tributaries which wash or penetrate the borders of every State between the Rocky and the Alleghany ranges be degraded commercially to a level with the Cheesequakes and the Choptank, and Chicago, Saint Paul, Saint Louis, and New Orleans be severally rated as an oyster-bed, a "grist-mill," or a "brick-yard," in order that river and harbor improvement may survive? Cannot the commerce on the great national water highways be cared for and protected without squandering the people's money on a trade that can get over a series of "modified mill-dams" in "push-boats," or "pole-boats," or boats that float down stream to be hauled back in wagons? Must the "boating" grounds of wealthy pleasure-seekers in "summer residences," where the "elite and lovely spread their silken sails" and lovers "bill and coo" in the soft moonlight, be adorned, and private "brick-yards" and "clay pits" made approachable by flat-boats, out of the taxes laid upon the people, in order that that which all recognize as just and wise may be done? If so, then it needs little foresight to discern that the whole system of river and harbor improvement will soon become odious and die.

I do not believe in this necessity. I have too much confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of Congress and the country. Let local and private interests be ignored. Stop "modifying mill-dams" for "push-boats." Drop the insignificant streams, creeks, and bayous. Abandon slackwater navigation, save perhaps where it forms a link in great transcontinental routes. Let the national river and harbor system appeal for aid on its own merits. The aid will not be denied. It will be vastly stronger than when associated and loaded down with shams and absurdities.

The political party with which I am proud to act is distinctly pledged to the improvement of national water-highways. I know of no dissent among its leading members. I am in full accord with its most advanced expressions on the subject. In this pledge fulfilled lies a large measure of relief against the exactions of selfish and grasping railway corporations. It violates no constitutional provision and invades no private right. Its results will not be uncertain. Let us hope that it is destined to a beneficent fulfillment and expansion. But the system can have no healthy growth until stripped of the barnacles and fungi which the engineers have so graphically described.

Let me illustrate. This bill appropriates $10,000,000 in the aggregate. For the Chattahooche River, Georgia, it appropriates $20,000; the engineers estimate the cost of the whole improvement at $6,403,811; so that the bill gives $\frac{1}{320}$ of the amount necessary. Now, if one item of $20,000 in this bill involves an ultimate expenditure of $6,400,000, then in the same ratio the aggregate of the bill, to wit, $10,000,000, involves the ultimate expenditure of $3,200,000,000, a sum nearly one and a half times as large as the national debt. Is it not sure that such a system will soon fall to pieces of its own weight?

In a former hasty reference to this stream the ultimate expenditure was stated at about three million dollars, which on close examination is found to have had reference to only one of the three sections of the river.

It is claimed that this is not a fair illustration, that the survey and estimate relate to a part of the river not to be improved. In the engineer reports the river is divided into two sections, first, "the Chattahoochee River, Georgia and Alabama;" second, "the Chattahoochee River, Georgia, above Columbus." The appropriation is for "the Chattahoochee River, Georgia," without limitation except by the word "Georgia." The survey and estimate from which I read are of the upper part of the river, which is in Georgia, if my geography is correct.

But take the Big Sandy, Kentucky and West Virginia. The bill gives it $30,000 for slackwater navigation. The estimate in round numbers is $2,000,000. Capitalizing the cost of operation, repairs, &c., at 4 per cent. per annum, we have $2,000,000, more, in all, $4,000,000, or one hundred and thirty-three times the appropriation for this stream in this bill. Now multiply the aggregate of the bill, to wit, ten million by one hundred and thirty-three and we have $1,330,000,000, an amount pretty close up to the whole national debt, for which this bill is an "entering-wedge."

Everybody knows the several items in this bill could not receive the approval of this House, each on its own merits. How long could the Cheesequakes, the Secretary, or the Choptank stand alone in this Hall? Its passage will be said to be due to the omnibus or log-rolling principle, a motive power in legislation so vicious as to need no characterization.

The States represented on the Committee on Commerce receive large appropriations. Some of them are, perhaps, not justly criticisable. Every member of that committee is understood to be warmly in favor of the bill as an entirety. The remainder of the House is practically without information as to the character of the streams appropriated for save what can be snatched from 2,000 unindexed pages in the hurly burly of debate. Very many of the surveys are special and as yet unattainable, and of these I fear many are of streams most insignificant and absurd. No member of the committee has given to the House, so far as I know, any information as to how much of wrong it must approve in order to do some justice. So anxious are many, myself among the number, for the improvement of navigable or important waters, that yielding much to differences of opinion and the weakness of human nature, and out of regard for the difficult and laborious duties which the Committee on Commerce has performed, they would be willing to endure what seems to them a considerable wrong in order that great good might be done. But the Sumpawamuses, the Guyandottes, the Big Sandys, the Cheesequakes, the Choptanks, &c., are much too numerous, and I know not how many more such the attainable and unattainable reports disclose.

Whether the distributions of the bill be regarded as based upon population, commerce, or the navigability of streams it is indefensible. As a "big divide," a character which its friends seem to give it, it is unfair. Speaking in round numbers, the bill appropriates twenty cents per capita of the population of the United States. Texas carries off $750,000, while the proportion of her population, 1,592,000, would entitle her to no more than $318,400. Iowa, with a population of 1,642,000, receives about ninety thousand dollars, when she is entitled to $328,400. Are the streams of Iowa and on her borders less noble than the bayous of Texas? Is she nearer the sea-coasts than Texas? Why should Texas receive $750,000, while Iowa with a greater population, is thrust aside with not a farthing for her interior, and only $90,000 for her six hundred or seven hundred miles of navigable boundary? True, Iowa has asked nothing for her interior streams. That industry she has never developed. Nevertheless she has streams as deep and broad as the Trinity or the Sabine, that will yield as gracefully to the embraces of lock and dam as the Big Sandy. She has bubbling brooks wherein the shy but gamy trout hides under "overhanging trees," "ripples and shoals," that murmur sweet music, and pools and inlets and lakes whereon lusty youth breathes its tale of love and plies the drippping oar. In her classic "Skunk" she has her "splatterdock" ready to part gracefully for the plowing keel of traffic, and her bullfrogs to "bay its deep-mouthed welcome." But she has no "push-boat" commerce or "pole-boat" navigation, and cares little for a "down-stream" trade that involves a return portage of vessels. I fear also her "mill-dams" would absolutely refuse to "modify," even at the command of the Commerce Committee.

Of the ten millions in this bill over one-half goes to the Southern States. If I remember correctly, statistics current during the last summer showed that these States represented but a small fraction of the commercial, financial, property-owning, tax-paying interests of the United States—about one-fourteenth. But even though the fraction be larger, why should more than one-half go South? Her population does not, I think, exceed one-third of the whole. Is it because she has more assiduously coveted the "golden stream" which last year so delighted West Virginia, or because she is by birthright entitled to the "lion's share" spoken of so frankly by the distinguished Georgian? The South comes here annually and comes almost solidly as a section and demands these inequitable appropriations, and when the North, which for the greater part must "foot the bill," cries out against it, she holds up her hands in horror and screams, "Oh, for shame; you are sectional and tearing open gaping wounds which should long since have been healed." I have been glad to notice, however, a few men from that section on this floor, who, with a broad patriotism, have resisted the blandishments of this bill, and are content to appeal for approval to the better sentiment of their people, men who evidently believe that to waste public money among their constituents can do them no permanent good at all commensurate with the general evil of the example, and representing communities who bear their full share of the public burden.

It is due to the Department of Engineers to say that in the hurry of this discussion some unintentional injustice has been done by all sides. It has often been remarked that the engineers "recommended" such and such appropriations. This is hardly ever correct. The engineers are directed to examine and report upon the feasibility of a given project. They do not start it. They report the facts with reference to it and estimate the costs. These "estimates" are often erroneously treated as recommendations. The responsibility is with the Congress, and not with the Engineer Corps. It sometimes happens that these gentleman very properly express an opinion like this: "If this work is to be done it were better not to do it in driblets, thus incurring unnecessary waste and injury." I know of no suspicion of improper or unwise application of money appropriated; and from some personal observation in the West I am inclined to think that in that section the appropriations are wisely and economically administered.

River and Harbor Improvements.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN WHITEAKER,

OF OREGON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 15, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHITEAKER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to submit a few remarks upon the bill now under discussion in Committee of the Whole House. I am in favor of the passage of this bill, because I believe the interests of this great country demand it. Although representing the most remote State in the Union, I desire, nevertheless, to consider the merits of this bill in a national point of view. I hold that it is the duty of the Government to provide in a liberal manner for the improvement of its rivers and harbors. I would go further, and amend the bill so as to include in its provisions other sections of the country which have been either ignored entirely or granted such small appropriations as to render the execution of the work inefficient. There are gentlemen upon this floor who can speak eloquently and determinedly in behalf of their own excluded sections. I propose to devote my allotted time to the discussion of the rights and demands of that section of the Union which I have the honor to represent in this body.

While this bill was being formulated by the Committee on Commerce, which under the rules of the House was charged with its preparation, I submitted to it, through its chairman, the following communication relating to the improvement of the rivers and harbors of Oregon, to wit:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, January 16, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the following estimates of appropriations for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the State of Oregon. I most respectfully urge that these amounts may be incorporated without reduction in the bill to be reported by your committee relating to the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the United States.

The amounts following are those estimated and recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the congressional delegation from the State of Oregon urge them as necessary and proper for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of that State, to wit:

For continuing work on the canal around the Cascades of the Columbia River, $500,000. The appropriation last year for this work was $100,000. (See Book of Estimates, page 145; also see Report of Chief Engineer, United States Army, page 2301.)

For the improvement of the Upper Columbia River, including Snake River, $50,000. The appropriation last year was $15,000. (See Book of Estimates, page 145; also Report of Chief Engineer, United States Army, page 2272.)

For the improvement of the mouth of Columbia River, protecting beach at Point Adams, $20,500. A very important item. (See Book of Estimates, page 145; also, Report of Chief Engineer United States Army, page 2317.)

For the improvement of the Lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers from Portland to the sea, including the bar at the mouth of the Columbia River, $150,000. The appropriation last year was $45,000. This is a work of great importance to the State. (See Book of Estimates, page 145; see also Report of Chief Engineer United States Army, page 2258.)

For the improvement of the Upper Willamette River, including Yam Hill River, $50,000. The appropriation last year was $12,000. (See Book of Estimates, page 145; see also Report of Chief Engineer United States Army, page 2277.)

For improvement of entrance to Coos Bay and Harbor, $60,000. The appropriation last year was $40,000. (See Book of Estimates, page 137; see also Report of Chief Engineer United States Army, page 2326.)

For the improvement of the mouth of Umpqua River, $12,000. (See Report of Chief Engineer United States Army, page 2334.)

I have the honor to request, in behalf of the delegation from the State of Oregon, that your committee will incorporate in the river and harbor bill a clause directing an examination of Youngs, Lewis and Clarke's, and Skipanon Rivers, entering into Youngs Bay, in the county of Clatsop, near the mouth of the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon, as far as tide-water extends on said rivers, with a view of ascertaining whether any improvement of the said rivers is advisable.

In support of this request I would urge that the performance of this work will not involve a special appropriation. It can be performed by the engineer in charge of that district, at a small expense which will be obtained from the annual appropriation of $150,000 made for such purposes.

I have also been informed by General Wright, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, that certain specific information relating to Yaquina and Coquille Rivers will shortly be forwarded to your committee for its consideration.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JOHN WHITEAKER,
Representative from Oregon.

Hon. J. H. REAGAN,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
House of Representatives

The bill as reported to the House by that committee reduces those estimates and grants to the State of Oregon to the following amounts, which, in my opinion, are inadequate to the wants and interests of the people of that growing State:

Canal around Cascades of Columbia River, Oregon, $100,000.

Improving Upper Columbia River, including Snake River, Oregon, $15,000.

Improving Lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers, from Portland, Oregon, to the sea, including bar at mouth of Columbia River, Oregon, $45,000.

Improving Upper Willamette and Yam Hill Rivers, Oregon, $15,000.

Young's, Lewis and Clarke's, and Skipanon Rivers, entering into Young's Bay, in the county of Clatsop, near mouth of Columbia River, Oregon.

Improving entrance to Yaquina Bay, Oregon, $10,000.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to enter upon a tirade against the committee because they have not granted the Pacific coast what I think the interests of that great section demand. As that committee is now constituted, it is perhaps as fair a bill as could be expected. In my judgment, the Pacific slope was entitled to a representation upon that committee. It is impossible for any committee to understand fully the commercial importance of the far West unless they possess personal knowledge of its wide and varied resources. Oregon, California, and Washington Territory have a seaboard of sixteen hundred miles or more. And back of these States, and still on the Pacific slope, lie the State of Nevada, and the Territories of Arizona, Idaho, and parts of Utah and Montana, embracing limits far greater than those of the Middle and New England States. The State of Oregon alone has a coast line on the Pacific of more than four hundred miles, embracing many harbors. The first, on the south, is formed by Rogue River and has two fathoms of water. Many rocks border the shore, and a dangerous reef with a channel one mile wide lies off the entrance. Port Orford is two miles long and one mile wide, and has an anchorage of six fathoms.

It is proposed to make this a harbor of refuge by the erection of a breakwater to protect it from south winds. The Coquille River is accessible by vessels of light draught. Coos Bay is about ten miles long and two miles wide and has a depth of four fathoms; the bar sometimes fills up in winter, which prevents large vessels from crossing it at certain periods. Umpqua River is accessible by vessels drawing from three to fifteen feet. Yaquina Bay is about four miles long and two miles wide; the bar has a depth of less than two fathoms at low water. Tillamook Bay has an area of more than six square miles; the entrance has a width of six hundred yards, with a channel one hundred and thirty-five yards wide and from four to eight fathoms deep. Nehelem River forms a bay four miles long and eight miles wide, with an entrance from two hundred to four hundred yards wide and a depth of eighteen feet at high tide. The Columbia River furnishes the best harbors in the State. Between Cape Disappointment (now officially called Cape Hancock) and Point Adams it is five miles wide. It has two channels; the south channel, more than two miles wide, with a depth of four fathoms at the lowest stage, and the north channel, more than six hundred yards wide at the narrowest point, with a depth of three and a half fathoms. Its chief drawback is a shifting bar.

The Columbia River forms the north boundary of the State for three hundred miles and is navigable by steamers the entire distance, with portages of six and fifteen miles at the Cascades and the Dalles respectively, around which railroads have been constructed. Ships ascend one hundred and fifteen miles above its mouth. Its chief tributary west of the Cascade Mountains is the Willamette, formed by the junction near Eugene City of three streams, known as Coast, Middle, and McKenzie Forks, which, with the exception of the latter, rise in the Cascade range south of Diamond Peak. The Willamette flows north one hundred and fifty-five miles and joins the Columbia one hundred and ten miles above its mouth. It is navigable by light steamers one hundred and twenty-six miles above Portland, and by sea-going ships eighteen miles. Navigation was formerly obstructed by the falls at Oregon City, but the difficulty was overcome by locks constructed by the State at a cost of $450,000. The chief tributaries of the Willamette are composed of three rivers. East of the Cascade Mountains the Columbia receives the Des Chutes River. John Day's River rises in the Blue Mountains and has a north course of two hundred and fifty miles, emptying into the Columbia River a short distance above the mouth of the Des Chutes. The Umatilla and Walla Walla Rivers rise in the Blue Mountains and empty into the Columbia. The Snake River forms the eastern boundary of the State for more than one hundred and fifty miles, and is navigable above the mouth of the Powder River. The principal streams that flow into the Pacific from this State are the Rogue and Umpqua Rivers, each about two hundred miles long, which rise in the Cascade Mountains and flow west, breaking through the Coast range. The Umpqua is navigable by steamers of light draught to Roseburg, ninety miles above its mouth, though more than half this distance is obstructed by rapids. Numerous other streams rise in the Coast Mountains and flow west to the Pacific, among which are the Nehelem, Tillamook, Coos, and Coquille. The headwaters of the Klamath River, which empties into the Pacific in California, are in the southwest corner of Eastern Oregon, just east of the Cascade Mountains.

From this statement, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen what a vast area of rich and fertile territory in the State of Oregon is watered and drained by innumerable streams forming the tributaries and emptying into the larger streams that find their way to the Pacific Ocean, and for which we have asked appropriations to aid their navigation, whereby the products of millions of acres of fertile soil may be enabled to find their way to the markets of the world. In Eastern Oregon a portion of the chief agricultural tracts are along the streams. The soil in the valleys of the Willamette, Umpqua, and Rogue Rivers is of the most fertile character. In Western Oregon, particularly east of the Coast Range, grass is abundant and it was formerly a stock-raising country. A large part of the State is well adapted to stock and sheep raising, and the table lands of Eastern Oregon may be profitably devoted to this industry. Wheat is the chief crop, and its yield is very abundant and its quality most excellent. The climate and soil are also well adapted to the raising of oats and barley. Corn is grown to some extent in portions of Eastern Oregon and in the south valleys, between the Coast and Cascade Mountains. All manner of fruits and vegetables thrive in great abundance, and flax grows wild in the vicinity of the Klamath basin. Prunes, peaches, and figs are also successfully grown in different parts of the State. The rivers of Oregon abound in fish, chief among which is the salmon, which has given rise to profitable industries. The annual value of the salmon fisheries of the State is estimated at several millions of dollars.

Another great product of the State, and which, with the proper improvements of the rivers of Oregon, would promote immense industries and thereby aid in enriching the Government, is its densely wooded and gigantic forests. This is particularly true of the coast range and the region west of it. On the Cascade Mountains the forests extend to the snow line. There are several varieties of deciduous trees, but the chief product of the forest is the coniferous evergreen, which furnishes most excellent ship timber, and several species attain a height of three hundred feet and a diameter of eight to ten feet. There are twelve varieties of this tree, all of magnificent growth, which, together with the Oregon oak, the red wood, the white maple, the Oregon ash and alder, the cottonwood, aspen, birch, and willow, form a product of the soil, which, in time, will give rise to one of the mightiest industries that has ever found a lodgment among the people of the earth; an industry by which the navies of the world shall be recuperated and ride at anchor in harbors on our coast, which shall have been created by a generous government in support of an industrious, brave, and energetic people.

The returns of the census of 1880 have not been so far completed as to enable me to present the wealth and resources of the State of Oregon in regard to its internal improvement and the productions of its varied industries at the present time; but from the census of 1870, ten years ago, we find that the number of acres of land in farms was 2,389,252, and the number of farms 7,587. The cash value of farms was $22,353,988; of farming implements and machinery, nearly two millions; of wages paid during the preceding year, $719,875; value of farm productions, including betterments and additions to stock, $7,122,790; the value of orchard products, $310,041; of produce of market gardens, $105,371; of forest products, $259,220; of home manufactures, near one hundred thousand dollars; of animals slaughtered, $1,365,737; and of live stock, $6,828,675.

The productions of spring wheat were 1,794,494 bushels; of winter wheat, 546,252 bushels; of rye, 3,890 bushels; of Indian corn, 72,138 bushels; of oats, 2,029,909 bushels; of barley, 210,736 bushels; of buckwheat, 1,645 bushels; of peas and beans, 12,575 bushels; of Irish potatoes, 481,710 bushels; of sweet-potatoes, 2,000 bushels; of grass-seed, 1,220 bushels; of flaxseed, 10,988 bushels; of tobacco, 3,847 pounds; of wool, 1,080,638 pounds; of butter, 1,418,373 pounds; of cheese, 79,333 pounds; of hops, 9,745 pounds; of flax, 40,474 pounds; of wax, 1,207 pounds; of honey, 66,858 pounds; and 75,357 tons of hay.

The live stock at that time consisted of 51,702 horses, 2,581 mules and asses, 48,325 milch-cows, 2,441 working oxen, 69,431 other cattle, 318,123 sheep, and 119,455 swine, besides 12,923 horses and 30,049 cattle not on farms. The number of manufacturing establishments in 1870 was about one thousand, both steam and water power, employing near three thousand hands, with an invested capital of $4,376,849, paying $1,120,173 wages during the year, and using material valued at $3,419,756, and producing $6,877,387.

There were nearly three million dollars of wheat and flour exported in that year, in a total tonnage of steam and sailing vessels belonging to the State, of 20,496.

In 1874 there were nearly five hundred miles of telegraph lines, and in the same year there were in operation two lines of railroads, the Oregon and California and the Oregon Central. The former runs along the east bank of the Willamette and through the Umpqua Valley, from East Portland to Roseburg, two hundred miles, and is to be extended thence to the California line, a total distance of two hundred and ninety miles, to connect with the Oregon division of the Central Pacific Railroad.

The Oregon Central Railroad extends from Portland to Corvallis, a distance of eighty-five miles. It runs along the west bank of the Willamette, and assists in opening up one of the richest and most fertile valleys in the world. Of course the census returns of the year 1880 will increase all of the foregoing statistics to at least from 30 to 500 per cent. There are now in the State of Oregon eight universities and colleges of learning. The State agricultural college, endowed by Congress with a land grant of ninety thousand acres, was organized as a department of Corvallis College in 1872. It has a farm connected with it, and has received additional aid from the State.

The University of Oregon was established by the Legislature in 1872. It receives from the State as an endowment the "university fund," amounting to more than fifty thousand dollars. This institution, which is under the control of a board of directors, a part of whom are appointed by the governor, is located in the beautiful Willamette Valley, near Eugene City. In addition to these seats of learning Oregon possesses a fine system of public school instruction at which more than sixty thousand children are being educated at the expense of the State. The value of public school property was nearly three hundred and thirty-three thousand dollars in 1874. The receipts for public school purposes during that year was nearly a quarter million of dollars, and the "irreducible school fund," the income of which is apportioned among the different districts, amounted to half a million of dollars.

According to the census of 1870, the number of libraries both public and private in the State was 2,361, with 344,959 volumes. In that year there were forty-one newspapers and periodicals published in the State issuing about four million copies annually. As I said before all of these results belong to a period ten years or more ago, and will be largely increased by the returns of the census of 1880, and perhaps many of them will be quadrupled.

But, Mr. Chairman, these returns are sufficient for my purpose, which is to lay before this House the true character of the State of Oregon, and the relative position it now holds to the other States of this Union in all that pertains to material progress and wide and varied resources. The tireless energy of the settler and frontiersman who has pushed his way across the continent, and by his industry and unceasing efforts has opened up to civilization a vast territory and founded an empire within a single State of this Union, on its remotest boundary, ought to be recognized by the Government, and such needed appropriations as I have urged before the committee ought to be granted without objection and in the interest of the Government itself as well as the people of that vast and rising State on the western border of our continent.

Mr. Chairman, while I have shown our great resources in minerals and other products of our lands and soil, we are in the main an agricultural people, and in this great interest which in every land underlies and sustains all others, Oregon stands pre-eminent; and it is because the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce has, as I believe, failed to do the people of my State that justice to which they are entitled, that I now appeal to this House while in Committee of the Whole.

Sir, the Columbia River is second only to the Mississippi. It is the great inland water-way of our Northern Pacific possessions, not including the barren lands of Alaska, and upon its banks and tributaries are to-day produced millions of bushels of cereals, a large proportion of which is surplus and seeks a market through the mouth of the Columbia River, as at present all transportation of the products of the soil of Northern Oregon must find its way through this river. Sir, is it good policy on the part of our Government to permit our industries to stagnate and our large surplus of grain to rot in destruction on our hands for the want of a small appropriation to open up this great water-course to the demands of commerce? And when we consider that all these industries have been built up without external aid, that an unbroken wilderness four thousand miles from this capital has been redeemed to civilization and made to contribute so largely to the wealth, grandeur, and security of our common country, and that all these results have been accomplished within a quarter of a century by an industrious, intelligent, brave, and honest people, it appears to me, and it ought to appear to this House, that their just demands should receive instant and favorable consideration.

Sir, as a representative of the people on this floor I would not ask for my State what I did not conscientiously believe it to be entitled to; and, sir, I am not now asking for one dollar more than I firmly believe to be just and proper and even profitable to the Government to grant.

On the Columbia River and its tributaries there is to-day as fine a fleet of river steamers as is to be found on the waters of any stream in this great country; but there are such natural obstructions to free navigation at certain points as to make transportation so expensive that the great productive interests of the people are seriously crippled and in many instances forbids entirely the production of certain products, and in others the production of no more than will be sufficient to satisfy a home demand. Thus are many of our most fertile lands untilled and our richest valleys surrendered to the rude growth of the wilderness. Thus is labor checked in its endeavor to fructify the earth and make it yield to the comforts and support of mankind. Thus, in a measure at least, is the idle and surplus population of our great cities prevented from seeking homes in the rural parts of our State and planting wheat-fields and building homesteads in its rich producing valleys where the plow ripping the rich glebe makes the land "laugh with the harvest." And this while thousands of our countrymen are seeking homes in the far West, and on our coast; while many thousands are suffering for food in our own land and millions starving in the Old World for the food that is rotting on our soil for the want of proper transportation.

Mr. Chairman, the entrance at the mouth of the Columbia River is such as to materially lessen the number of vessels that would otherwise find their way to the city of Portland and at vastly reduced rates of tonnage transport to foreign markets the immense surplus products of our State. From the want of this means of transportation that portion of the valley of the Columbia which lies east of the Cascade Mountains, and which is unequaled for its production of wheat, both in quantity and quality, is practically deprived of a market for its great surplus. As I have already shown, there are two portages compelled to be made, one at The Dalles of fifteen miles and one at The Cascades of six miles. The cost of loading and unloading at these portages is so great as to forbid the transportation of grain on that river unless the prices rule extremely high. Around The Cascades there is now being constructed a canal for the passage of vessels. The engineer in charge of this work recommended to the Government an appropriation of $500,000, and the House will observe that the Committee on Commerce in the bill now before us has generously allowed one-fifth of that amount.

I had the honor, Mr. Chairman, to introduce at the last session of this Congress a joint resolution instructing the Secretary of War to appoint a board of competent engineers to make a full and exhaustive examination of the bar or other obstructions to the safe entrance of the Columbia River, and to recommend some plan of improvement whereby this great evil to its free navigation might be removed, together with an estimate of the costs, and to report the same to Congress for its action. That resolution, like many others of merit, has been snowed under an avalanche of talk. It sleeps well! The small sum annually appropriated for the improvement of the Lower Columbia River, including the bar at its mouth, is undoubtedly useful as to the river, but is absolutely without avail as to the bar. The only practical method of dealing with this bar, in my opinion, is that proposed by the terms of the resolution I introducted at the last session. At the mouth of this river on the south side is Point Adams upon which stands Fort Stevens, the principal work of defense north of San Francisco. The engineer in charge of that district reports a fact already known to every one there, that Point Adams is rapidly washing away and being carried out to sea or into the channel through the bar, which cannot fail to produce additional obstructions to vessels endeavoring to pass over it.

At the rate the beach is now disappearing it cannot be very long before the waters of the ocean will reach the fort, and thus destroy one of the principal defenses of the Pacific coast, situated as it is at the entrance of a river which, if once entered by an enemy, would place the entire Pacific northwest at the mercy of an invading force. And still the Government, through the niggardly policy pursued by Congress with regard to appropriations for the Pacific coast, with all these facts before them and the very integrity of its possessions imperiled, is unable to do anything toward rescuing it from such a state of affairs. Notwithstanding the dangers attending the crossing of the Columbia bar, to show the importance of this point in a commercial light, I will state that during the past year there were 234 coastwise and foreign vessels registered as crossing in, and 269 coastwise and foreign vessels as crossing out, presenting an aggregate tonnage of 834,726.

This statement would be vastly increased if the dangers attending the crossing and the recrossing of the bar were removed. How greatly to the interests of the Government and the whole nation would be the permanent improvement of this important work.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Columbia River and its tributaries are not, as I have already shown, the only waters in Oregon which demand the fostering care of this great Government. As before stated, there are about four hundred miles of sea-coast indented with many bays, and there are also a number of smaller rivers flowing into the ocean which would form excellent harbors if the bars at their entrance could be removed.

Many of these rivers afford deep water, from ten to thirty miles inland, and both the rivers and bays are settled by a thrifty, industrious, and productive population.

Yaquina Bay, including a part of the river, extends inland with deep water, twenty-five miles or more, and is now being connected with the Willamette Valley by rail. The removal of the bar at the entrance is not difficult, according to the report of the United States Engineer, and when that shall have been done, and the railroad now being constructed shall be completed, there can be no doubt that a handsome revenue will be collected at Newport in the form of customs duties.

It is no answer to a demand from the General Government for aid in the removal of obstructions to the entrance of harbors like the ones I have enumerated to say that the revenue now derived from the commerce of such places will not justify the expenditure of considerable sums in their improvement. It might with the same propriety be urged that because wild lands are unsalable, no matter how rich the soil or valuable their timber or mineral deposits, they are not worth a survey or purchase by individuals, inasmuch as in their unimproved condition they are unproductive. The argument is weak. Every one knows that they only await the encouragement of the Government and the hand of industry to develop their latent wealth and thus add prosperity to the individual citizen and wealth to the Government.

The Umpqua River has been navigated by a steamboat for a distance of eighty miles, but the rapids and other obstructions were found too great to be overcome, and the navigation of that stream by large crafts has ceased altogether. This river waters and drains one of the finest sections on the Pacific coast, annually producing a large surplus of wheat, oats, wool, beef, and mutton. We do not, however, ask for the expenditure of any money on this stream above Scottsburgh. The very small sum of $12,000 is urged, and this amount is insignificant when the importance of the work is considered.

At the last session of Congress $10,000 was appropriated for the improvement of the entrance to the Coquille River, and the United States Engineer suggested the same amount this year, and it is likewise recommended in the Book of Estimates. The bill now before us omits this needed appropriation. Why it has not been provided for I cannot understand. Were this stream located on the Atlantic instead of the Pacific coast it would not have been thus neglected; doubtless a much greater sum would have been readily granted to complete the improvements already begun at the mouth of this river. This river is navigable for a distance of forty miles, and flows through a country which for richness of soil is not surpassed on the Pacific coast. Along the banks of a part of this stream is a dense forest of the finest timber in the world, much of it being the celebrated myrtle so valuable in ship-building. The river itself abounds in salmon, one of the finest delicacies in the world, and from which a great industry has sprung. And yet all these sources of wealth are paralyzed for the want of an outlet through the mouth of this river, which could be obtained for the inconsiderable sum recommended by the Engineer. Why has it been denied? Can it be for any other reason than its location on the Pacific instead of the Atlantic coast?

Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that a point of so much importance as that of Coos Bay should be unprovided for, and the works already begun be permittted to stand useless and a monument to a narrow and misguided policy adopted by this Congress. Sir, the coal alone obtained at this place would justifiy the expenditure of a far greater sum in improving the entrance to that harbor than has been recommended by the engineer in charge of that work! It is well known that the greater portion of coal now consumed by steamers plying between San Francisco and the various ports to which they run—Portland, Victoria, and other points on the sound—to Alaska, Mexican, Central American, and South American ports, and to China and Japan comes originally from the coal-mines of the sound country, nearly four hundred miles north of Coos Bay, being first transported from that point to San Francisco at great expense, that being the great coaling depot of the Pacific coast. And yet it is not claimed that the sound coal is in any wise superior to that obtained at Coos Bay, both being of the same excellent quality. The coal is obtained at the sound and shipped to San Francisco, an increased distance of nearly four hundred miles, and of course at a much greater cost, because there is a harbor on the sound into which vessels can enter and lie in safety. At Coos Bay there is, on the other hand, great danger in entering and leaving the bay, although when once inside the harbor is as safe as any in the world.

Now, is it wisdom on the part of the Government to permit this great natural wealth to lie imbedded in the bowels of the earth for the want of a sufficient appropriation to open up a safe and easy entrance into this harbor? Notwithstanding all these disadvantages, nearly fifty thousand tons of superior coal were shipped from Coos Bay during the past year. This was, however, accomplished by small craft and at some risk, and consequently at a much greater cost than if the obstruction to the harbor were removed. The country about Coos Bay is thickly settled, and the farming interests are very great. It is also one of the best lumbering localities on the coast. Just sixty miles east of Coos Bay lies the great Umpqua Valley, to which I referred when speaking of the Umpqua River. As I then said, this is one of the greatest grain-growing sections on the Pacific coast, and when its connection by rail to Coos Bay is assured, as it undoubtedly would be if the entrance to Coos Bay Harbor were improved so as to secure a safe and easy outlet, it will be found that an immense surplus of products raised in that rich and fertile valley will find their way to the markets of the world.

Sir, I again assert that the custom-house statistics furnish no reliable data as to the commercial importance of a given point before the harbor is made easy of access. Until vessels can arrive and depart in safety the surplus products of a people can find no market, and consequently the revenues of the Government are far less than if commercial trade was constant and increasing.

Again, sir, why is it that no notice has been taken in the report of the United States Engineer Department of the work of the board of engineers directed to make a survey and examination of the coast north of San Francisco with a view of selecting and locating a harbor of refuge between that point and Puget Sound? It is rumored that the board of engineers selected Port Orford; officially, however, the country knows nothing of their action, nor even that such a board was organized and performed its appointed work. And yet more than a year has elapsed since this commission was engaged in making the survey and locating the harbor. How truly are the interests of the people on the Pacific coast subserved!

Of course, Mr. Chairman, when this important matter was entirely ignored by the Department, and no suggestions or recommendations submitted to Congress with regard to an appropriation for this work, I could not expect the Committee on Commerce to include an appropriation for such a work in the bill they have framed. But, sir, in justice to the commerce of the entire Pacific coast, I desire to say that such a harbor, located between the points mentioned, is a prime necessity, and one of such a character and affecting such manifold interests that the American Congress cannot well afford to pass it by in silence. Sir, in the name of the people of the Pacific Coast, and in the name of those great interests I have enumerated, I demand an exhaustive examination of this matter. If, after such an examination shall have been made, and full discussion shall determine Port Orford to be the proper point for the location of such a harbor, as I now believe it to be, this Government and this Congress shall continue to ignore such a just demand in the interest of the commerce of the Pacific coast, as well as the security of human life involved in the adoption of the measure, then I unhesitatingly pronounce such dereliction of duty on the part of Congress and the Government as criminal in the highest degree. The interests not alone of trade, but of humanity demand for this object a liberal appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, before I resume my seat I desire to make a few remarks of a somewhat personal character relating to the State I have the honor to represent upon this floor. I entered this House without a colleague. I stand here alone upon this floor, and cannot, like the majority of members of this body, command the aid of ten, twenty, aye thirty colleagues to obtain from this House the just demands of the people of my State. I have but little more power than a Delegate, who possesses no vote. As combinations appear to rule in the passage of such acts, standing here alone I am at the mercy of the majority and am powerless to enforce the just demands of my State. The time will soon come, however, when Oregon will not stand alone in its representation upon this floor. "Westward the course of empire takes its way," and the State which in less than a quarter of a century has accomplished so much through the energy, industry, and intelligence of her people, will rise to greater heights of prosperity and increased strength in wealth and numbers.

Sir, I have been a resident of the Pacific Coast for more than thirty years. I was a citizen of California at the time of the adoption of her constitution, and was not an idle spectator. I saw her rise up like a star from out of the sea, and join the constellation of the Union. I was likewise present at the adoption of the constitution of the State of Oregon, and have resided there ever since that important period. I have watched its growth with pride, and with unspeakable gladness have beheld its transformation from an almost unbroken wilderness into an empire of strength, wealth, and prosperity. Step by step I have watched its progress, studied its interests, and pondered upon its wants and necessities. Since the formation of its State government I have participated largely in its legislation, and through the partiality of its generous people have been called from retirement to fill some of its highest offices. I therefore believe that I am fully conversant with its wants, and as fully as possible understand to what my people are justly entitled, and the favorable legislation which is due them by this Congress. They are a part of our common country, and as a people are as intelligent, industrious, and enterprising, as any people on the face of the earth. And, sir, the time may come when amid the shock of arms this Government may have to depend upon their bravery and heroism to defend the integrity of all that vast country lying west of the great Rocky Mountains.

Sir, in my opinion it would not only be wisdom but in the interest of economy for the General Government to deal fairly, if not generously, with the people of the Pacific States. Although we are somewhat remote, yet by iron bands and lightning chains we are bound to the great heart of this nation. The ingenuity and industry of our race has crossed great deserts, pierced our mountains, and crossed our valleys. We are no longer remote strangers, but a well-known part of the great brotherhood of the Union. Why not then do us that justice which is amply our due? I regret to say that the bill now before this House does not do us that justice to which we as a people and as great States of the Union, are entitled. I ask that these wrongs may now be righted, and that a liberal and charitable feeling may prevail in amending this bill, so that the wants and necessities of all sections of our country may be justly provided for and relieved.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I am through, and in a few days the same may be said of this Forty-sixth Congress. Now is the opportunity to do justice, for what is not now done will remain undone at its close. I have been a quiet, if not a silent member of this House, and have sat at the feet of many Gamaliels who have sought to impart their wisdom to less fortunate members. I trust their labor has not been in vain.

In leaving this Congress I shall gladly return to that retirement from which I was unwillingly called to occupy a seat upon this floor. In going hence from its walls, it will be with the proud satisfaction that at all times and under all circumstances I have endeavored to perform my duty conscientiously, as I have been given to understand it, and in no instance have ever failed to act as I believed would be for the interests of all sections of our common country.

Improvement of Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH OF HON. THOMAS TURNER,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 10, 1881.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes—

Mr. THOMAS TURNER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I shall support the bill under consideration, not because I believe it entirely just, or based upon the true principles which should govern appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, but because it is an improvement upon its predecessors, and contains some meager appropriations for the improvement of the rivers of my long-neglected State. I had the honor to introduce for the consideration of Congress House bill No. 626, which reads as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the sum of $750,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated for the improvement of the Kentucky River, to be expended in accordance with the report of Major W. E. Merrill, of the United States Engineer Corps; and $50,000 for the improvement of the Licking River; and $100,000 for the improvement of the Big Sandy River, including the Tug Fork; and $368,500 to be expended in overcoming and canalizing the falls of Cumberland River, in accordance with the survey and report thereof, made by Major W. R. King, United States Engineer Corps. Said sums to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

I had intended to offer the provisions of this bill as an amendment to the pending one, but have been induced to desist from so doing by the fear that loading it with amendments might defeat it. At first blush these demands may seem extravagant, but when viewed in the light of the facts and figures disclosed and principles advocated in the sequel, they will appear not only moderate, but modest. If the sums asked had been granted in full they would only have been an installment of partial and tardy justice to the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

I shall avail myself of this occasion to discuss the true principles which should obtain in the formulation of bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and the disbursement of Federal money for internal improvement, public buildings, and education, and to expose the rank injustice which has been perpetrated upon the State of Kentucky, and how it has been treated as the hated step-child of the Union and made to bear an undue proportion of its burdens without participating in its advantages, except to a meager extent.

The history of river and harbor appropriations is at once curious and instructive, and illustrates the proneness of poor, weak human nature to conform its principles and modes of constitutional construction to its local interests and surroundings. At the formation of the Constitution, and for many years after, nearly every State in the Union bordered on the sea-shore, and the great body of people who made Senators, Representatives, and Presidents resided in the sea-shore States and were interested in improvements upon tide-water, and, strange to say, the doctrine was unblushingly asserted that the Constitution conferred no power on Congress to make improvements except where the tide ebbed and flowed.

In other words, it was asserted that the Constitution of the United States was a salt-water instrument, and that the constitutional power to appropriate money for the improvement of a locality depended upon whether that locality was blessed with salt water or cursed with the presence of fresh water. This doctrine is entitled to the same respect, or, rather, contempt, with that more modern one that the Constitution is an elastic, expansive, and contractile instrument which confers powers on Congress in time of foreign or domestic war that it does not in time of peace. This doctrine proceeded upon the idea that it was necessary to have a foreign commerce, and its adherents seem to have been unconscious of the fact that there can be no foreign commerce unless means be provided to transport the internal productions to the shore, thence to be shipped to foreign countries and exchanged for the productions of those countries which are shipped back to us and form our imports. They also ignored the fact that the Constitution of the United States gives Congress plenary power over interstate as well as foreign commerce.

I would be happy to have the few advocates of this almost exploded heresy tell me how we could have a foreign commerce if there was no means for the transportation of internal products to the sea-shore.

But we are told that the States must open the rivers and furnish the means of transportation to the shore. But if a river runs through two States or more, and the State in which it debouches into the ocean or salt water refuses to improve and make it navigable, how are those on its headwaters to find a pathway to tide-water? After a time population spread over the interior, and the Western States began to have a potent voice in selecting Presidents, Senators, and Representatives; and then we advanced to the idea that the lakes, the Mississippi, and other great rivers were "inland seas," and that the Constitution conferred upon Congress the power to improve these "inland seas."

In order to counteract this doctrine and obtain for the sea-shore the lion's share of the appropriations, the untenable and unsound doctrine that appropriations must be given to localities in proportion to their commerce and the revenue paid in by them was promulgated, and for a time all river and harbor bills were fashioned and shaped upon this false principle, until the growing political power of the interior and the great West compelled a compromise with the salt-water politicians, by which the great bulk of the money appropriations were given to the tide-water States. And in order to reconcile the new States that contained vast areas of lands which belonged to the Federal Government and which were bought with the money paid into the Treasury by all the States or won by the valor of the citizens of all the States, these lands were, with a lavish hand, to the tune of hundreds of millions of acres, given to the States in which they were situate, for the purpose of opening their rivers, digging canals, constructing railroads, and developing their resources. And by this unholy coalition the new sectionized States and the sea-shore States were rapidly developed; and Kentucky and Tennessee, the only two States that were unfortunate enough to have neither tide-water nor Government lands within their borders, were left out in the cold; and the money paid into the Treasury by them, and the lands bought with their money, or won by the valor of their sons, were all unjustly devoted to the development of their sister States.

After a time, the growing political power of the Northwest, which had been greatly stimulated by these land-grants, compelled liberal money appropriations to open their harbors, improve their lakes and rivers, and develop their material resources, and, by this duplicate hot-house process, their commerce assumed gigantic proportions, and the revenue collected at their ports and internal-revenue districts swelled to large sums, and now we find them here joining hands with the East in advocating the false principle that appropriations to rivers and harbors should be made and apportioned to localities according to their tonnage and commerce and the amounts of revenue collected in them.

To expose the fallacy of such a basis of appropriation it is only necessary to look to its effect. This very commerce and tonnage and revenue has been created by most liberal appropriations of land or money, and now the very past liberality of the Government to certain localities at the expense of the balance of the country is made an argument in favor of continuing to vote all the spare money of the Government to these heretofore favored localities. Such a principle, if enforced, would cause the expenditure of all the spare public revenues in the localities that have already received large appropriations, and would preclude the hope of ever undertaking a new work in any of the pretermitted localities.

Again, the sea-shore States and those States which are fortunate enough to be located upon what they claim to be great national rivers and lakes or "inland seas," have united to enforce the doctrine that appropriations must be confined to what they are pleased to call great national streams, lakes, and seas. This false principle is also the offspring of local self-interest and a selfish desire to apply the revenues derived from the whole country to their localities. Generosity would prompt the expenditure on those unfortunate localities that have been less favored by Providence. But this last and latest subterfuge of local selfishness has been stricken down by the Supreme Court of the United States, and it is the duty of all good citizens to acquiesce in the decisions of the court of last resort. Any other course is a vain and selfish assertion of individual infallibility.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases of Waring vs. Cluke, 5 Howard, 378; 3 Wheaton, 336; in the case of the Genesee Chief, 12 Howard, 443 and 466; Cunningham vs. Hull, 1 Clifford, 43; and in Jackson vs. The Magnolia, 20 Howard, 296; and in Daniel Ball, 10 Wallace, 557; and in other cases, has decided that the Federal Government had jurisdiction over streams wholly within a State or even wholly within a county, and notably in the two last-named cases, in which it in substance says: All these streams empty into others which traverse different States or run into the ocean waters, and they are a part of the means by which those resident on or near them transact their commerce with other States and foreign countries; and that all navigable streams, however small, run into other waters, and finally into the ocean, and are national in their character.

If the Federal Government has jurisdiction over the commerce of these streams it certainly has the right to appropriate money to improve their navigation so as to give it an outlet. But it is insisted by some that the Federal Government has power to improve the navigation of rivers, however small, by dredging out the channels and building wing-dams so as to confine the channel and make it deep enough to float craft, but that it has no power to improve navigation by a system of locks and dams or slackwater.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am so obtuse that I cannot understand how the constitutionality of the improvement of a river depends upon the mode of improvement, the purpose and object of all modes being to improve its navigation and enable it to transport the productions and supplies of those who reside on its banks or in their vicinity. Nor can I understand how the constitutionality of appropriations to improve a river are determined by its size or the volume of water it discharges in a given time. It is true the propriety of appropriations must be determined by results, and by ascertaining or forecasting whether the results will be commensurate with and compensatory for the expenditure. No work should be undertaken which will not broaden the base of taxable property and develop resources that will directly bring results which authorize the requisite expenditure. The advocates of this doctrine forget that there would be but little water in or commerce upon the large streams but for that contributed by the tributaries.

Having disposed of the false principles that have entered into the make-up of river and harbor bills and of the questions of their constitutionality, I now proceed in an effort to point out the true principles which should control in the formulation of bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. It is difficult to enunciate inflexible principles which should be applied to every proposed appropriation. But it seems to me that the following principles and considerations will be found to be true in theory and just in practice and results:

First. The amount of money paid into the Treasury by the inhabitants of a section as direct tax or as consumers of taxed articles.

Second. The extent of its water-ways and the resources of the country to be developed and the effect of the expenditure in developing wealth and capacity for taxation.

Third. The amount of money hitherto appropriated to a locality, and whether equal or better results cannot be obtained by new works than by continuing lavish expenditures to further develop the localities which have been highly favored in the past.

The first principle is one that cannot be successfully controverted, namely, other things being equal, that each section should participate in the benefits of government in the ratio that it contributes to the revenues.

The effect of the distribution of money in a locality in stimulating trade, prosperity, and industrious activity cannot well be overestimated. No one can fail to have observed the difference in trade and activity for miles around when an iron-furnace is silent and when it is in blast and distributing large amounts of money daily. My State has for eighty-eight years paid into the Treasury of the United States annually an average of almost three and a half millions of dollars, and yet next to nothing has been expended by the United States Government in it. And when we consider the fact that this money has been taken from us and mostly expended in other localities to develop their resources, we will find why it is that Kentucky, blessed as she is with the richest soil and with abundant mineral resources, has not kept pace with some of her sister States in wealth and population. It must and will impoverish any locality to have its resources taxed to develop other sections, and it is only by the aid of superior natural advantages that Kentucky has not been impoverished by almost a century of this injustice.

In times of commercial distress Kentucky is oppressed more than any other State, because the pressure is not alleviated as in other States by the expenditure in her borders of a part of the money taken from her for Federal taxes.

The second proposition is self-evident. The country is laboring under the burden of a large debt and should not beyond the necessary expenses of ordinary administration expend money that will not bring a return and increase the aggregate capacity to pay and ultimately reduce taxation.

The third proposition results from the first, and no one can be found who will seriously contend that all the benefits of Government should be lavished on those sections who have heretofore been the recipients of them to the detriment of others which bear an equal share of its burdens, when the money can be as profitably expended in the heretofore pretermitted sections.

Self-interest is the great lever that moves mankind, and no union can long be maintained which habitually impoverishes one section for the benefit of others, and those who are really devoted to the Union and desire its perpetuity should advocate justice to every section of it.

The only objection that has been made to the meager appropriation made to the rivers of Kentucky by this bill has come from Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. His State is not superior to Kentucky in soil and is far inferior to it in coal, iron, mineral, and lumber resources, and is hardly equal to it in navigable water-ways, and yet Iowa has, in the forty-two years she has been in the Union, received from the Federal Government for internal improvement, public buildings, and education, in public lands and money, $10,505,708, and my State, in eighty-eight years, has only received from it for these purposes $2,251,550. This objection to a meager appropriation to some of the rivers of Kentucky comes in ill grace from the Representative of a State which has received grants from the United States Government for 5,455,486 acres of rich land, which was won and paid for in part by the money and blood of the citizens of Kentucky and one twenty-fifth part of which rightly belonged to it. And yet the Representative of a State that has been made rich by the appropriation of that which belonged in part to Kentucky has the grace to read from the reports of the surveys of her rivers that part of them which speaks of the upper waters, in order to induce the House (in its supposed ignorance of geography) to believe they are mere rivulets.

I hope this was not done to impress his constituents with the idea that he had in his great zeal and energy read the whole 3,000 pages of the reports of the engineers touching the public works in progress or in contemplation. It is but a short time since other members of the Iowa delegation were before the Committee on Commerce urging a large appropriation to the Nishnabatona, a stream scarcely as large as any respectable tributary of the Kentucky or Big Sandy Rivers, and, failing to get this, some of them are here opposing this bill, on the ground that it makes appropriations to streams that have but little water and do not extend into more States than one. The Nishnabatona, in comparison with the Kentucky or Big Sandy, is but a rivulet or spring branch.

It has been asserted that Kentucky has no navigable water-ways and hence the meagerness of her past appropriations. As shown by actual surveys the Kentucky River has four hundred and eighty miles of navigable water; Green and Barren Rivers, three hundred and fifty; Licking, one hundred and fifty; the Big Sandy in and bordering on Kentucky, one hundred and fifty; trade-water forty-one miles; the Cumberland in the State of Kentucky, four hundred; making in the aggregate 1,571 miles of navigable water in the State; and besides this, broad along its margin rolls the magnificent Ohio for over eight hundred miles. But not only has Kentucky water-ways that demand and deserve improvement by the Federal Government, but upon these water-ways lie unexampled resources of coal, iron, and lumber which await and demand development, and the development of which will enhance almost incalculably the wealth of the United States, broaden the base of taxation, and repay many fold the outlay necessary to their development.

On the Big Sandy, only twenty-seven miles from its mouth, is found coal of the finest quality, and these coal-fields extend from that point up the main river to the State line, one hundred and sixty miles, and up the Tug Fork to the State line an equal distance. This coal is only, by water, one hundred and fifty-three miles from Cincinnati, which now draws its coal supply from Pennsylvania, a distance of four hundred and seventy-six miles, by water. In Cincinnati this Big Sandy coal commands the same price as the Pittsburgh, and the cannel is superior to that of Pennsylvania, and the block coal of this region is used at Ashland in the raw state for smelting iron ore. Open this river, and it will furnish Cincinnati with coal at one cent per bushel cheaper than it can be furnished by the Pennsylvania mines. Colonel John Gray, civil engineer, in a pamphlet entitled "Kentucky and her resources in Coal, Iron, and Timber," says of these coals and those of the Kentucky and Licking Rivers:

I took to New York in 1876 about three hundred pounds of specimens from a wide extent of our hill country. The lot of three hundred pounds comprised every variety of bituminous, splint, cannel, and semi-cannel. The best cannels from Morgan and Breathitt Counties were pronounced by English experts fully equal to the best English cannel, worth then by the cargo in New York, as quoted by the New York papers, $17.50 per ton, and $25 delivered to houses for domestic use. One specimen of semi-cannel was declared by the superintendent of the Philadelphia and Reading Company to be the finest steam-coal ever exhibited in New York City.

The strata range from three to six feet in thickness.

The coal and lumber fields on the Kentucky River are unsurpassed in quality and boundless in supply. I here append the analyses of several coals on the Kentucky River made by Professor A. R. Crandall, of the Kentucky geological survey:

Coal on Kentucky River near the three forks.

	Per cent.
Specific gravity	1.307
Moisture	4.000
Volatile combustible matter	35.500
Fixed carbon	55.500
Ash	5.000
Coke	60.500
Sulphur	1.041

Professor N. P. Morse in his report gives the following analysis of fine coals found on the Kentucky River—Nos. 1, 3, and 4 from Breathitt County, No. 2 from Wolfe County, and No. 5 from Perry County:

Class.	Specific gravity.	Moisture.	Volatile matter.	Fixed carbon.	Ash.	Coke.	Sulphur.
	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.
No. 1	1.300	2.50	41.10	49.22	7.18	56.40	.180
No. 2	1.294	3.50	35.20	56.70	4.60	61.30	1.189
No. 3	1.297	3.56	33.56	58.38	4.50	62.88	1.381
No. 4	1.290	2.76	36.60	56.50	4.06	60.56	.865
No. 5	1.289	2.10	36.20	58.20	3.50	61.70	.836

He also gives the following analysis of fine Kentucky River cannel coals—Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 from Breathitt County, and No. 5 from Perry, as follows:

Class.	Specific gravity.	Moisture.	Volatile combustible matter.	Fixed carbon.	Ash.	Coke.	Sulphur.
	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.
No. 1	1.280	.94	52.38	35.54	11.14	46.68	1.423
No. 2	1.265	1.30	47.00	44.40	7.30	51.70	1.574
No. 3	1.280	3.40	34.40	46.96	6.24	53.20	.630
No. 4	1.180	1.20	58.80	35.30	4.70	40.00	None.
No. 5	.....	1.20	40.86	46.44	9.50	57.94	.634

He also says the Kentucky cannels are free from the objection of other cannel coals, namely, that they pop when first placed in the grate.

These analyses show that the Kentucky River coals compare favorably with the best English, Pennsylvania, and Indiana block coals.

Professor Crandall, in his report of the geology of the Upper Cumberland, on page 8, part 12, volume 4, says:

The thickness of coal measures in this valley is greater by many hundred feet than in any other part of Kentucky. The number of coals is also greater. * * * The quality of the coals of this valley is most excellent; the proportion of ash and sulphur is very low and the fixed carbon high.

I give below the analysis of seven average specimens from this section:

Class.	Moisture.	Volatile combustible matter.	Fixed carbon.	Ash.	Coke.	Sulphur.	Specific gravity.
	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.	Per ct.
No. 1	1.70	35.70	59.60	3.00	62.60	.750	1.289
No. 2	5.20	31.26	60.08	3.46	65.59	.618	1.356
No. 3	2.96	35.28	59.40	2.36	.....	.736	1.277
No. 4	1.50	37.94	58.40	2.10	.....	1.038	1.262
No. 5	1.00	43.60	47.80	7.60	.....	.590	.....
No. 6	1.90	37.50	57.90	2.70	60.60	1.579	1.276
No. 7	1.36	35.80	59.54	3.30	62.84	.975	1.284

These coals compare favorably with any in the United States or England. On the Kentucky River and its tributaries is found a larger supply of the celebrated car-wheel iron ore, which makes iron with a smooth surface, deep chill and great tenacity and tension, and is peculiarly adapted to making car wheels. Before the panic three furnaces were engaged in making pig metal from this ore, and had all their cold-blast charcoal pig sold for five years ahead at $63.80 per ton, all to be made into car wheels. Other valuable iron ores are found on the Kentucky and the Cumberland. I will content myself with giving the analysis of one specimen of Kentucky River car-wheel iron ore and two of the Cumberland River ores. Car-wheel ore:

	Per cent.
Iron heroxide	75.598
Alumina	1.971
Lime carbonate	.540
Magnesia	.258
Phosphoric acid	.601
Silica and insoluble silicuts	8.910
Combined water	11.739
Metallic iron	52.918
Phosphorous	.262
Silica	7.260

Cumberland River—ore near Cumberland Gap:

Iron heroxide	77.380
Alumina and manganese	3.941
Lime carbonate	.420
Phosphoric acid	.349
Silica and insolubles	15.960
Combined water	2.529
Metallic iron	54.156
Phosphorus	.140

Here follows an analysis of a limonite found on Mud Creek, Whitley County, Kentucky.

Oxide of iron	80.50
Carbonate of lime	.18
Alumina	1.88
Silex and insolubles	2.48
Moisture and loss	12.66

On the Big Sandy and Kentucky Rivers are found large fields of yellow poplar, white oak, yellow pine, and hickory timbers. On the head waters of the Sandy large yellow poplars are found, that measure five and six feet across the stump.

Professor Defrees in his report on the timbers of the Upper Cumberland and Kentucky Rivers, in speaking of a section in Bell and Harlan Counties, says:

About five hundred feet below the crest of the mountain I found a remarkable belt of the finest old forest walnut timber I had ever seen. This walnut-bearing belt winds along the mountains as far as I had time to trace it on the northern exposure; on the other side about 35 per cent. of the timber is massive yellow poplar, many trees of which are six or seven feet in diameter, with trunks sixty to eighty feet high. The white hickory and blue and black ash rank next in value, and they all abound in the black mountains especially. At one hundred feet up—the mere list of trees gives no idea of the splendor of the forest—the yellow poplars are five to seven feet in diameter with trunks sixty to eighty feet long; the white oak is also extremely heavy, and the blue ash as fine as any I ever saw. * * * At 1,050 feet the splendor of the forest can hardly be imagined; the belt of walnut begins to show itself here, and the yellow poplar, chestnut, and white hickory are of the finest. At 1,250 feet * * * 25 per cent. of the whole timber is old forest walnuts. In size and quality these trees have no superior in this country.

Jno. R. Proctor, State geologist of Kentucky, in his report on the improvement of the navigation of the Kentucky River, page 37, bulletin 1, says:

In the region drained by the Upper Cumberland and Kentucky Rivers there is more black-walnut timber than in any other region of like area with which I am acquainted. White oak and yellow poplar of large size and superior quality is very abundant.

It is not generally known, but the coal-fields of Kentucky are of greater area than those of Ohio or Pennsylvania. Ohio has 10,000 square miles of coal fields; Pennsylvania, 12,630; Kentucky, 12,771.

Having shown that Kentucky is at least an average State in water-ways, and far above an average one in soil, minerals, timber, and other resources, and as such is entitled to have appropriations to improve her water-ways and develop her resources in proportion to the revenues paid into the Treasury, and that their development would enrich the whole country, and bring an ample return for money appropriated to it, I now propose to speak of the injustice done her in the past. At the cost of much hard labor, extending through the last three years, I have tabulated the money paid into the Treasury by each State and Territory, from 1789 to 1st July, 1880, and the money expended in each State and Territory for internal improvement, education, and public buildings, including land grants for these purposes, which are charged at $1.25 per acre. I now present these tabulations:

A.—Apportionment of the public revenues of the United States, according to population, by decades from 1790 to 1880.

States and Territories.	1790 to 1800.	1801 to 1810.	1811 to 1820.	1821 to 1830.	1831 to 1840.
Alabama				$2,910,561 79	$7,331,276 30
Arkansas				324,391 31	719,753 38
California
Colorado
Connecticut	$4,103,901 10	$6,173,702 18	$7,622,116 26	6,261,367 36	7,050,535 85
Delaware	1,019,240 33	1,580,872 96	2,114,703 42	1,655,503 21	1,817,809 36
Florida					822,593 13
Georgia	1,423,721 28	4,001,461 62	7,345,418 61	7,759,576 92	12,241,168 53
Illinois			357,388 31	1,225,286 58	3,729,149 56
Indiana		138,747 47	713,495 76	3,349,235 88	8,124,833 89
Iowa
Kansas
Kentucky	1,270,721 66	5,434,658 83	11,822,852 06	12,837,659 65	16,293,601 84
Louisiana			2,227,664 46	3,479,969 73	5,109,869 42
Maine	1,665,044 19	3,731,714 63	6,654,970 10	6,787,516 70	9,461,257 20
Maryland	5,514,411 02	8,400,792 02	11,073,313 86	9,269,802 52	10,588,330 44
Massachusetts	6,533,012 97	10,400,389 49	16,735,650 77	11,905,194 69	14,457,768 64
Michigan			138,565 81	199,460 49	749,382 90
Minnesota
Mississippi		217,676 22	1,174,181 69	1,716,922 89	3,235,926 32
Missouri			606,557 77	1,514,594 86	3,326,733 93
Nebraska
Nevada
New Hampshire	2,447,117 81	84,522,212 47	6,240,460 84	5,553,052 65	6,379,147 30
New Jersey	3,175,881 73	5,193,468 50	7,145,482 64	6,313,206 66	7,598,825 36
New York	5,866,115 67	14,488,431 18	27,906,875 67	31,221,250 42	45,443,031 71
North Carolina	6,791,100 31	11,759,529 47	16,164,209 75	14,537,423 36	17,479,528 99
Ohio		1,115,808 33	6,714,769 56	13,228,157 79	22,214,623 19
Oregon
Pennsylvania	7,491,715 54	14,815,906 49	25,572,422 64	23,837,444 64	31,933,462 58
Rhode Island	1,187,037 76	1,700,140 89	2,238,575 03	1,889,117 66	2,302,198 88
South Carolina	4,295,810 35	8,500,234 41	12,079,219 01	11,440,554 92	13,765,609 99
Tennessee	615,569 88	2,597,411 25	7,615,859 37	9,620,727 32	16,151,180 92
Texas
Vermont	1,473,341 63	3,799,256 48	6,340,415 13	5,369,727 54	6,647,360 42
Virginia	12,894,175 32	21,649,597 93	23,359,385 51	24,238,161 12	23,692,632 02
West Virginia
Wisconsin
Arizona
Dakota
District of Columbia		346,634 95	699,033 29	751,847 36	943,484 13
Idaho
Montana
New Mexico
Utah
Washington
Wyoming
Total*	67,767,917 95	130,563,647 77	210,669,587 32	219,230,716 62	304,611,096 18

States and Territories.	1841 to 1850.	1851 to 1860.	1861 to 1870.	1871 to 1880.	Total.
Alabama	$9,388,392 00	$20,041,693 44	$93,251,459 21	$80,788,394 86	$213,711,777 60
Arkansas	1,550,660 35	5,451,742 57	42,113,904 83	39,257,719 14	89,418,261 58
California		2,405,062 73	36,750,643 07	45,398,016 96	84,553,722 76
Colorado			3,315,055 46	3,230,262 26	6,545,317 72
Connecticut	4,926,221 65	9,630,738 21	44,502,518 26	43,551,050 32	133,822,171 19
Delaware	1,240,939 38	2,377,401 78	10,852,813 81	10,130,243 18	32,789,527 43
Florida	865,757 09	2,271,245 67	13,589,925 76	15,213,627 28	32,754,148 93
Georgia	10,987,717 17	23,536,731 21	102,254,067 49	95,950,905 85	265,500,768 68
Illinois	7,567,580 34	22,115,595 84	165,569,157 55	205,812,817 42	406,406,975 30
Indiana	10,899,894 87	25,672,551 48	130,604,919 81	136,185,646 07	315,689,325 23
Iowa	685,141 89	4,992,457 60	65,273,342 32	96,754,019 05	167,404,960 86
Kansas			10,368,291 20	29,528,032 73	39,896,323 93
Kentucky	12,393,155 89	25,516,428 55	111,770,483 22	107,044,359 95	304,389,924 65
Louisiana	5,600,573 54	13,448,051 32	68,473,508 79	58,903,497 71	157,213,134 97
Maine	7,944,576 71	15,146,898 50	60,763,204 07	50,800,284 25	162,985,466 35
Maryland	7,469,618 86	15,143,392 69	66,447,077 29	63,277,533 89	197,184,272 59
Massachusetts	11,723,633 61	25,830,939 32	119,060,977 82	118,092,290 57	331,739,857 88
Michigan	3,373,361 07	10,328,436 21	72,449,495 30	95,946,844 04	183,185,565 82
Minnesota		157,839 68	16,636,979 22	35,630,305 78	52,425,124 68
Mississipp'	5,969,909 33	15,753,559 93	76,530,061 82	67,088,291 02	171,686,529 22
Missouri	6,097,857 18	17,715,023 48	114,316,773 76	139,480,241 12	283,057,782 10
Nebraska			2,780,327 30	9,966,364 84	12,755,692 14
Nevada			663,181 39	3,443,132 25	4,106,313 64
New Hampshire	4,522,498 34	8,258,925 11	31,535,722 55	25,792,544 03	95,251,681 10
New Jersey	5,932,641 93	12,715,421 74	64,994,999 55	73,422,899 49	186,492,827 00
New York	38,600,816 17	80,449,943 07	375,320,311 90	335,144,380 18	974,444,155 97
North Carolina	11,973,460 46	22,571,923 16	96,000,158 74	86,814,680 85	284,092,015 09
Ohio	24,147,621 94	51,435,934 72	226,262,813 94	215,971,742 91	561,091,469 88
Oregon		345,291 99	5,074,091 79	7,367,682 50	12,787,066 28
Pennsylvania	27,398,619 64	60,045,006 94	281,070,857 15	285,391,261 83	735,556,697 45
Rhode Island	1,729,545 46	3,832,251 94	16,888,135 44	17,612,593 64	49,379,596 70
South Carolina	9,446,271 30	17,363,412 60	68,058,229 76	57,176,760 59	202,126,102 93
Tennessee	13,177,943 25	26,043,998 49	107,332,994 47	101,980,586 26	285,136,251 21
Texas		5,521,744 28	58,435,865 57	66,331,357 45	130,288,967 30
Vermont	4,639,686 03	8,158,774 65	30,474,291 73	26,785,249 94	93,688,103 55
Virginia	19,703,058 91	36,925,412 69	115,789,378 25	99,277,589 19	387,529,390 94
West Virginia			38,536,469 55	35,817,336 42	74,413,805 97
Wisconsin	491,784 24	7,932,053 67	75,038,329 43	85,462,192 48	168,924,359 82
Arizona				782,616 69	782,616 69
Dakota			467,797 11	1,149,116 76	1,616,913 87
District of Columbia	694,679 07	1,342,489 61	7,261,270 58	10,671,932 16	22,711,371 15
Idaho				1,215,386 72	1,215,386 72
Montana				1,668,840 73	1,668,840 73
New Mexico		1,598,588 30	9,044,269 99	7,444,731 87	18,087,590 16
Utah		295,578 18	3,894,943 85	7,032,458 35	11,222,980 38
Washington			1,121,308 11	1,941,138 10	3,062,446 21
Wyoming				738,842 90	738,842 90
Total*	271,173,637 67	602,372,541 35	3,041,000,498 21	3,124,467,782 28	7,971,862,424 75

* Including "net ordinary receipts," "interest," and "premiums."

TABLE B.

States and Territories.	Money expenditures for internal improvements.	Money expenditures for public buildings.	Acres of land grants for internal improvements.	Value of same at $1.25 per acre.	Acres of land grants for schools and universities.	Value of same at $1.25 per acre.	Acres of land grants for public buildings.	Value of same at $1.25 per acre.	Total for internal improvements and school and public buildings.
Alabama	$2,273,347	$628,879 00	3,729,542	$4,661,927 50	970,773	$1,213,466 25			$8,777,619 75
Arkansas	1,344,391	189,184 00	2,878,889	3,598,623 75	934,637	1,168,496 25			6,300,670 00
California	3,853,034	4,128,406 00	26,800,100	33,500,125 00	6,765,404	8,456,755 00	64,000	$80,000 00	50,018,320 00
Connecticut	1,316,407	875,373 00							2,191,780 00
Delaware	3,584,396	103,127 00							3,631,523 00
Florida	763,179	613,483 00	2,260,468	2,825,585 00	1,021,587	1,276,983 75	64,000	80,000 00	5,559,240 75
Georgia	1,128,523	633,473 00							1,761,996 00
Illinois	3,689,351	6,783,803 00	3,386,968	4,232,460 00	1,031,146	1,288,932 50			15,994,546 50
Indiana	1,454,261	898,526 00	1,939,279	2,424,098 75	696,397	870,496 25			6,195,958 33
Iowa	3,180,001	505,838 00	4,440,260	5,550,325 00	951,224	1,189,030 00	64,000	80,000 00	10,505,708 00
Kansas	2,584,814	139,545 00	8,351,531	11,064,413 75	2,937,386	3,671,732 50	64,000	80,000 00	17,540,505 25
Kentucky	1,555,283	696,207 00							2,251,550 00
Louisiana	3,573,190	5,588,493 00	1,572,404	1,965,505 00	832,124	1,040,155 00			12,167,343 00
Maine	1,444,889	2,196,113 00							3,641,002 00
Maryland	2,513,840	2,041,838 00							4,555,678 00
Massachusetts	2,670,735	7,161,185 00							9,780,920 00
Michigan	7,747,537	753,729 00	4,978,976	6,223,720 00	1,113,477	1,391,846 25			16,116,827 25
Minnesota	1,776,775	578,638 00	10,249,455	12,811,818 75	3,052,630	3,815,787 50	64,000	80,000 00	19,063,019 25
Mississippi	1,514,435	143,775 00	1,435,159	1,793,946 25	883,664	1,114,587 50			4,556,738 25
Missouri	2,290,315	4,141,384 00	3,128,004	3,910,005 00	1,245,219	1,556,523 75			11,898,287 75
Nebraska	61,083	748,996 00	8,208,400	10,260,500 00	2,748,124	3,435,155 00	64,000	80,000 00	14,585,734 00
Nevada	3,400	419,281 00	4,800,000	6,000,000 00	4,031,510	5,039,387 50	64,000	80,000 00	11,542,068 50
New Hampshire	138,000	173,691 00							311,691 00
New York	8,535,216	15,075,391 28							23,410,607 25
New Jersey	956,463	552,261 00							1,508,724 00
North Carolina	2,210,377	397,450 00							2,607,827 00
Ohio	5,027,914	4,595,816 00	1,100,361	1,375,451 25	773,608	967,010 00			11,966,191 25
Oregon	1,118,105	695,585 00	7,500,000	9,375,000 00	3,375,786	4,219,732 50	64,000	80,000 00	15,478,422 50
Pennsylvania	1,564,963	9,095,106 00							10,660,069 00
Rhode Island	680,985	326,413 00							1,007,398 00
South Carolina	726,716	3,351,457 00							4,078,173 00
Tennessee	705,946	1,078,233 00			200,000	250,000 00			2,034,179 00
Texas	1,664,200	154,359 00							1,818,559 00
Vermont	525,357	220,467 00							745,824 00
Virginia	1,595,460	1,418,233 00							3,013,693 00
West Virginia	1,500,133	318,094 00							1,818,227 00
Wisconsin	3,674,024	605,044 00	3,600,500	4,500,625 00	1,050,809	1,313,511 25	64,000	80,000 00	10,173,204 25
Arizona	261,415		17,340,000	21,675,000 00	4,050,350	5,062,937 50			26,999,352 50
Colorado	13,827	90,723 00	3,200,000	4,000,000 00	3,793,635	4,742,093 75	64,000	80,000 00	8,926,593 75
Dakota	92,000		9,852,000	12,315,000 00	8,554,560	10,693,200 00	640	800 00	23,101,000 00
Idaho	46,500	57,233 00	1,320,000	1,650,000 00	3,233,137	4,041,421 25			5,789,154 25
Montana	666,496	113,075 00	15,400,000	19,250,000 00	5,112,135	6,390,168 75			26,419,739 75
New Mexico	217,072	99,649 00	12,800,000	16,100,000 00	4,355,448	5,444,310 00			21,861,031 00
Utah	7,943	68,254 00	2,272,800	2,841,000 00	3,176,949	3,971,186 25			6,888,383 25
Washington	308,178	67,650 00	11,300,000	14,125,000 00	2,534,755	3,168,443 75			17,669,271 75
Wyoming		37,455 00	5,800,000	7,250,000 00	1,740,142	2,175,177 50			9,462,632 50
Total									475,886,984 58

C.—Population of States and Territories at date of admission (or organization) and percentage of total population for each decade from 1790 to 1880.

States and Territories.	Admitted or organized—	Population at date.	Population of United States at date.	Percentage of population.
				1790 to 1800.	1801 to 1810.	1811 to 1820.	1821 to 1830.	1831 to 1840.	1841 to 1850.	1851 to 1860.	1861 to 1870.	1871 to 1880.
Alabama	Mar. 3, 1817	127,901	9,633,822				1.327625	2.406766	3.462133	3.327126	3.066473	2.585669
Arkansas	Mar. 2, 1819	14,255	9,633,822				.147968	.236286	.571833	.905045	1.384873	1.256461
California	Sept. 9, 1850	92,597	23,191,876							.399265	1.208505	1.452984
Colorado	Feb. 28, 1861	34,277	31,443,321								.109012	.103386
Connecticut	Jan. 9, 1788	237,946	3,929,214	6.055817	4.728319	3.618043	2.856063	2.314609	1.816630	1.598801	1.463417	1.393871
Delaware	Dec. 7, 1787	59,096	3,929,214	1.504016	1.210760	1.003801	.755142	.596764	.457618	.394673	.356883	.324223
Florida	Mar. 30, 1822	34,730	12,866,020					.270047	.319263	.377050	.446594	.486919
Georgia	Jan. 2, 1788	82,548	3,929,214	2.100878	3.064642	3.486701	3.539457	4.018622	4.054912	3.907338	3.362514	3.070952
Illinois	Feb. 3, 1809	12,282	7,239,881			.169644	.572587	1.224233	2.790677	3.671415	5.444562	6.587132
Indiana	May 7, 1800	5,641	5,308,483		.106264	.338680	1.527722	2.667281	4.019526	4.261906	4.294801	4.358683
Iowa	June 12, 1838	43,112	17,069,453						.252658	.828799	2,146443	3.096656
Kansas	May 30, 1854	107,206	31,443,321								.340950	.945058
Kentucky	Feb. 4, 1791	73,677	3,929,213	1.875108	4.162300	5.614885	5.855776	5.348985	4.570192	4.235988	3.675451	3.426003
Louisiana	Mar. 3, 1805	76,556	7,239,881			1.057421	1.587355	1.677506	2.065309	2.232514	2.251677	1.885233
Maine	Mar. 3, 1820	96,540	3,929,214	2.456980	2.858048	3.158961	3.096061	3.106012	2.940764	2.514540	1.998132	1.625886
Maryland	Apr. 28, 1788	319,728	3,929,214	8.137200	6.434004	5.256247	4.228332	3.476016	2.754552	2.513958	2.185040	2.025226
Massachusetts	Feb. 6, 1788	378,787	3,929,214	9.640274	7.965457	6.519997	5.430441	4.746304	4.323294	4.288200	3.915191	3.779597
Michigan	Jan. 11, 1805	4,762	7,239,881			.065774	.090982	.246013	1.243993	1.714626	2.382423	3.070822
Minnesota	Mar. 3, 1849	6,077	23,191,876							.026203	.547089	1.140364
Mississippi	Apr. 7, 1798	8,850	5,308,483		.166714	.557357	.783158	1.062314	2.201508	2.615252	2.516608	2.147191
Missouri	June 4, 1812	20,845	7,239,881			.287919	.690868	1.092125	2.248991	2.940875	3.759183	4.464128
Nebraska	May 30, 1854	28,841	31,443,321								.091724	.318978
Nevada	Mar. 2, 1861	6,857	31,443,321								.021808	.110199
New Hampshire	June 21, 1788	141,885	3,929,214	3.611027	3.463475	2.962203	2.532972	2.094194	1.667750	1.371066	1.037018	.825502
New Jersey	Dec. 18, 1787	184,139	3,929,214	4.686408	3.977577	3.391796	2.879709	2.494599	2.187765	2.110890	2.137290	2.349933
New York	July 26, 1788	340,120	3,929,214	8.656184	11.096409	13.246751	14.242644	14.918377	14.234723	13.355513	12.342001	11.366556
North Carolina	Nov. 21, 1789	393,751	3,929,214	10.021114	9.006396	7.672778	6.631107	5.738310	4.415422	3.747170	3.156861	2.778543
Ohio	Apr. 30, 1802	45,365	5,308,483		.854576	3.187345	6.033898	7.292782	8.904856	8.538891	7.440407	6.912273
Oregon	Aug. 14, 1848	13,294	23,191,876							.057322	.166856	.235806
Pennsylvania	Dec. 12, 1787	434,373	3,929,214	11.054959	11.347216	11.189286	10.873223	10.483355	10.103718	9.968085	9.242710	9.134076
Rhode Island	May 29, 1790	68,825	3,929,214	1.751622	1.302105	1.092600	.861703	.755783	.637800	.636193	.555348	.563699
South Carolina	May 23, 1788	249,073	3,929,214	6.339003	6.510165	5.733727	5.218500	4.519077	3.483477	2.882504	2.238021	1.829968
Tennessee	June 1, 1796	35,691	3,929,214	.908350	1.989307	3.615073	4.388403	5.302230	4.859596	4.323570	3.529529	3.263934
Texas	Dec. 29, 1845	212,592	23,191,876							.916666	1.921600	2.122965
Vermont	Feb. 18, 1791	85,425	3,929,214	2.174099	2.909777	3.009649	2.449350	2.182245	1.710965	1.354440	1.092114	.857274
Virginia	June 25, 1788	747,610	3,929,214	19.026961	16.581008	13.461547	11.056006	9.419431	7.265846	6.129996	3.807608	3.177424
West Virginia	Dec. 31, 1862	442,014	38,558,371								1.269203	1.146350
Wisconsin	Apr. 20, 1836	30,945	17,069,453						.181354	1.316802	2.467554	2.735256
Arizona	Feb. 24, 1863	9,658	38,558,371									.025048
Dakota	Mar. 2, 1861	4,837	31,443,321								.015383	.036778
Dist. of Columbia	July 16, 1790	14,093	5,308,483		.265481	.331815	.342948	.309734	.256175	.222867	.238779	.341560
Idaho	Mar. 3, 1863	14,999	38,558,371									.038899
Montana	May 26, 1864	20,595	38,558,371									.053412
New Mexico	Sept. 9, 1850	61,547	23,191,876							.265382	.297411	.238272
Utah	Sept. 9, 1850	11,380	23,191,876							.049069	.128081	.225077
Washington	Mar. 2, 1853	11,594	31,443,321								.036873	.062127
Wyoming	July 25, 1868	9,118	38,558,371									.023647
Total				100.000000	100.000000	100.000000	100.000000	100.000000	100.000000	100.000000	100.000000	100.000000

TABLE D.

States and Territories.	Per cent. of total revenues contributed by States on the basis of population.	Amount received for internal improvements, public buildings, and education.	The proportionate amount due to each State.	Excess.	Deficit.	Percentage paid in and received back for internal improvements, &c.
Alabama	2.680826	$8,777,619 75	$12,757,702 01	.....	$3,980,082 26	4.111902
Arkansas	1.121673	6,300,670 00	5,337,895 82	$962,774 18	.....	7.046289
California	1.060652	50,018,320 00	5,047,504 82	44,970,815 18	.....	59.155668
Colorado	.082105	8,926,593 75	390,727 01	8,535,866 74	.....	136.381366
Connecticut	1.678681	2,191,780 00	7,988,624 30	.....	5,796,844 39	1.637830
Delaware	.411316	3,631,523 00	1,957,399 31	1,674,123 69	.....	11.075252
Florida	.410872	5,559,240 75	1,955,286 37	3,603,954 38	.....	16.667325
Georgia	3.330474	1,761,996 00	15,849,292 29	.....	14,087,296 29	.663650
Illinois	5.098018	15,994,566 50	24,260,080 41	.....	8,266,237 63	3.935600
Indiana	3.960045	6,195,958 33	18,845,338 74	.....	12,649,380 40	1.962575
Iowa	2.103711	10,505,708 00	10,011,286 84	494,421 16	.....	6.264393
Kansas	.500464	17,540,505 25	2,381,643 04	15,158,862 21	.....	43.965216
Kentucky	3.818304	2,251,550 00	18,170,811 77	.....	15,919,261 77	.739692
Louisiana	1.972477	12,167,343 00	9,386,761 32	2,780,581 68	.....	7.757916
Maine	2.044509	3,641,002 00	9,729,552 23	.....	6,088,550 23	2.233942
Maryland	2.473503	4,555,678 00	11,771,078 84	.....	7,215,400 84	2.310365
Massachusetts	4.161385	9,780,920 00	19,803,489 59	.....	10,022,569 59	2.948070
Michigan	2.297902	16,116,827 25	10,935,416 54	5,181,410 71	.....	8.998087
Minnesota	.657627	19,063,019 25	3,129,561 30	15,933,457 95	.....	36.362372
Mississippi	2.153656	4,556,738 25	10,248,968 59	.....	5,692,230 34	2.654103
Missouri	3.550711	11,898,287 75	16,897,371 50	.....	4,999,083 75	4.203480
Nebraska	.160009	14,585,734 00	761,462 00	13,824,272 00	.....	114.346864
Nevada	.051510	11,542,068 50	245,129 39	11,296,939 11	.....	281.081000
New Hampshire	1.194849	311,691 00	5,686,130 87	.....	5,374,439 87	.327228
New Jersey	2.339388	1,508,724 00	11,132,843 01	.....	9,624,119 01	.808909
New York	12.233545	23,410,607 25	58,170,259 71	.....	34,759,652 46	2.402457
North Carolina	3.563684	2,607,827 00	16,959,108 33	.....	14,351,281 33	.917951
Ohio	7.038399	11,966,191 25	33,494,824 76	.....	21,528,633 51	2.011484
Oregon	.160403	15,478,422 50	763,337 00	14,715,085 50	.....	121.047487
Pennsylvania	9.477794	10,660,069 00	45,103,588 07	.....	34,443,519 07	1.410889
Rhode Island	.619424	1,007,398 00	2,947,758 20	.....	1,940,360 20	2.040010
South Carolina	2.535494	4,078,173 00	12,066,085 94	.....	7,987,912 94	2.012690
Tennessee	3.576784	2,034,179 00	17,021,444 76	.....	14,987,265 76	.713405
Texas	1.634360	1,318,559 00	7,777,706 52	.....	6,459,147 52	1.020250
Vermont	1.175235	745,824 00	5,592,790 40	.....	4,846,966 40	.796071
Virginia	4.861215	3,013,693 00	23,133,889 48	.....	20,120,196 48	.776716
West Virginia	.933456	1,818,227 00	4,442,195 61	.....	2,623,968 61	2.443400
Wisconsin	2.119008	10,173,204 25	10,084,083 27	89,120 98	.....	6.022342
Arizona	.009817	26,999,352 50	46,717 83	26,952,634 67	.....	3450.009799
Dakota	.020283	23,101,000 00	96,524 16	23,004,475 84	.....	1422.524750
District of Columbia	.284894	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Idaho	.015246	5,789,154 25	72,553 73	5,716,600 52	.....	476.321793
Montana	.020934	26,419,739 75	99,622 18	26,320,117 57	.....	1583.119304
New Mexico	.226893	21,861,031 00	1,781,276 74	20,781,276 74	.....	120.862043
Utah	.140782	6,888,383 25	669,963 21	6,218,420 04	.....	61.377496
Washington	.038416	17,669,271 75	182,816 74	17,486,455 01	.....	576.965943
Wyoming	.009268	9,462,632 50	44,105 21	9,418,527 29	.....	1280.738083
Total	100.000000	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....

E.—Comparison, by decades, showing the per cent. of population of the Southern States to that of the United States.

Decades.	Population of Southern States and Territories.	Population of the United States.	Percentage of population of Southern States.
First decade	1,961,174	3,929,214	49.91263
Second decade	2,607,818	5,294,390	49.25625
Third decade	3,456,899	7,215,858	47.90697
Fourth decade	4,451,760	9,600,783	46.36872
Fifth decade	5,808,469	12,820,868	45.30480
Sixth decade	7,403,051	17,019,641	43.49123
Seventh decade	9,614,969	23,140,189	41.55052
Eighth decade	12,240,293	31,368,261	39.02129
Ninth decade	13,877,615	38,426,671	36.11454
Total percentage			398.92695
Average percentage of the South			44.32522
Percentage of appropriations received by the Southern States			16.03979

NOTE.—Of the $475,886,984.58 expended for internal improvements, public buildings, and education, the South received $76,331,304.50, and was entitled to receive $210,937,952.86; the North received $399,555,680.08, and was entitled to receive $264,949,031.72, being an excess over its share of $134,608,648.36, and a deficit of the same amount in the South.

Table A shows the amount paid into the Treasury by each State by decades and the total amount paid into the Treasury by each State and Territory from 1789 down to the 1st of July, 1880.

Table B shows the total appropriations to each State and Territory for internal improvements, public buildings, and educational purposes to the 1st of July last, and includes land grants charged at $1.25 per acre, all the sums amounting in the aggregate to $475,886,984.58.

Table C shows when each State was admitted or organized as a Territory and what percentage of the whole population each State and Territory contained at each census or decade.

Table D shows the percentage of total revenues paid by each State, the amount received by each for internal improvement, public buildings, and education, the amount each State and Territory should have received according to the amount paid into the Treasury, and the excesses received by and deficits due each State and Territory, and the percentage of the amount paid into the Treasury received back by each State for the three purposes named.

Table E shows the average proportion the population of the South (or sixteen late slave States) bore to the population of the whole Union during the nine decades, and what portion of the whole sum of $475,886,984.58 each of these sections received, and what each should have received if it had been divided according to the population of, and the amount of money paid into the Treasury by, the two sections.

The Southern States have averaged 44.32522 per cent. of the whole population, and paid that proportion of all the money into the Treasury, and only received 16.03979 per cent. of the appropriations. The North received of the amount appropriated ($475,886,984.58) the sum of $399,555,680.08 and the South the sum of $76,331,304.50, when the North should have had $264,949,031.72 and the South $210,937,952.86. The deficit of the South is $134,608,648.36.

In ascertaining the amount of money paid into the Treasury by each State each decade, and in the aggregate, I did not proceed on the erroneous idea that Kentucky paid into the Treasury the tobacco and whisky tax, or that New York City paid into it the customs or tariff tax collected at that point, but that each State consumed tariff and internal revenue paying articles in proportion to its population. I am aware that this assumption may not in all instances be exactly accurate, but it is the best possible approximate basis. In paper B, as a part of the $2,251,550 of appropriations received by my State it is charged with over $1,300,000, money expended on the Louisville and Portland Canal. This sum should be divided between seven States, each of which were as much interested in it as Kentucky, and certainly it might have been fairly divided between Indiana and Kentucky, but as the canal was wholly on the soil of my own State and it had received so little that it could afford to have it so charged, and then be far behind its sister States, and as I desired there should be no cavil and no suspicion that I had favored my own State in these tabulations, it was thought best to charge this sum to it.

In paper B no account is taken of the land-grant or scrip act of July 3, 1861, as by it all the States received land or scrip according to their representation in the two Houses of Congress, and if taken into the estimate it would vary the result but little, and that in favor of my own and the other larger and older States.

Paper E does not prove exactly, but near enough for practical purposes, this is owing to the fact that fractions could not be carried out indefinitely, and that from the total sum paid into the Treasury was not first deducted the amount paid by the District of Columbia before the percentages were taken, and which should have been done, as no account was taken of expenditures in the District of Columbia. If this error had been avoided, the balances in favor of Kentucky would have been still larger, and excesses of the new States have been greater; and hence I did not undertake the great labor of correcting the table in this respect.

These facts and figures demonstrate the past injustice done to Kentucky. Justice demands liberal future appropriations for the rivers and public buildings of that much-neglected State. It has paid into the Treasury of the United States over three hundred and four million dollars, and after charging it with over one million three hundred thousand dollars, of which at least half is not just, has received in over eighty-eight years but $2,251,550 for internal improvements, public buildings, and educational purposes, while California, that has only been in the Union for thirty years, and has only contributed to the Treasury $84,553,722.76, has received of the Federal Government $50,018,320 for these purposes. Kansas has only paid in $39,896,323.93, and received back for these purposes $17,540,505.25. Minnesota has received for them $19,063,019.25, and only contributed to the Treasury $52,425,124.68. Iowa in forty-two years received $10,505,708 of the $167,704,960.86 paid by it into the Treasury. Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, and New Hampshire have each received for these three purposes less than three-fourths of 1 per cent. of what they contributed to the Treasury, while California has received nearly 60 per cent., Kansas nearly 44 per cent., Minnesota 36 per cent., and the average State about 5 per cent., and the Territories of Montana, Arizona, and Dakota, that have not yet population sufficient to demand admission as States and have been organized as Territories but a few years, have each received for the three purposes named ten or twelve times as much as Kentucky has received in over eighty-eight years.

These tables show that upon a fair and equitable distribution according to the amount contributed to the common Treasury there is justly due to the State of Kentucky almost sixteen million dollars.

If I had been elected to the Forty-seventh Congress I had intended to introduce a bill to make up this deficit and injustice in installments of 5 per cent. each year for twenty years, in addition to giving my State her fair proportion of the annual appropriations to rivers and harbors and public buildings. It is reasonable to presume that the annual appropriations for rivers and public buildings will be $12,000,000. Kentucky, according to the census of 1880, is about one-thirtieth of the whole Union in population, also in water-ways and resources to be profitably developed. This would give her for twenty years to come annual appropriations to the amount of $1,200,000 each. It is the custom of our friends resident in the younger States to taunt us with a want of enterprise and progress, and to speak of Kentucky as an old-fogy State, and to boast that they surpass us in schools, internal improvements and progress; but let these States remember that they have been developed and their railroads constructed and their common schools endowed with our land and money.

In their prosperity, obtained at our expense, let them be just to us and give us the $1,200,000 per year for twenty years which we are justly entitled to, and let us expend it in opening our rivers, in building railroads, and opening up our wealth of coal, iron, and lumber, and within a few years we will again take the lead of them. This system of giving away to the new States the public domain, which belonged to all the States, grew partly out of a desire upon the part of the sea-shore States to reconcile the West to the doctrine that no public money should be appropriated for improvements except upon tide-water, and partly out of the desire of the party in power to court the favor and political support of the new States. The democratic party did some of this political juggling prior to 1861, and gave away a few millions of acres of the public domain; but since 1861 the republican party has engaged in it on a gigantic scale, and has given away to corporations about two hundred and seventy million acres of the public lands, and by doing so has built up mammoth corporations that threaten the liberties of the people and assert, if they do not exercise, supremacy over the Government, and have a controlling and baneful influence in its administration and councils, and that have and exercise the power to elect Senators and Representatives in Congress and to control their action in their interest in opposition to that of the great body of the people. And yet the prejudices of the war control the people of the old States who have been robbed of their interest in the public domain, and the poor people, whose children will soon need to settle on these lands, into supporting a party the conduct of which, in this and many other respects, they condemn. I trust that their children will not curse them when, instead of being independent owners of the soil, they will have to become the tenants and servants of heartless corporations.

But a few of our democratic friends who desire to out-Herod Herod, to paint the lily and gild gold, and to improve on the democracy of Jefferson, Calhoun, and Jackson, think it undemocratic for the United States Government to make appropriations to improve our rivers and harbors.

In 1806 Jefferson signed the bill appropriating money to construct the National Road in the States of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland. On the 16th of December, 1816, Mr. Calhoun moved in the House of Representatives for a committee to inquire into the propriety of setting apart the dividends arising from the Government's National Bank stock as a permanent fund for internal improvements, and favored this course. (See Congressional Annals, page 851.) And this committee reported in favor of this course, and in their report asserted the power of Congress to make such improvements under the power to regulate commerce between the States.

Jackson, in 1830, 1831, 1832, 1834, and 1836, signed bills appropriating money to construct the National Road. In 1832, 1833, and 1834, Jackson signed bills making appropriations to improve the Cumberland and Arkansas Rivers. Jackson, in the years from 1830 to 1836, signed bills to improve Black River, Cunningham Creek, and Conneaut Creek, all of which are wholly within the State of Ohio.

I made this speech in substance before the Committee on Commerce two years since, and also one year ago, and then exhibited similar tabulations, and the result was that I then for the first time obtained in the shape of appropriations to the rivers of Kentucky some little recognition. It was not printed then, and I make it now, not in the hope of increasing the appropriations to the rivers of Kentucky in this bill, but to place the facts and figures before the country with a hope that they may induce the Senate to increase them or may induce future Congresses to mete out to my State long-delayed justice. I must acknowledge my obligations to Mr. L. J. Barnes, of the Statistical Bureau, for valuable assistance in revising the tabulations made a part hereof. I had the honor to first press the improvement of the rivers of Kentucky upon the consideration of Congress with some success. If the great labor expended in these tabulations contributes to continued appropriations and the rapid completion of the works undertaken in Kentucky, I shall be fully rewarded for the wearisome labor they have cost, most of it performed in the small hours of the night, after my other duties were discharged.

I am about to retire from public life, and am fully aware that the credit of opening up the coal, iron, and lumber regions of Kentucky will be awarded to whoever may obtain the last appropriations which complete the improvements leading thereto; for not until then will the people of the State feel the beneficent influences of the improvements made with these appropriations. But I hope that a few men of reflection will recall the fact that I was an humble factor in initiating the work, and thereby made it possible and comparatively easy to obtain appropriations for their continuance and completion.

Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH OF HON. G. L. FORT,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 7, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriation for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. FORT said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill ought not to pass under suspension of the rules without opportunity for adequate debate, or for amendment, yet I presume it will pass. I am opposed to many of the clauses of the bill making large appropriations. The bill is manifestly unfair, giving Texas $750,000, while it has but few if any rivers that can be called navigable. Other localities have large appropriations where there is no public necessity and where the money must be spent without utility. Appropriations of many thousands of dollars are made for small streams, creeks, and bayous.

There appears to be no appropriation for "the slough of despond" into which Christian fell on his "Pilgrim's Progress," which is the only omission I have found in the bill.

Sir, this bill of all others ought to be regularly reported and considered in Committee of the Whole House, with full opportunity to strike out some of the items and if proper to add others, or to decrease or increase any of the appropriations made.

The most meritorious rivers and harbors have not been recognized by the bill.

There is no one of the appropriation bills we consider and pass but could be more properly passed under suspension of the rules and without amendment than should this bill. This bill with the first $1,000,000 in my opinion commits Congress to the policy of rebuilding and maintaining the levees on the Mississippi River below Cairo, which will ultimately require many millions of dollars and will only benefit the owners of swamp and overflowed lands along the bank of that river, and not tend in any considerable degree to the improvement of navigation or be for the public welfare.

While I am strongly in favor of appropriating liberally for the improvement of all navigable rivers and water ways, and for the extension and safety of harbors, and for making new ones where practicable, I doubt whether it is my duty to vote for this bill, offered as it is by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] under the gag of the suspension of the rules, yet under all the circumstances I shall give commerce the benefit of the doubt and vote for the bill.

Pension Appropriations.

SPEECH OF HON. A. H. COFFROTH,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 9, 1881.

On the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

Mr. COFFROTH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Much has been said in reference to the present magnitude of the pension-roll, and the impression has been generally made that it is annually increasing to an alarming extent. These statements have been so general in their character, and accompanied by such meager details of the actual facts and figures involved, that the country is liable to be misled as to the truth.

An examination of official reports, however, dissipates all fears upon that subject and demonstrates that the increase is but temporary (being limited to one year) and more apparent than real, and is to be accounted for upon principles entirely consistent with the highest degree of uprightness of purpose on the part of the pensioners.

If we take the annual reports of the Commissioner of Pensions for the nine years last past, we find that the highest point reached was during the year ending June 30, 1875, when the yearly value of the pension-roll for pensioners of all the wars, excepting that of 1812, under acts of 1871 and 1878, was $24,269,871.59.

If we next turn to the annual report for 1880, we find the total value for that year, exclusive of pensioners of the war of 1812, to be $22,568,658.60, or $1,701,212.99 less for the year 1880 than for the year 1875, or an annual decrease for each of the five years from 1875 to 1880, of $340,242.59.

The following table will give a correct exhibit of the number of Army pensioners of all classes borne on the roll:

Year ending June 30—	Page of annual report.	Number of pensioners on the rolls.	Less pensioners of the war of 1812, under acts of 1871 and 1878.	Pensioners of late and other wars except of 1812, under acts of 1871 and 1878.	Yearly value of the pension-rolls.	Less yearly value of pensions due for war of 1812, under acts of 1871 and 1878.	Yearly value of pensions due for war of the rebellion and all other wars except that of 1812.
1872	1-3	232,229	20,127	212,092	$25,480,578 00	$1,932,192 00	$23,548,380 00
1873	1-2	238,411	23,319	215,092	26,259,284 43	2,238,192 00	24,021,092 43
1874	4-6	236,241	22,932	213,309	26,244,786 46	2,201,472 00	24,043,314 46
1875	4-5	234,821	21,038	213,783	26,289,519 59	2,019,648 00	24,269,871 59
1876	7	232,137	19,193	212,944	25,596,324 69	1,842,528 00	23,753,796 69
1877	14	232,104	17,411	214,693	25,371,215 43	1,671,456 00	23,699,759 43
1878	18	223,998	14,132	209,866	24,107,981 90	1,356,672 00	22,751,309 90
1879	11	242,755	32,815	209,940	25,493,742 15	3,150,240 00	22,343,502 15
1880	17	250,802	34,888	215,914	25,917,906 60	3,349,248 00	22,568,658 60

It will be seen from this table that on the 30th of June last there were on the pension-roll 34,888 survivors and widows of soldiers of the war of 1812, and that the number for all other wars was 215,914. The gross annual value of all pensions was $25,493,742.15, and the gross annual value—excluding those of the war of 1812—of all other pensions was $22,568,658.60.

It must also be borne in mind that during this period of decrease in the annual value of our pension-rolls, Congress has passed five acts increasing the rate of invalid pensions in certain specified cases, to wit: Act of February 28, 1877; act of June 17, 1878; two acts of March 9, 1879, and act of June 16, 1880.

There was an increase of $225,156.45 during the year 1880 over that of 1879, owing, no doubt, in some degree, to the impulse given to applicants by the passage of the arrears act. Applicants whose injuries were slight, entitling them to but a trifling monthly sum payable only from the date of the completion of their claims, had been comparatively indifferent; but as they became entitled to arrears for fourteen or more years they were stimulated to immediate action in completing their proofs.

Others, also, who had failed to make application because of the insignificance of the monthly rate due them, at once became interested and immediately filed their claims.

In addition to this, cases of slight injury, such as the loss of a finger, thumb, toe, or other gun-shot wounds of a comparatively trifling nature, are as likely to be the subject of an entry on the company rolls as those of a more serious character, thus making the additional proof required less difficult to secure.

But independent of and beyond the question of the cost to the country of our pension list, let us inquire if the numbers now upon the roll, and of those now applying, are greater than is consistent with the nature of the case, and within the limits of the number disabled in the Army.

The whole number of dead Union soldiers lying buried in national cemeteries on the 30th of June, 1866, is officially reported in the introduction to the first volume of the Medical History of the War as being 341,673.

If to this number we add those dying at home during the war, and such others as were buried by the enemy wherever killed in skirmishes, or who died on marches, or under other circumstances precluding all opportunity of their being reinterred, it is not an unreasonable estimate to fix the total number of fatal casualties in our armies during the war and up to June 30, 1866, at 375,000.

How many have died between June 30, 1866, and June 30, 1880, a period of fourteen years, by reason of diseases contracted while in the Army, we shall not now undertake to estimate. Leaving that number out of view for the present, let us inquire how many applications for pension on account of the death of the 375,000 soldiers of the late war who died prior to June 30, 1866, have been made, and whether that number is so great as to justify the charge or apprehension even that any material number of them are fraudulent.

In the annual official report for the year ending June 30, 1880, we learn that the total number of applications filed from 1861 to June 30, 1880, for widows' Army pensions was 274,087. In this number are included all applications for minors, dependent parents, brothers, and sisters. From reliable data it appears that 79,642 of this number are based upon the death of soldiers who died since the 30th of June, 1866. Deducting these, there are left 194,445 pensioners whose claims are based upon the death of soldiers who died prior to the 30th of June, 1866.

These figures clearly show that for 180,555 of the dead heroes and patriots who gave their lives that our great Government might be maintained, no claim for pension has been filed by either widows, children, or dependent relatives; and yet the whole country has been startled by the wholesale, general, and intangible charges of fraud, originating, as is believed, from official sources. These charges are made indiscriminately against pensioners, pension applicants, and their friends, but are unsustained by any specific statement of facts to give them even a color of justification.

In the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the year ending June 30, 1872, the number of widows, minors, and dependent relatives upon the pension-roll, is stated at 113,518, and the annual value or amount required for their payment was $14,530,778.39. In his report for 1880 this number is reduced to 78,772, and the amount required for their payment is correspondingly reduced to $8,515,585.20, a reduction in number in nine years of 34,746, and in annual value of $6,014,193.19, or an average annual reduction in number of 3,860, and in value of $668,243.68. At this rate of reduction it will be but a few years until the pension-roll of this class of pensioners will become a matter of comparative insignificance.

Let us now turn our attention to the invalid rolls. From an official statement published by the War Department under date of November 19, 1880, we learn that 2,772,408 men were furnished for our armies between the 15th of April, 1861, and the close of the rebellion. Deducting from this number the 375,000 who died prior to June 30, 1866, we have remaining 2,397,408 who from various causes were discharged either during the pendency of their term of service or at the close of the war.

In part first of the Medical History of the War we learn that 285,545 soldiers were discharged for disability during the progress of the war. How many of these have since died by reason of the disabilities for which they were discharged, we have no means of ascertaining; but it is not reasonable to suppose that many of them form a part of the 375,000 estimated to have died prior to June 30, 1866, as 341,670 were lying in their graves at that date in the national cemeteries. It is safe to say that at least 90 per cent. of the number discharged by reason of disability before the close of the war, were entitled to a pension and have probably made application therefor.

In the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the year ending June 30, 1880, it is stated that the total number of applications for invalid Army pensions from the year 1861 to June 30, 1880, is 405,858. This includes all soldiers of the regular Army, and all others that have been disabled since the close of the late war. It is therefore safe to say that the whole number of invalid applications for pension on file in the Pension Office on the 31st of January, 1881, arising out of the late war, does not exceed 400,000.

As 341,670 of the soldiers of our Army died, and 285,545 were discharged on account of disabilities during the war, is it not a safe and reasonable estimate to say that for every soldier that died during the progress of the great conflict for the preservation of the Union, two were more or less permanently disabled? Those of us who were old enough to judge can form a tolerably correct estimate from our own observations. Will any reasonable man of ordinary correctness gainsay the statement that, of every one hundred men who left their homes in health and strength to take their chances in the war of the rebellion, more than the proportion of two to one returned free from disability? If this estimate of one-third is correct, the whole number of deaths and permanent disabilities resulting must have been 914,894.

These figures challenge the closest scrutiny for their fairness and impartiality, and while perhaps no two persons can be found whose estimates would entirely agree in details, it is confidently believed that the conclusions that would be reached by any candid investigation of the subject would rather exceed than fall below this estimate.

The best writers on the subject all agree that our late war was one of the most gigantic and severe of any yet recorded in the history of the world. Our soldiers were not inured to the hardships of the tented field. With but few exceptions, they left comfortable homes in a healthful northern climate to endure long marches in enervating southern climes, whole armies sleeping in the open air on marshy ground for months at a time. And from the large extent of country embraced within active operations, the hardships endured were necessarily more constant and uniformly severe than in any of the wars covering the same length of time in other countries. And can it be other than true of such a war that an estimate of one-third of fatal and permanent casualties, is an extremely reasonable one? And if reasonable, then it follows that to the number of invalid applications for pension already filed there may yet be added, we have every reason to assume, from one to two hundred thousand more before that limit is reached when the cry of fraud, on account of the magnitude of the number of applications, will be justified.

It is not supposable that so large a number will ever apply, for, year by year, death is rapidly thinning the ranks of our late soldiers, and as time goes on each passing year renders it more difficult to furnish the necessary proofs. From June 30, 1871, to June 30, 1879, a period of eight years, the number of applications filed were only 128,022, or an annual average of 16,003. It will require a greater ratio to continue for eight years to come, in order to reach the number contemplated by this calculation.

The passage of the arrears act unquestionably stimulated the filing of applications, as will be seen by reference to the Commissioner's report for 1880, from which it appears that in the year 1878 but 18,812 applications were filed, which were increased to 36,835 for the year ending June 30, 1879—the arrears act having been in force during five months of that time. For the year ending June 30, 1880, the number reached 110,673. But this extraordinary number was reached by reason of the fact that claims presented after that date, if allowed at all, would be barred from the benefits conferred by the arrears act, and payment could begin only from the date of filing the application.

The attention of the whole country having been turned to the arrears bill during the several years it was under discussion before it became a law, it is only reasonable to suppose that the soldiers interested, as well as the survivors of the dead and their immediate friends, were on the alert to take advantage of its provisions, and consequently filed their applications on or before the 30th of June, 1880, the date of limitation by the provisions of the act. It therefore follows that a great falling off in the filing of applications may be expected from this time forward. It must be many years before an entire cessation can be expected; for as a man advances in years the disabilities contracted in the service, though trifling when they first appeared, become aggravated in the course of time, and when the sufferer finds himself old, and infirm from the disease or wounds he at first regarded as slight, he naturally turns to his country for relief. Fortunately for him, the classes now manifesting impatience by reason of the gravity of the burden imposed upon the public Treasury by the length of the pension-roll, are not sufficiently large in number or potent in influence, politically or otherwise, to close the door of relief against him. The cry of fraud that has filled the air during the last year has found no echo in the hearts of the people, and it never will.

To convince intelligent and thinking people that 10 per cent. or even 1 per cent. of the names now on our pension-roll, are there by fraudulent means, or that any large number of those whose applications for pension are now pending are attempting a fraud upon the public Treasury, will require something more than vague surmises, ill-founded suspicions, and general allegations. Justice requires specific statements of frauds if discovered, the names of the perpetrators, place, occasion, and all the circumstances involved. Nothing short of definite specifications will satisfy the public as to such charges, nor will anything less sufficiently enlighten Congress to enable it to adopt the proper legislation to prevent such fradulent practices.

Instead of specific facts showing the number and extent of frauds, the circumstances under which the law is violated and evaded, and the means used, the Commissioner estimates the frauds to be 10 per cent. Is this the reward that was promised our suffering soldiers during the dark days of our struggle for national existence?

Let us see how his official report for the year 1880 bears out the position taken as to frauds. Under the head of "special investigations—frauds," we are told that "during the last four years the investigations have been very thorough and made with great care;" and yet in the paragraph immediately preceding the one above quoted, we are informed that of the $40,000 appropriated for the discovery and prosecution of frauds "only $26,466.19 was expended." If frauds were known to be so numerous and extensive, why is it that all of this $40,000 was not expended for the legitimate purposes of its appropriation? Why allow it to lie idle in the Treasury and frauds go on without an effort at further detection and bringing to punishment the offenders? Is not the conclusion irresistible that either frauds on the part of the pensioners and applicants are not sufficiently numerous to justify the expenditure of more than $26,466.19 in their detection and prosecution, or that those in authority are criminally remiss in attending to their imperative duties as public officers? I accept the former alternative, and am strengthened in this conclusion by official reports. By reference to the annual reports of the Commissioner it will be seen that the number of criminal prosecutions of attorneys for the year 1878 was 59; for the year 1879 the number was 47, and for the year 1880 the number was 30. It also appears from his reports for 1879 and 1880, that in the former year 47 indictments were found for violation of the pension laws, and in the latter only 23. The same reports also show that in 1879 there were 8 acquittals, and in the year 1880, 18, of persons who had been indicted for infractions of the pension laws.

Section 4744 of the Revised Statutes authorizes the Commissioner of Pensions to investigate suspected attempts at fraud. He is not required to wait until fraud has been committed, but in all cases where it is attempted he is authorized to detail, from time to time, experienced experts direct from his office, to aid in ferreting out the perpetrators of these criminal attempts.

Such being made the Commissioner's duty by the mandate of the law, are we justified in coming to any other conclusion than that during the year 1880 the frauds, or attempted frauds, did not extend beyond the cases actually investigated and referred to in his annual report? To suppose that he did not exhaust all the means at his disposal in investigating all attempts at fraud coming to his knowledge, is to suppose him unfaithful to his trust.

The country is advised by the Commissioner of Pensions that the present system of adjudicating pension claims is inadequate to the settlement of the number already on file in less than twelve years. If this statement is well founded, it is eminently proper that Congress should provide some remedy for so great an evil. But before casting aside methods that have been in successful use for three-quarters of a century, it is proper to consider such facts as experience has developed that go to show that the capacities of the present system, if wisely administered, are fully equal to the demands of existing emergencies.

It has been officially announced from the Pension Office that in the month of October last 4,423 original pension claims were admitted and allowed. If this is correct, of which there can be no doubt, is there any good reason why the same number cannot be allowed every month in the year, and in this way relieve every year 53,076 of the waiting multitude of suffering applicants? If this were continued for five years, 265,380 claims would be allowed, and this, in all probability, would cover every claim "proven up" by the claimant. But this rate of dispatch of business by no means tests the capacity of the present system. We are informed that the heads of the nine divisions of examiners in the Pension Office can add at least one-half more to their force of examiners, if they are furnished by Congress, and by this means increase the work of adjusting pensions at least 50 per cent. Therefore, if with the present force they can settle 4,423 cases in one month, that number can be increased to 6,635 per month, or 79,620 per annum, which in three years will settle all the claims that will likely be made out.

Thus, instead of twelve years being required to dispose of this mass of business, it is seen by the experience already had that with the present force it can be done in five years; and with an increase of force quite practicable to handle, the whole difficulty can be dealt with and overcome in three years.

It may be said that the number of allowances that issued from the Pension Office in October were so issued to influence the presidential election then pending. But if so, is it not reasonable to expect that, if the present force of that office could, under partisan feeling, be stimulated to the allowance of 4,423 cases in October, it is entirely practical to continue the same rate under the higher stimulus of devotion to duty and of a desire to do justice to the thousands of suffering soldiers, and their widows and children, of the late war?

I am aware it is said that 315,340 applications are now pending; but this is of all classes, and includes the accumulations of nearly twenty years. In fact it is stated by those who are practically acquainted with the subject, that there are not over two hundred and twenty-five thousand of these claims upon which any labor should or ever will be bestowed. All of the meritorious claims can be adjudicated in a few years if the Commissioner of Pensions will liberally administer the law as it now is found upon the statute-books. In my opinion there exists no necessity for a radical change in the pension laws. Prompt, energetic, and liberal-minded officials will soon dispose of the just claims, rendering to the claimants what is due them and protecting the Government from frauds.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said in reference to the amount required to meet the provisions of the arrears act of January 25, 1879. The Commissioner estimates that the total present and prospective burden imposed thereby will be $510,301,672.25. In this is included the prospective accessions to the rolls and the continuance thereon for twenty-two years of 125,000 persons whose applications would never have been filed had it not been for the inducements held out by the arrears act. As a matter of principle, does the magnitude of an obligation necessarily incurred in the prosecution of a legitimate object render it improper or impolitic to pay it?

One of the inducements held out to our men to volunteer and fill up the ranks of the Army was that they and their families should be liberally pensioned for every disability contracted while serving their country; and this arrears legislation goes only in the direction of redeeming that promise. As well might the people estimate the present and prospective burden of the public debt upon the common Treasury for the next twenty-two years, and then, by reason of its magnitude, cavil about its payment. When the pensioner dies the debt, principal as well as interest, ceases and is forever canceled; but the Government bonds live on for generations unnumbered, or until the principal itself is extinguished by actual payment to the last farthing.

It does seem to me that very little consideration is required to show these official estimates to be uncertain and largely exaggerated in amounts; and for evidence of which, reference is had to official reports and data for the following estimates.

The Commissioner, in his annual report for 1880, shows there were on file 307,697 unsettled invalid and widows' Army claims. If every one of these claims were settled at the average of claims already allowed, it would require $244,164,066.77 for their payment. But a very large number of these claims have now been abandoned because of the death of the applicant, and a still larger number cannot be sustained for want of the required proof.

The Commissioner estimates—

Amount of arrears to old pensioners	$25,293,963 66
First payment previous to July 1, 1880	$8,821,826 09
Arrears in pending claims	192,000,847 50
Total	226,116,637 25

The Commissioner, in his estimate to Senator DAVIS, charges to the arrears act the continuance upon the rolls for twenty-two years, of all the applicants it is supposed will succeed subsequent to June 30, 1880, in becoming pensioners, but who, it is assumed, would never have made the attempt but for that act, and this item is set down at $284,185,000.

This estimate is entirely gratuitous. Who that is wise enough to determine how many of those entitled to pension would have forever neglected to avail themselves of their legal rights? The presumption should be, and in fact is, that every person will claim his or her rights when properly advised as to what they are. The object in passing any law is, that it shall be effective for the purposes of its enactment. Our pension laws, as they stood before the passage of the arrears act, form no exception to this rule. Hence, the conclusion is that if the arrears act had never been passed, all entitled to pension would, sooner or later, have applied for the same, and all speculations as to the number that would not have done so, are idle and vain.

But let us examine these speculations as they are submitted. The estimate of twenty-two years' continuance upon the rolls from July 1, 1880, is based, we are told, upon the Carlisle tables of expectation of life at given ages, and the assumption is indulged in that our surviving soldiers, their widows and parents, all averaged, at the date given, about forty-three years; consequently, the average of life in expectation for all these pensioners, is twenty-two years.

In my opinion the reasoning of the Commissioner of Pensions is not sound. Let us ask how many fathers and mothers of our soldiers to be affected by the arrears act will remain upon the pension-rolls for twenty-two years to come, and how many of their orphans will be there, when by the law their right to pension ceases at the age of sixteen years? How many widows of our dead soldiers, whose husbands were dead more than five years before January 25, 1879, will be there? And how many of our invalid pensioners who are such because of disease contracted or wounds received in the service will survive twenty-two years longer?

Life tables are based upon the average expectation of each individual of a healthy community, and not upon the expectation of life to a class of invalids, who are suffering from every conceivable disease and infirmity arising from the exposure of camp life in an unhealthy climate, from long imprisonment while in the hands of the enemy, or from wounds of all parts of the body, and loss of limb. With such a community there can be no reliable basis for forming any judgment as to the expectation of life, and all attempts to arrive at a satisfactory result by these means must, necessarily, prove futile.

Of 362,350 pensioners who were placed on the rolls of Army and Navy pensions since 1861, but 215,914 were there June 30, 1880, showing a total loss of 146,436, or within 6,748 of the whole number admitted to the rolls from 1861 to June 30, 1867.

If, during the first fifteen years after the close of the war, forty out of every one hundred of our pensioners have been swept from the roll by death and other causes, how greatly must this rate of diminution be accelerated with each recurring year!

In view of such data, we are safe in concluding that the pensioners placed upon the rolls from and after June 30, 1880, will not remain there on an average of twenty-two years, nor one-half of that time.

We are told that the average age of our soldiers in 1863 was twenty-six years; on the 30th of June, 1880, they had attained the age of forty-three years; and twenty-two years hence the average age of our soldiers who were disabled to an extent entitling them to pension, will be sixty-five years. If this is to be the average age of our sick soldiers, what is to be the maximum? And if our disabled invalid soldiers are to attain such a degree of longevity, to what ripeness of old age will not those attain who escaped the war unscathed?

As in the ordinary course of nature, our soldiers must die more rapidly with each succeeding year, it is more than likely that the average duration of a pension will not exceed eleven years, and that the future payment to pensioners will not exceed one-half of $284,185,000—the Commissioner's estimate—or an amount not exceeding $13,000,000 per year.

Liberal speculation is indulged in as to the probable annual payments to our pensioners in the future, and every effort has been, and is still being, made to exaggerate the sum, in order seemingly to alarm the public mind as to its magnitude, and induce legislation to limit or reduce it.

Whether the amount is to increase suddenly must depend upon the number of applicants admitted each year. If the allowances are to be made with more promptness and dispatch at the Pension Office, a large and immediate additional annual appropriation will be required. But all this is immaterial. If, under the law, these applicants are entitled to pension at all, it is due them that payment be made at the earliest possible moment. If payments are presently increased they will be less in the future. The one important consideration on the part of the people is the prompt and willing discharge of whatever obligation is due our suffering soldiers and their dependent representatives. All considerations as to when it is to be paid, and the means by which it is to be reduced to a minimum, are unworthy of the American people, and will not receive their sanction.

Our soldiers fought and endured as none others ever did in the history of the world, and all caviling and equivocating and quibbling in order to avoid or postpone the redemption of promises made to them in the hour when their services were necessary to the preservation of our Government is as dishonest a form of repudiation as it would be to ignore our bonds in the markets of the world. The debt we owe our brave and heroic soldiers is, if possible, more sacred than any other, and should be paid them with the same promptness and alacrity as the interest is to the holders of our bonds.

River and Harbor Improvements.

SPEECH OF HON. J. H. ACKLEN,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 15, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriation for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. ACKLEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The present river and harbor bill I regard as one of the most equitable ever brought before this House for its consideration. As a member of the Committee on Commerce, I can bear testimony to the time and labor spent in its preparation. It is true that it appropriates a large sum of money, but the magnitude of the many works and their importance to the commercial interests of this country fully warrant such an expenditure, and the criticisms that certain members have unwisely made upon this measure are totally unwarranted in point of fact. The bill provides for an appropriation of $10,149,800. The amount contained in the river and harbor bill reported by our committee to this House at the last session of Congress was $8,206,500, and the total amount contained in the bill as approved June 14, 1880, was $8,951,500. This present bill contains in the aggregate a sum of $1,625,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, including an appropriation of $150,000 for establishing a system of reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi. Therefore, the bill which has now been reported, independently of the above-mentioned sum, is only $218,300 more than was in the river and harbor bill reported by this committee last year, and is $451,700 less than was appropriated by act of June 14, 1880, for rivers and harbors.

I desire to say to the House that this bill has been made up on estimates from the War Department, which aggregate in round numbers twenty-six million dollars, and it can well be seen how difficult was the task imposed upon our committee in reducing this large sum to the amount presented in this bill, and retaining at the same time as equitable a distribution among the different States as has been done. The Committee on Commerce were deeply impressed with the importance and necessity of inaugurating some general plan for the improvement of the Mississippi River, and though many difficulties had been presented in this matter, yet they have been substantially removed by the acquiescence of the Mississippi River commission in a plan covering the whole subject, which has been concurred in by the War Department; and the Committee on Commerce, having in view the general interests of the country, have not felt that they could longer postpone the inauguration of this great work.

The reports of the engineers, which have been the basis for the formation of this bill, convey the gratifying intelligence that the moneys already expended for the improvement of rivers and harbors have tended greatly to facilitate the commercial interests of this country.

A question has been raised as to whether the democrats of this House could, in view of the past policy and doctrines of that party, justly support this measure. I answer, without any qualification, yes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has chosen to quote an extract from the veto message of President Polk of August 3, 1846, as outlining the doctrine and policy of the party in regard to such measures. He assumes that the precedents and doctrines of the party in the past are against the enactment of such legislation. Such an assumption is not warranted by the facts. I admit that the opposition to this line of legislation did exist; but point to me any great measure of public importance that has not found bitter opponents. The meritorious measures enacted through the influence of Sir Robert Peel, namely, the repeal of the then existing corn laws in England, and other measures looking to the welfare of the English people at large, met, as history has well shown, with the bitterest opposition that the Parliament of England ever witnessed.

The first appropriation for rivers and harbors we find as early as April 27, 1816, and the next on March 3, 1823. Both of these measures were approved respectively by Presidents Madison and Monroe, and the latter also approved the measure of May 26, 1824. John Quincy Adams approved four river and harbor bills, the first on May 20, 1826, and one other each year thereafter during his term of office. When Jackson was President he approved annually a river and harbor bill passed during his eight years of administration. Mr. Van Buren approved the river and harbor bill of 1838, and I might go further and quote the views of President Tyler, did the occasion require.

Mr. Speaker, it would not matter in the least to me whether a river and harbor bill had ever before met with democratic sanction. I believe the rivers and harbors of this great country need the assistance of the General Government to enable them to float our constantly increasing commerce, and I would therefore earnestly support this measure irrespective of past precedents and party doctrine. Party doctrine is but the embodied expression of popular thought; and the people of this country to-day, keeping mental pace with our growing prosperity, demand that the facilities for commerce shall be furthered and not restricted by the National Government. That this great system of public improvements should be left to the States is an argument which, I regret to say, has been used upon this floor. How narrow-minded a view is this to take of so important a subject, how unwise in view of the importance of rendering facilities to our great commerce is the position that the burden of these improvements should be thrown exclusively on the States, and not borne by the National Government. The navigable waters of this country belong to and are under the control of the United States.

On this subject the opinion of Mr. Justice Field in the case of the Daniel Ball is considered conclusive. He said:

> The doctrine of the common law as to the navigability of waters has no application in this country. Here the ebb and flow of the tide do not constitute the usual test, as in England, or any test at all of the navigability of waters. There no waters are navigable in fact, or at least to any considerable extent, which are not subject to the tide, and from this circumstance tide-water and navigable water there signify substantially the same thing. But in this country the case is widely different. Some of our rivers are as navigable for many hundreds of miles above as they are below the limits of tide-water, and some of them are navigable for great distances by large vessels, which are not even affected by the tide at any point during their entire length. A different test must therefore be applied to determine the navigability of our rivers, and that is found in their navigable capacity. Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used in their ordinary condition, as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water. And they constitute navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress, in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the States, when they form in their ordinary condition, by themselves, or by uniting with other waters, a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water.

The commerce clause of the Constitution is broad, and he who would destroy its spirit by restrictive construction to the letter does not deserve and will not receive the confidence of the people of this country. The arguments heretofore used, that a measure of this importance should not be passed under a suspension of the rules, thus cutting off debate, has been fully answered. The bill is now in Committee of the Whole subject to debate and amendment, and where every measure can stand or fall according to its merits. To those insinuations that the committee have not justly distributed this money among the States, I shall not deign to reply. Such remarks are as uncharitable as they are unjust, and if the members of this House would but consider that the Commerce Committee is composed of fifteen members from as many States, and selected with a view to the commercial needs of the country, they can readily see why these fifteen States have a larger proportion of the money appropriated in this bill than others. If any appropriation be discovered in this bill which should not have been made, then let it be stricken out; but if such there be, and I know of none, the fault is not chargeable to the committee, for they have not set up their judgment in such matters against the matured experience of the Chief of Engineers and his corps of able assistants. They have followed without hesitation the recommendations of the Department, and in so doing believed that they were serving the public interests.

I desire now, Mr. Speaker, to touch upon the point of order raised under clause 3 of Rule XXI of this House, which embraces the point as to whether the river and harbor bill is a general appropriation bill, and if so, do not appropriations made for new works and contained therein come under this point of order as not being made in accordance with existing law? This clause reads as follows:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

I submit that the river and harbor bill is not a general appropriation bill in the proper sense of the term. Properly speaking, it is a law unto itself, and the improvements for which appropriations are made are not in accordance with any previously existing law, each bill as a law unto itself determining the question of the continuation or discontinuation of these existing works. But the question as to whether the bill is a general appropriation bill is definitely settled by the rules. Clause 46 of Rule XI is as follows:

> The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, namely: The Committee on Elections, on the right of a member to his seat; the Committee on Ways and Means, on bills raising revenue; the Committee on Appropriations, the general appropriation bills; the Committee on Enrolled Bills, enrolled bills, &c.

Thus it will be observed that the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations is confined to the reporting of the general appropriation bills, and from clause 7 of this same rule it will be observed that—

> The Committee on Commerce shall have the same privileges in reporting bills, making appropriations for the rivers and harbors, as is accorded to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills.

And, further, we again notice the distinction drawn between general appropiation bills and river and harbor bills in clause 6 of Rule XXI, which reads as follows:

> Upon all general appropriation and revenue bills and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the yeas and nays shall be taken on the passage of such bills in the House and entered upon the Journal.

The word "general' as applied to appropriation bills does not mean including many subjects, nor does it necessarily mean the appropriation of large sums of money; but it does mean that class of appropriations upon which the movements of the Government absolutely depend; that class of appropriations which are necessary for carrying on the powers which are given to the several departments of the Government. Special legislation should not be placed upon general appropriation bills, but this bill is in the nature of special legislation for each of its definite objects, and yet general in so far as the interests of the country at large are concerned.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has chosen to mention me by name as having obtained too large a proportion of the money contained in this bill for my own State. I consider this rather more as a compliment than otherwise. If I have been zealous on behalf of my State, it is because heretofore her interests have been neglected and her streams unappropriated for. He has furnished the RECORD with the following list of appropriations for Louisiana:

LOUISIANA.

New Orleans	$75,000
Amite	5,000
Courtableau	7,500
Bayou Teche	20,000
Terre Bonne	8,800
Red River	10,000
Tangipahoa	2,000
Vermillion	4,900
Calcasieu	12,000
Calcasieu	3,000
Bartholomew	8,000
Tensas	3,000
Boeuf	5,000
Tchefuncta	1,500
Tickfaw	2,000
Bayou Teche	25,000
Bayou La Fourche	500
Total	193,200

I am glad to say that even this list does not contain all that Louisiana has justly received. There is an appropriation of $50,000 for the Mississippi River at Vidalia. The Ouachita has not been forgotten, and I trust that an appropriation for Bayou Black will yet be inserted before this bill shall become a law. It certainly would have been, because the work is meritorious, had the report from the Engineer Department not unfortunately been delayed.

If I have devoted myself for the last month in impressing the Commerce Committee with the importance and necessity of granting a large sum for the Mississippi River, surely this is no ground for criticism. I believe that the interests of this country demand that this work should no longer be delayed, and the following, cut from the New Orleans Democrat, shows that at least among my colleagues my efforts are not unappreciated:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1881.

To the Editor of the New Orleans Democrat:

The Committee on Commerce have appropriated $1,000,000 for the Lower Mississippi River. This insures the permanent improvement of the river according to the plan and under the supervision of the commission. Mr. ACKLEN, of the Commerce Committee, deserves the thanks of our people for his efforts in passing this appropriation through the committee.

E. W. ROBERTSON,
Chairman Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River.

But since the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] has attacked some of these appropriations, I will briefly set forth the facts contained in the reports from the Engineer Department of those in my own district.

COURTABLEAU.

Survey and examination of this stream was provided for in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1879. The full report is found in Executive Document No. 54, Forty-sixth Congress, second session. The object of the improvement is to secure a navigable channel at all seasons of the year from Washington to the mouth of the stream where it debouches into the Atchafalaya. A glance at the topography of this section of the State makes manifest the importance of this improvement. Rich and fertile as the lands are, the facilities of commerce are poor, and during a long period of the year the bars near the mouth of this stream render navigation impossible. The amount of money necessary for the completion of this work is small compared to its importance and its necessity for the facilitation of commerce. The appropriation is strongly recommended by the Department.

BAYOU TECHE.

Survey and examination of Bayou Teche was provided for in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1879. The work contemplated is to secure slackwater navigation from New Iberia to Port Barre, where this stream joins the Courtableau. The full report is found in Executive Document No. 54, Forty-sixth Congress, second session. Six thousand dollars was appropriated for this stream in the last river and harbor bill, and $20,000 in addition have been recommended in the present bill. The entire cost of this work is estimated at $58,190. Needle dams and locks must be constructed in order to secure navigation at all seasons of the year, and dredging will have to be extensively done between Saint Martinsville and Port Barre before the needed facilities for commerce can be furnished. The Bayou Teche, though not the largest, is yet one of the most important streams in the State. Its commerce is very great. The entire supplies of a large portion of this section of the State are received by this route. Food, fencing, and materials for building, as well as ordinary plantation supplies, are brought up the stream; while the exports are sugar, cotton, cattle, and many other products, which are shipped chiefly to New Orleans. This section of the State, in proportion to its area, produces more sugar than any other portion; and with increased facilities for production, with cheaper freights, and with facilities for shipment all times of the year, the sugar production of the Attakapas country bids fair to be greater than all the rest of the State combined.

TERREBONNE.

Examination and survey of this stream provided for in act of Congress approved March 3, 1879. Report will be found in Executive Document No. 54, Forty-sixth Congress, second session. Ten thousand dollars were appropriated in the last river and harbor bill, and $8,800 are recommended in the present bill. The object of this improvement is to secure navigation in Bayou Terrebonne at all seasons of the year. The entire amount needed for the completion of this work, according to the estimate of the Engineer Department, is $18,800, and the work consists in dredging the bayou and clearing it from fallen trees and stumps. The Bayou Terrebonne, in connection with the canal now being cut by a private corporation, and the Bayou Black can be made to furnish an inland line of navigation from New Orleans to Morgan City, and perhaps there is no improvement in the State more demanded by the local interests of Terrebonne and the adjacent parishes than the establishment at the earliest possible date of this inland line of navigation, inasmuch as the charges of the present railroad company have been onerous in the extreme.

VERMILLION.

Examination and survey of this stream provided for in the act approved March 3, 1879. The entire amount recommended was $9,900, of which $5,000 were appropriated for in the last river and harbor bill and $4,900 recommended in the present bill. The objects of the improvement are to secure uninterrupted navigation at all seasons of the year from Pin Hook Bridge, just above the town of Vermillionville, to where the bayou debouches into the bay. This improvement is important inasmuch as the facilities for transporting the productions of these and adjacent parishes have been poor in the extreme. It is perhaps needless to say that the improvement is strongly recommended by the Department.

CALCASIEU PASS.

The reports of the Chief of Engineers for 1871, 1873, and 1874 give full information in reference to the importance of this improvement. The channel which was dredged out under former appropriations has been almost completely obliterated by storms, and it is very desirable that the channel should be reopened at the earliest possible date. In the report of the Engineer (Executive Document No. 46, Forty-sixth Congress, third session) the estimate for dredging the pass is $15,000, and the amount recommended in this bill is $12,000. This is the outlet for an extensive commerce, consisting principally of lumber and supplies. The deputy collector at Calcasieu Pass has furnished the following as the crew and tonnage entering this port during six months of 1879: crew, 485; tonnage, 10,682.

CALCASIEU RIVER.

Examination and survey of this stream was provided for by act of Congress approved June 14, 1880. The work contemplates the removal of existing bars in the stream by dredging, and also the removal of snags, stumps, and fallen trees. The entire estimate is $10,080 for the improvement of Calcasieu River from Philip Bluff to its mouth, of which some three thousand dollars is appropriated in the present bill. The commerce to be benefited consists of several thousand bales of cotton which now take the overland route to the railroad. Many thousand saw-logs are annually floated down to seven saw-mills located near the mouth of the river. The greater proportion of this lumber is shipped to Texas.

CHARENTON CANAL.

Survey for this work was provided for by joint resolution approved June 28, 1879. The work contemplates the connection of the Bayou Teche with Grand Lake, near the town of Charenton, by a canal which in length will not exceed one mile. The entire cost of this work, according to the plans and estimates of the Engineer Department, will be $73,000. The present bill provides for an appropriation of $25,000 to commence this improvement. There is perhaps no public work in Louisiana costing so small a sum which will be so fruitful in good results as the completion of the Charenton Canal. As heretofore stated, the Attakapas country is the richest section of the State, and by the construction of this canal an almost direct water communication with New Orleans is established for the upper portion of the Teche country. Difficulties are constantly being encountered in the lower portion of Grand Lake, known as Flat Lake, during extreme low tide on account of the extensive mud flats which are there found. This work has not only received the approval of the Commerce Committee, but likewise the unanimous approval of the Committee on Railways and Canals.

BAYOU LA FOURCHE.

The appropriations heretofore made for Bayou La Fourche have been in the aggregate $25,000. This money has been used for dredging and removing stumps and snags. No appropriation is this year demanded by the Department, inasmuch as $13,500 of the last appropriation is still on hand, which will be used in continuing the work. Five hundred dollars, however, of this amount, as provided for in the present bill, will be used for removing a brick pier situated in the Bayou near Donaldsonville, which offers during low tide serious obstruction to the passage of steamboats, and which has, further, tended much to the filling of the bayou at this point. The reports on Bayou La Fourche are lengthy, and contain much information as to the productiveness of that section of the State through which it passes. It is the artery of commerce for the parishes of Ascension, Assumption, La Fourche, and likewise greatly facilitates the removal of the products of a part of the parish of Terre Bonne. As an estuary of the Mississippi it commences at Donaldsonville and empties its waters into the Gulf. The main difficulties found in the way of a permanent improvement of this stream are that the Mississippi River during each high water has a tendency to fill up with sand that portion of the bayou which has been dredged out, thus in one season of high water obliterating the work done during low water. It has been urged that Bayou La Fourche should be closed, but to such a plan of improvement I am earnestly opposed.

BAYOU BLACK.

Survey and examination of this stream were provided for in act approved June 14, 1880. The report of the engineers shows $27,080 is the aggregate amount required for the completion of the work, which is dredging and removal of stumps and snags. As an evidence of the importance of this work, I cannot do better than quote the following from the report of the local engineer:

The importance to commerce of dredging and cleaning out this outlet to the sea is incalculable. It would open out a channel from New Orleans to the Atchafalaya, and passes through one of the richest and most productive portions of the whole alluvial region. The deepening of this outlet would, to a considerable extent, furnish safety from overflow. It is a section of the Old Barataria Canal now in disuse, and forms the connecting link between that canal and Bayou Teche, thus giving uninterrupted interior water navigation, cheap freights, and security against sea-storms.

The general plan of improvement I have contemplated in the foregoing works is securing an inland water navigation from New Orleans to Morgan City, by way of Bayous Terrebonne and Black and the canal now in process of construction; the opening up of the Teche by slackwater navigation, so as to secure communication at all seasons of the year from the Attakapas country to New Orleans by way of Bayou Courtableau and the Atchafalaya; the opening of the Vermillion River into the Bayou Teche, near Arnaudville, through Bayou Fusilier; and the completion of a direct water communication for the Lower Teche with New Orleans by way of Charenton Canal and Bayou Plaquemine to the Mississippi River, at which point locks are to supersede the present dike, so that no obstruction to navigation would be offered. This is a short summary of the improvements I have contemplated and inaugurated for this section of Louisiana.

I now approach, Mr. Speaker, that portion of the bill making an appropriation of one million for the Mississippi River. It is manifest, from the expressions heard on both sides of this House, that fears are entertained by many members that this is not strictly an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of that river, but rather an appropriation for purposes of rebuilding the levees in the lower Mississippi Valley. While in my opinion it would be manifestly just for the Government of the United States to repair the levees on the Lower Mississippi, yet, in so far as this appropriation is concerned, no such idea is entertained; and, in view of that fact, to quiet all apprehensions, the immediate friends of this measure have decided to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] which reads as follows:

Provided, That no portion of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used in the repair or construction of levees for the purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow or for any other purpose whatever, except as a means of deepening or improving the channel of said river. And it shall be the duty of said commission to make report on or before the 1st day of January next to the Secretary of War, for transmission by him to Congress, of a detailed statement of the work done, and of the expenditure made from the sum hereby appropriated, with their judgment upon the effect of such work and the general practicability, and estimates of the total cost of such improvements along such river from Cairo to the head of the passes.

While I do not think that such an amendment was necessary, yet we have concluded to accept it in the same spirit of good faith in which we are assured it was offered. That the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, and not the reclamation of the alluvial lands is contemplated by the Mississippi River commission, is made manifest from an examination of their report and of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1879, which constituted the Mississippi River commission. Section 4 of that act reads as follows:

It shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel and protect the banks of the Mississippi River; improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof; prevent destructive floods; promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service; and when so prepared and matured, to submit to the Secretary of War a full and detailed report of their proceedings and actions, and of such plans, with estimates of the cost thereof, for the purposes aforesaid, to be by him transmitted to Congress: Provided, That the commission shall report in full upon the practicability, feasibility, and probable cost of the various plans known as the jetty system, the levee system, and the outlet system, as well as upon such others as they deem necessary.

What then was the work assigned to the commission?

First. To direct and complete such surveys of the Mississippi River between the head of the passes, near its mouth and its headwaters, as were then in progress; and to make such additional surveys and examinations of said river and its tributaries as might by it be deemed necessary.

Second. To take into consideration and mature such plan or plans as will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel, and protect the banks of the Mississippi River; improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof; prevent destructive floods and promote and facilitate commerce and the postal service; and with such plans to prepare and submit estimates of the cost of executing the work.

Third. To report specifically upon the practicability, feasibility, and probable cost of the plans known as the jetty system, the levee system, and the outlet system.

The outlet system they examine and condemn. The commission say:

It has been supposed by many persons that, because the immediate effect of a crevasse during a flood is the reduction of the height of the river's surface in the vicinity of the crevasse and below it, lateral outlets, either natural or artificial, by which the flood-waters of the river are drawn off and conveyed through a shorter route to the sea, tend to prevent the recurrence of destructive floods, by supplying additional avenues for their escape. This method would undoubtedly be effective if the flood-waters of the Mississippi were not highly charged with sedimentary matters, which are held in suspension in the water by the current. To support this immense mass of earth and sand in suspension, and thus insure its transportation to the Gulf, the velocity of the current must be sustained. Without stopping to determine, or even discuss, the character of the relation which exists between the various velocities of current and the proportionate quantities of sediment which such velocities are capable of carrying in suspension, the fact seems to be established that when the current is checked in its natural flow during floods, a deposit of sediment will occur. Shoals are found in the river immediately below crevasses, which it is difficult to refer to any other cause than the loss of current-velocity which takes place below the crevasse. As a portion of the volume of the river is drawn off by the crevasse when it is first made, it is impossible that the current below the crevasse can then be as rapid as it was before its occurrence. Being less rapid, it is unable to sustain the whole quantity of matter held in suspension by the more rapid current above the outlet, and consequently its surplus sediment falls to the bottom below the crevasse. This deposition continues until the size of the river below the crevasse has been so reduced by the shoaling that the current is again restored through the short distance in which the bottom of the river has been thus raised and the channel diminished. If the crevasse remained open, however, for several years, it is evident that the shoal will continue to extend down the stream, for the reduced velocity will still exist in the river below the shoal. If the crevasse be kept open indefinitely, the shoaling will continue to extend down the stream until certain other injurious effects are produced, which will be presently referred to.

In the case of a crevasse an island is also formed, having the main body of the river on the one side of it, and the crevasse channel on the other side. As the volume flowing in the main channel below a crevasse has been decreased by the amount drawn off through it, a steeper slope in the main river, if the crevasse be kept permantly open, becomes inevitable; because the shoal below the outlet, as it grows in length down stream from the deposition of successive floods, gradually increases the frictional resistance of the volume flowing through that diminished channel, and this tends to check the current of the river above the crevasse, and thus the shoaling of the river bed and the raising of the flood line above the site of the outlet ensue as a secondary and permament effect.

It is in this way that silt-bearing streams flowing through alluvial deposits have the ability to increase or steepen their surface slopes, and thus recover the velocity of their currents and adjust them to the work of transporting the sedimentary matter with which the flood-waters are charged so that this matter may be carried without loss or gain. In proof of the correctness of these views, and of their full accordance with well-established hydraulic laws, we have the evidence of this relation between slope and volume presented in the phenomena of silt-bearing streams all over the world. Wherever such streams flow through alluvial deposits, other conditions being the same, the slope is least where the volume is greatest; and, conversely, the slope is found to be invariably increased as the volume is diminished. The Mississippi throughout its alluvial basin, not only in its main trunk but in all of its outlets, presents no exception to this peculiar feature.

And, in conclusion—

The outlet system which, being one of diffusion and waste, and not of concentration, does not commend itself to the judgment of the commission.

The levee system the commission treat solely with reference to its effect upon the navigation of the river. They say:

Levees have never been erected upon the banks of the Mississippi River except for the special purpose of protecting the alluvial lands from overflow. They have therefore always had sole reference to the high-water stage, and the degree to which levees might prudently be relied upon "to improve and give safety to navigation," "promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service," has not hitherto entered into the question of the construction and maintenance of a levee system.

There is no doubt that the levees exert a direct action in deepening the channel and enlarging the bed of the river during those periods of "rise" or "flood" when by preventing the dispersion of the flood-waters over the adjacent lowlands, either over the river banks or through bayous and other openings, they actually cause the water to rise to a higher level within the river-bed than it would attain if not thus restrained.

While it is not claimed that levees in themselves are necessary as a means of securing ultimately a deep channel for navigation, it is believed that the repair and maintenance of the extensive lines already existing will hasten the work of channel improvement through the increased scour and depth of river-bed which they would produce during the high-river stages. They are regarded as a desirable, though not a necessary, adjunct in the general system of improvement submitted.

It is obvious that levees are, upon a large portion of the river, essential to prevent destruction to life and property by overflow. They give safety and ease to navigation and promote and facilitate commerce and trade by establishing banks or landing places above the reach of floods, upon which produce can be placed while awaiting shipment, and where steamboats and other river craft can land in times of high water.

In a restricted sense, as auxiliary to a plan of channel improvement only, the construction and maintenance of a levee system is not demanded. But in a larger sense, as embracing not only beneficial effects upon the channel, but as a protection against destructive floods, a levee system is essential; and such system also promotes and facilitates commerce, trade, and the postal service.

A levee system aids and facilitates the postal service by protecting from injury and destruction by freshets and floods the various common roads and railways upon which that service is conducted to and from the river bank, and generally within that portion of the alluvial region subject to overflow. Moreover, the permanent maintenance below Cairo of a connected levee system, a system of sufficient strength to inspire confidence in its efficiency, or the demonstration, by the achieved results of an improved river, that overflow need no longer be seriously apprehended, would act as a prompt and powerful stimulant in rapidly developing a largely increased trade and commerce in all the products of agricultural industry indigenous to that region, and in those branches of manufacturing enterprise related thereto.

The foregoing is submitted as the opinions of this commission, with regard to the attributes and functions of levees, and their general utility and value.

Further examination of their report shows that the work to be done, therefore, is to scour out and maintain a channel through the shoals and bars existing in those portions of the river where the width is excessive, and to build up new banks and develop new shore-lines, so as to establish as far as practicable the requisite conditions of uniform velocity for all stages of the river.

The practicable applications of the principle upon which this improvement is to be made is found in many rivers of the world, and as applied to the Mississippi on a larger scale it must and will be successful. Mr. Speaker, Congress can hesitate no longer to inaugurate this national work. For years the people of the valley have waited expectant upon the General Government for relief. Cheap transportation is the crying need of the hour; it is with the West and the South the vital, paramount, and all-absorbing question. A great and unobstructed channel for commerce to the Gulf will tend to more relief from the exactions of railroad monopoly than any legislation of a restrictive character Congress can enact.

The price of transportation regulates the price of food. The great granaries of the West should be thrown open to the South and the world through the Mississippi, and not unnaturally forced to Atlantic sea-ports by railroad monopoly. The West by the Mississippi River can supply the South with food at reasonable rates, and with a fair profit to producers, which is now being swallowed up by the extortions of rail rates to the East. Over two hundred million dollars in gold are annually pouring into this country from Europe to purchase our cereals. Where do they come from? The West. Where do they go for shipment? To the East. The natural outlet is the mouth of the Mississippi, now capable of floating the largest foreign vessels. Water transportation for bulky articles, as every member of this House well knows, has always and must ever remain cheaper than that by rail.

The people of the valley can wait no longer. They are fast realizing the truth of the words of Daniel Webster: "Ere long the strength of America will be in the valley of the Mississippi." The "father of waters," as the Mississippi has been most justly termed, sweeps far beyond local preference or prejudice. It is the greatest treasure of the nation. With 15,000 miles of navigable waters in its tributaries, the Mississippi offers highways of commerce from the Alleghany to the Rocky Mountains.

Sir, the time is come, the hour is ripe for action, and we must either take a step forward or backward. We can hesitate no longer slipshod in the path of so clearly defined a duty. In our political firmament we see the star of empire moving westward, while the southern cross, like the aurora of the arctics, is shining resplendent with new financial and political power. Grand as our future is destined to be, the Mississippi must ever remain the great artery of our commercial life and bear upon the broad bosom of its waters the food for millions to the blue waves of the Gulf.

Rivers and Harbors.

REMARKS OF HON. JOHN E. KENNA,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 15, 1881.

The House being in Committee of the Whole and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes—

Mr. KENNA said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I regret that in the course of my four years' experience here I have never discovered the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in an attitude to illustrate his opposition to the river and harbor bill outside of the State of West Virginia. Precisely what motive fires the gentleman's strife I am unable to say. The Elk River, which is the subject of his last attack, is a beautiful and valuable stream. It is the outlet to an important and extensive region of country, blessed with a population active and vigorous, and abounding in the finest varieties of timber and coal in quantities which will last forever. The money heretofore expended on the river has been productive of good results, and I hope to secure such further appropriations as will suffice to give the best possible development to its navigation. The gentleman is mistaken in his idea that the only effect of this expenditure is to advance and promote the interest of private corporations. It is true that there is what the engineers call a "miserable lock and dam near Charleston which should be removed as a nuisance and obstruction to navigation."

And while that is undergoing the process of destruction by time and flood its owners will probably continue to collect tolls under their charter if they can, whether the river is improved or not. But I fail to see wherein that company can be immediately benefited by increased facilities for navigation by boats and rafts on the upper river. If I had my way I would give the right to collect tolls on a stream in anywise navigable to no corporation or person on earth. I would lay no such tax on the commerce of the country. But we are to deal with facts as they are, and I repeat that the advantage to be realized by corporate interests is trivial compared with the great good to result to the public from this improvement. In so far as the Boom Company is concerned, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] ought to know that instead of increasing the payment of tribute to it, the improvement of the river will have a tendency to limit that necessity. He ought to know that the very charter from which he has read contains a proviso:

That said booms be so constructed as to admit the safe passage of rafts and boats and not prevent the navigation of said river or tributaries.

He ought to know that insufficient facilities for navigation in the upper river enlarge the necessity for running loose logs and thereby promote the financial interests of the boom into which loose logs must go, and he ought to know further that the improvement of the river enables shippers of timber to raft it in larger quantities and run it safely without availing themselves of this private improvement, thus diminishing rather than increasing the receipts of these corporations from the commerce of the river. While I am on this subject I desire to make some reference to the observations of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] in regard to dams on this stream. For a distance of eighty miles or more from its mouth there is no mill-dam across Elk. The mills are supported by wing-dams, which do not cross the river but are run diagonally a short distance out and above the mills to divert a sufficient quantity of water to supply them. They are, however, so located, as the engineers state, that in some instances and at certain stages of water they interfere with the safety of navigation, and their modification is recommended. Elk is a glorious stream, boundless in the resources that enrich its valleys and mountains, and I shall not yield without a struggle an appropriation to improve it.

Mr. Chairman, I know the House will spend considerable time in the consideration of this bill, and I would rather facilitate its action than allow time occupied by me to retard its progress. For that reason I have paid little attention to the numberless and frivolous attacks made on this floor upon West Virginia rivers. The Guyandotte, Big Sandy, New, Monongahela, Little Kanawha, and Shenandoah, as well as the Elk and Great Kanawha, have come in "jointly and severally" for their share of abuse. I have contented myself with such brief response as I thought sufficient to protect their status in this bill. The result has vindicated the propriety of that course. But now comes a vigorous and fresh attack on the Great Kanawha, and I think it is due to my constituents as well as to myself that I should once more place its great merit squarely before this House. I will support every fact I assert by the records of the War Department itself. In the first place, by reference to the Engineer's report, first session forty-fourth Congress, page 94, you will find that the plan for the improvement of the Great Kanawha was recommended by a board of able engineers, of which General H. G. Wright, now Chief Engineer of the United States, was at the head. His associates were Major William P. Craighill, who is now in charge of the works, and Major O. M. Poe. In another report of the Engineer, (first session Forty-third Congress, page 508,) the following statement, to which I invite the attention of the House, is made:

The special reason for improving the Great Kanawha is, that great bodies of fine coal lands lie on its upper waters, and that the people of all the States below demand it for their comfort and their manufacturing prosperity.

In the next place, as shown by the Engineer's reports of last year, notwithstanding the remarks of my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who is always to be understood as talking in a Pickwickian sense when he speaks of the Great Kanawha or anything else pertaining to West Virginia, this beautiful stream has "always an abundance of water if properly utilized." I quote from the current Engineer's report, volume 1, page 681. And now a word with reference to the resources of this splendid region. Its salt is known and valued everywhere. Its timber in variety and quality is unsurpassed on earth. Its iron, though not fairly developed, is declared to be of excellent kind and large in deposit. Its coal is exhaustless as the air. The coal area of Pennsylvania, wonderful as it is, is not as large as that of West Virginia by 3,300 square miles! I give the comparative area in square miles of seven leading States, as found in the Engineer's report, second session Forty-fifth Congress, volume 3, page 306:

West Virginia	16,000
Pennsylvania	12,700
Ohio	10,000
Eastern Kentucky	8,900
Alabama	5,000
Tennessee	5,100
Maryland	550
Total	58,250

This boundary of coal deposits is marvelous. It is not surpassed to my knowledge on earth, and yet its depth is as much a subject of wonder. I quote now from the same report and the authorities therein copied, page 312:

In no other part of the Appalachian coal-field are the lower coal measures developed to such an extent, contain a greater number of workable seams or more varieties of coals, or better or purer fuel. After leaving Hawk's Nest the next important disclosure has been made by the Cannelton Company nine miles below the Kanawha Falls. A partial section of the hill shows seven seams above the water level, as follows:

	Feet.
No. 1 in thickness	4
No. 2 in thickness	7
No. 3 in thickness	3½
No. 4 in thickness	4
No. 5 in thickness	5
No. 6 in thickness	7
No. 7 in thickness	8
Total thickness	38½

A synopsis of sections of the lower coal measures on the Kanawha and New Rivers is furnished on page 313. It is as follows:

Locality.	Nature of section.	Number of seams over three feet thick.	Aggregate thickness of seams including partings.
			Ft. In.
Hawk's Nest	Partial	6	41 2
Cannelton	Partly above water level	7	38 6
Paint Creek	Completely above water level	8	38 10
Opposite Coalburgh	Completely above water level	9	41 3

The volume to which I have referred is replete with information extracted from a work by Professors Maury and Fountain, entitled "Resources of West Virginia." I commend it to gentlemen who have failed to find in the Engineer's reports information satisfactory to themselves concerning the resources of these sections of country whose navigable waters the Government is improving. No region has advanced more rapidly in the last decade than the Kanawha and New River Valleys. Enterprises of magnitude have sprung into life all along the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway, and that great trunk-line, to my own knowledge, has over and over again been unable with all its rolling-stock to supply the demand for cars to carry their product to the seaboard. Twenty-nine coal mines are in full operation on the Kanawha alone, and their shipments by rail east and by water westward form an important factor in the make-up of the commerce of this great country. It is a fact familiar to many on this floor that low water in the Upper Ohio in summer and ice in winter have seriously interfered at those seasons with the navigation of that magnificent stream. More than once that condition of affairs has cut off the Pennsylvania supply and precipitated coal panics from Wheeling to New Orleans.

This winter, Mr. Chairman, when the Ohio above the mouth of the Kanawha was blockaded by ice, but for the shipments by this much maligned Kanawha River there would have been a recurrence of these panics, and apart from the fabulous prices the insufficient supply of coal would have commanded, suffering and hardship would have resulted without limit. This improvement is in no sense local. The benefits to be produced are as broad and as long as the valleys of the Ohio and the Mississippi. Cheap fuel is essential to personal comfort and to manufacturing prosperity. This Kanawha improvement once completed, thus enabling the Kanawha coals to reach the Ohio at all convenient stages of its navigation, and the Ohio and Lower Mississippi Valleys will be in full command at all seasons of the year of a bountiful supply of the cheapest and the best fuel in the world.

River and Harbor Improvements.

SPEECH OF HON. THOMAS RYAN,

OF KANSAS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 15, 1881.

The producers of the country have no security against extortion in the competition of lines of rail with each other. It is the great water lines alone that afford certain and healthful competition, that compel the railway to deal with the producer in a spirit of at least comparative justice.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriation for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the Clerk read the following:

Improving Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas Rivers: Removing snags, wrecks, and other obstructions, $150,000; of which sum $80,000 shall be expended on the Mississippi River, $45,000 on the Missouri River, and $25,000 on the Arkansas River.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out all after the words "and other obstructions" and inserting that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Three hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars, to be expended as follows: $100,000 for building one iron-hulled snag-boat; $50,000 for repairing one wooden snag-boat and fitting it up for working purposes; for working expenses on Mississippi River, $90,000; for working expenses on Missouri River, $75,000; and for working expenses on the Arkansas River, $50,000.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I have drawn this amendment in accordance with the report of the Chief of Engineers. The expenditure is for the removal of snags, wrecks, and other obstructions from the Missouri, the Mississippi, and the Arkansas Rivers. At least two of these streams, the Missouri and the Mississippi, are the greatest commercial water-ways of this country. Yet the Committee on Commerce seems to have treated them precisely as it treated the smaller water-ways provided for in this bill.

So far as the estimates of the engineers are concerned, the committee seems to have done with the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers precisely what it has done with the smaller streams; that is, struck a percentage. It seems to me that if any one will carefully go over this bill he will find that the Committee on Commerce has allowed about 33⅓ or 40 per cent. of what has been asked for by the Chief of Engineers for the improvement of water-ways. Whatever may be said of that plan, it certainly ought not to be applied to the two great navigable streams of the country. If it be necessary, as is reported by the Chief of Engineers, to expend the sum of $355,000 to keep these three great channels of commerce open, there ought not to be any hesitation in putting such an appropriation in a river and harbor bill that calls for the expenditure of over ten million dollars.

The Engineer states that $155,000 is necessary to provide the machinery to prosecute this work on the Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas Rivers. He further tells us that $200,000 more is needed for working expenses. How does the Committee on Commerce respond to that? Why, by allowing $150,000 only for working expenses and nothing whatever for machinery. As well might you expect a machinist to construct a locomotive without the necessary mechanical instruments as to expect the engineers of this country to open these water-ways, to remove these snags and other obstructions without the necessary appliances.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there ought to be no hesitation in voting the small sum asked for by the Engineer Department to keep these great water-ways open for commerce.

From what source do the Committee on Commerce and this body get the information upon which they act in perfecting this river and harbor bill? Is it not from the Engineer Corps of the Army? Is not that corps employed and paid for that purpose? Officers of the highest skill, removed beyond venal, selfish, or other improper influences by life commissions in the service, may we not without offense conclude that their judgment, enlightened as it is by the highest scientific attainments, formed after a careful survey, after a most thorough personal investigation, is safer for our guidance than the opposing judgment of the Committee on Commerce? I can understand the wisdom of the committee when with regard to the multitude of small streams whose navigability is problematical and all appropriations for their improvement are tentative they withhold altogether or in part the sum reported by the Engineer Corps to be necessary for the prosecution of work upon them.

But with respect to the great navigable streams, whose channels it is our duty to keep open and free to a nation's commerce, there can be but two questions, and those are, What is the work necessary to be done? and, What will it cost? For an intelligent answer to that we must look alone to the Engineer Corps. I have already stated that the Chief of Engineers says that $355,000 is needed to remove snags, wrecks, and other obstructions from the Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Arkansas Rivers. The Committee on Commerce tells us that $150,000 is enough for that purpose. How does the committee know that is enough? Has it any information to that effect from any reliable source? I think not. Is it not patent that the committee in this case has simply arbitrarily allowed less than half the sum needed, without special regard to the character of the work or its relation to the interests of commerce? Where is the committee's data upon which it has intelligently determined that, in this instance, the Engineer's judgment is a little over 50 per cent. erroneous?

Again, the Chief of Engineers tells us that $60,000 is needed the ensuing fiscal year to improve the Missouri River at Atchison, in my State. An examination of the Engineer's report discloses the importance of this work. But we are informed by the committee that in this case $20,000 is enough. In other words, the judgment of the Chief of Engineers is only 33 per cent. right. Pray how did the committee learn that fact?

To improve the river at Brownville, Nebraska, the Chief of Engineers tells us $51,000 is needed. The committee denies that, and says only $10,000 is needed. Upon what data does the committee repudiate four-fifths of the Engineer's judgment in this case?

At Cedar Point, Missouri, $45,000 is needed to improve this stream, says the Chief of Engineers. The committee tells us only $15,000 is needed. Will the committee explain to us the intelligence of its guess in this case?

At Council Bluffs, says the Engineer, $60,000 is needed to improve the river. The committee allows but $20,000. I am curious to learn just how the committee was informed that the Engineer erred 66 per cent. in this case.

The Engineer informs us that $27,000 ought to be expended on the river at Fort Leavenworth. The committee says only $8,000 is needed. I will proceed with details no further. The Chief of Engineers says that over nine hundred thousand dollars is needed for the improvement of this great water-way. The committee tells us that $300,000 is enough. I am apprehensive that it has no intelligent or reliable data to warrant the repudiation of the judgment of the Engineer Corps. I fear that the committee's action in this case is purely arbitrary. It looks very much as if the committee had determined upon a sort of general rule in framing this bill—that is, to allow about one-third of the Engineer's estimate, without regard to the nature of the work or the commercial importance of the improvement.

Look at the small streams in the bill. The same rule seems to have been applied to them. Some of them will never float a pound of commercial articles; others of them possibly may by the expenditure of very large sums of money. In regard to many of them the projected improvements are experimental, while the practice of voting sums wholly inadequate for any practical purpose for the improvement of such as might by intelligent treatment be made navigable, amounts to a criminal waste of the public funds. This bill is full of illustrations of this folly. Take the Arkansas River between Wichita and Fort Smith. Some of my people thought it could be made navigable. I asked Congress to provide for a survey. It did so. The Engineer reported in substance that the expenditure of $100,000 would make that portion of the river as good for navigation as that portion between Fort Smith and Little Rock. Thereupon the work of improvement was undertaken. Ten thousand is voted one year; fifteen thousand another year; and now twenty thousand in this bill. The Engineer asks for over fifty thousand. Twenty thousand, in my judgment, is wholly insufficient for any practical results. Fifty thousand may be, but I think it reasonably certain that less than that will in nowise promote the interests of commerce.

Let us in such cases appropriate an adequate sum or nothing. If we are restricted by the revenues, then let us appropriate for fewer of these doubtful streams. Above all let us be practical, and see to it, first, that ample appropriations are voted to the great national waters, and second, if our resources will permit, treat the doubtful streams in a practical manner. When the committee are asked why they do not appropriate the sums needed for such great commercial water-ways as the Mississippi, the Missouri and the Ohio, they reply the revenues will not admit of a greater expenditure than this river and harbor bill contemplates. But suppose they give to those streams what they now in this bill give to the eighteen or twenty creeks, from Otter Creek to Rock Creek, would not they better subserve the interest of commerce? Why drain the Treasury to improve the little creeks and unheard-of inlets, and ignore the great navigable waters of the country? Why give the little mountain streams of West Virginia nearly three hundred thousand dollars, and only forty thousand to remove obstructions from the channel of the great Missouri River, navigable 2,500 miles? This great river drains the resources of an empire. Dakota, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri are washed by her waters. Dakota is destined to rival the greatest of our agricultural States. Minnesota farms yield an annual production of $80,000,000. Iowa farms an annual production of over two hundred million dollars. Missouri farms very little less—about one hundred and seventy million dollars.

The annual product of Nebraska farms will exceed $60,000,000, and Kansas farms (and the State not one-sixth developed) rolls up an aggregate annual production of about one hundred million dollars. These States, some of them yet in their infancy, contribute over six hundred million dollars annually to the wealth of this country from farm products alone, not to mention their manufactures at all. There is not a pound of those products that would not instantly suffer depreciation in the hands of the producer if the Missouri River should be closed to commerce. Then, indeed, would the railway be a monopoly, and the producer its victim. Keep that river open, free and safe for navigation, and the rail must compete with its cheap transportation for all that vast commerce.

It is no answer to say that most of that commerce goes by rail anyhow. So it does, but it is because the railway rates sustain such a relation to the low rates of water transportation that, other things considered, the producer reaps an advantage by shipping over the rail. The producers of the country have no security against extortion in the competition of lines of rail with each other. Experience has demonstrated that fact. It is idle to hope for competition when combination is possible. It is the great water lines alone that afford certain and healthful competition, that compel the railway to deal with the producer in a spirit of at least comparative justice.

Sir, we have proceeded far enough in the consideration of this bill to satisfy me of a predetermination on the part of a decided majority of this body to vote down every amendment regardless of its merits.

The pending amendment will probably suffer the fate of all those that have preceded it. This bill practically ignores the great navigable waters, and lavishly, improvidently, and profligately expends the public funds upon unimportant creeks, mountain streams, and inlets, and unless it shall be materially amended I shall deem it my duty to vote against it.

Tariff—Changes must follow a Principle.

SPEECH OF HON. SAMUEL S. COX,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 7, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The humblest laborer has the right at the close of his day's work to employ his scanty wages in the purchase of a foreign product, without being compelled to pay a tax upon it for the benefit of another.—Bastiat.

Mr. COX said:

Mr. SPEAKER: All discussions relating to changes in the existing tariff run ultimately to the first dogma of the policy of protection. This must be so so long as the doctrine of protection remains as it is—a confused mass of contradictory assertions, which the believer supports with conflicting arguments, and which the dissenter denounces as the co-production of folly and greed.

It is impossible to construct the first syllogism of protection without making a contradiction. It is impossible to elaborate it as a theory without denying the most patent facts of industrial growth, the plainest precepts of financial wisdom, and the most common tenets of democratic justice and republican beneficence. This being so, I see no hope for the cessation either of "tariff tinkering" or of repetitious discussion of the foundation of things, until the structure of the protective policy is swept away!

Waiving, therefore, as already argued threadbare, the constitutional question as to whether money should be raised for other than governmental purposes, and estopping the puling cry of "infancy" to our hundred-year Republic, let me come to the alphabet—the elements of the economic question. Thus and thus only can we reawaken, with the aid, perhaps, of disaster to crops as a cudgel to the farming brain, the lethargy of the body of our people on the vital topic of their means of subsistence.

I propose, therefore, to present once more the elements of this great question, than which I know of none which more deeply concerns the prosperity of the whole country, the liberty of the individual, and the purity and integrity of the Government.

THE FREE-TRADE THEORY.

It is easy to formulate the free-trade theory. It is as easy as to formulate the kindred doctrines of free speech, free press, free men. Free trade is the natural condition. Every man in his practice is a free trader, however loud his professions of faith in protection. The free-trade theory is simply the acceptance of the facts of human nature and its environment. All agree that freedom is best; all agree that trade must exist in society. Their conjunction is deprecated only by ignorance and avarice.

Every man is given a certain ability for labor. He is surrounded by certain natural conditions of labor. The free-trade theory with respect to the individual is, that if he be left free to apply his best ability to the best conditions open to him he will (as a rule) achieve the greatest results. The exceptions come from individual folly or weakness. Nor do I know that the hottest protectionist ever pretended to rule out stupidity or laziness by tariff taxation, although he may yet tax the iron in the blood and the phosphorus of the brain.

Every individual knows his own business best; that is the free-trade theory. He is his own best judge as to what he should turn his hands and how he can make the most of his materials and his energy.

The advocates of protection have never ventured to deny this fundamental proposition in terms; but they certainly do deny it by their acts. Their theory is that Congress is the best judge of what a man should do to win his bread. Congress should decide for him whether he should till the soil, or make wheat into flour, or throw the shuttle, or drive cattle, or delve in the mines of the earth. The average American citizen, says the protectionist, has not enough common sense to choose his own trade; if left to himself he will degrade (this is the term the protectionist uses) himself with agriculture, or he will seek starvation in the fruitless effort to make wooden toys in competition with the paupers of Germany.

Is this true? I am compelled to put the question soberly, for most soberly are these propositions of the protective theory acted upon as true. Are they not incorporated as active principles in the law of the land? Is not our statute full and running over with instances?

This is the first step in the free-trade theory: The individual is his own best judge of his own abilities for the making of things of value. The second step is equally simple, namely, the individual is his own best judge as to where and how he shall trade. If left alone he will sell his productions where he can get the most for them, and buy what he wants where he can buy cheapest. Does it not seem obvious that in this way the individual will get the most there is to be had out of his industrial efforts?

But the protective theory interposes here also a denial—even a downright, specific denial. One of the commonest arguments of protection is this: The American farmer, if he were left to his own unguided judgment, would buy his shovels and his prints, his clothing and his crockery, from England or from France. Understand that I do not make this statement. Under a free-trade system I believe that American manufactures would prosper beyond all our dreams. It is only the advocate of the hot-house system of industrial development who is afraid of the free rain, the free sun, and the free air of the world's broad field. It is the protectionist who lays down the proposition that the unguided farmer would go to England or France or Germany for the furnishing of his farm and his household. He would buy abroad, says the Pennsylvanian philosopher, and the result would be ruin. Why? Because he would create an "unfavorable balance of trade," and because he would lose the "home market" for his sales which he now maintains by his purchases.

As to the "unfavorable balance of trade," it is sufficient to say that trade is trade—the giving of value for value. When a trade is completed there is no balance at all, favorable or unfavorable. The simple American farmer can bankrupt himself, it is true, by trading his wheat for things he does not want and cannot afford; and it does not matter whether these things be the demoralizing luxuries of Spain or the costly comforts of Pennsylvania. But his trading is trading, all the same. It does not make a particle of difference whether he barters at home or abroad. He can ruin himself just as quickly on New England rum as on French champagne. There is no question of a "balance" here. The only "unfavorable balance" I know of is an unpaid tailor's bill, or some other unliquidated debt. If an American farmer sells his crop at the highest market price and then with the proceeds buys farm and home supplies at the lowest figure, is there any logic ever manufactured in Philadelphia which can make him believe that he has not done well?

"Unfavorable balance," where is it? He has been paid for his wheat; he has paid for the goods he has bought. There is no balance. The only question is, has the trade given him much or little for his crop? Has he netted a liberal supply of blankets, shoes, hose, clothing—general utilities and comforts—or is the return scanty and unsatisfactory?

HOME MARKET.

And what is this argument about the "home market?" I have already often refuted it in this House and in my little volume on "Free trade and Free land," published last year by the Putnams. But there can be nothing gained for truth without iteration. The farmer, it is said, must maintain the home market by his purchases, in order to have the advantage of it for his sales. Mr. Speaker, how can any one be deluded by such an attenuated fallacy as this? The home market is to be sustained by paying for things more than they are worth. Would it not be easier to subsidize one's customers directly? Directly, I say. Suppose the market price of wheat is $1, the protectionist plan for raising it to $1.25 is to have the farmer agree to buy goods in a protected market at 20, 30, or 40 per cent. over their true value. Why this machinery? Why should not the farmer say to the grain buyer, "I am not satisfied with your offer of $1,000 for my crop; give me $1,200 and I will pay you a five-hundred-dollar bonus?" That would be a much simpler transaction. It would amount to just what the protection of the home market now amounts to; and there would be this additional advantage, that the sagacious farmer would know exactly what he was doing. Now, under the tariff system he can only guess how much the luxury of a home market is costing him.

I can imagine, sir, a protectionist remarking that every practical business man can give you scores of cases where a producer will buy in a particular market, and pay an advanced price for the privilege, in order to secure that market for the sale of his own goods. Very true, so he will; but he does it for his own individual and peculiar reasons and on his own individual judgment. He does not do it at the direction of the Congress of the United States.

LEGISLATIVE AND INDIVIDUAL SAGACITY.

Here is just where the protectionist goes astray continually. He tries to put legislation in the place of individual sagacity. The American citizen, under the protection view, is a baby. He cannot be trusted to his own free motion; he would fall into the fire or drown himself in the tub, or choke himself with the camphor-bottle. The manufacturing baby needs to be fed on tariff pap; the agricultural baby must be barred out from the foreign jam-closet; the trading baby must be tied into a jumper lest he tumble over the balusters and break his blessed little neck.

Just now, for example, the navigation laws are under consideration. A protectionist paper recently started in New York defends those barbarous restrictions on the astonishing ground that investments in railroads are more profitable than investments in ships! That is to say, Congress shall determine for the baby capitalists of America what enterprises will pay and what will not; and shall then put up the bars against the unfruitful fields, lest the guileless Goulds and cherubic Scotts rush madly in and get a colic of crab-apple.

To all this absurdity the free-trade theory opposes its simple tenet, "the individual is the best judge." He is his own best judge in the selection of a vocation, his own best judge in the choosing of a market. Expanding these propositions a little we have a complete statement of the positive side, often expressed, of the free-trade theory. That is to say, every locality, every country has its own peculiar advantages for the production of things of value: The West wheat, the South cotton, New England shoes, China tea, Brazil coffee, and so on. Now, it is true that cotton can be grown in New York, coffee raised in England, and silk cocoons produced in Maryland. But it is obvious that the easiest, cheapest, and best way for each locality to supply itself with all that it needs is to produce in abundance those things which it can produce easiest, cheapest, and best, and exchange the surplus of production for the best fruits of other localities.

THE GENTLE SAVAGE AS A PROTECTIONIST.

This is the sum and substance of the free-trade theory. But this also is the first principle of civilization. True, indeed. Free trade is neither more nor less than civilization. And protection, however fine its guise, patriotism, nationalism—with never so large an "N"—humanitarianism, is nothing more nor less than savagery. The Indian of the western plains is to-day your highest type of the protectionist. He is self-contained, self-centered, and independent. He recks not the rise and fall of British prices, he makes his own tools, he finds his own food, he builds his own shelter, he consolidates all markets in his own person—yea, in his own stomach; he puts the balance of trade in either pocket at discretion. He believes that things are never too high, where every one of his precious tribe can be fed from the bounty of the Government. If all else fail and a crisis impend, he straightway goes to Washington for a subsidy of three-point blankets, powder, and corned beef. So much for first principles. Now let me be a little more specific.

WHAT IS A PROTECTIVE TARIFF?

A protective tariff is a system of duties on imports so levied as to prevent or restrict the importation of certain commodities. The purpose of the arrangement is to cut off foreign competition in certain lines and compel the citizen to purchase the protected class of goods from the domestic producer, paying for them a higher price than the foreign producer would demand. In the new nomenclature of France protectionists call themselves "compensators" and their system one of "compensation." If the end in view were sought directly and without disguise—if, that is to say, Congress were to pass laws prohibiting the purchase of foreign-made blankets, steel rails, and clothing—the American people would rise in revolt against the tyranny. Nothing saves the system from instant destruction at the hands of indignant freemen but its sneaking indirection and nocturnal burglarious methods. But for the cunning way in which its real aims and real results are covered up under a mass of pretentious philosophizing and simulated patriotism it would rot even before it died.

Let me clarify my view with examples: Blankets and steel-rails will do as well as any others; from one or two learn all. In 1879 the duty actually collected on imported blankets averaged 86 per cent. of the value of the same. That is, the total import was in value $1,453, and the duties collected amounted to $1,233. Now, what does this duty of 86 per cent. ad valorem signify? I want a direct answer. I shall not be satisfied with evasion. This question has been put specifically to protectionists and to others suspected of having a weakness for blankets and blanket manufacturers. But no answer is forthcoming. What does an 86 per cent. duty mean? This annual purchase of blankets in this country is, in round figures, $20,000,000. On the face, therefore, this protective duty of 86 per cent. means that the American people are practically prohibited from purchasing foreign-made blankets and forced to pay for the home goods annually something like seven million dollars more than they are worth. If this is not what this enormous protective duty means, let some protectionist say why and how.

Again, the ad valorem duties collected on steel rails in 1879 averaged 104 per cent. What does a protection of 104 per cent. signify? What can it signify but that the free American is denied the privilege of buying rails abroad, and compelled by law to purchase at home and pay a double price for the goods? This is what it does signify. And the lesson from any number of examples would be the same. A protective tariff is simply a device to compel the people to buy of particular manufacturers and to pay those manufacturers what they think they must have.

The point may be viewed otherwise by considering the plea which is put forward in defense of the system, namely, "Protection is necessary in order to enable the American manufacturer to compete."

Very well. Now, it is admitted that the United States has industries which do not need protection. When, therefore, we assert that this industry or that requires protection, we assert simply that such an industry is comparatively a losing enterprise. Unless the Government intervenes it cannot be conducted without loss. Hence, the proposal of protection is that the Government shall enable A, B, and C to go into certain unprofitable lines of business, and give them the privilege of making good their inevitable losses by pillaging those whose business pays a profit. Is this democratic? Is this American? I may ask, indeed, although this atrocious system has been practiced since the foundation of the Republic, is this constitutional?

Mr. Speaker, this Government was never designed to create privileged classes, nor to place obstacles in the way of any man in his pursuit of the means of living. The only constitutional basis for a tariff is the basis of revenue. The Government must have a revenue; and a system of duties on imports may be properly defended as a revenue-producing device.

WHAT IS A TARIFF FOR REVENUE?

This brings us to the question, What is a tariff for revenue? Many imagine that the free-trade theory demands the abolition of tariffs; but the abolition of tariffs is not at all a necessary part of the practice of free trade. The demand is that taxes be laid for revenue only; that no taxes be levied except such as are needed for the Government expenses; and, furthermore, to carry out the free-trade principle to the end, that where a duty is levied for revenue which may give to any manufacturer an undue advantage—which may, in other words, put into his hands the power of extorting tribute from the consumer—then such duty on importation should be offset by an excise tax on the domestic manufacturer. No taxes except for Government purposes! That is the free-trade rule; that is the doctrine of tariff for revenue only.

The distinction between a protective tariff and a revenue tariff is broad and plain. The protective tariff, in so far as it really is protective, produces no revenue at all, for its protective operation is the prevention of importation; and in so far as it does actually prevent importation precisely to that extent does it prevent the payment of duties. Where the protection is complete, as is virtually the case in the instances of blankets, steel rails, spool-thread, &c., the tax, or extra price, which the consumer pays goes entirely into the pockets of the manufacturers. The public Treasury gets not a penny. A rough estimate of the taxes thus extorted from the people for the exclusive benefit of the protected classes gives a total of over a thousand million dollars annually.

A THOUSAND-MILLION BOUNTY.

That is to say, the total value of our manufactures per year was, in 1870, over four thousand million dollars. Take it for 1880 at no more than five thousand million dollars. The average rate of duties now collected is over 40 per cent. Suppose, therefore, that 40 per cent. of duty means an artificial rise in the prices of protected commodities of no more than 25 per cent., then 25 per cent. as the protective element in $5,000,000,000 would be $1,000,000,000—one thousand millions to the privileged classes. The Government share of the protective taxes is about one hundred and seventy-five millions.

This is theory, says the protectionist. So it is. Are we not figuring among unknown quantities? The protective system prevents us from reaping the full fruits of our industry. How can we estimate as to what might have been? My own belief is that the protective system, is costing this country many times the heaviest estimate of protective taxation that I have ever seen. A thousand millions a year! This is only a guess at the direct cost of the protective system. We have yet to estimate the damage the system itself brings in its very operation, for I beg you to notice that we by no means complete the entry in our ledger when we charge up the losses which we make good to the conductors of naturally unprofitable labors. What of the loss from the distortion of our industrial forces? The protective system obviously achieves its results by diverting capital and labor from the natural to the unnatural channels; from the lines where there is a real profit to the lines where there is an actual loss. How much is sacrificed yearly by the failure to apply our capital and labor in the right directions? We have no estimates of this factor, and can have none. We can only rest on a moral certainty that our loss is far greater in this direction than in the other.

Not for lack of material but for the sake of terseness, I close my exhibit of the positive side of this question with a brief summary:

THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF CREED.

1. The protective tariff is a device to compel the people at large to pay tribute to privileged classes in order to enable these classes to conduct manufactures otherwise unprofitable.

2. In so far as such a tariff accomplishes its purpose it produces no revenue to the Government. It operates purely and simply as a tax on the well-directed industrial efforts for the support of ill-directed industrial efforts.

3. The protective tariff diverts industry and capital from profitable to unprofitable channels. The few who manage the protected enterprises may grow rich, since to them is committed the division of the spoils; but the result to the country cannot be other than a diminution of wealth.

4. The protective system is a clear invasion of personal liberty.

THE REVENUE TARIFF CREED.

1. The revenue tariff is a system of duties on imports laid for the purpose of bringing income for the expenses of Government. It is so laid that the Government Treasury will receive the whole tax levied—less the expenses of collection. All taxes are due to the Government "only."

2. The revenue-tariff system discountenances the creation of classes to be supported by tribute from others, and therefore demands as a supplement the adjustment of internal taxes in such a way as to offset the effect of import duties.

3. The revenue tariff leaves the industrial forces of the country just as it finds them, free to seek the best channels which the resources of the country afford.

4. The revenue tariff infringes on no man's liberty, except to the extent of exacting from each individual his contribution for the maintenance of law and order.

WHICH IS THE CHOICE?

It would seem that between these opposing systems it would not be difficult to make a choice. How does it happen, therefore, that so enlightened a people as the citizens of these United States have chosen the system of protection? The proper answer to this is that they never did choose it. The first tariff made was made for revenue. The protective element was forced into it by the representatives of certain manufacturing interests, (it is a remarkable coincidence that their leader hailed from Pennsylvania,) who found their opportunity in the critical need of the nation for immediate income. A foot-hold thus secured, the history of the progress of protection in the tariff is simply the old history of encroachment on the common, and therefore unchampioned, rights by a class organized and equipped for plunder under the forms of law.

I know of no more exasperating case of misrepresentation than that of the protectionist version of this part of the history of our tariff.

PERVERSIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Take for example the speech of the arch-protectionist, the late republican candidate for the Presidency. It passes my comprehension how a member of the Cobden Club—even if he did not know what that club was—could so distort the plain record. In the speech to which I refer, originally made in this House in 1878, but made again in print ten thousand times and more during the late canvass, this fierce protectionist begins by planting himself on the Constitution and on the very first grant of powers to Congress:

> Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

How is it possible for any one to go astray in the reading of this simple and business-like clause? What can it mean other than this: that Congress is empowered to raise a revenue by certain means, the purposes of such revenue being the payment of debts, the sustaining of the means of national defense, and such other objects as may be broadly classed under the term "general welfare." In other words, the plain reading of the clause is, that since the Government must have a revenue it may raise that revenue in the several ways specified.

But, lo! our protectionist champion makes these simple words read very differently. His translation is that Congress has the power to impose taxes in such a way that the general welfare will be promoted; "general welfare," in the bright lexicon of the protectionist, meaning always the profits of the pig-iron men.

I shall not stop to argue the point. I only ask that clear-headed men scan the clause of the Constitution in question in an honest way, and then say frankly if they can find anything in it authorizing any provision for the "general welfare" excepting by the expenditure of the revenues previously acquired. The clause may possibly be construed to authorize subsidies, and even river and harbor appropriations; but so to twist this clear revenue-producing provision as to make it a license for Government dabbling in manufacturing experiments, even to the extent of cutting off and preventing revenue, distances the usual dexterity of the most supple and subtle politician.

THE FATHERS.

On the second page of this remarkable and representative speech, referring to the founders of the Republic, "the men who created this Constitution," occurs this striking passage:

> Our fathers said: "Though we will use the taxing power to maintain a small Army and Navy sufficient to keep alive the knowledge of war, yet the main reliance for our defense shall be the intelligence, culture, and skill of our people; a development of our own intellectual and material resources, which will enable us to do everything that may be necessary to equip, clothe, and feed ourselves in time of war, and make ourselves intelligent, happy, and prosperous in peace."

Now, the fact is, "our fathers" said nothing of the kind. Our father from Massachusetts said, "Put an impost tax on rum. We make it here, and don't want the West Indies to run into our market." "Besides," he added piously, "such a tax will aid the cause of temperance."

Our father from Georgia opposed: "Give me my rum free, if you please. I buy it with my lumber in the West Indies, and, besides, good rum never hurt anybody."

Our father from Pennsylvania patriotically remarked: "I must have a duty on iron, since the iron industry is the foundation of all things."

Our father from South Carolina replied: "You cannot have it. I am not going to pay more for my plows and hoes than they are worth. Let iron be free. But hemp, now—hemp is a good thing to put a duty on. I raise hemp myself; and wouldn't mind it."

And then the father from Pennsylvania collided with him because hemp was the raw material of cordage. And thus the wrangling continued. No, Mr. Speaker, "our fathers" used no such mellifluous language as that put into their mouths by the eloquent protectionist from whom I have quoted. Tariff legislation was in the beginning what it has ever been, a jangling strife for the biggest share in the plunder of the whole people. It always ended in some fashion by a compromise and a deal.

MADISON'S VIEWS.

The late candidate's address is even so bold as to declare in effect that James Madison was the leader of the protection forces in the initial tariff debate. I quote:

> Two days after the votes for President were counted, and long before Washington was inaugurated, James Madison rose in the first House of Representatives and for the first time moved to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the express purpose of carrying out the theory of the Constitution to provide for the common defense and general welfare, both by regulating commerce and protecting American manufactures.

James Madison, Mr. Speaker, did nothing of the kind. He rose in the first House of Representatives with these words on his lips:

> The deficiency in our Treasury has been too notorious to make it necessary for me to animadvert upon that subject. Let us content ourselves with endeavoring to remedy the evil.

That is, James Madison's first speech was for revenue, and the tariff he proposed in that speech was a revenue tariff. Fitzsimons, of Pennsylvania, and others, who put the claims of their locality above the nation's need and the nation's honor, began at once a course of bully-ragging to get in their protective items. Madison protested, urged the need of instant action for revenue, and finally yielded his position because he saw that if he did not the conflict would be indefinitely prolonged, the national Treasury would remain empty, and the young Republic be disgraced in the eyes of the whole world, if not torn asunder by the angry contestants.

I beg your patience while I quote from James Madison in this very debate. You will see for yourselves how much truth there is in the statement that he rose in the first Congress to advocate the protective system.

I am myself—

Said Mr. Madison—

> the friend to a very free system of commerce, and hold it as a truth that commercial shackles are generally unjust, oppressive, and impolitic. It is also a truth that if industry and labor are left to take their own course they will generally be directed to those objects which are the most productive, and this in a more certain and direct manner than the wisdom of the most enlightened legislature could point out. Nor do I think that the national interest is more promoted by such restrictions than that the interest of individuals would be promoted by legislative interference directing the particular application of its industry. For example, we should find no advantage in saying that every man should be obliged to furnish himself, by his own labor, with those accommodations which depend on the mechanic arts, instead of employing his neighbor, who could do it for him on better terms. It would be of no advantage to the shoemaker to make his own clothes to save the expense of procuring them from the tailor. It would be better policy to suffer each of them to employ his talent in his own way. The case is the same between the exercise of the arts and agriculture—between the city and the country, and between city and town—each capable of making particular articles in abundance to supply the other. Thus all are benefited by exchange, and the less this exchange is cramped by government the greater are the proportions of benefit to each. The same argument holds good between nation and nation, and between parts of the same nation.

Was ever, Mr. Speaker, a clearer, broader, more clean-cut statement of the principle of free-trade? I am free to say, sir, that Mr. Madison subsequently gave a kind of support to the doctrine of "tariff for revenue with incidental protection;" but in this first congressional debate he planted himself distinctly, emphatically, and without possibility of mistake upon the democratic platform—a tariff for revenue only; free trade the highest condition of industrial growth.

I will not pursue further the devious line of assertion and of sophistry on which the speech under consideration draws its slow length along. Enough is before us to illustrate the misrepresentation of which protectionists are guilty when they try to make it appear that their system of class taxation and local monopoly was created by the statesmen of the early and patriotic days, and was accepted deliberately by the people as the clear means to industrial growth and commercial greatness. The fact is, as I have stated, and as any man can see by reviewing the record, protection was forced into the first tariff by sectional greed; it was suffered to enter only as an incident, the main object of the tariff being agreed on all hands to be revenue; but once in, it grew and became masterful. It used those evil means which are a necessary part of any such system of class privilege and favoritism.

INCIDENTAL ROBBERY.

In the beginning, on the most favorable construction for the protectionist view, we had a tariff for revenue with incidental protection. To-day we have a tariff for protection, with incidental revenue. The protectionists have had the advantages of personal and pocket interest for the pressing of their schemes; the revenue tariff men have had no center of organization on any business basis; they have had as their working force only the spirit of equity and patriotism. And patriotism, Mr. Speaker, while it is a consuming fire when focused under the lens of imminent national danger, commonly acquires a rather milk-and-watery temperature when the purpose of action is only the conservation of general business interests.

The people have never in any true sense declared in favor of a protective tariff. They have simply grown used to it. They will throw it off with indignation as soon as their eyes are really opened to its true character.

HOW MANY INTERESTED IN THE PLUNDER?

For I ask you to consider how many of the people of these United States have any share whatever in the benefits or spoils of the protective tariff. In 1870 the census returns figured the number of the country's working force at 12,500,000. If the ratio of increase is the same as for the general population, our working force now numbers about fifteen millions. Now suppose these working and business people to be distributed as they were ten years ago. We obtain this exhibit:

Table showing number of persons engaged in the various classes of vocation.

Vocation.	Per cent.	Number engaged.
Agriculture	47	7,050,000
Profession and personal services	22	3,300,000
Trade and transportation	9	1,350,000
Manufacturing, mechanical, and mining	22	3,300,000

This reduced to terms of tariff means that the protected workers are 3,300,000; unprotected workers, 11,700,000.

For every working man or woman in the protected industries there are four (nearly) in the industries that are not protected. A tariff for revenue only would therefore bring benefit directly to four out of five of our working and business men; and since to them, to those who depend upon them for support: that is, (roughly,) to forty millions of the people of the United States.

But this is not all. The class "manufacturing, mechanic, and mining" yields interesting results on analysis. The army of mechanics contains but a small minority who can in any way be regarded as benefited by protection. What protection does a carpenter get? His saws and hammers are taxed, his screws pay an exorbitant tribute to monopolies, the very lumber he uses is made more costly by tariff restrictions. How is the plumber protected? His wrenches and his pots all pay tax, the iron for his sinks, the copper and brass for his tubes, are levied upon by the private tax-gatherer of the combinations. Neither is protection extended (except in the way of imposing burdens and exacting tribute) to the masons, the tailors, the shoemakers, the bakers, and the great host of the country's skilled and unskilled working people.

Of course it is pretended that the workmen engaged in the industries which do actually receive shares of the tariff spoils are directly and greatly benefited.

The protectionist reasoning on this subject will not hold water; but suppose we allow it. Taking away from the fourth class in the table the working people engaged in mechanic arts like plumbing and masonry, the proportion of those who are benefited by the protective tariff to those who are injured will be about one to twenty. That is to say, about two and one-half millions are benefited, while forty-seven and one-half millions of our people are injured.

I cannot believe, and I do not think that anybody believes, that forty-seven and one-half millions of our people are willing to be taxed in order to sustain a body of two and one-half millions engaged in fancy occupations. When the great majority awake to the truth, then expect a revolution more sudden and startling than the corn-law repeal.

We can go further yet. It is pretended, as I have said, that the "workingman" in the protected industries is obviously benefited. How is he benefited?

WAGES.

Here is an industry, say, which must have protection. Why must it have protection? In order, says the protectionist, to make it possible to pay the workmen fair wages.

How does any one imagine that the protected manufacturer pays any more than the market rate? He does not. He pays wages, not on the philanthropic plan which is commonly paraded before the public, but on strictly business principles. And what fixes the market rate of wages? Not the small demand of the subsidized industries; not the 5 per cent. demand, but the 95 per cent. demand of the great unprotected employments.

PAUPER LABOR.

The very arguments which the protectionist uses give the refutation of his position. We cannot compete, he says, with the "pauper labor" of Europe. Why? Because there is no pauper labor here; wages in this country are high. Wages are high. Wages are not to be made high; they are high. And every employer must meet this situation, protection or no protection. The protection, that is to say, does not touch wages; good wages are already secured by the conditions of the general labor market. The tariff tax goes to the manufacturer either to make good his natural losses, or, as in copper and sundry other cases, to give him exorbitant profits.

The hands in the mills and forges and mines of the country have no share at all in the fund contributed by the forty-seven and a half millions for the support of the two and a half millions. It is not a wage fund at all; it is at best only a bankruptcy fund. They are not benefited; but on the contrary they are subject to tribute with the mass of consumers. They must pay more than they otherwise would for all that they eat or drink or wear.

ARE THE MANUFACTURERS BENEFITED?

Whom have we left? The manufacturers themselves. And even here what do we find? Their machinery and appliances cost, the most of them, anywhere from 20 to 50 per cent. more than they should; the majority of them are loaded down with taxes on their raw materials and their transportation expenses are magnified enormously. Last, but not least, they are all of them, practically, cut off from the foreign market; penned up to the home demand with facilities and capital to fill that demand five times over. This is the meaning of the recurring gluts, the slaughtering of price-lists, the running on half time, the selling of plants for one-tenth of their value.

It is amazing to remark the prevailing blindness in this regard. "I cannot live without protection," says the manufacturer of hats. Of course you cannot, so long as you pay a duty on your cloth, on your thread, on your silk, on your paper, on everything that goes into your hat. But suppose your materials were free and your machinery bought at its proper cost; what then? I will tell you what then.

FOREIGN MARKET.

The manufactures of this country would advance with such strides as we have never seen. Our statistics of exports would not be the disgrace they are now; they would not show that we are selling our birthright, throwing away the crude richness of our soil. We would export manufactured goods, and make our profit not on gross sales of our inheritance, but by the genius of our minds, the cunning of our hands, and the industry of our muscles, as impressed on the finished goods.

Protective tariff—revenue tariff. An illusion on the one hand, a business-like system on the other. Let the American people decide between them, and that speedily, before darker days come.

CONCLUSION.

Political parties have played the coward on these vital issues. Each party seems fearful of a struggle with the bounty-fed monopolies of the land.

But, Mr. Speaker, future platforms will be built on the principles of freedom in trade, since they closely affect our business relations, which are stifled when freedom is lacking. We are no longer dependent upon others for raw materials or manufactured articles. We need, we must have, a market beyond our borders for our surplus productions. For all the forms of matter produced for utility and comfort there must be an outlet. New markets must be found. We cannot be forever mutual with ourselves. It is a solecism. Without foreign markets our limited foreign commerce will fade away and our home commerce be paralyzed. We are at the mercy of the first disaster to our harvests or at the caprice of the first abundant harvest abroad. Will not our farmers take note of the peril? Their prosperity might and should have been better, notwithstanding the bad harvests abroad and good harvests here. They have hugged the delusion that their prosperity is to continue. Cannot they see that retaliation is as old as human selfishness? Do they desire a prohibitory tax in France and England against our wheat and cattle? Will not other countries, shut off from us by our protective and prohibitive policies, strike back?

M. Maurice Rouvier spoke eloquently for commercial liberty in the French Chamber on the 17th of February, 1880; but he spoke most significantly also, if our farmers will heed even the translation. I append it in the form of extracts to guide us toward living fountains of true economy, to show what is preparing against our abundance and surplus and what will evidently come unless we liberalize our own custom policies under the light of science.

Let us not be deluded. We may now float on a Pactolus of European gold as if on a summer stream, reflecting all the blessings from above; but let the adverse elements appear and the clouds lower, and the protective illusions will dissolve. The need of natural laws which govern production, distribution, and consumption will be so surely felt (though it may be too late to avert the worst catastrophe) that a revolution will be hailed as the only hope and harbinger of this new hemisphere, now so alluring to the labor of mankind and so attractive as the only true protecting genius of popular activity and advancing civilization.

APPENDIX A.

Extracts from the speech of M. Maurice Rouvier, on the general customs tariff bill, in the French Chamber, February 17, 1880.

INVASION OF FRANCE BY AMERICAN PRODUCTS—DUTY DEMANDED AGAINST AMERICAN WHEAT AND CATTLE—FRANCE IN A BAD WAY—CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS AN ENEMY TO OUR RACE.

The crops had been bad in France for two years. This fact indicated the line of conduct for our opponents to pursue. They excited agitation throughout the land. They went among the agriculturists to exhibit the phantom of an invasion of American products.

An able orator traveled through the provinces everywhere, and visited the principal agricultural towns. Before the political trip of which I speak, they had flooded the rural districts and even the smallest villages of France with a little blue paper, in which the president of the republic and the Chambers were petitioned to protect agriculture, and to impose a duty of three francs upon wheat. We have in the archives of the committee eighty-seven volumes, almost a cubic meter, of documents of all kinds, containing thousands of signatures, all demanding invariably this duty of three francs.

It is easy to conceive what response would be elicited by this agricultural circular. The peasants were asked: "Do you wish to obtain three francs more for your wheat?" As in all circulars, one side only of the question was presented. They were not told: "In selling your wheat for three francs more you will have to pay six francs more for all other necessaries." No; this simple question was asked: Do you wish to obtain three francs more for your wheat? They replied: "Yes; of course we do;" and affixed their signatures. And from this has resulted all that mass of documents to which I refer.

I am indeed astonished that up to the present hour no one in the Chamber has brought to the desk this demand for a duty of three francs upon wheat.

After this campaign, undertaken for the duty upon wheat, we have the tour of M. Ponyer Quertier. He is not here, but as he has a platform from which he can speak, and as he has agitated this question, I do not hesitate to mention his name. M. Ponyer Quertier traveled over France and excited the rural population about the danger to which it is exposed on account of America. He represented our country as inundated by immense quantities of wheat and by large numbers of cattle. It is one of the most curious incidents of these discussions that it can be proved that, at the very time when this politician traveled over France creating a sort of economical panic, in another direction he was making appeals for the capital of his fellow-citizens, in order to unite France and America by a telegraphic cable. This has struck me so forcibly, as I have listened during the past few days to all the orators who have successively denounced from this platform the dangerous invasion of American products, that I have asked myself if we are not subject to a sort of delusion in considering the illustrious navigator who discovered the New World as a benefactor of humanity. Ought he not to be considered as an evil genius, who prepared the invasion of all those products which have flooded our markets?

If Christopher Columbus should be held up for public execration because he discovered America, and thus opened the way for the evils with which we are threatened, we ought then to stigmatize M. Ponyer Quertier, who desired to connect America with France by a telegraphic cable, because the least fluctuations in our markets will be known instantly in America, and the speculators of the New World will be advised of all that occurs in France.

At the time when the country was subjected to this agitation the committee which you appointed made an investigation, and summoned before it successively, as committees always do, the representatives of every industry. Almost all, alas! gave a deplorable picture of their business. To believe them, this land of France, which we love, perhaps too fondly, is a very ungrateful soil, and quite unfavored by nature. In nothing is it equal to other nations. Coal does not burn here so well, and operatives are less skillful. The sun even does not warm it like other lands.

Open the report of the investigation, and you will see that what I have just told you is not exaggerated. Open it, and you will find in every page this long lamentation upon French industry. I even ask myself how was it that those imprudent men who gave their testimony were ignorant of the fact that the most terrible blow that could be inflicted by our foreign competitors would be the printing in every language of those three volumes of the investigation. The manufacturers pointed out different causes of inferiority. I will take for example coal, which is said to be dearer in France than in England. There is some truth in their assertion. I know that it is easy for them to exaggerate the importance of statements of this sort. They gave the cost of coal at the mine in England and in Belgium, and then the price at Paris. I beg the manufacturers to settle their differences with M. Allain Targé, the deputy of the department of the Seine, who finds that the freight on coal is too low, and who regards as a new evil the deepening of the river so that the barges of Belgium may transport their coal more cheaply.

That is the doctrine of the school which regards as an evil the importation of foreign productions. This cannot be denied. As for myself, I belong to the opposite school, which professes that when we buy foreign productions we benefit ourselves by obtaining at a lower cost products which are dear in our own land.

APPENDIX B.

MORE DANGERS FROM AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.

But we are told, "There are other considerations; new contingencies have arisen owing to America and Germany." "America," it is asserted, "overwhelms us with its importations of grain."

Now, has there ever existed in the world a country, I will not say civilized, but even a barbarous one, where one hectoliter of grain has been imported that was not necessary for the consumption of its inhabitants?

We are told, "America sends us grain; floods us with it." Yes, thank Heaven! She has sent us a great deal—I do not know if the plains of Russia after the wars of the past few years could have supplied our wants—well, America has sent us a great deal, and we rejoice at it.

We were told that she also sent us cattle and sheep. The minister of commerce made known from this platform, with the authority which attaches to his statements, how unimportant this invasion actually was.

It is true that some reply, that these steers and these sheep imported from America come by the way of Antwerp, through Belgium, and enter by our Belgian frontier. Truly those are steers and sheep which have a strange fancy for traveling about!

Moreover, before exhibiting to us this specter of an invasion of American products, they made another campaign. At the commencement of the investigation to which I just now alluded, we heard manufacturers say, "Take care, America is going to flood our markets with its manufactured goods, and as we have prohibitive tariffs instead of treaties of commerce in force as to the United States, these manufactured goods, not yet being able to enter France, already pour into England."

APPENDIX C.

QUESTION OF FAILURES AND WAGES IN FRANCE AND UNITED STATES, AS AFFECTED BY PROTECTION.

[David A. Wells, quoted by the French Economist.]

We are again told, "But the United States are in an excellent condition internally; wages are greater; in England failures are taking place one after another; in the United States prosperity is increasing."

Relative to this point it is proper for me to submit a few reliable figures. In 1872, the number of failures amounted to 4,069, representing liabilities of 605,000,000 of francs;* in 1878 the failures amounted to 11,478, with liabilities of 1,172,000,000 of francs.† That is the way that excessive protection in the United States develops domestic prosperity.

But let us not discuss the subject of failures, because I am aware that in Anglo-Saxon countries a failure is of less importance than it is in France. In France it is an injury to the property of others; in the country referred to a kind of liquidation, and a failure there does not entail the opprobrium which attaches to it in France. Let us, then, eliminate these subjects from our debate.

But there is another consideration—wages. What has been the effect of the increase of duties upon wages? Our opponents have said, "We are the protectors of national labor. We do not wish the wages of our operatives to be lowered."

Let us see now what takes place in regard to wages in a country where your principles are applied. America has applied your principles, let us look at the results. Here are the figures taken from the Board of Trade Gazette:

"Wages have diminished one-half or two-thirds. In 1873 carpenters in New York received 12.50 francs‡ a day as wages. In 1878 this fell to 8.75 francs; § operatives in all trades $2 or 10 francs a day; in 1878 their wages were 5.50 francs. ‖ Cigar-makers were paid in 1873 15 francs. ¶ They now receive 6.25 francs  a day. People smoke less."

When people reduce their expenses, when they deprive themselves of luxuries, it is a proof that they are scarcely able to supply their necessary wants.

"Tinsmiths who earned 15 francs do not now obtain more than 10 francs." In order to appreciate the true value of these figures you must keep in sight the fact that the cost of living in the United States is three times as much as it is in our own country. Moreover, here is the opinion of Mr. David Wells, formerly Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and he is not the only one who entertains these views. He wrote as follows in the North American Review in 1872:

"It is certain that the people of this country to-day consume less sugar and less coffee, they buy a smaller quantity of boots, shoes, and hats, and of every other article of general consumption than they did in 1859."

That is an estimate, but here are the figures: "The consumption of cotton goods calculated in weight," Mr. Wells adds, "was less in 1870 for a population of 39,000,000 than it was in 1860 for one of 30,000,000." These are the effects of protection upon wages and upon consumption. When we examine presently the nature of custom duties, we shall see that this is the inevitable effect of such duties.

When you create in addition to the tax levied for the support of the Government a tax imposed for special classes,—for you cannot apply this system to one industry only, you must make it of general application and apply it to all,—you thereby create an unnatural enhancement of price, which results in causing a decrease in consumption.

APPENDIX D.

ALL TARIFFS ARE TAXES. WHAT GOES TO THE TREASURY AND WHAT OUTSIDE. THE ECONOMIC FORMULA OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE. THE CUSTOM DUTY IS A TAX.

This has not been stated too often. It has been described as a sort of moral barrier; but the truth is it is a tax which differs from others in this, that a part only of the proceeds of this tax goes into the public Treasury, while the balance—and it is the largest part—goes into the pockets of manufacturers and producers.

Can there be in a republic those who would think of establishing such a condition of affairs? Can there be in a republic those who would pretend to have the right to impose such a tax upon their fellow-citizens? Can such a policy find support? When you impose a custom duty upon a necessary article of consumption which is produced in the interior of the country, and which comes also by importation from abroad, can you deny that you cause the following results? On one hand the duty levied upon the goods goes into the vaults of the Treasury, and on the other hand the domestic productions are increased in cost by an amount equal to the entire custom duty.

Our opponents deny that domestic productions are enhanced in cost by an amount equal to the entire custom duty, but indeed they admit, I think, that their cost is increased in a certain proportion. Now, I will tell them that if I desired to oppose their arguments by others of their own making I would remind them that Hon. M. Méline confessed that warehouse duties, which are in reality custom duties, resulted in increasing the cost of cotton by the whole amount of the tax.

However, I will concede this also, the custom duty does not affect prices to its full extent; but please acknowledge at least that it does to a certain extent.

Well, I have given the figures of the production of grain: 77,000,000 of hectoliters are domestic grain; 42,000,000 are imported. Impose a duty of two francs upon this grain and what will the grain brought from foreign countries pay into the treasury? Eighty-four millions! But the home producers, owing to the protection resulting from the duty, will obtain 154,000,000!

You know this so well that not one of you, however devoted to the agricultural interest and imbued with this doctrine, not one of you has risen to demand a duty upon grain.

What you dare not do in regard to grain and other provisions of prime necessity,

* About one hundred and twenty-one million dollars.
† About two hundred and thirty-four million four hundred thousand dollars.
‡ About two dollars and fifty cents.
§ About one dollar and seventy-five cents.
‖ About one dollar and ten cents.
¶ About three dollars.
 About one dollar and twenty-five cents.

how can you do it in regard to other articles, the necessity for which is as great, if not as apparent? How can you do it without inflicting an injury upon consumers?

Gentlemen, if it is true that custom duties are of this nature; if it is true that they do not benefit the State alone which imposes them, but also certain classes of citizens, is it not evident that the question now debated is essentially a political one, whatever may be asserted to the contrary? We must decide whether, under the republic, under a democratic government, one part of the population shall impose duties upon the other.

Do you not feel, gentlemen, that this is impossible, and that the unrestricted right to consume whatever we need is, in a certain measure, the economic formula of universal suffrage?

APPENDIX E.

THE ARISTOCRACY OF MANUFACTURES. PROTECTION AN ANACHRONISM; AN INSULT TO SCIENCE AND PROGRESS. TALLOW CHANDLERS vs. THE SUN. PROTECT EVERY ONE OR NO ONE. WORDS OF WISDOM FROM AN ELOQUENT FRENCHMAN.

In this regard I recall to mind a passage from a speech of the minister of commerce, in which he spoke of the demand for a reduction of tariff duties, which was made under the monarchy of 1830, and of the reply returned by Count Jaubert.

Ah! there was no deception in Count Jaubert. He did not say, "We wish to protect the wages of the working classes!" He came to the platform and declared with a frankness characteristic of the time, "In every monarchy there must be an aristocracy, and the aristocracy upon which the government of 1830 ought to rely for support is the aristocracy of manufacturers!"

Well, in a democratic republic there is no place for any other aristocracy than that of merit, of talent, and of virtue; there is none for that which comes from a name or from wealth.

The custom-tariff duties whose political character I have just now endeavored to demonstrate, have still another disadvantage. I confess that I have hesitated to discuss this point because I have feared that I would be charged with exaggeration. But after all I have heard here, I can safely assert that the fact has already been acknowledged upon this platform. Custom-tariff duties are not only a tax contrary to democratic principles, but they are also an actual anachronism. They are a tax upon the discoveries of science, and upon what has been regarded as too great facility of commercial transportation.

You demand an increase of duties—it was stated explicitly—because transportation has become cheaper. And we would exhibit the spectacle of a people who are now making sacrifices in order to develop their means of transportation, who are seeking to encourage discoveries in human science, who are constructing new canals and new railroads, who have already pierced the Isthmus of Suez, who to-morrow, perhaps, will accomplish as great a work in another hemisphere; we would exhibit the spectacle of a people who would station at the end of their railroads and canals a custom-house officer armed with tariffs, who will say to science, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther!" We would present this spectacle of a people whose brightest intellects are seeking to invent improvements in manufactures; and when a man of genius shall succeed in shortening distances and in lightening labor, behold, a protectionist appears and cries out, "No admittance."

This is not a paradox; it is occurring every day. These doctrines have been presented from this platform without disguise. You all remember that pamphlet of Bastiat in which he speaks of the tallow-chandlers who present a petition against the sun, calling him a competitor who does not buy any raw material or pay for labor, and who, in the interest of accursed England, floods us with his light, so that as soon as he appears there is no longer a chance to sell the products of their labor.

That apparently is facetiousness in the celebrated economist, but in reality it is nothing of the kind. There was presented here one day a petition from tallow-chandlers in another form. In 1821 the oil merchants of Lille importuned the public authorities with a petition against gas. They demanded that measures should be taken against this new article of competition, because, as they asserted, it would ruin their business.

And frankly, gentlemen, do you not find to-day even evidences in our tariffs of the same interested motives? Do we not perceive that a crusade has been organized for the purpose of imposing duties upon colors derived from coal? upon alizarine and upon aniline, which come in competition with madder, a natural product?

Custom-tariff duties, I repeat, are a positive anachronism, and if we had not suffered the calamity of the war of 1870, which so frightfully increased our debt, and which compelled us to impose new taxes; if we were in a normal condition, we would demand their abolition, and the adoption in this country, as the greatest and surest stimulant, of the English tariff with its eight or ten clauses imposing duties upon articles which are not produced in that country, and so preserving an exclusively fiscal character.

We would say to you, Break down the barriers! Fear nothing, for the French are a people sufficiently energetic to compete with foreigners.

But we are compelled to accept the situation in which we are placed. We are not influenced by a blind party spirit. We do not ask you to go forward. We bear in mind, no matter what assertions are made, that since 1870 seven hundred millions of additional taxes have been imposed upon the country. It is because we bear this in mind that we support the tariff bill submitted by the government and refrain from asking you to proceed further.

But we implore you to take no step backward, and to give no encouragement to an economic reaction. When a step in that direction is taken, there is no telling where we will stop. To-day you are asked to protect a single industry; to-morrow there will be another, because it is impossible to create two classes of citizens in this country, one which is protected and another which is not. If we do not wish to divide the country we must protect all alike.

Now, to protect every one or to protect no one amounts to exactly the same thing.

A Judicious Tariff the Hope of the South.

SPEECH OF HON. W. H. FELTON,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 18, 1881.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7098) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes—

Mr. FELTON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am not a protectionist; I am not a free-trader, and especially I am not the advocate of a tariff which is levied for revenue only. I believe that the revenues of the Government should be raised by duties levied upon imported foreign commodities and those duties should be so arranged and imposed as to afford encouragement and protection to American industries. They should discriminate in favor of home production. There are, in my judgment, two objects in view whenever a judicious tariff is levied and collected by this Government: First, revenue; second, incidental protection to our own industries. If the tariff upon any article is so exorbitant as to exclude it from our ports, then the first object of all wise tariff legislation, the raising of revenue, is lost sight of, and such a tariff is purely in the interest of the manufacturer—of a class, of a monopoly. If, on the other hand, the duty is so low as to permit foreign labor and foreign capital to suppress any particular branch of our home industries, then the second object of a wise tariff is destroyed, competition in production is broken down, manufacturers combine, prices advance, and consumers are oppressed.

A great many people and some members of Congress seem to believe that the work of tariff reform is the work of a day. That without investigation it is only necessary to hear the opinion of some clever political leader, who is perhaps little acquainted with practical business pursuits—either commercial, agricultural, or manufacturing—in order to enable a committee of the House of Representatives to frame a tariff bill which shall affect for weal or woe every business interest in the United States. There is no subject on which crude and hasty legislation can accomplish so much evil, destroy or cripple so many industries, wipe out so many fortunes, and impoverish so many of our laboring population. Sometimes when we imagine that we are cheapening an article by removing the duty thereon and that we are thus bringing relief to the consumers of said article, we find that we are only preparing the way for combinations in trade and for speculators, that immediately after removal of the impost duty on such an article the price is wonderfully augmented and the consumer is in nowise benefited.

Sometimes when we persuade ourselves that only one article of consumption or only one industry is to be affected by our "tariff tinkering," we find that we are engaged in legislation, the influence of which ramifies in every direction, touches almost every industry, affects the manufacturer, affects the farmer, affects the merchant, affects the health and knowledge of the people, indeed affects all the sources of wealth and civilization.

The material industries and enterprises of this country, while composed of many members, form one beautiful whole, one system "compact together like a temple built up" with living stones; if you impair one you impair all. Like the human body with its various members, if one suffers all are in sympathy. If manufacturing enterprises are depressed the agriculturist finds his markets curtailed, his profits reduced, and his lands depreciated in value. If agriculture, the mainspring of all productive wealth, is oppressed by legislation or blighted by unpropitious seasons, then depression, stagnation, and business ruin spreads through the land.

These are mutually dependent, and so also with the several parts in each of these grand divisions of productive labor. Hence the difficulty of framing with exact justice a tariff bill, and more especially the difficulty of selecting a few articles for tariff revision without including the entire list.

This work should be committed to a commission whose members should be experts in trade, in manufactures, and in agriculture, familiar with all the details of practical business pursuits; no theorists, no dreamers, no schoolmen who derive their knowledge from technical books written in advocacy of certain political theories, but from men who have learned wisdom in the factory, at the furnace, in the counting-room, or in the field of practical agriculture.

Especially this commission should be non-partisan in its character, free from the prejudices and passions of political aspirants.

I have sometimes heard it suggested that the democratic party must make a platform on this tariff question; that agitation and discussion is necessary even if nothing practical is accomplished; that the party must keep its eyes steadily fixed upon party success.

With all respect for the eloquent gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] it seems to me these resolutions now under consideration, and of which he is the author, are intended as a mere party maneuver; that his design is to make them act as a sort of cog-wheel in the political machinery of the future rather than that they should have any practical bearing or significance whatever. Thus it is proposed to subject the material interests of the country, the great interests of agriculture and manufactures, to the arbitrament of politics.

Let us eliminate from our political platforms as far as practicable this business question, for the whole country would rather risk the combined wisdom of one intelligent farmer, one manufacturer, and one merchant upon all matters of trade and production than to risk the unaided wisdom of a thousand wrangling and discordant politicians. Then let this tariff question, these reforms which are so desirable, be carefully investigated by business men, and let their report thereon be the guide and directory for congressional legislation.

In discussing this subject we must never forget the two objects of all just tariff laws, their original purpose, namely, to raise the money necessary to support the Government, and the incidental protection afforded thereby to our home industries.

I imagine there are but few American citizens who favor a prohibitory tariff, who are willing to adopt an exclusive system of trade and shut out all foreign nations from our markets. Foreign commerce is essential to our civilization, contributes to our wealth and our intelligence. It means progress, growth in all the arts, the acquisition of the comforts and luxuries of life. Its suppression means national decay. We retrograde as our commerce is diminished, and when it disappears ignorance, poverty, and crime are in the ascendant. If there were no revenues to be raised and no encouragement afforded to our industries, then no man would advocate a tariff for the simple purpose of excluding foreign workshops and the products of other climes from competition with our own industries. Prohibitory tariffs not only shut out foreign products from our markets, but they exclude our domestic products, in some measure, from foreign markets. We impoverish our foreign customers, and they cease to buy because they cannot pay. We will not receive in exchange for our industrial products the only commodities they have for international trade. Hence, prohibitory tariffs would soon confine us to our own domestic markets, and would speedily blot out all incentives to increased work and enterprise.

Again, tariff laws should not be enacted for the simple purpose of protecting our productive industries. If no revenue was needed by the Government, it is reasonable to suppose that no considerable number of our citizens would advocate a duty upon imported goods as a mere bonus to American manufacturers. It is true the necessity for American independence of foreign governments, the absolute necessity for a home supply of the leading articles of manufactured goods when our ports should be blockaded, or when European wars should diminish foreign production, might lead the wise and prudent statesman to offer even a bounty pure and simple to some agricultural or manufacturing industry while in its infancy. It is true the wise legislator, in order to create competition, destroy combinations, multiply production, and thus cheapen the price of a commodity, might be induced to impose a considerable tariff upon that commodity without regard to the revenues arising therefrom.

This is illustrated in some measure by the earnest manner in which Alexander Hamilton, in 1791, urged upon Congress the importance of levying a duty of two cents per pound upon nails. It would not do for the United States to be dependent upon Europe for this indispensable iron manufacture. He said:

> The expediency of an additional duty is indicated by an important fact. About one million eight hundred thousand pounds of them were imported into the United States in the course of a year ending the 30th of September, 1790. A duty of two cents per pound would, it is presumable, speedily put an end to so considerable an importation. And it is in every view proper that an end should be put to it.

He also, as Secretary of the Treasury, urged upon Congress the same considerations in reference to bar-iron, steel, and castings, or hollow-ware. The duty on steel at that time was seventy-five cents per cwt., and he recommended an increase of $1 per cwt.

Hamilton, with all his faults—and these faults were numerous and glaring—was yet one of the grandest intellects this country has ever produced, while his patriotism was unquestioned by his bravest and purest contemporaries. Thus we see that he pressed upon the consideration of Congress the necessity of protecting with a prohibitory tariff those infant industries which were essential to the wealth and independence of the nation.

It will be remembered that the duty on raw cotton at that time was three cents per pound, which our fathers levied in order to protect the cultivation of cotton in the Carolinas and Georgia, and to shut out the importation of cotton from Cayenne, Surinam, and Demerara; and though Hamilton recommended the abolition of this tax on the raw material, he did suggest a bounty on domestic grown cotton when wrought at a home manufactory, and also an increase of customs duties on all manufactured cottons for the purpose of stimulating its growth in the Southern States. Under the fostering care of the Government in the days of its infancy the growth of cotton in the South was rapidly developed. The production of iron has gone on multiplying, and to-day both in cotton and iron industries, we are independent of the world.

These were the sentiments of the founders of our Government. But the infantile days of a majority of our industries have passed, and it is no longer the part of wisdom or patriotism to levy impost duties for the purpose of protection only. Why, then, advocate a tariff? First, that we may raise the money which is necessary to meet the expenditures of the Government.

We owe a debt of nearly two billion dollars. The interest on this debt, after refunding at 3 per cent., will be nearly one hundred million dollars per annum. In addition to this our civil and military appropriations are extravagantly large. Our pension list alone is increasing with fearful rapidity, and unless checked will in a few years absorb the larger part of our present revenues. All together it requires nearly two hundred and eighty million dollars per annum to support our Government, exclusive of the principal of our public debt, which principal, unless paid as rapidly as our resources may authorize, will fasten on this country the most terrible monopoly that ever crushed the enterprises and liberties of a people. How, I repeat, shall we raise this vast sum of money? Shall we do it by direct or indirect taxation? Shall we do it by taxing our own industries or by taxing the industries of foreign governments? Sometimes in our zeal for free trade, falsely so called, we forget that we are opposing a tariff system which, if abolished, would of necessity send the Federal tax assessor with his summary processes into our agricultural districts, out upon our farms, into our quiet and happy homes, there to levy and collect from our lands, our farming implements, and all the possessions of our farming population this enormous sum of money which is required for the support of the Government.

Even the execution of our present excise laws—the collection of the tax upon our industries of tobacco, whisky, licenses, and stamps—covers the country with a consuming horde of tax-gatherers, and gives rise to litigations, frauds, and oppressions innumerable. But who can conceive the annoyances, the tyrannies, the corruptions, and the suffering that would attend the collection of the entire revenues of the country directly from the people. By this tariff system of raising revenue the man who buys most is taxed most, the man who buys but little is taxed but little; and under its operation it is possible for the independent farmer, the self-supporting, self-sustaining agriculturist of the United States to live comparatively exempt from Federal taxation. These tariff laws should always discriminate in favor of the agriculturist. We should keep the duties on those commodities which he is compelled to buy at the lowest standard compatible with their greatest production—duties that will prevent foreign manufacturers from controlling the market of said articles and at the same time stimulate and multiply their home manufacture.

It is possible that the more important of these articles which are of prime necessity to the farmer, and which cannot be produced or grown in this country, should be placed on the free list. He should be comparatively exempt from taxation, because he is the great wealth-producer of the nation. His occupation is the motive power which drives all the manufacturing machinery of the world, and every act of legislation should carefully guard his interests.

But if the utopian scheme of free trade is ever consummated in this country, and the revenues of the Government should be raised by direct taxation—taxation of property, or by laws authorizing the taxation of our own industries similar to the internal revenue laws now in force—then agriculture, the foundation of all wealth, will be the industry on which it will bear most heavily, and which will feel most sensitively the burdens of Federal taxation. Large commercial cities like New York are fully conscious of this truth, for they not only amass their colossal fortunes by handling imported foreign goods, but they know if free trade and direct taxation should be resorted to by the Government, then the burdens of that Government would be transferred from their warehouses to the lands and productions of our agricultural population. New York's importunity for low duties and free trade is the prompting of supreme selfishness. Of course this city would abolish all tariffs, that all the commodities consumed in the United States might enter through her mercantile establishments, and by their rich deposits swell the already overgrown wealth and power of this commercial emporium.

I trust the day will never come when the revenues of this country will be collected directly from the people or indirectly from our own industries. Free trade forces the Government to resort to this mode of taxation. Hence I believe that the term free trade is used by intelligent citizens more as a party shibboleth than as an expression having practical significance. Free trade per se is a dream, a vision which has floated through the brains of impracticable politicians and theoretical schoolmen in all ages; but which was never designed for or adopted by any modern nation.

It is true, England since 1845 claims to have abandoned the protective policy and to have adopted free trade. She claims now in her age and infirmities to be a reformer. After having grown gray in practicing the most selfish and exclusive system of trade that ever enriched and disgraced a nation, she now makes broad her phylacteries and invites the United States to embrace her doctrines of free trade.

But if we examine this philanthropic pretension we will find that under the guise of free trade she is still protecting her spindles and furnaces with the same exacting selfishness that has ever made her the grasping and monopolizing power of the world. She made breadstuffs free in 1846, because an increased supply of food was essential to the continuance and prosperity of her manufacturing establishments. These breadstuffs were regarded as "raw material," which, in the philosophy of protectionists, must always be free for the benefit of manufacturers. Other customs duties were abolished because by her high protective system for years she had well-nigh succeeded in crushing out all rivals. Because by her improved machinery, her skilled artisans, her cheap labor, and her secured and firmly established position in the markets of the world she was able to compete successfully with all the nations which she could persuade to adopt her reform measures. In 1801 she abolished all duties on Irish manufactures, but retained her own protective duties, compelled Ireland to buy from her own manufacturing lords, and forced this conquered people to rely only on agricultural pursuits for a support.

Thus England has succeeded in making Ireland the poorest and most hopeless land in Europe. When famines come she has no money to buy food. Her surplus population must seek homes in foreign countries, and thus, with a starving and helpless peasantry, Ireland stands out as a forcible illustration of the boasted free-trade system of England. She also destroyed the cotton manufactures of India by forbidding the importation of Indian cotton goods in the year 1700, because they would injure her domestic manufactures. By prohibiting the export of machinery and workmen by whom machines could be made and by lessening the Indian duties very soon English manufactured goods flooded all India and made the owners of English spindles immensely rich.

I need not describe the efforts of England to obtain a monopoly of the markets of the United States, her efforts to prevent these States from ever becoming a manufacturing nation, her efforts to break down the cultivation of cotton in the Southern States, and her untiring efforts to build up the cultivation of that crop in India and Egypt. No, sir; England has never ceased in her labors to destroy foreign competition with her manufacturing establishments, and to "gain and keep possession of foreign markets" for her manufactured products. She has protected those establishments at the expense of all other industries, until her national existence is inseparable from them. Her free trade, I repeat, is protection to these manufacturing industries; and she never wages a war or annexes a distant territory or enacts a law without direct reference to these sources of her strength. This great political power, this center of the world's wealth and intelligence, keeps only one principle at the helm of state, and that is unconditional and unlimited protection to English manufactures.

I need not refer particularly to her system of internal taxation. She still collects from customs £20,316,000, and to raise her remaining revenue she collects from—

Excise	£27,400,000
Stamps	10,670,000
Land and house tax	2,720,000
Income tax	8,710,000
Post-office	6,240,000
Telegraphs	1,335,000
Crown lands	410,000
Other internal sources	5,300,000

Here you have a picture of free-trade England. She has removed in some measure her impost duties and transferred her burdens to the property and business pursuits of her citizens. Over three hundred million dollars extracted from her farmers, her merchants, and her laborers; real estate, sales, incomes, furniture, light, heat, books, food, spirits, medicines, almost everything that a man eats, wears, or drinks, almost everything that he possesses or can hope ever to possess, is taxed to support that government. Under this policy of heaping a mountain of taxation upon her own people and allowing foreigners comparatively free access to her markets, she has succeeded in centralizing her immense wealth in a few families and entailing greater poverty upon the majority of her laboring population than any other European government.

To this condition would those who advocate the abolition of revenue tariffs bring these United States—all wealth concentrated in the hands of the few, and grinding poverty the entailed lot of the laboring, tax-paying multitude.

Then let us raise our revenues by taxing foreign factories and work-shops, foreign furnaces and fields, foreign labor and production, rather than our own industries. Whenever the question is presented, "Who will you sustain and benefit by your legislation; American citizens, American laborers, who defend us in war and enrich us in peace, whose virtues and patriotism are the strength of the nation, or the pauper laborers of European and Asiatic despotisms?" I will unquestionably decide in favor of my native land. The glory and power of the "American system" consists largely in the fact that it prefers home to strangers, and delights to honor and strengthen American citizenship, rather than those who pay allegiance to foreign crowns.

If the necessity was not upon us to raise an immense sum of money to meet the payment of our national debt, the interest thereon, and other public expenditures, I repeat it would be desirable to have a large free list, placing thereon those articles of prime necessity, such as tea, coffee, and every article of food or medicine not abundantly within the producing capacity of our labor and soil. But during these necessities of the Government this free list must be limited, and we must reduce the tariff on many of these articles to that standard, specific or ad valorem, which will bring revenue to the Government and cause their greatest consumption among the people.

The importance of a tariff for revenue being apparent, let us inquire more particularly as to the importance of so arranging these impost duties that they afford incidental protection to our industries, especially that they may discriminate in favor of the grain, cotton, and iron industries of this country.

Every citizen of the United States knows that the present and prospective wealth of our common country is inseparable from these three great products. They are our leading resources. They have valuable auxiliaries, it is true; mighty dependencies which cluster around them; but they are the central industries which give assurance to every American citizen that he has a country destined for material supremacy among the nations of the world.

I am glad to know that the section which I in part represent is intimately connected with these three great products of our fields and mines, producing the raw material in sufficient quantity to secure for its citizens a future of wealth and prosperity unsurpassed by any other section of the Union. Shall we, just as this future is opening so full of promise, after New England and the Middle States have grown immensely rich under the fostering care of our tariff laws; shall we, just as railroads and improved river navigation are multiplying routes of transportation and cheapening freights; just as iron-ore and manganese, coal-fields, copper and gold veins are being developed in rich and inexhaustible quantities; just as furnaces and cotton-factories are rapidly springing up all over the South, especially in Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and Virginia; just at the time when we are inviting the capital and skilled labor of the North to locate in our beautiful mountains and fertile valleys, with a soil fruitful in every agricultural product; just when we hope to transfer the spindles of Massachusetts and the rolling-mills of Pennsylvania to the States above named; finally, just as we are emerging from the night of our poverty, shall we strike down all encouraging duties on these industries and send the South back to its helpless dependence upon European markets?

I am told the South can manufacture successfully independent of this protective policy. Strange it has never distinguished itself heretofore as a manufacturing section, with all the aids furnished by this tariff system. It would be as wise to demand that all friendly support should be removed from the infant venturing upon its first steps as for southern men at this time to require the removal of these protecting influences. For I find the limited number of cotton and iron manufactories now in the South liable to and influenced by the fluctuations which increase or diminish the profits of northern manufactories, and it seems to me unreasonable to suppose that northern or European capital will seek investment in southern manufacturing establishments when all enterprises of this character throughout the North are prostrated by the repeal of our tariff system. No, sir, the free trade doctrines eloquently expressed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] are nothing more than a notice served upon the owners of those splendid cotton-mills in Augusta, Columbus, Roswell, Tryon, and others in Georgia, that if his views are successful they must close up in poverty and ruin. It is simply a notice served on every capitalist in New England and Europe not to venture a dollar in southern cotton-mills and iron furnaces until it can be seen if the American Congress will ratify his utterances. God help the South, for vain is the help of party and politicians!

The Southern States export about one hundred and sixty-two million dollars' worth of cotton per annum, and it is shipped back in the shape of iron, steel, silks, broadcloths, wines, brandies, cotton fabrics, woolens, and the thousand and one commodities which our people consume. We ship raw cotton to the value of some eighty million dollars per annum to northern factories and receive in return therefor the products of northern workshops. These returns both from Europe and the Northern States reach us enhanced in value almost beyond computation over the price we obtained for our lint cotton. A bale of cotton when it leaves the gin-house of the Georgia farmer is worth $50. When the same bale is returned to the Georgia consumer from Europe and New England in the shape as indicated above, it is worth from one hundred to two hundred dollars. Mr. Carey illustrates this increased value thus:

> The man of Tennessee sends his cotton to Manchester to be twisted. His corn goes along with it to feed the man who twists it. It leaves him worth twenty cents. By the time it is consumed by the Manchester spinner it is worth perhaps a dollar. The laborer buys it at that price. The manufacturer gives him a dollar to pay for it, and he charges it to the cloth at $1.10. The corn and cotton become cloth, and the Tennessee man buys it back paying five bales for one.

Transportation, all the expense and profits of the manufacturing process, all the commissions and percentage of intervening merchants and brokers, and at the end of the year when accounts are balanced the cotton-planter of Georgia and the corn-grower of Tennessee have made no progress in wealth. This has been our history for years; poorer and poorer because the farmer refuses to bring the "loom to the cotton and the anvil to the food," and persists in sending the mass of cotton and food year after year in search of the loom and anvil.

Yes, sir, let our revenue tariff discriminate in favor of cotton and iron manufactories, because these manufacturing establishments benefit and enrich the farmer and the day-laborer.

I repeat that all the legislation of this country should especially guard the interest of the farmer. Whatever promises him wealth is worthy of trial, and whatever threatens to retard his growth in wealth should be abandoned.

These manufacturing establishments enhance the market value of his land; they bring population, attract capital, build towns and cities, create markets for all farm products, and multiply routes of transportation. The sole cause for the difference in the price of land anywhere (quality being equal) is to be found in its proximity to or distance from a good market. Why is it that lands in Upper Georgia, capable of such varied and prolific production, are not equal in market value to the less intrinsically valuable lands of Pennsylvania, New York, and New England? There is no comparison in the natural fertility of the two soils, or in the richness and variety of their products. The mineral resources of Upper Georgia are fully equal to the mineral wealth of any northern State. The reason for this difference in the value of land is apparent. Everything produced on the lands of the Pennsylvania farmer, from a garden vegetable to a ton of hay, the products of dairy and orchard, of stall and vineyard, all find a constant and remunerative home market. There is a dense population there, cities are there, railroads traverse every settlement, with rivers made navigable by Government aid. These have made their lands valuable. What has attracted that population? What has built those cities, constructed those railroads, and is crowding those navigable rivers with costly freight? I answer, their manufacturing industries.

Why is it that the naturally bleak and sterile lands of Massachusetts, with their limited products, are so valuable, while the lands of upper Georgia and Alabama are comparatively so inferior in market value? It is because the citizens of Massachusetts have availed themselves of the benefits of our tariff laws and erected factories and workshops to manufacture the products of the lands of Georgia and Alabama, while we of the South have said "none of these things for us." We have caught up the shibboleth of some political leader and shouted the absurd cry that tariff laws discriminating in favor of factories and furnaces were antagonistic to agricultural pursuits, while Yankee skill and Yankee energy, Yankee enterprise and Yankee manhood were carving fortunes from the raw products of our labor.

Here is Virginia. How we honor the old State! There is not an American citizen who does not feel his heart thrill with emotion at the mention of the name of the grand old Commonwealth. But even before the war she felt the approaching doom of agricultural poverty. There she is to-day, many of her once valuable farms exhausted, much of her territory a worn-out, sterile "old field," with meager and stinted crops for the support of her laboring population. She has iron-ore and coal, and water-power enough, if developed, to make an empire rich—enough to attract a sufficient population to restore her waste places and consume all the products of an improved tillage. Yet in the midst of her retrogression many of her citizens adhere to the teachings of the free-trade schools.

Here is South Carolina. My eloquent friend [Mr. O'CONNOR] said during the last session of this Congress that South Carolina was the first State in this Union to raise the banner of free trade. Yes, sir. How my heart leaps with pride as I recall the names of Hayne, McDuffee, and Calhoun. While Calhoun lived this State felt very much like the boatman who was rowing Cæsar across the water: a storm arose, and ignorant of the character of his passenger he became alarmed and agitated. Cæsar observing his trepidation cried out, "Cur times? Cæsarem vehis!" Instantly his agitation ceased and he landed his royal passenger in safety.

The South had unbounded confidence in Mr. Calhoun, in his great intellect and his patriotism. But Mr. Calhoun is gone; the South which he represented and many of the political doctrines which were then applicable to the South are all gone; free trade and the nullification of tariff laws are gone never to return. There is his State, and as I now look at some of her once flourishing towns and some of her once fertile and productive lands I am almost reminded of the prophet's description of the destruction and desolation of Babylon. But South Carolina has produced, and is yet capable of producing, incalculable wealth. The products of South Carolina have built up Manchester in England, and Lowell and Fall River in Massachusetts, and many other manufacturing cities in New England.

She reminds me of the mother who dies in giving birth to her child. She has given birth to more wealth than any State in this Union, and yet the throes of the parturition have destroyed her. She is the State over which the first banner of free trade floated. She has fine water-power in her upper counties. I believe one of the first iron furnaces ever erected in a Southern State was built in South Carolina, but free-trade prejudices and theories strangled it. If this State had manufactured the raw materials which it has so abundantly produced, her lands would still be valuable and the State powerful. But alas! her political theory was "sell in foreign markets, buy in foreign markets." Old England and New England are dependent on us for their cotton and we can dictate commercial law to the world.

The war came on. Old England encouraged the growth of cotton in India and Egypt. New England snapped its fingers in the face of South Carolina, and there she lies to-day under the first banner of free trade, desolate and poor. She has sown, but others have reaped. She has planted and watered, but others have gathered the increase.

By encouraging and building up these manufacturing industries we create additional consumers for our agricultural products, and thus increase their value. Formerly southern planters were dependent upon Liverpool merchants and Manchester spinners for the price of cotton. These spinners were the sole purchasers of cotton; they formed combinations in the trade; raw cotton declined and manufactured cotton advanced in price, according to the caprice or interest of these cotton lords. But New England to-day, under the operation of our tariff laws, is a competitive bidder for our cotton, and foreign avarice and foreign capital are no longer the undisputed masters of southern cotton-fields; and I verily believe, if political madness fails in abolishing these laws, the time will soon come when Georgia spinners will be able to price the cotton grown on Georgia soil.

These laws advance the value of all agricultural products. Suppose all the millions who are soon to inhabit this country were to devote their labor to agricultural pursuits. Where would the West find a market for its wheat? It would not pay for the reaping; glut, stagnation, poverty, would cover the land. Crush out the manufacturing establishments of this country, and you multiply indefinitely the number engaged in agricultural labor and increase agricultural products indefinitely; you crowd the European markets with our cotton and breadstuffs, and the inevitable result would be that agricultural labor and products would decline 100 per cent., financial ruin would overtake our agricultural population.

Again, by this diversity of pursuits we create an additional demand for labor, and thus advance the wages of the day laborer. There is nothing the South needs more than a general advance in the prices paid for labor and the products thereof. There is nothing which indicates the prosperity of a country more than the demand for and the rewards or wages of labor. The man who creates wealth by his labor must have remunerative wages or the whole country retrogrades. He must have the means to command the comforts of life—food, raiment, and education; he must have good opportunity to accumulate property—a farm, a home for himself. These results can only be attained by advancing the profits of labor.

As a farmer myself and the representative of farmers, I am satisfied that no class of our population reap so many benefits from a judicious tariff, discriminating in favor of American industries, as our "toilers of the soil." And when the day comes, as come it will, when the congressional district I represent shall convert all its iron and coal, all its cotton and grain, into manufactured fabrics, then will our farmers have reached that prosperity which secures wealth and all that wealth can purchase.

It is especially in iron that this section of Georgia is so vitally concerned, and which, in connection with our fertile lands and valuable agricultural resources, is destined to make this portion of the State, in conjunction with the adjoining portions of Alabama and Tennessee, the wealth-gatherer of the South. We want no political abstractions to project their shadows across this promising future. We want no legislative interference with the present and prospective growth of this portion of the South, and while we believe that some reforms in our present tariff should be effected—its irregularities adjusted, its discordances harmonized, and the duty on many articles reduced—still we now and forever desire a tariff for revenue, with protection to American industries.

Department of Agriculture.

SPEECH OF HON. E. B. FINLEY,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

Mr. FINLEY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When the democratic party at Cincinnati declared in favor of "a tariff for revenue only" it struck a key-note in the interest of the great West and South.

I am not surprised that the manufacturers of New England or the iron men of Pennsylvania favor a protective tariff. Why not? It brings water to their mills. They are the beneficiaries of a protective tariff, and why should they not favor it? But in the great grain-producing, non-manufacturing regions of the West and South, where the masses are purchasers and consumers of the products of protected industries, the interests of the people lie in a tariff for revenue only. Being consumers, our interests lie in cheap markets; and cheap markets grow out of unrestricted trade with the commerce of the world. I do not favor free-trade absolutely. We must raise revenue, and a certain duty is necessary for that purpose.

The statesmanship that imposes unnecessary burdens upon labor is, to say the least of it, unwise; and when such statesmanship legislates in favor of the few, and against the interests of the many, it is arbitrary and unjust. If the rule of the greatest good to the greatest number is to be respected, the interests of the great body of our farmers and other laborers are first to be regarded in questions of political economy.

The average intelligent farmer knows that the law of taxation is necessary for the maintenance of government, and he voluntarily pays his taxes for this purpose; but he at once sees that the law is unjust if it imposes a proportionally greater burden upon his class than it does upon some other productive or non-productive class of the people. Where such a tax is a direct one, its unjust operation may easily be seen; but if it is an indirect tax, its injustice is not so patent.

Reciprocity of obligation, and advantages for all classes of the people, is the true spirit of our institutions; it is the true principle of democracy in social laws; and the observance of a just reciprocity in legislation affecting productive industry is quite as necessary as that affecting any other part of our political or economical relations. As with classes of people under civil laws, so it is with classes of productive labor under economic laws; they must forego some profit or advantage incident to their own industry for the benefit of some other class of people, so that obligations and advantages may be most equally distributed. This is merely maintaining a sound political economy—a just reciprocity. If, however, any industry has any undue advantage, reciprocity is destroyed; the system that permits it is unjust, and those who are injured by it are in a state of oppression. If the oppression is severe and extensive, the people who suffer from it are not, under the laws which create or permit the existing condition, the equals of the favored class; on the contrary, they are to the extent of the oppression their slaves, bound to that extent to labor for the benefit of the favored class.

As with social and productive laws, so it is with the laws of trade and commerce—a just reciprocity is their true spirit. Indeed, in the latter case, in international trade, where the laws of one country cannot control the other, reciprocity is enforced by the mere fact of international trade. The trade is one of exchange of products, and not of sale of goods for cash. To illustrate this, I call attention to the following figures from the United States Bureau of Statistics:

Value of our net exports for five years ending June 30, 1880	$3,318,479,338
Value of imports for same period	2,397,299,494
Balance apparently in favor of the United States	921,179,844

This shows an enormous international commerce, an enormous exchange of products; the balance in our favor represents cash—a debt that would bankrupt Europe to pay in cash. Europe would never have incurred her enormous portion of the debt if she had expected to pay it in cash; and we would not have trusted her. We would have gauged our exports to her ability to pay if we had expected cash; in other words, we would have exported several hundred million dollars' worth less of our products in that period. But the fact is, there is another ledger account to be considered. Our bonded debt, a good deal of our State and national debt, and much more of our railroad debt appears in foreign ledgers. The payment of the interest of this debt and a small reduction of the principal almost wipes out the foregoing balance, as the following statement of the net imports and exports of gold and silver coin and bullion for the same period shows:

Net imports of gold, silver, coin, and bullion	$158,451,937
Net exports of same	147,138,242
Balance of cash paid to us in five years	11,313,695

An average of $2,262,739 per annum.

This $2,262,739 is our real "balance of trade" of which our republican friends have boasted so long and loudly.

Does any sane man suppose we would find a market in foreign countries for three and one-third billions of dollars' worth of our products every five years were our railroad and other foreign debts paid, unless we took in exchange a proportional value of their products? Could these countries afford to trade with us if they had to remit $921,179,844 in cash every fifth year? Such trade in ten years would empty the coffers of Europe into the United States and render coin utterly valueless for the purposes of money. This would be the logical result of a protective tariff which would close our ports to foreign commerce.

Our exports are mainly agricultural products, and our imports are mainly manufactured articles. If we had a home market for these surplus products, there might be some policy in saying to our farmers, "Buy only from our own manufacturers; you can get as good a price at home as abroad for your products, and it is patriotic to pay a higher price for American products than for foreign manufactures."

But we have no such home markets for our agricultural products, and until we have it would be foolish for our farmers to favor a policy that must necessarily tend to destroy our export trade, since that trade exists by and depends upon just reciprocity; an exchange of one commodity for another. Small cash-paid balances, now on one side, again on the other, are not important; but heavy balances to be paid in cash are fatal to international trade.

The republican party is not only the advocate of a tariff for revenue, but is the champion of a prohibitory tariff, claiming that such a tariff is a protection to American labor. So far as a tariff for revenue is concerned, there can be no serious dispute as to its propriety, if it is imposed upon articles that do not increase the cost of home production. Taxation falls upon labor, either directly or indirectly. All non-producers live upon the labor of the producers. All wealth is derived from the products of labor. If the farmer did not till the soil and the miner did not delve in the bowels of the earth, whence would come our wealth?

The farmer is the great provider, the great tax-payer, because he is the great producer. He pays the taxes or affords the means to others to do so. Therefore it matters little to labor whether the taxes necessary for the support of Government are collected by a direct or indirect tax, as the burden falls upon the producer, and the masses are the producers. If the tax is an indirect one, as, for instance, a tariff, the masses, being the consumers, pay for it. Figure it as we may, taxation falls upon productive labor; hence it should be judiciously imposed, so as to least affect the means of production. Having attempted to show that a so-called protective tariff is impolitic and tends to decrease if not destroy our export trade, I propose to show by statistics that such a tariff, instead of being a benefit and protection to labor, is a grievous burden upon it. I herewith submit a table of figures, taken from the ninth census report, showing the profits realized by the principal manufacturers throughout the United States on their capital invested, together with the average wages paid to labor, as follows:

Table illustrating the operations of a "protective tariff" as shown for the year 1870 in the Ninth Census Report of the United States.

Some of the principal manufactures.	Number of hands employed.	Amount of capital employed, including machinery and real estate.	Value of products.	Deduct from value of products—			Amount of profits realized.	Percentage of profit on capital.	Average wages of each hand employed per annum.
				Value of the materials used and consumed in manufactures.	Wages paid.	Total expenses of manufacture.
Agricultural implements	25,249	$34,834,000	$52,066,000	$21,473,000	$12,151,000	$33,624,000	$18,442,000	52.90	$409 00
Sawed lumber	150,000	143,493,000	210,159,000	103,343,000	40,000,000	143,343,000	66,816,000	46.50	266 00
Steel	2,437	6,345,000	9,609,000	5,166,000	1,651,000	6,817,000	2,792,000	44.00	677 00
Pig-iron	27,554	56,145,000	69,640,000	45,498,000	12,475,000	57,973,000	11,667,000	20.75	452 00
Cast-iron	51,305	67,578,000	99,843,000	48,222,000	28,835,000	77,057,000	22,786,000	33.71	562 00
Rolled iron	44,662	54,774,000	120,311,000	79,176,000	25,192,000	104,368,000	15,943,000	29.10	564 00
Forged iron	3,588	4,620,000	8,385,000	5,011,000	1,975,000	6,986,000	1,399,000	30.28	550 00
Nails and tacks	7,353	8,043,000	23,101,000	17,786,000	3,721,000	21,507,000	1,594,000	19.80	506 00
Worsted goods	12,920	10,085,000	22,090,000	14,308,000	4,368,000	18,676,000	3,413,000	33.84	338 00
Woolen goods	80,053	98,824,000	155,405,000	96,432,000	26,877,000	123,309,000	32,096,000	32.50	335 00
Cotton goods	135,369	140,706,000	177,489,000	111,736,000	39,044,000	150,780,000	26,709,000	19.00	288 00
Total	540,490	625,447,000	948,098,000	548,151,000	196,289,000	744,440,000	203,657,000	32.56	363 17

It will be observed by the foregoing table that our most important manufacturing industries yielded on the average a profit of 32.56 per cent. per annum in the year 1870 on the capital employed, while the average wages paid was $363.17 per annum, or an average of $1.16 per day or $6.96 per week, counting every working-day in the year. While the protected manufacturer pockets his 32.56 per cent. annual profit on his capital and labor employed, the farmer of the West and South who buys his wares, who pays the bulk of the tax, does not realize 3 per cent. on his capital and labor.

I have not the data from which to tabulate for any subsequent year, and the statistics will not be obtainable until after the publication of the Tenth Census report; but it is safe to say that capital has been growing and manufactures increasing in the United States yearly since 1870, with but a slight interruption in 1873–'74, and that the profits have not been decreasing, but, on the contrary, increasing and likely to continue to increase if the tariff laws are not modified. The "business boom" may not be a boom to the farmer or the average consumer of manufactured articles; but there can be no question that the great manufacturing "boom" will yield enormous profits to those who own the capital employed in that branch of our industries.

An important question is, out of whose pockets do these enormous profits come? With the exception of a few expensive agricultural implements, and a few cheap cotton goods, for which a mere temporary demand exists in the East Indies, our manufactures are mainly consumed at home, because a high tariff makes the home market the best. Farmers and miners produce the raw material used in the economy of civilized life. Railroads, steamboats, canal-boats, and ships carry these products to the markets, and the heaviest cost of transportation falls upon the raw material because of its bulk. Iron and lumber are the materials used in constructing ships, railroads, rolling-stock, and other vehicles of transportation. If we have cheap transportation, both the producer and consumer of the goods and products shipped are benefited. We cannot, however, have cheap transportation while the manufacturers of the iron, steel, and lumber used in constructing and keeping in repair our vehicles of transportation derive an average annual profit of 36.46 per cent. on the articles supplied for these purposes.

The capital invested in 1870 in sawed lumber and iron and steel manufactures was $332,955,000, and the profits on the capital invested that year amounted to $120,403,000, a snug profit of over 36 per cent. Contrast these results with the profit derived by the farmer on his capital. After paying hired labor and allowing equal wages for himself he will not have 3 per cent. left, as I will show hereafter. Yet the manufacturer, from the sale of his wares, (enhanced in value by a protective tariff, paid mainly, as I have shown, by the farmers and consumers of the West and South,) can double his enormous capital once every three years from his profits, and still have an annual profit of more than 3 per cent. per annum left. The railroad is as much a farm appendage now as the Conestoga wagon was forty years ago. It is freight and not passenger traffic that supports railroads. There are thousands of miles of railroads. The farmer, the laborer, the mechanic, and their families number millions. Capitalists and manufacturers, thousands. Yet the millions of consumers, the thousands of miles of railroads must be taxed outrageously in order that these manufacturers may have a monopoly of the trade, and an annual profit of 36.46 per cent. of their capital.

This is an illustration of the operations of a so-called protective tariff. I have taken only such manufactures as are mainly consumed or used in productive labor in the United States for an illustration. Sawed lumber, steel, iron, domestic worsted, woolen and cotton goods; these articles are the daily necessaries of life to the farmer, and in fact to all productive labor; and to tell the consumers of these fabrics and products, men who toil year after year, from sunrise to sunset, rain or shine, for a bare subsistence, or at least a 3 or 5 per cent. profit on their muscle or money or farm capital, "that the maintenance of a high tariff" that opens the door for such an enormous profit to the manufacturers is "protection to American labor," is an insult to their intelligence.

Labor has no share in the manufacturer's profits. Manufacturing is not yet conducted on the co-operative plan. We do not export any appreciable amounts of our most extensive and important classes of manufactures. They are mainly consumed at home. Therefore the 32 or 33 or 36 or 40 or 50 or 56 per cent. profit, as the case may be, comes out of the pockets of the American consumers, the farmers and other industrial laboring classes, who have to pay the manufacturers, even on the necessary articles named in the foregoing table, an annual profit of 32 to 56 per cent. on the capital—a profit on the articles purchased of $203,657,000 per annum.

That was the amount ten years ago. What is it now? The percentage of profit is at least the same as it was then. Business is "booming," but the manufacturers' enormous profits are "boomed" out of the pockets of the American farmers and American laborers. It is safe to say that the two hundred and three millions per annum of ten years ago will amount to three hundred and three millions per annum now—almost a million dollars a day for each working day of the year out of the pockets of labor and into the pockets of the great manufacturer who so piteously appeals to Congress to protect American labor from "European competition." When American farmers and other American laborers can count their annual profits at an average of 32 to 56 per cent. of their capital or of the value of their annual labor, a protective tariff upon the daily necessities and means of industrial life may seem right and beneficial. The farmer's profit is less than 3 per cent., yet we never hear a clamor in his behalf. We do not find Congress proposing to tax other classes of community for the farmer's benefit.

Some time since a modification of the tariff laws was proposed by the House Committee on Ways and Means, whereby some relief might have been given to farmers and other laborers, by such a reduction of tariffs as would compel manufacturers to sell their staple products at a reasonable profit, something less than 30, 40, or 50 per cent. of their capital. Did it become a law? Oh, no; a solid republican delegation in Congress at once came to the relief of "American labor" and killed the proposition, and the result is that American labor pays, not to American labor, but to American capital, 52.90 per cent. profit on its agricultural implements, 46.50 per cent. on sawed lumber, and from 19 to 33.84 per cent. profit on the cotton, woolen, and worsted clothing it wears. Can any one wonder that our farmers are mostly in debt, while our manufacturers become "cotton kings" and iron lords, counting their riches by millions?

It is said that tariff laws are for the protection of "American labor." American labor is the great factor instigating tariff legislation; but somehow or other it always happens that it is American capital instead of American labor, the employer instead of the employé that is found hanging around the committee-rooms and lobbies of Congress invoking congressional aid in the premises.

If the system of taxing the millions of America for the benefit of a few thousand millionaires did really carry with it an incidental benefit to labor, we might stand a moderate loss of self-respect in thus submitting to a grievous taxation without receiving a just equivalent; but labor in fact derives no real benefit under any tariff that permits enormous profits, such as are shown to be realized under our present system. This is so true that it is self-evident. The system of taxation which has been in force for twenty years has not only degraded labor, but has created classes in American society, has gradually closed the avenues of honest enterprise and moderate wealth against American labor; "the rich becoming richer and the poor poorer."

The man of moderate means, forty years ago, by industry and thrift could acquire a competency at least, if not amass a fortune, in almost any branch of industrial persuits; because, having a fair market for the fruits of his labor, the competition he met was that of individual enterprise, such as his own, and only stimulated trade, and the labor of his hands or the profits of his small capital yielded a fair reward. But how is it now? Small capitalists, men of slender means, however enterprising and industrious, know better than to attempt to compete with the wealthy manufacturing corporations that have absorbed the leading manufacturing industries of the country and grown rich and all-powerful under the ægis of a protective tariff. To attempt it is suicidal. Aggregate corporate wealth forces individual enterprise to the wall and crushes out individual competition, as every-day experience proves.

Let us examine a few more statistics with reference to this question. The statistics which I have produced, exhibiting the enormous profits realized by our leading manufacturers, emanate from their own ledgers, taken down by sworn officers of the census. Let us produce some more from the same source, with reference to "American labor," for which our republican politician has such a tender solicitude.

Take first the great mass of our laboring population, the farmers, their families and hired employés, and see what their profits and earnings are per annum. We will see that they all fare alike so far as profits are concerned. The following figures, taken from the same census report of 1870, tell the tale:

Total value of farms in the United States, 1870	$9,262,803,000
Total value of live stock on farms	1,525,276,000
Total value of farming implements	336,878,000
Total value of capital	11,124,957,000

This capital is not due to legislation, but to a fertile soil, hard and unremitting toil.

The number of farmers in 1870 was 3,032,471; their average capital, therefore, was $3,668. These farmers employed, besides their own families, 2,890,000 hired hands, male and female, at the average wages (including value of board) of $117 per annum. The wages paid amounted to $336,878,429. The value of farm products, including increase of stock, betterments of farms, and improvements, was $2,447,538,000.

These figures show that the account of each farm on the average would stand as follows:

Capital, (that is to say value of the farm, stock, and implements)		$3,668 00
Value of products	$727 00
Estimated value of betterments and improvements	80 00
		807 00
Deduct wages and board of hired help, say one hired man		117 00
Balance, representing gross profits		690 00

Deduct from the foregoing $690, the wages of two persons at $117 each per annum, $234, being the personal service of the farmer and his family, and we have left $456 as the farmer's profit. But out of this must come the cost of living and clothing for himself and family, as well as his taxes, county and State, which leaves the average farmer no profit whatever on his capital. This is as true now as it was in 1870. Our farmers make nothing, as a general rule, beyond a bare living, except the gradual rise in the value of real estate, which is offset by the sweat and toil incident to its cultivation and improvement. They sweat and toil for a living. They do not grow rich. As a class, especially in the West and South, they are in debt, and will continue to be so as long as they are taxed for the benefit of the few manufacturers, which piece of baseness the advocates of a high tariff call "protecting American labor."

What do the farmers of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, of the great West and South, think of this sort of protection? The very tools these farmers work with, their agricultural implements, are taxed 52.90 per cent. for the "protection of American labor," while European manufacturers could make and sell to them the same implements—average good common implements in daily use—at from 25 to 40 and 50 per cent. cheaper than they are compelled to pay to our home manufacturers because of the present tariff system, which imposes a duty upon the material used in their manufacture, and on the finished articles. Suppose the manufacturers I have named were compelled to forego half their profits by a reform in the tariff laws, they would still have left the handsome profit of 16.28 per cent. on their capital. One-fifth of that rate would satisfy the farmer, if he could make it on his capital. This would be a clear saving of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty million dollars per annum to the consumers of manufactured products.

But it is claimed that prohibitory tariffs protect American labor from competition of ill-paid European labor. From time to time we see comparative statements of wages paid to labor in Europe and America. These statements appearing in tariff organs claim to show that the American artisan earns from $15 to $25 per week on the average, and the best paid artisans of Europe, those of England, earn little more than half that amount. These comparative statements deceive no intelligent person. They refute themselves. If they were true, if there was a difference of 100 per cent. between the wages paid labor in Europe and America, if the skilled laborer of Europe could get double the wages in America that he could receive at home, all other things being equal, does not every one know that there would be such an immigration of skilled labor into this country within a few years as no country ever witnessed? It would be like the California rush of 1849, and in a very short time reduce wages from the alleged American standard to an equality with the alleged European standard.

Some few skilled American artisans do earn from fifteen to twenty-five dollars per week, it is true, and these rates are not unknown in England, but $2 a day at steady employment for good, average, skillful mechanics is much nearer the American figure; and there are more of our artisans who are paid $1.50 than of those who get $2 per day, and glad to get it at that. The average mechanic knows this to be true.

These rates are not much, if any, higher than the English wages. No one knows better than the mechanic himself how important a factor the element of steady employment becomes in this connection, and no one knows better than he that steady employment is open to the English mechanic all the year round. This is the case because not their own country alone but the whole world is a market for English manufactured products. American skilled laborers know by sad experience that theirs is not a steady and regular employment. This cause alone more than equalizes our wages with foreign rates, and reduces the average earnings here per annum to bare subsistence. Few of our mechanics can save a dollar at the end of the year. If it were otherwise our skilled-labor market would be glutted by immigration of skilled labor from Europe. This fact is more forcible than any array of figures that can be presented for or against the proposition.

A high protective tariff does not, never did, and never will protect American skilled labor. It might possibly do so if Congress were to prohibit immigration and distribute to the employés a joint pro rata share of the profits of manufacturers. All experience, all statistics show that such a distribution of profits is not made under the tariff system as it now operates, and that the manufacturer will not voluntarily abandon one dollar of his profits in behalf of labor.

I have attempted to show that a protective tariff affords no relief to the great mass of our laboring population, the farmer and other industrial classes of the West and South, but works a positive wrong. Now, if it affords a protection to any class, it certainly must be to those employés engaged in manufacturing establishments.

What is the average rate of wages paid in our great manufacturing establishments to American labor? Let us consult the table before us: It shows 540,490 hands employed, a small number compared with our farmers and farm laborers. Is it for the benefit of this handful that the masses are taxed two or three hundred million dollars a year? No, for the wages paid them are only $196,289,000 a year, not as much as the profits of the manufacturers by $7,368,000—profits derived from the labor they employ and from the taxation of labor which they do not employ. It does not protect labor employed in manufacturing. The wages table shows an average of $1.16 a day for each man employed. Does this look like the fifteen to twenty-five dollars per week we read of in the comparative tables of wages? Even $1.16 per day is too high, because in the estimate before us no deduction is made on account of the increased salaries of foremen, master mechanics, superintendents, and a large corps of clerks and bookkeepers whose wages are considered in and are a part of the statistical table, and hence go toward swelling the average wages paid employés.

Go into our manufacturing towns, live there the year round, and see how our American labor lives; see how it has to struggle for living wages; how it has to combine and force out of the wealthy employer every dollar it gets beyond mere living wages. No appreciable percentage of these laborers can lay by a dollar for a rainy day. When the engine ceases to move, when the wheels of the factories stop, how many families have the means of one month's comfortable support? Few, very few indeed. Thus we see that the mechanic and the mill operative are in nowise gainers by reason of a protective tariff. Tariff protects no one but the manufacturer. It taxes the whole community for his especial benefit. The pretense that it protects the laborers in our factories from the alleged "pauper wages of Europe," is an outrage on credulity, an insult to ordinary intelligence, and a pitiable sham gotten up to cover and disguise the most corrupt, most sinful and infamous system of extortion that crafty capital ever ingrafted upon legislation, for its own gain, and for grinding down honest labor into a condition of penury and absolute dependence upon the will of wealthy employers.

This is the operation of a so-called protective tariff, as shown by official figures. The advocates of such a tariff have made its maintenance the policy of the republican party. The democratic party stands pledged to a reduction of this iniquitous measure of oppression. At Cincinnati we declared in favor of a tariff for revenue only, which, after careful consideration, in my judgment, is the only tariff Government should impose. With the argument all on the side of a revenue tariff, as it appears to me, at the recent elections, for want of a thorough and full discussion of the question in all its bearings, mechanics, artisans, operatives, and even the farming community of the West were tricked into believing that our present tariff not only afforded protection to American labor, but that the great "business boom" was mainly due to the beneficial effects of a republican protective tariff, which was destined ultimately to empty the wealth of Europe into the lap of American industry. The result of all this was that tens of thousands of democratic and wavering votes were cast for the republican nominees, because, as it was said, "a change of policy might disturb the business prosperity of the country, and it was better to let well enough alone."

In my judgment, the discussion of last summer's campaign was but the beginning of the end. The tariff question is bound to become an important factor in American politics, and the more it is discussed the better informed the people become on the subject, the clearer they will see that protection does not protect, and that the party standing as the advocate of a protective policy is no friend to American labor. Sooner or later there will come a great change, unless, indeed, the power of corporate wealth proves too strong for the people. When this change does come, it will be wrought out through the great democratic party, especially of the West and South, whose instincts, interests, and sympathies always have been, and I trust always will be, found on the side of labor and the toiling millions of America rather than for aggregated wealth and great moneyed corporations.

Department of Agriculture.

SPEECH OF HON. SETH H. YOCUM,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department, &c.

Mr. YOCUM said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The district I have the honor to represent consists largely of agricultural lands. While the great bituminous coal fields cross it, and its whole extent is dotted over with furnaces and forges, yet its greatest wealth consists in highly cultivated farms, elegantly improved, a limestone soil, and one of the few districts left where the maximum of wheat to the acre can still be raised. The skill and judgment of our agricultural people have not allowed our lands to deteriorate, but have preserved them in pristine fertility and vigor of vegetable growth. Here, too, in the midst of these great farms is located one of the largest, best, and most flourishing agricultural colleges of the country. So that I shall ask no further excuse for the presentation of my views upon this subject and this bill than that I represent a large agricultural constituency.

Practical agriculture is not only one of the most ancient, but also one of the most honorable of callings. The farmer, in the varied branches of his work, does not, as in most other avocations, depend solely upon his own ingenuity and industry, but forms, as it were, a copartnership with nature and nature's God. These, working hand in hand, accomplish the successful result. The experience of gathering centuries has proved that in order to secure the highest results this compact between the farmer on the one hand and the Great Ruler of natural causes on the other must be honestly and fairly carried out on the part of the farmer. The time was when the farmer (if he could be called by so honorable a name) expected, if he simply scratched up an old, worn-out stubble-field with a shovel plough a month or six weeks after season, and sowed wheat upon it, that Providence would do the balance, and that he would reap a bountiful harvest. So, too, have men been inclined to think that by loud prayers and laziness they might succeed as well as by industry and the use of proper methods. Superstition and ignorance as to the causes of famine and its proper sequent, pestilence, have led many to look upon the avocation as liable to the displeasure of some blind divinity whose only pleasure was destruction and death.

But these vague ideas of theology as applicable to prosperous agriculture, as well as the unreasonable methods by which the copartnership with the Ruler of natural forces shall be carried into effect, have been utterly obliterated by the light of true science and religion. The day has gone by when man can succeed in farming by magic, and he, as well, need no longer fear the blasting of his prospects by some unknown and consequently greatly-dreaded power. Farming is a science. The rules and laws that govern vegetable growth are better understood than the laws that govern our own bodies. With vast fields yet unexplored, with almost unlimited scope for advancement, yet elementary principles are sufficiently ascertained to constitute farming a science. And I venture the prediction here that the day is not far distant when, through a knowledge of our varied climate, the effect and use of rain-fall, the place and nature of the fertile lands, with the proper grain, fruit, and plant for each, the United States alone will be able to effectually preclude the possibility of a famine anywhere upon the face of the globe that can reach to any formidable extent. The consummation of this result, it will easily be seen, can only be attained by steady progress, by that succession of scientific triumphs which has marked the last century being carried forward into the future.

That the safety of the human race to a great extent depends upon the present and future knowledge of scientific methods as applied to agriculture may be learned by referring to the sad history of India.

In a lack of real education in the science of farming, added to the selfishness, greed, and inhumanity of man, are found the real dangers to the perpetuation in prosperity of the race. Its protection from destruction by famine and pestilence are to be sought in a thorough education in the great rules and truths which constitute its science.

The farm is the great common nursery from which is obtained the sound bodies and the good brains that give new life and vigor to every profession, and in fact to every avocation in life. As the life and vigor oozes out of the various professions, by overwork and bad habits, constantly there is coming in from the farms of the land minds as bright as gems, and bodies whose ancestors as well as themselves were free from the leprosy caused by vice and indulgence, and who are perfect models of manhood in both body and mind. This is equally true in every branch of business life. The successful merchant, mechanic, and business man, as well as the brightest lights among professional men, almost invariably come from the farm, where temperate living, habits of industry, and purity of life give basis for all the noble accomplishments of life.

Yet the farmer, not unlike other branches of the animal and of vegetable life, has natural enemies. The drone and the cormorant live and flourish at his expense. In every town and city, and extending even to the villages, crowd the drones, "who toil not, neither do they spin," yet they must be fed. Your poor-tax is doubled for these; your charity is called upon, and your corn-crib and meat-house are the subjects of their midnight prowlings. If human society, like the industrious bee community, could with propriety drag out these excrescences and hurl them, bee-like, over some precipice to destruction, the world at large would no doubt be benefited. The drone is the man who has nothing and does nothing, yet claims that the world owes him a living. But more active and more fatal to the interests of the farmer are the cormorants. The dishonest merchant, who imposes upon him with his worthless wares; the unscrupulous usurer, who, as need may enable him to do, sucks his life-blood at every pore; the soulless corporation that eats up almost every dollar of his hard-earned money, in the way of freights, tolls, and charges, while the owners and managers of these concerns move around in a lordly way as though they could barely tolerate the existence of men who honestly earned what they had and enjoyed—men who earn their bread by the sweat of their face—these are the chief of the farmer's enemies.

Who in the fight of life deserves success, if not the farmer? Shall industry reap her own reward, or shall others steal justice from her hands? At early dawn the farmer, in the vigor and strength of his manhood, is already at his daily work. As day declines you still find him with iron nerve pursuing his unequal task. His wife, no less dear to him than are the wives to them of the presumptuous and the proud, and more beautiful and perfect in person and in soul, measures up to her lord in every responsibility and duty of life. Even the little boys and girls soon find a place for usefulness in this hive of industry. And shall all these things avail nothing in the struggle for success and for place? The great bane of city life is the destruction of her youth. Unnatural nurture and the debilitating influences consequent upon the vices and habits of city life reduce the offspring to the lowest stage of vitality, both mental and physical; evil conconstitutional tendencies are not only aggravated, but new poison is introduced at every step.

Once in a while a young man or woman may struggle through the environments of early youth and develop into true manhood in spite of the violation of every condition conducive to physical, moral, and intellectual development; but these are the exceptions rather than the rule. Nature has kindly provided relief. The city death-list of children shows that more than half of those born die before reaching the age of seven years. The majority of those left are not worth their keeping. The mother who thus neglects the physical, mental, and moral well-being of her child for the frivolities of fashionable life has as a result abundance of time to devote to the graveyard, the tombstone, and the epitaph. I hope, therefore, that the young men and women from the farm will not fail to appreciate the dignity as well as the true nobility of their calling.

The olden-time simplicity of life and of customs, which all so much admire, is found alone among the farmers. When the rest of the world have gone mad in their worship of foolish fashions and their love of gaudy and senseless show, the farmers hold with matchless courage the idiotic herd and drive them back to reason and a possibility of reformation. You can afford, therefore, to bear the taunts of the senseless fop, whose gaudy clothes are bought on credit and never paid for. True manhood consists more in honesty, virtue, and strength than in any senseless decoration of the person. Be proud of living with economy; for the fool who wastes his life in fast living has, in most cases, either stolen the money he spends in some modern refined way, or never expects to pay his bills; and be it the one or the other, his life is but a blight. It requires courage to stand up against this current of giddy, useless life, but you have enough of courage as well as strength to do it.

The farmers are the conservative element of the country. Never inclined to wander away after wild theories or take up with new and untried projects, there is a stability about them as a class that is not found among any other class of people. But valuable as is this characteristic in many respects, it has disadvantages in others. In the line of political promotion the farmer is seldom found among those asking for place. Suffering more ills from bad legislation than all other classes combined, they never ask legislation for themselves, and as a result they get just what they ask for—nothing. Praiseworthy as conservatism is when contending only with legitimate forces when met by every possible combination of fraud and double dealing, it becomes them, in this age of railroad monopolies, political combination, and consolidated power in the shape of corporations, all acting with an accumulated, because with a combined, force, to assume the aggressive. Let them become aggressive in forming a solid combination to defend the right—aggressive in political life—aggressive in the use of their great means of securing just legislation—aggressive in furthering the interest of their common calling. If the farmers of the United States were to put their heads together and their shoulders to the wheel, there is no object, in either of these directions, that they could not readily accomplish. If they do not thus combine utter chaos will result.

With the unchecked power of rings and corporations riding roughshod over the land, who can withstand their force, unless the farmers come to the rescue? The owners of seven-tenths of all the wealth of the United States, they are represented in our National Legislature by scarcely more than a score of members, while the balance of the three hundred and seventy-one Senators and Representatives are chiefly lawyers, bank-men, and corporationists. While less than $300,000 are appropriated by this bill for all this vast and immense interest of agriculture, $11,000,000 is readily thrown away in the crooked river and harbor bill. Committees are so formed and legislation so handicapped as to prevent either position or consideration for agricultural objects. This will continue to be the case unless the farmers become aggressive—unless they rise up as one man and demand redress. Seven-tenths of the members of the United States Congress should be active, aggressive men, in favor of protecting the rights of the farmer. This end can be accomplished if the farmers but determine it shall be so. All the bitter political warfare now going on could thus, at a single blow, be wiped out. If the farmers will it, it shall be done.

The greatest danger that threatens the agricultural interest of the United States to-day is the loss of her young men. Thousands of her best farmer-boys are drawn into the professional callings; other thousands seek other avocations than farming, while an untold number, allured by the show and gaudy appearance of city life, enter that whirlpool of destruction, where they are swallowed up and utterly lost. The fault that causes this terrible drainage is not altogether with the boys. Many of the old men who have lived lives of happiness and prosperity are contributing to this result by themselves breaking away from the early customs established. In the good old times, when the father had acquired surplus means he started the boys by helping them to buy, or at least to stock a farm; and with thus early insured success there was no danger of any allurements that might present themselves in any direction. But of late years the farmer of means retires to some attractive neighboring town, invests his money in the enticing bonds of the town, county, State, or the United States, and consequently lets the boys look out for themselves. He promises them, in his mind, a large sum when he shall finally die, and thinks he has done his duty.

But what, I pray you, in the mean time, becomes of the boys? Those that have the inclination and the courage strike out for a profession, perhaps first for a more thorough education; others choose merchandising, take the lowest place in a store, with the hope of winning success by working their way; but many idle their time in expectation and soon fall a prey to the vices that allure on every hand, and thus a good and successful farmer, with a promising family of boys, has driven them all away out of the pursuit of agriculture—some to success on their own merits on a new line, but more to ruin and final destruction. It is a noticeable fact that a farmer with small means is more apt to do justice to the boys by giving them such aid as he can in the line of farming than one who has been more successfull in making money. I speak thus circumstantially concerning this matter because here lurks a hidden vice that is growing into a confirmed custom among farmers. Help the boys—put them on their feet as they are about to start out in life, and more than half of those lost to the pursuits of agriculture will be saved to happiness and prosperity. The farmer's home should be the brightest, happiest home in the land, as it certainly is the home where the comforts of life are most certain to come. But in order to make these homes what they ought to be, the best young men must remain on the farms; from the farm they must be able to see the brighest hopes of promotion and political preferment looming up. No place is too high to be filled by the intelligent, educated, industrious, honest farmer; and any policy that drives these young men away from the farm is a fatal policy.

The scope of the present bill ought to have been much broader than it is, if the proper legislation could have preceded it. I had hoped that the Commissioner of Agriculture could have been raised to the dignity of a Cabinet officer, and thus agriculture could have assumed the importance in the councils of the nation to which it is entitled. But where the opposition is of so positive a character as that developed in the present Congress, it is an easy matter to find an excuse for the failure of this necessary legislation. With a place in the Cabinet, agriculture would have at once become one of the most important departments of the Government. The department would have naturally and necessarily been organized into bureaus for the proper accomplishment of the work to be done:

First. Bureau of experiments, to investigate, test, and report upon new and valuable products capable of being raised upon the soil of the United States, and of being made valuable and useful to the farmers, and consequently to the people of the country. An example of what might be done can be found in the culture of the sugar-beet and the manufacture of sugar therefrom. France, while furnishing feed for her cattle, also supplies her people with most of the sugar they use. Thus the scope of agriculture could be enlarged and the nation saved many millions that have now to be sent to foreign lands to buy sugar.

Second. Bureau for the investigation and analysis of the various soils of the country, the climate, the rain-fall, the adaptability to the various localities and conditions of climate and rain-fall; of grains, fruits, vegetables, cotton, tobacco, and all valuable farm products. These are fields utterly beyond the scope of individual enterprise, yet of so vital importance that vast sums counted by millions are yearly wasted for the want of the information that would thus be obtained.

Third. Bureau for the investigation of disease to animal and vegetable life—disease of cattle, swine; the scourge of the vineyard and the wheatfield, the vegetable garden and the orchard; the methods of prevention and the treatment and cure for these. The Government has already spent large sums of money upon these objects; but the money has, to a great extent, been wasted for the want of proper organization, and the establishment of method in its use.

Fourth. Bureau for the purpose of seeking out the cause and source of the insect enemies of vegetable life, their methods and habits of life; how to avoid and how to destroy them. It is a well-ascertained fact that, by the use of such information as can thus be obtained, the great scourges of the West and South can be entirely averted, or so guarded against as to become harmless. There could also be established, with advantage, a bureau for the inspection and testing, in a most thorough and practical way, the great mass of farm implements and machinery that is constantly offered the public; a report thereon, with such description of their use and value as could thus be obtained, and the useful thus separated from the valueless, without the waste of the many thousands uselessly wasted in this direction.

Many other equally valuable aids to agricultural interests could be dealt with in a practical way. About two hundred million dollars of money is annually expended by the Government, all of which, except the paltry sum of $300,000, is spent in other branches besides that of agriculture. If this vast sum could be reduced one-half, and the half of the sum expended devoted to agriculture, its development, and its interest, a new state of prosperity would be reached unknown to our country heretofore.

But to accomplish this great work, or any considerable part of it, it will be necessary for the farmers to join hands, assume the aggressive, and drive opposing forces from the field. Preserve your simplicity of manners, your ancient and well-established customs, but fall into line, form in battle array, and let shot and shell and gleaming steel be heard and seen on every side, until you can only see the backs of all that host of enemies to right and justice which now infest every corner of the land.

River and Harbor Improvements.

SPEECH OF HON. A. J. WARNER,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 15, 1881.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes—

Mr. WARNER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I regard the question of the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries as altogether the most important feature of this bill; and it is entitled to the fullest consideration in the light of all the facts which we have before us. The question of the improvement of the Mississippi presents itself under two phases: First, the low-water navigation of the river—for there is always navigation at flood tide—and this includes making permanent the banks, preventing the shifting of the channel, &c. The other phase is the flood tide of this great river—its overflows, and its drainage.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to limit the expenditure of this money to the low-water channel of the river, with a view to the improvement of navigation only. I am not prepared to say whether, if the question of taking care of the overflow and the drainage of the river were up, I should be willing to take the position that it was a national question, to be controlled by the Government, for, if we do admit that, then questions immediately arise as to the various interests that are involved and how the money shall be raised, for when we expend the public money to improve the channel of the river you and I and everybody else have the right to navigate it; but when, by preventing overflow, land is reclaimed or improved the owner of the land alone has the right to it, and he alone gets the benefit of the improvement. These and other questions must all be considered when we come to the question of the flood tides of the Mississippi. But, passing by for the moment the question of Government policy, it is well known that different opinions are held by engineers who have studied the subject as to the best methods for taking care of overflow. These differences are, perhaps, best indicated by the terms "levee system" and "outlet system." The Mississippi River commission, not without misgivings on the part of the ablest of its members, however, seem to favor a general levee system—that is, jetties at the mouth and levees for the river wherever necessary to prevent overflow; but, for one, I am not prepared to give my assent to this system.

I know that at one time the Gulf extended up to the point where New Orleans now is and far above that. I know that when it did extend there the high-water mark of the Mississippi was some fifteen or sixteen feet below the present high-water level; I know, too, that if the Gulf line were to be brought back to that point that then the high-water level of the Mississippi River would be drawn down fifteen or sixteen feet below its present level. This would accelerate the flow of the water above and lower the surface of flood tides as far up as they have been affected by the raising of the surface-level, caused by the extension of the river to its present mouth.

It is proposed by the outlet system to make a way to the Gulf by the shortest cut practicable, sufficient to discharge water enough to bring the surface-level of the river at New Orleans down as near to the old gulf level as possible. If the surface-level at New Orleans could be reduced even eight or ten feet the whole river by the acceleration of the flow would be brought within the banks, and the bottom of the river instead of being built up would be cut deeper. The best possible proof of this is furnished in the Bonnet Carré outlet. The effect of this outlet beyond question has been to lower the level of the river for a long distance above. It could not be otherwise. If one-fifth of the water discharged through the present mouths of the river could be drawn off above or immediately below New Orleans, as I have said, the entire river surface would be drawn down and overflow prevented.

It is claimed, however, that the effect of drawing off a part of the volume of water at a given point will be to retard the flow below that point, and consequently to increase the deposits in the channel. But experiments made below Bonnet Carré disprove this theory. General Humphreys states in his report that "the velocity of the current below the break was more than one foot per second greater than above, and actually an increased velocity of 6 per cent. in the river." Or, to take another view of the question, the engineers who have taken the measurements tell us that about one million five hundred thousand cubic feet of water per second flows into the great Mississippi basin at Cairo at high water, while the outflow is only about one million one hundred thousand cubic feet per second—hence the overflow. Now, increase the discharge, and plain common sense would tell us that the overflow would be less; and but increase the outflow sufficiently, and there would be no overflow.

On the other hand, the jetty and levee system contracts the channel, narrows the river at its mouth, raises the surface, and thus by contracting the channel and raising the water increases the flow in a narrowed channel, and to some extent may scour out the bottom. Then, to take care of the flood-tides of the river it is proposed to build levees.

This plan has been called a plan to eventually destroy the lowlands of the river basin. By damming up the mouth of the river and contracting the channel, so as to raise the water and get an increased flow to effect a scour, the surface of the water is raised, if not the whole length of the river, at least to the first rapids; and as a necessary consequence of a rise in the surface, sediment is deposited and the bottom of the river is built up after it. The tendency to overflow is thus increased, and to counteract the overflow levees must be raised higher.

As the jetties are extended the surface of the river will be raised still higher, and that the jetties must be extended, if this system is to be continued, there is hardly room for two opinions. The river meeting the Gulf waters must and will deposit its sediment. This sediment has built up in recent times the whole of the Lower Mississippi Valley and it will continue to build out into the Gulf. It is building out beyond the jetties now; how fast will depend upon the depth of the waters of the Gulf. It is true that the mere lengthening of the river incline will itself raise the surface of the river very slowly, but it is from the effect of the jetties and levees themselves in causing the bed of the river to rise with the surface that the greater danger is to be apprehended. Less sediment will be carried down and more will be deposited along the way. This is the history of all great rivers whose waters have been confined by levees or the outflow obstructed by natural or artificial means.

I think we should, therefore, hesitate before we enter upon an expenditure of $50,000,000 upon a system of levees which in the end may, and I believe will, have to be abandoned. It will cost comparatively little, at any rate, to try the other plan—that of making way for the water to get out. Then the only improvements required would be to give permanent low-water navigation, by taking care of the low-water channel; and here let me say that I believe the time has come when the Mississippi and its great tributaries, the Ohio and the Missouri, should be taken in hand, with a view of making them permanently navigable. These rivers have their high and their low water channels. In high water they are always navigable, unless obstructed by ice. It is when the floods have passed and the low-water stages come on that the need of improvement is felt. It is the low-water channel that needs the improvements; it is this channel, especially of the Ohio, that ought, without further loss of time, to be taken in hand and put in condition to make it navigable throughout the lowest stages of water. It can be done, and done with a moderate outlay of money, and the vast commerce of the river demands it. To this end I should like to see these great national water-ways separated from the innumerable streams always connected with them in any appropriation, so that works of really national importance might be appropriated for without being encumbered with a waste of millions, as in this bill, for works that never can and never will be of any practical use.

Color-Blindness in the Navy.

SPEECH OF HON. B. W. HARRIS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 18, 1881,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 308) relating to color-blindness and visual acuteness in persons employed in the Navy and merchant marine.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: On the 31st of January last I had the honor to introduce several petitions upon the subject of color-blindness and visual acuteness, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. They were all in the following language, omitting the address or heading, to wit:

Whereas a normal acuteness of vision and good color perception are needed in officers and seamen, for the safe navigation of vessels; and whereas most of maritime nations now require a certain standard of these qualifications by absolute test, the undersigned would most respectfully petition your honorable body to take into consideration a general law of control in the Navy and merchant marine of color-blindness and visual acuteness, and the agreement by an international commission upon definite and uniform standards of testing these necessary qualifications.

These petitions were not numerously signed, but the names appended to them were of gentlemen who will be at once recognized as of great scientific and literary attainment and of high standing and reputation in the country.

They are as follows:

B. Joy Jeffries, Henry I. Bowditch, O. F. Wadsworth, Thomas T. Bouvé, Charles T. Folson, Charles W. Elliot, Joseph Lovering, E. G. Robinson, Eli W. Blake, jr., Elias Loomis, Theodore S. Woolsey, C. R. Agnew, Edward Loring, Peter A. Callan, Arthur Matthewson, William Thomson, George C. Harlan, George Strawbridge, F. B. Loring, O. W. Holmes, Calvin Ellis, H. P. Bowditch, William B. Rogers, Charles R. Cross, Samuel H. Scudder, Noah Porter, A. W. Wright, W. H. Carmalt, C. S. Lyman, Henry D. Noyes, D. St. John Roosa, H. Knapp, E. Gruening, J. S. Prout, W. F. Norris, H. S. Schell, A. D. Hall, Swan M. Burnett.

These gentlemen have lent themselves to this movement because their knowledge of the subject has enabled them to appreciate its importance and the dangers to life and property which may be averted by a proper control over it on the part of those having authority over the navies and the mercantile marine of the world. No other motive can have actuated these learned and honorable petitioners.

The Committee on Naval Affairs gave the petitions prompt and careful attention. Dr. B. Joy Jeffries, of Boston, the head petitioner, was heard with much satisfaction by the committee. He has given the subject greater personal attention and study than any other person in this country, and has for a long time been in frequent correspondence with scientific societies and ophthalmologists in Europe. He exhibited and explained the very simple and perfect apparatus now in use for detecting and testing color-blindness.

He found no difficulty in satisfying the committee of the existence of color-blindness to a dangerous degree, for the committee were able to furnish him from their number two examples of decided color-blindness. After repeated experiment and trial these gentlemen became themselves satisfied that they possessed an infirmity of vision which would render them very unsafe persons to be intrusted on watch at sea or where safety required that they should be able to read correctly colored signals. The committee unanimously and promptly agreed that the subject deserved immediate and effective action on the part of Congress. It cannot be reasonably doubted that great loss of life and the destruction of vast amounts of property have occurred at sea from the unconscious defect of vision and inability to distinguish correctly the colors of signals on the part of men placed on watch and in pilots and officers of vessels.

Modern discovery and science furnish us the means of averting these perils in the future, and we shall be remiss in our duty if we fail to adopt and use them. The dangers of the sea are great at best, and we should not fail by legislation and education to avoid and remove such as can be overcome.

The committee in their report say:

The petitioners are among the best and most scientific men in the country. They take a very deep interest in the subject, and we think they are fully justified in presenting it to Congress and urging action upon it. Its importance cannot, in the opinion of the committee, be overestimated. Vast numbers of human lives and a commerce of immense value depend for their safety upon the perfect eyesight of the men in charge of vessels and railroad trains. Persons who cannot distinguish perfectly the colors of lights, flags, signals, and buoys, or are liable to mistake them, or who from want of acuteness of vision cannot perfectly observe the forms of objects at ordinary distances, ought not to be placed in positions of responsibility on ships at sea. A perfect watch at sea requires perfect eyesight. The subject is comparatively new, but not the less important; and perhaps for the reason that it is new and important it should have the more careful attention.

Throughout the civilized world there has been for the last few years great attention drawn to defective vision and color-blindness among sea-going men, as well as railroad employés.

Reliable statistics from the best medical experts in Europe and America have proved the existence of color-blindness in about 4 per cent. of men, while in women this peculiar defect is very rare. Color-blindness exists as red or green blindness, one involving the other. Violet or blue-yellow blindness also exists, though more rarely.

Red and green being the colors which all maritime nations have agreed to show on the port and starboard sides of vessels at night, and red buoys, red storm-signals, and red light-house lights being used, of necessity require on the part of those navigating vessels a normal or perfect perception of colors, and this of course in addition to good eyesight for form, or normal visual power.

In proportion as the person is color-blind, in that proportion will the red and green lights or signals be undistinguishable from each other, and the person be uncertain which he sees. This defect exists in all degrees of severity, the lightest forms of it often being the most dangerous, since, if the person who can see a strong red light at a certain distance, while the paler green light cannot be distinguished from the mast-head light, he may be deceived as to his surroundings and fall into fatal rrors which he cannot account for or excuse himself for, but which may be wholly attributable to color-blindness, of the existence of which he is himself wholly unconscious. Just such a case has been reported.

Color-blindness is very hereditary. When congenital it is incurable and cannot be palliated by any practical methods. It is also said to be produced by injury, disease, and poisoning by alcohol and tobacco. All these conditions are now recognized in regulations for its control on land and sea.

Till Professor Holmgren, of Sweden, introduced his method of examination, medical experts had no accurate and quickly applied means of testing for color-blindness. This is largely the reason why it and also defective visual power have been overlooked in the past.

Now that attention has been so generally called to these sources of danger on land and sea, European governments and railroad corporations have enacted laws and adopted rules of control. In this country only one State (Connecticut) has passed the requisite laws. Some railroad corporations have acted, but, as was also first done in Europe, in an uncertain manner, from lack of recognizing the necessity of medical experts to carry out the examination in a thorough and systematic manner.

The maritime nations of Europe have introduced these tests into their navies, and some of them into the merchant marine. Our Government has recognized the importance of the subject, as shown by the action of the three Departments, Army, Navy, and Marine-Hospital Service. In the last it is made compulsory with pilots but not with seamen.

The Supervising Surgeon-General of this Department has well shown in his annual report for 1879 the great value of enforced physical examination of seamen, a part of which is testing the color sense and visual power.

To the medical officers alone of these several departments is intrusted this important duty. They are provided with the "Manual" lately published by B. Joy Jeffries, M. D., the head petitioner, who has given the subject great attention and careful study, and the material necessary to carry out the test of Professor Holmgren therein recommended. There are of course no returns from these departments on these points, regulations having been so recently made. When, as in European navies, the tests have been carried out, about the same proportion of seamen are found color-blind as among railroad employés, namely, from 2 to 5 per cent.

This dangerous defect in so large a number of persons cannot but explain the cause of many marine disasters otherwise unexplainable.

A classification in Europe of the reports of 2,408 accidents, between 1859 and 1866, showed—

Want of skill, carelessness of the ship personnel, or accidents which it was impossible to prevent or avoid	1,562
Error of pilot or captain	215
Want of observation or proper interpretation of the rules of the road	537
Undetermined causes	94
	2,408

Under the last three heads are eight hundred and forty-six accidents which might have been due to color-blindness or defective vision.

While maritime powers have sought to eliminate the danger from color-blindness by requiring examinations, all have not directed such methods to be used as would render the elimination certain. Moreover, all are not agreed as to the requisite amount of color perception necessary to render a lookout perfectly safe for the vessel the lookout is on, as well as for the one approaching. There is also no definite standard of visual power acknowledged as necessary in the navigation of vessels. Mutual intercourse and the comparison of the results of different tests would enable the maritime nations taking part in it to avail themselves of each other's experience, and readily lead to the adoption of the best methods of examinations and the requisite standard of requirements.

Dr. Jeffries, in his "Manual" above mentioned, says: "The test for color-blindness now being so simple as to be readily carried out by the surgeons attached to vessels, especially naval medical officers, there can be no great difficulty in having an international commission meet and frame the laws or regulations which shall govern all the navies and merchant marines of the great maritime nations at least. It would then be as readily recognized that every officer and man must be able perfectly to distinguish the red and green lights as to know where they belong and what they mean." This author's experience is based on the examination of over 30,000 individuals, and corresponds with that of all the scientific European observers. The final conclusion in his Manual is: "An international commission should be called to establish rules for the control of color-blindness on the sea, and the carrying out the same examinations among pilots, masters, and crews of steamers and sailing-vessels in the navies and the merchant marine."

It will avail but little if, of two vessels of different nations meeting, but one of them has no color-blindness on the lookout. An international commission would, from the weight of its authority, force examinations even among those nations not participating in it, as well as settle standards, methods, and requirements.

Since the resolution was introduced even greater attention than before has been given to the question of the necessity of freedom from color-blindness and good eyesight among seafaring men. Constant notices of the examinations of pilots, for instance, have been in the daily press, showing the interest of the community in the matter. This interest has been naturally stimulated by the attempts to enlist the press in behalf of defective pilots and defective railroad employés, it having been made in Connecticut in reference to the latter even a political question.

The published reports of examinations in Europe carry up the number to many thousands, and with the same general result of about 4 per cent. of males, or one in twenty-five as color-blind. In our own country, Dr. B. Joy Jeffries reports among 18,556 examinations of males 764 color-blind, the same per cent. These individuals were of all classes and occupations.

The medical expert in charge of the tests of the thousands of employés of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company reports over 4 per cent. as color-blind. (In Medical News and Abstract, December, 1880, page 711.)

A similar report comes from the medical expert in charge of the Illinois Central Railroad. (Chicago Railroad Review, August 28, 1880.)

Of examinations carried out by the different departments of our Government, we have already reports from the Marine Hospital Service of the Treasury in reference to the tests of pilots. Among 2,870 examined up to June 30, 1880, sixty-four were found color-blind, and unfit for their positions. (Annual Report Supervising Surgeon-General Marine Hospital Service, 1880, page 18.) It is to be remembered that the whole subject of color-blindness and its detection is new to the medical officers, in whose hands it alone can be placed. Familiarity gained by experience will give greater certainty.

There is no compulsory examination of the vision of masters, mates, and seamen in the merchant marine. This is of course as necessary as for pilots, but requires the sanction of Congress to be carried out. It has been repeatedly and most strenuously urged. The whole question is most thoroughly put in the report of the Supervising Surgeon General Marine Hospital Service, 1879 and 1880.

Lieutenant Shroeder, United States Navy, in an article on collisions at sea in "United Service," August, 1880, says:

> The number of collisions, however, far from decreasing in proportion to the means taken to prevent them, keeps on increasing. This is mainly owing, of course, to the continued increase in ocean traffic and in the speed of modern steamers, but it also shows that we are not keeping up with the increased demands on professional care and forethought.

The English Lloyd's report the average annual number of collisions throughout the world during the years 1866 to 1871 was 2,163, resulting in the sinking of one hundred and seventy-five vessels. This number only includes those that were insured, and also necessarily excludes a great many whose cases were settled without litigation. This may readily be believed when a society of ship-masters in Marseilles report that in the Mediterranean only about twenty vessels in a hundred carry red and green side-lights. When they see a steamer coming they show a red, green, or white light until she has passed. The French carry but few; the English, American, and other northern nations carry still less, and the Italian, Greek, and Levantines none at all. Lieutenant Schroeder says:

> Color-blindness being a not infrequent physical defect, is cited as an argument against the use of colored position lights, as any man of the crew is liable to lookout duty at night. Persons troubled in this way, however, are not fitted for active sea duties, and have no business on board ship. Here again, though, we see the disadvantage under which merchant captains labor. Their crews are not subjected to such physical examinations as are the recruits for the naval service, and it may well happen that one of their lookouts cannot distinguish between red and green. It must be remembered that very much the greater number of vessels met with at sea belong to and are equipped by private parties, and rules and regulations should be framed with due regard to their frequent inferiority in material and personnel.
>
> Unfortunately, too, this peculiar defect, although most often originating in birth, may be brought about by various causes, such as bruises on the head, typhoid fever, or similar diseases, excessive use of tobacco and alcohol, to all of which seamen are particularly liable, especially the first and last.

To the assertion of danger from color-blindness on the railroads it has been replied that accidents have rarely if ever been traced to this cause. The fact is that they have not been investigated in this light. Certainly color-blindness will explain many maritime accidents; and these are now more likely to be investigated. The inspector-general of steam-vessels says, annual report, 1880, page 6:

> Another case to which my attention has been called, and which is of a serious character, more strongly shows the wisdom of requiring an examination for color-blindness. On the night of July 5, 1875, there was a collision near Norfolk, Virginia, between the steam-tug Lumberman and the steamship Isaac Bell, the former vessel bound to and the latter from Norfolk. The accident occurred at about nine o'clock p. m., on an ordinarily clear night, under circumstances which until recently seemed more or less mysterious. The master of the steamer and all his officers made oath that at the time signals were made to the tug the latter was from one to two points on the steamer's starboard bow, and consequently the steamer's green light only was visible to the approaching vessel. Yet the master of the tug, whose statement was unsupported by any other testimony, asserted that the steamer's red light was exhibited, and he signaled accordingly. The discrepancy in the statements was so great that many persons uncharitably charged the master of the tug with being intoxicated, although no evidence was ever offered in support of the charge. By this accident ten persons lost their lives. Upon a visual examination of this officer under the rules during the past summer by the surgeon of the marine hospital at Norfolk, he was found to be color-blind, two examinations having been accorded him with an interval of ten days between them. The Supervising Surgeon-General reports that up to June 30, 1880, 2,870 pilots were examined, and sixty-four of this number were found to be color-blind.

Professor W. Thomson, of the Jefferson Medical College, in Philadelphia, says, in a recent clinical lecture on color-blindness:

> I have been informed by a prominent lawyer in Baltimore, who is counsel for several steamship companies, that he is satisfied that many cases in which he has defended his companies for injuries done to sailing-vessels in Chesapeake Bay could be accounted for in no other way than by supposing that the lookout on one or other boat was color-blind.—Medical News and Abstract, December, 1870, page 705.

Our Government, like several other maritime powers, has adopted tests of visual power and color perception for naval recruits and pilots. The amount of visual power required of sailors is defined, but not the amount of this for pilots, or any definite amount of color perception for officers or men of the Navy or for pilots. This is very natural, as there are no standards recognized universally or standard tests. Among some of the European states there are requirements of visual power and color perception explicitly set down, and based on the reports of the medical experts of highest authority whom the governments have called upon for advice. (Jeffries's Manual, pages 255 and 262.)

The newness of the whole subject, a desire to not exceed what is both safe and practical in requirement, and a knowledge that an international commission must sooner or later settle these points for the guidance of all, contribute largely to this condition.

While our Government Departments have adopted the most simple, sure, and practical test for color-blindness as a standard, and one the medical officers who employ it can readily learn, the lack of definite rules as to the amount of defect in the color-sense which may be safely permitted has been seriously felt. It has also served to hinder the proper carrying out of this reform.

From the report of the Surgeon-General Marine Hospital Service it will be seen that the Treasury Department yielded to the pressure brought to bear to retain defective pilots in their places, and allowed them to be re-examined by inspectors of steamboats with signal lights and flags, even after being reported by the medical officer as partially color-blind. It is most difficult for the laity to understand the hidden danger. The Treasury Department, when fortified by the results of a conference of naval officers and experts from all the great maritime nations, would never place the decision in the hands of steamboat inspectors. Surgeon-General Hamilton well says, pages 20 and 21:

> No test will be satisfactory to those persons who fail to pass.
>
> When signal-lights are proposed as tests for color-blindness, in opposition to the united opinions of the best-informed ophthalmologists in Europe and America, it seems to be assumed that the medical examiner has a peculiar and special interest in the rejection of the candidate. This assumption needs no refutation.

The superintending surgeon of the Illinois Central Railroad showed by absolute testing of the color-blind employés of that road "the danger and uncertainty of the flag test." (Hamilton's report, page 21.)

A most instructive case, entirely in confirmation of this, is given in a "report of a case of color-blindness" by Surgeon W. H. H. Hutton, which has been quoted and commented on with great interest by the daily press. (Hamilton's report, page 155.) Every sort of pressure was brought to bear on the examining surgeon to induce him to pass a color-blind pilot, or to call him only partially so, in order that he could then be tested by the inspectors of steamboats, who would quickly decide he was all right and relicense him. It is to be remembered, as the Treasury rules now stand, that they could give him at once a license as master of a vessel, since masters or sailors do not have to be tested.

Here, again, had the Treasury Department been fortified with the results of an international commission, Surgeon Hutton would have had such definite instructions as to have rendered attempts at pressure useless. Surgeon-General Hamilton would have been sustained in his opposition to tests being taken out of medical officers' hands by steamboat inspectors.

Yielding to the same sort of pressure in a still more exaggerated extent the board of health of Connecticut recently agreed to test defective railroad employés with flags and lanterns. It is true their existence as a board was threatened by both political parties previous to the recent State elections. The introduction of color-blindness into politics afforded food for merriment, at the expense of the State, in many of the journals. A thorough personal investigation of the subject by the members of the board would have, of course, obviated their uncomfortable position. They would have had thorough support from the resulting experience of an international commission.

The cry of persecution in every form and on all sides was raised in Connecticut because the board of health, under law, required of engineers and firemen simply the average normal visual power or eyesight. In vain did the medical experts show that this was a low standard, and that when it was understood the community would demand a higher one of all employés. Of other employés engaged in moving trains no more sight was required than of a sailor entering the United States Navy. Now, how uselessly would the counsel of the defective employés have argued with the board of health had they had behind them the authority of an international commission!

The same sort of international commission for railroads has been proposed since this bill was entered. The minister of public works in Belgium appointed a commission to investigate and report on all the relations of color-blindness and visual defects to the working of railroads. This commission made their report June 10, 1880. (Annales d'Oculistique, September-October number, 1880.) The report of this commission entirely substantiates the recommendations of the international medical society of September, 1879, at Amsterdam. They prove the necessity of the examinations being carried out by medical experts only, and give the details of the methods recommended for testing, the standard of requirements, rules and regulations to govern the examiners, &c. They close their very practical report by urging the necessity of all railroad corporations entering into a general reform of this kind, and strongly advise an international commission to agree upon standards of requirement and tests, in which Belgium shall take the initiative step, just as our Government is authorized by this bill to do in reference to the sea.

The Chicago Railway Review, November 20, 1880, says:

We would recommend this international railroad commission proposed by the Belgian committee to the serious consideration of our great corporations. If Congress will authorize the Government's taking the initiative in relation to the sea our country will have the honor of commencing so important and valuable a step in civilization. If the State governments would at once organize an interstate commission for the railroads we might even now get the start of Belgium. Connecticut has been the first to pass laws and enforce them. Perhaps to her belongs the right to inaugurate such an interstate commission to discuss and agree upon standard methods of testing visual power and color perception, and the necessary standard of requirements.

The minister of public works of France, December 27, 1879, notified the railroads of the danger of defective vision and color-blindness, and asked them to suggest such measures as the administration should take. This circular of the minister was replied to by a report from the administration of railroads, substantially the same as the Belgian commissioners' report. It received the sanction of the superior railroad commission, and the minister of public works communicated it to the chief surgeons of the companies, asking for their opinion of the value of the different methods of testing therein proposed. (Examen de le Vision chez les employés de chemins des fer. Preface, 1880.)

The Boston and Hingham Steamboat Company, who carry thousands of pleasure seekers to and from Nantasket Beach at night, through a tortuous channel and among the shipping in the harbor, have the past two seasons had all their officers and employés tested by a medical expert, although not called upon by law so to do. Now, this expert had no standard, universally recognized, to guide him. He says in his report of June 28, 1879, that his decision as to fitness was guided "by the usual standard, and the color test being adopted in the navies, pilot service, and merchant marine of Europe, and enforced on the railroads there." Had he had a standard agreed upon as safe and fair by an international commission it would have been of great service. Refusal to give a certificate naturally excites in the mind of the examined an idea of something personal, which the medical expert has to bear the brunt of. A recognized standard having the authority of such a commission would carry great weight, and no doubt cause owners of vessels and steamboats to have all their employés tested long before Congress makes such physical examinations compulsory, by yielding to the repeated calls to do so from the Treasury Department. (Vide annual reports of Surgeon-General Marine Hospital Service, 1879, 1880.)

Imperfect as are the regulations of the Treasury Department in relation to tests and requirements of pilots, they are much in advance of those of England at the present time. There the board of trade required tests of the color perception of masters and mates as long ago as January, 1877. The method of carrying out examinations has, however, rendered the whole quite useless, as is well shown by the reports to Parliament. The matter was left to the "examiners of navigation and seamanship;" no medical men were employed. These examiners were provided with cards and pieces of glass, white, black, red, green, yellow, and blue. Further examination was refused to any candidate failing in even one of these colors, and a special report was to be made to the board of trade.

No instructions have been issued to the examiners as to the amount of visual power and color perception required, each case being decided on its own merits, and the examiners being directed to apply to the board of trade in all cases of doubt and difficulty.

In the return to an order of the honorable the House of Commons, August 5, 1879, it will be seen that these non-medical examiners tested masters and mates with these pieces of colored glass and cards by asking them the name of the color. Now it is admitted and well understood that asking the names of color is no test whatever of a person's color-sense, and any method dependent on this is wholly unreliable. No better proof of this exists than the report of these examiners in relation to thirty-nine cases of doubtful color perception.

A person born color-blind remains so, and there is no present cure for it. Yet among these reports we find several cases of masters and mates declared color-blind by the examiners' tests and subsequently allowed to pass. That naming colors will amount to mere guessing is perfectly shown by the report of the "nature of errors as to color." This same sort of testing of railroad employés in England has been very thoroughly shown up by medical experts, and the uselessness of it proved. A man ignorant of color-names, and most males are, or frightened or confused, is just as likely to prove himself thereby color-blind, when he is not, as a color-blind person is quite sure of passing as perfect.

No better proof also is needed of the necessity of examinations being made by medical experts and proper tests being used, than the fact that those not medical examiners of navigation and seamanship found only twenty-six color-blind among 5,976 males tested, or less than ½ per cent., while everywhere in the world where males have been tested by competent experts about 4 per cent. have been found thus defective.

No report of visual power or good eyesight is made, and, as stated, no instructions are issued to these examiners as to the amount of visual power or color perception.

Equally faulty with lack of proper examination is the rule of the board of trade that color-blindness is not to prevent a man receiving a certificate of a higher grade, only on this certificate is stated "failed to pass the examination in colors." This will hardly prevent collision from defective vision, and sounds strange from the land of Dalton. No wonder the international commission is earnestly advocated in Great Britain.

The great value and necessity of an international commission has been shown, not only by the character and standing of the petitions to Congress, but by the direct evidence of all the medical experts who have been practically engaged in the work of examination; especially by the urgent support of those gentlemen in Europe whom the several governments here called upon for advice in the framing of regulations for the navy and merchant marine, as Professor Holmgren, of Sweden, the originator of the movement of control, and Professor Donders, of Holland, than whom we have no higher authority, and who went to England this last summer to lecture before the British Medical Association on this topic.

The dismissal from service, or the refusal to admit to the navy or mercantile marine for defective eyesight or color-blindness, is of course a serious matter for those interested. Every government will be desirous of being on the safe side, and they must naturally refer the question of the amount of defect permissible to those who are familiar with the question practically, namely, the ophthalmic surgeons whose every-day work includes these decisions.

Hence the interest the several societies of oculists have expressed in this whole question of defective vision, and especially in this proposed international commission to determine standard methods of testing and standard requirements. Several of the original petitioners were professors of ophthalmology in our universities, &c.

The American Ophthalmological Society at their sixteenth annual meeting in July last at Newport passed the following vote:

The society would hereby heartily approve of the proposed international commission in reference to visual acuteness and color-blindness, and the secretary of the society is hereby directed to transmit this vote to the Naval Committee of Congress.

At the forty-eighth annual meeting of the British Medical Association at Cambridge, last August, a very interesting discussion followed Professor Donders's lecture on color-blindness, at the conclusion of which the following resolutions were unanimously passed, the report of the Naval Committee of Congress and the bill being before the members:

Resolved, That it is most desirable to establish international standard tests of visual acuteness and of color perception, by means of an international commission, to which the several governments should be invited to send delegates.

Resolved, That, in all countries, persons upon whom may devolve the charge of life, by sea or land, where signaling is employed, with or without the use of color, should be required to submit themselves to such standard tests of their sight, both before being admitted to their several services and also at stated subsequent intervals.

Resolved, That an important part of the duty of such an international commission should be to devise some common system of signaling, especially on sea-going ships and for all coast service; and that the standard tests should be decided on with special reference to such common system of signaling.

The sixth international congress of ophthalmology, which met at Milan in September last, voted "to indorse the resolutions and opinions of the ophthalmological section of the British Medical Association," and—

1. That an international commission should be appointed by the several governments to determine standards of tests and of requirements of visional power and color perception for railroad employés and the navy and merchant marine.

2. That in all countries persons called upon to distinguish the signals, on land or sea, should be obliged to submit to an examination not only before entering service, but also afterward at stated intervals.

3. That this international commission should be charged with the determination of an uniform system of maritime signals.

Since then the "Ophthalmological Society of Great Britain and Ireland" has appointed a committee for the purpose of considering "the defects of sight in relation to the public safety and communicate with the government on the subject." This committee has commenced its labors and are now putting themselves en rapport with what has been done in relation to control of color-blindness and defective vision on land and sea in all the different countries. The passage of this bill causes the United States Government to initiate a commission which they will prove the value of to the British Government.

The gentlemen in Europe to whom the various governments will refer this question for decision are awaiting the action of Congress. One of them in Norway writes to one of your petitioners:

I congratulate you with what you have already carried through, and hope that Congress will pass the proposed bill. No doubt other countries will then resolve to be represented at an international commission.

Another, Professor Donders, of Holland, writes:

When will the commissioners meet? And will the American Government take the initiative?

Constant European correspondence with your head petitioner shows that men of science are looking to America to commence this movement.

Captain Robert B. Forbes writes:

The subject is of great importance, and if you can show me where I can be of use, I shall certainly try to help you. When I went to sea I took it for granted that all men had eyes like mine, and I frequently blew up men for neglect and stupidity who were probably more or less blind.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report, (page 116,) says:

The safety of a vessel and crew may turn upon the accuracy of the powers of vision, and hence the importance of ascertaining the soundness of the eye, both as regards color perception and refraction. It is to be regretted that no uniform standards for such examinations exist among the various maritime nations as seem to be demanded in the interest of the safe navigation of the seas. Some movement on this important subject is desirable, and I recommend that Congress authorize the creation of a commission, under the national sanction, to determine these matters by scientific and uniform methods.

General Order No. 253 of the United States Navy, July 16, 1880, a revised code of "regulations for preventing collisions at sea," has been approved by nearly all the maritime nations of the world, and adopted by them to go into effect September 1, 1880, thus becoming an integral part of the law of the sea. It is hereby adopted for the naval service of the United States, to go into effect on the above-mentioned date.

This code requires colored signal-lights and calls for normal visual power on the part of those who are to read them. To be assured of this by international agreement is the object of this commission.

The lamentable lack of obedience to the international code, which requires red and green side-lights to be carried by all vessels, has been commented on. An international commission would by the diffusion of knowledge on this very point, and from the weight of its authority, force the various maritime powers, even those not participating, into requiring their merchant marine to comply with what is not only a custom but a law.

Attention would thus also be drawn to the very great necessity of the physical examination of officers and men in relation to their visual power and color-perception; and standard requirements of these qualities being determined on, no excuse could be given for not complying with them. Every officer and sailor in the Navy and merchant marine would know just what must be his physical condition in this respect to be fit for duty. The employment by ship-owners of those not up to the international standard would be at their own risk, a most sure means of preventing collisions at sea.

A few years ago in England a royal commission was appointed on lights, buoys, and beacons, consisting of five members. There is the best authority for stating that "one of these was so color-blind that he could not distinguish a red light from a dull white one, and another, though not color-blind in the ordinary sense, was somewhat abnormal in his perception of them." "An occasional clerk of the commission was once found writing with red ink believing it to be black." There is equally good authority for asserting that two members at least of the naval committee could not pass the color test and would be very dangerous pilots.

While the color-blind have even been successful as portrait painters (provided their red and green paints were carefully marked) it would be well that the several governments taking part in this international commission should not send color-blind delegates. The instances just mentioned show the natural possibility of it.

APPENDIX.

[Boston Sunday Herald, Sunday, July 25, 1880.]

COLOR-BLINDNESS AND DEFECTIVE VISION—THEIR CONTROL ON LAND AND SEA—WHAT THE NATIONAL AND STATE GOVERNMENTS ARE DOING IN REGARD TO THESE MATTERS.

A year ago the Herald called the attention of the public to the regulations then in force in this country protective against defective vision and color-blindness on our railroads and at sea. The purpose now is to present the public what the past twelve months have been productive of in the same direction. The following order explains what has been done in the Army. It should be added that the cadets entering and leaving West Point this year were carefully tested by the medical board convened for their physical examination:

"[General Orders No. 82.]

"HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
"ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, August 13, 1879.

"By direction of the Secretary of War, the following additional instructions with regard to the examination of the eyes of recruits are published for the guidance of recruiting and medical officers and boards of inspection. * * * This test will be made by means of cards, prepared under the direction of the Surgeon-General of the Army. The black spots on the cards will be circular, four-tenths of an inch in diameter, and the recruit must be able to count them with facility at twenty feet distance.

"At the principal recruiting depots all accepted recruits will be examined for color-blindness by the medical officers on duty. Any defect observed will be noted on the descriptive list of the soldier, but will not, of itself, constitute a cause of rejection, except in the case of enlistments for the Signal Corps. The examination for this defect will be made by the method of Holmgren. Test-wools for this purpose, accompanied with directions for their use, will be issued to the principal recruiting depots by the Surgeon-General.

"By command of General Sherman.

"E. D. TOWNSEND,
"Adjutant-General."

By a circular of the Treasury Department, dated June 11, 1879, medical officers of the Marine Hospital Service were directed to examine, free of expense, any seamen owners of vessels presented to them. Such examinations were not compulsory. Since then compulsory examination of the visual power and color perception of pilots has been ordered by the Treasury Department.

"[Circular.]

"Examination of pilots for color-blindness.

"[1880.—Department No. 14. Steamboat inspection.]

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, D. C., February 17, 1880.

"To supervising and local inspectors of steam-vessels:

"By an amendment of rule 47, rules and regulations of the board of supervising inspectors, adopted at the twenty-eighth session of the board, recently held in this city, and which was approved by the Secretary of the Treasury February 13, 1880, and promulgated in Department Circular No. 13, 1880, it was ordered that all persons applying for either a renewal of license or an original license as pilots on steam-vessels shall be required to undergo a visual examination, in order that it may be determined whether such person can properly distinguish the colored lights used as signals on steam-vessels; and in future inspectors will issue pilots' licenses only upon certificates of surgeons of the United States Marine Hospital Service that applicants therefor fulfill all the requirements of the rule referred to.

"Under the provisions of Department circular of June 11, 1879, surgeons of the Marine Hospital Service are directed to make such examinations free of expense to persons applying therefor.

"JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary."

This circular has now been modified by the following one. They are of importance to all pilots in the United States and those employing them:

"ARMY—TREASURY FOR PILOTS.

"[Circular.]

"Modification of Department Circular No. 14, relating to examination of pilots for color-blindness.

"[1880.—Department No. 19. Steamboat inspection.]

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, D. C., March 9, 1880.

"To supervising and local inspectors of steam-vessels:

"In view of the expense and hardship likely to accrue to pilots living at points remote from stations of the Revenue Marine Hospital Service in visiting such stations for the purpose of being examined as to color-blindness, as required by the amendment to rule 47, rules and regulations of the board of supervising inspectors, Department Circular No. 14, dated February 17, 1880, is hereby so modified as to allow pilots employed at places remote from a marine hospital station to be examined by any respectable resident physician, whose certificate that such pilot is exempt from the disease known as color-blindness shall accompany the license and oath of office of such officer when sent to any board of local inspectors for renewal of his license in the manner provided in rule 42, rules and regulations. Upon the receipt of the certificate a license shall be issued the same as though said examination had been made by a marine hospital surgeon. This modification is not to be applied to applicants for original licenses. They, in all cases, must be examined in the manner provided in Circular No. 14.

"A second visual examination will not be required in any case, and inspectors will therefore retain all certificates upon their permanent files for reference in cases of application for renewal of licenses.

"JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary."

It will thus be seen that there is only enforced examination of pilots in the merchant marine. The Boston and Hingham Steamboat Company was the first, and remains the only, steamboat company which requires a thorough examination and certificate by a medical expert of the visual power and color perception of all its officers and crew who are called upon to distinguish marks, buoys, and colored signals. This in addition to the required examination of their pilots by the medical officer of the Marine Hospital Service.

Surpervising Surgeon-General Hamilton, of the United States Marine Hospital Service, in his report for last year, shows very conclusively the great value of compulsory examinations of all seamen in the merchant marine. Under the regulations of the circular of last year but few sailors were presented for volunteer examination. Surgeon-General Hamilton says:

"In this connection it is proper to state that while the objects of the circular have been approved by the medical profession, the United States shipping commissioners, the Philadelphia Board of Trade, the Ship-Owners' Association, the National Board of Steam Navigation, the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, and shipping associations generally, the sailors' boarding-house keepers, disreputable owners and ship-masters, have usually opposed the examinations. On this head, Captain Duncan, the United States shipping commissioner for the port of New York, writes as follows:

"'My officers call the attention of all outgoing captains, when opening their articles, to the desirability of such examination, and the facilities for it offered by the Government. A large proportion of captains heartily approve of the system, and promptly declare their intention of adopting it; but most of them quite as promptly ignore it when their crews are shipped.

"'The reason is, as I predicted, the "blood money" landlords will pay more to captains or owners for the privilege of filling their crew lists without than with examination, and a little money of this kind, unlawfully extorted from seamen seeking employment, seems of more consequence than the physical condition of their seamen.'"

An investigation of this subject shows that the people receiving the money are the class of owners and ship-masters above referred to. Should a boarding-house keeper fail to pay "blood money," his boarders are not shipped; and, as a natural result, nearly all this class of men act, perforce, as middle-men in this nefarious business. A severe penalty visited upon all persons convicted of paying or receiving "blood money" would relieve sailors of an onerous tax, and take away the incentive to the opposition now shown by the "blood money" takers.

The board of commissioners ordered physical examination of the Boston police last year, and the board of fire commissioners ordered a similar examination of the firemen; in each case the examinations were conducted under the direction of the city board of health. The Boston and Hingham Steamboat Company and the Boston and Lowell Railroad Company required all their employés to be examined for color-blindness by an expert. The proportion of color-blind which has been found in Dr. Jeffries's examinations is as follows: Out of 11,735 men and boys, he found 488, or 4.15 per cent. of color-blind; out of 10,605 women and girls, he found only six. Dr. Jeffries is of the opinion that the difference is inherent in sex, and has nothing to do with training. If sound and healthy men are necessary for employment in the Army, on coasting lines, and as railroad employés on shore, how obviously necessary that sailors should be seaworthy when beyond the possibility of replacement and out of the reach of professional assistance. The consequences to vessels of being at sea with a disabled crew, or of having on board as lookout a man unable to distinguish signal-lights, are too obvious to need elaboration.

ORDER OF NAVY—PETITION—REPORT—RESOLVE BILL.

During the past year examinations of the visual power and the color perception of all sailors entering the United States Navy have been carried out. The cadets entering and leaving the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis are, of course, also tested, as part of their physical examination, by the inspecting medical board. The necessity for a knowledge of the color perception of all officers and men already in the Navy is shown by the following:

"[Circular.]

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY,
"Washington, D. C., March 30, 1880.

"Upon the receipt of this order and the colored worsteds to be used as tests, medical officers of ships and stations will make a careful examination of all persons in the Navy as to their color sense, the result to be reported to this bureau according to the accompanying form. Quarterly returns will also be made of the result of the examinations of those who shall be hereafter examined for the service.

"The method to be employed is that of Holmgren. Additional tests may be employed at the option of the examiner, in which case the fact is to be so stated.

"PHILIP S. WALES,
"Surgeon-General United States Navy."

INTERNATIONAL STANDARD TESTS AND REQUIREMENTS.

The three Departments of the United States Government that have thus acted in reference to the control of defective vision and color-blindness have not yet established any standard requirements by which their medical officers can be governed in their decisions. The value of such is shown by the result of the following petition presented to the last Congress, which was signed by the professional scientists of our New England universities, as well as ophthalmic surgeons:

"To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

"Whereas a normal acuteness of vision and good color perception are needed in officers and crews for the safe navigation of vessels; and

"Whereas most maritime nations now require a certain standard for these qualities by absolute test, the undersigned would most respectfully petition your honorable body to take into consideration a general law of control, in the Navy and merchant marine, of color-blindness and visual acuteness, and the agreement by an international commission of definite and uniform standards of testing these necessary qualifications."

This petition was presented by Hon. B. W. HARRIS, January 29, 1880, and referred to the Naval Committee, who gave a hearing to the petitions March 3, 1880, and reported to Congress, as follows:

"COLOR-BLINDNESS IN THE NAVY.

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the petition of B. Joy Jeffries and others and the several petitions in aid thereof, has considered the subject, and submits the following report:

"The petitioners are among the best and most scientific men of the country. They take a very deep interest in the subject, and we think they are fully justified in presenting it to Congress and urging action upon it. Its importance cannot, in the opinion of the committee, be overestimated. Vast numbers of human lives and a commerce of immense value depend for their safety upon the perfect eyesight of the men in charge of vessels and railroad trains. Persons who cannot distinguish perfectly the colors of lights, flags, signals, and buoys, or are liable to mistake them; or who, from want of acuteness of vision, cannot perfectly observe the forms of objects at ordinary distances, ought not to be placed in positions of responsibility on ships at sea. A perfect watch at sea requires perfect eyesight. The subject is comparatively new, but not the less important; and, perhaps for the reason that it is new and important, it should have the more careful attention.

"Throughout the civilized world there has been, for the last few years, great attention drawn to defective vision and color-blindness among sea-going men as well as railroad employés.

"Reliable statistics from the best medical experts in Europe and America have proved the existence of color-blindness in about 4 per cent. of men, while in women this peculiar defect is very rare. Color-blindness exists as red or green blindness, one involving the other. Violet or blue-yellow blindness also exists, though more rarely.

"Red and green being the colors which all maritime nations have agreed to show on the port and starboard sides of vessels at night, and red buoys, red storm-signals, and red light-house lights being used, of necessity requires on the part of those navigating vessels a normal or perfect perception of colors, and this, of course, in addition to good eyesight for form, or normal visual power.

"In proportion as the person is color-blind, in that proportion will the red and green lights or signals be indistinguishable from each other, and the person be uncertain which he sees. This defect exists in all degrees of severity, the lightest forms often being the most dangerous, since, if the person who can see a strong red light at a certain distance, while the paler green light cannot be distinguished from the mast-head light, he may be deceived as to his surroundings, and fall into fatal errors, which he cannot account for or excuse himself for, but which may be wholly attributable to color-blindness, of the existence of which he is himself wholly unconscious. Just such a case has been reported.

"Color-blindness is very hereditary. When congenital it is incurable and cannot be palliated by any practical methods. It is also said to be produced by injury, disease, and poisoning by alcohol and tobacco. All these conditions are now recognized in regulations for its control on land and sea.

"Till Professor Holmgren, of Sweden, introduced his method of examination, medical experts had no accurate and quickly-applied means of testing for color-blindness. This is largely the reason why it, and also defective visual power, have been overlooked in the past.

"Now that attention has been so generally called to these sources of danger on land and sea, European governments and railroad corporations have enacted laws and adopted rules of control. In this country only one State (Connecticut) has passed the requisite laws. Some railroad corporations have acted, but, as was also first done in Europe, in an uncertain manner, from lack of recognizing the necessity of medical experts to carry out the examination in a thorough and systematic manner.

"The maritime nations of Europe have introduced these tests into their navies, and some of them into the merchant marine. Our Government has recognized the importance of the subject, as shown by the action of the three departments, Army, Navy, and Marine Hospital Service. In the last it is made compulsory with pilots but not with seamen.

"The supervising surgeon-general of this department has well shown, in his annual report for 1879, the great value of enforced physical examination of seamen, a part of which is testing the color sense and visual power.

"To the medical officers alone of these several departments is intrusted this important duty. They are provided with the Manual lately published by B. Joy Jeffries, M. D., the head petitioner, who has given the subject great attention and careful study, and the material necessary to carry out the test of Professor Holmgren therein recommended. There are, of course, no returns from these departments on these points, regulations having been so recently made. When, as in European navies, the tests have been carried out, about the same proportion of seamen are found color-blind as among railroad employés, namely, from 2 to 5 per cent.

"This dangerous defect in so large a number of persons cannot but explain the cause of many marine disasters otherwise unexplainable.

"A classification in Europe of the reports of 2,408 accidents, between 1859 and 1866, showed:

Want of skill, carelessness of the ship's personnel, or accidents which it was impossible to prevent or avoid	1,562
Error of pilot or captain	215
Want of observation or proper interpretation of the rules of the road	537
Undetermined causes	94
Total	2,408

"Under the last three heads are eight hundred and forty-six accidents which might have been due to color-blindness or defective vision.

"While maritime powers have sought to eliminate the danger from color-blindness by requiring examinations, all have not directed such methods to be used as would render the elimination certain. Moreover, all are not agreed as to the requisite amount of color perception necessary to render a lookout perfectly safe for the vessel the lookout is on as well as for the one approaching. There is also no definite standard of visual power acknowledged as necessary in the navigation of vessels. Mutual intercourse and the comparison of the results of different tests would enable the maritime nations taking part in it to avail themselves of each other's experience, and readily lead to the adoption of the best methods of examination and the requisite standard of requirements.

"Dr. Jeffries, in his Manual above-mentioned, says: 'The test for color-blindness now being so simple as to be readily carried out by the surgeons attached to vessels, especially naval medical officers, there can be no great difficulty in having an international commission meet and frame the laws or regulations which shall govern all the navies and merchant marines of the great maritime nations at least. It would then be as readily recognized that every officer and man must be able perfectly to distinguish the red and green lights as to know where they belong and what they mean. This author's experience is based on the examination of over thirty thousand individuals, and corresponds with that of all the scientific European observers. The final conclusion in his Manual is: 'An international commission should be called to establish rules for the control of color-blindness on the sea, and the carrying out the same examinations among pilots, masters' and crews of steamers and sailing-vessels in the navies and the merchant marine.'

"It will avail but little if, of two vessels of different nations meeting, but one of them has no color-blindness on the lookout. An international commission would, from the weight of its authority, force examinations even among those nations not participating in it, as well as settle standards, methods, and requirements.

"The committee recommends the adoption of the joint resolution herewith reported as a first step toward the accomplishment of the object in view.

"In the House of Representatives, May 24, 1880, Mr. B. W. HARRIS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following joint resolution relating to color-blindness and visual acuteness in persons employed in the Navy and merchant marine:

"'Whereas it is important that definite and uniform standards of examination for color-blindness and tests for visual acuteness in persons employed in the Navy and the merchant marine should be established which shall be in harmony with such standards and tests established or to be established by other nations: Therefore,

"'Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to designate such officer or officers in the diplomatic or consular service of the United States, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to detail such officer or officers of the Navy of the United States as may be deemed qualified for such service, to attend and represent the United States in any international congress held to consider and act on said subject. And such officers so designated and detailed shall join in a report of the proceedings of such congress and of the conclusions reached thereby, if any, to the President of the United States, to be by him laid before Congress, to the end that an international system of examinations and tests as aforesaid may be established by law.'"

This bill will come up at the next session of Congress. Meanwhile, the attention of other maritime nations is being called to the whole question and the usefulness of the proposed international commission. Each country would naturally include in its representatives, besides officers of the navy and diplomatic service, some professional scientists, who would, from their practical acquaintance with the subject, be able to answer the questions which would arise in such a commission. Naval officers know what is required to be seen, what colors and combinations, &c., and they must depend on the medical experts as to how much visual power is necessary for this, as well as how good color perception. As to the practicability of the various methods of examination, their advice also must be sought, since it is only these medical experts who have tried these methods by the thousands of examinations lately made in Europe and this country.

RAILROADS—STATE ACTION—CONNECTICUT REGULATIONS.

Visual power and color-blindness on railroads.

In the volume published last year by Dr. B. Joy Jeffries, of Boston, on "Color-Blindness, its Dangers and its Detection," adopted as a manual by the United States Government, on page 177 he says: "The Government can, and no doubt will, carry out proper examinations for color-blindness in the Army and Navy. General national laws can also be enacted as to the merchant marine; international will come in time as a matter of necessity. The difficulties with the railroads are, however, very great. Here the interests and the safety of the community have to contend with ignorance, prejudice, pecuniary considerations, and incredulity born of supposed immunity from danger. These corporations have no surgeons attached to their roads who in their interests could carry out proper examinations to both protect themselves and the community. Even when interest is awakened from acknowledged danger justly feared, railroad managers are very likely to turn to any one calling himself a medical man and rely on his statement as to his ability to examine and pass judgment on their employés. Then, when they are satisfied from his reports that they are safe, and accident happens, color-blindness is proved in the employé before the court and jury, and at once undeserved miscredit is thrown upon the surety and usefulness of such examinations. It is, therefore, without hesitation that I would caution as to the choice of those to be engaged in testing railroad employés for color-blindness. The life-insurance companies of the country recognize this most thoroughly, so much so that examinations for life insurance is almost a specialty."

Time has certainly proved that Dr. Jeffries was right. The United States Government has acted promptly where it could. Just the difficulties spoken of have been met with by the railroads. In Massachusetts the only railroad that has had any of its employés tested by a medical expert is the Boston and Lowell, and the report to the manager in the Advertiser of August 14, 1879, conclusively shows the necessity of these examinations. There is, however, no law to prevent the continuance in office of those employés found defective. The public are probably familiar with the failure, so far, of the attempts to have such a law enacted. Very many of the railroads of the country are known to have carried out, or are carrying out, examinations of their employés. But, at present, no access can be had to their official reports. It is hazarding but little to foretell that an experience similar to that of Europe will be met with in this country, viz: total failure to protect stockholders, employés, and the traveling community from the hidden dangers of defective vision and color-blindness through any examinations by other than experienced medical experts, and legal enactments preventing the corporations from employing those found below a requisite standard equally established by competent authority.

STATE LEGISLATIVE ACTION.

Connecticut has, through the action of our officials, had opportunity to steal from us the honor of being the pioneer in this work of reform, which must naturally come by the legislative enactments of the individual States, provided the General Government does not step in before to control the railroads.

The railroad commissioners of Connecticut, in their report, January, 1880, devote much space to the subject, and say: "But, if it has been thought necessary for the protection of life to adopt signal colors of such marked difference to the normal eye as red and green, then the danger of trusting life to the ability of the color-blind eye to detect a difference simply in quantity or intensity of light, affected by all the variations of the atmosphere and conditions of the individual's eye, will be readily admitted. * * * Examination of railroad employés becomes, therefore, a matter required by public safety. These examinations should not only be required of each applicant for employment, but should be made periodically and systematically; for while those born color-blind can never be cured, those at one time normal-eyed even may become color-blind through injuries, disease, or the excessive use of alcohol and tobacco. And, again, the examinations must be by qualified persons, with suitable tests, for any imperfect examination is worse than none, allowing, as it would, a blind man to act with the confidence of one seeing. * * * Periodic examinations by competent specialists are required on most of the European roads; they should be by law enforced here; for, although some of our railroad companies have, within the past six weeks, turned their attention to this subject and had examinations of their employés made, the examinations should be universal and uniform, carried out thoroughly by skilled experts, and not left to the discretion of any one."

The whole subject was, in consequence of this report, referred to the joint committee on railroads, who granted a public hearing, and from the expert testimony presented were induced to report a bill to the Legislature, which readily passed both branches of the State government, and was signed by the governor. This bill is here given in full, as so important in its relations to the railroad corporations and the public. The rights of the various parties interested are carefully considered, and the exact duties of examiners and officials defined. The rules and regulations emanating by law from the State board of health have just been made public, and we therefore give them in full. They concern directly many thousands of railroad employés in Connecticut, as all there have to be tested before October 1, 1880. It is, of course, a mere question of time when similar regulations shall be legally enforced in all the States and Territories of our country, as is almost universally the case in Europe.

"VISUAL POWER AND COLOR-BLINDNESS—ACT OF LEGISLATURE OF CONNECTICUT REQUIRING EXAMINATIONS — RULES AND REGULATIONS OF THE STATE BOARD OF HEALTH.

"An act directing the examination of railroad employés for color-blindness and visual power.

"Be it enacted, &c., That the State board of health shall prepare rules and regulations for the examination and re-examination of railroad employés in regard to color-blindness and visual power, prescribing the method in which and the intervals at which such examinations shall be made, the maximum fee to be charged for each examination, the form of certificate to be issued by the examiners, and such other regulations as said board may deem necessary. Said board shall send a copy of such rules and regulations to every railroad company and trustee operating a railroad in this State, on or before the 1st day of July, 1880. Said board may, from time to time, make such changes in said rules and regulations as they may deem best, and communicate the same to said companies and trustees. Said board shall annually in the month of May recommend two or more medical experts to make the examinations above referred to, and the governor shall annually, on or before the 1st day of July, appoint not less than two medical experts, any one of whom shall be authorized to conduct the examination for color-blindness and visual powers, and issue certificates in accordance with the rules of the board of health.

"SEC. 2. On or before the 1st day of October, 1880, every railroad company and trustee operating any railroad in this State shall cause every person in their employ as locomotive engineer or fireman, train conductor or brakeman, station-agent, switchman, flagman, gate-tender, or signalman to be examined at the expense of the railroad company, by one of the examiners appointed by the governor, in regard to color-blindness and visual power, and shall cause a like examination to be made of all persons employed after said date in either of the capacities named above, and shall cause re-examinations to be made in accordance with the rules prescribed by the board of health.

"SEC. 3. Any railroad company or trustee operating any railroad in this State employing, after the 1st day of October next, in any of the capacities specified in the second section of this act, any person who does not possess a certificate of freedom from color-blindness and possession of normal visual power, duly issued in accordance with the provisions of this act, or knowingly employing in any such capacities any person whose certificate has been revoked by the examiners, shall for each and every offense be punished by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000.

"Approved March 25, 1880."

"RULES FOR EXAMINATION OF RAILROAD EMPLOYÉS UNDER PRECEDING ACT.

"RULE I. All railroad employés requiring examination under the law of March 25, 1880, shall be divided into two general classes. Class first shall include engineers, firemen, and brakemen. Class second shall include train-conductors, station-agents, switchmen, flagmen, gate-tenders, and signalmen.

"RULE II. Certificates shall be given for each position in accordance with the succeeding rules for examination. Promotion from one class to the other requires re-examination and certificate.

"RULE III. Re-examinations shall be made: First, after any disease of the eyes; second, after injuries affecting the head or eyes; third, after any disease or trouble of the brain, and after long-continued illness, as typhoid fever; fourth, after mistakes or acts which call in question the visual powers; also, whenever directed by the board of health.

"RULE IV. The examiners shall report regularly to the State board of health, and their work shall at any time be open to the inspection of any member or members of said board.

"RULE V. The regulations for conducting the examinations and the standards for each class shall be determined by the board of health, and not by the examiners. New rules and regulations shall be adopted from time to time, as required, and alterations and amendments made.

RULES FOR CONDUCTING EXAMINATIONS.

"RULE 1. For the qualitative estimation of color-blindness the following tests are to be employed: Holmgren's worsteds, the tables of Stilling, Donders's color-test patterns, Pflüger's letters with tissue-papers. Däae tests and Woinow's revolving cards may also be used. For the quantitative test for color-blindness, Donders's reflected spots, Donders's method with transmitted light, Holmgren's shadow tests shall be employed.

"RULE 2. The following are the requirements for a certificate in the first class: (1) healthy eyes and eyelids without habitual congestion or inflammation; (2) unobstructed visual field; (3) normal visual acuteness; (4) freedom from color-blindness; (5) entire absence of cataract or other progressive disease of the eyes. The second class shall have: (1) healthy eyes and eyelids without habitual congestion or inflammation; (2) unobstructed visual field; (3) visual acutenes at least equal to three-fifths without glasses and normal with glasses in one eye, and at least one-half in the other eye with glasses; (4) freedom from color-blindness in one eye, color-perception at least equal to three-quarters in the other eye.

"RULE 3. In the case of employés who have held their positions five years or more, the standards required in each class shall be determined under special instructions from the board of health."

Connecticut is a pioneer in this work in this country, being the first State to pass a law requiring examination of all railroad employés engaged in moving trains. The standards adopted are for the most part those agreed upon at the international medical congress at Amsterdam, September, 1879.

The following is the form of certificate. These are bound in books, the stubs retained for reference and tabulations. The form of regular returns by the examiners to the board follows:

"STATE OF CONNECTICUT.

"No. ——. State board of health, bureau of vital statistics. Certificate of examination for visual power and color-blindness.

"This may certify that I have this day tested carefully the visual power of —— ——, whose signature is attached to this certificate, and find that it is ——. I have also tested his color perception, and find that it is ——. He is, in these respects, fitted for the position of ——.

"Given in presence of the examiner.

"—— ——,
"Examining Ophthalmic Surgeon.
"——————, 18 .

"—— ——,
"[Signature of party examined.]

"Stub accompanying certificate and retained by the examiner: No. ——; name, —— ——; age, ——; height, ——; complexion, ——; occupation, ——; vision, ——; color perception, ——; railroad, ——.

"—— ——,
"Examining Surgeon.

"POSTAL CARD REPORT FROM THE EXAMINERS.

"——————, 18—.

Report for week ending ——, 18—.
No. in class first examined.....
No. in class second examined.....
Total.....
No. with incomplete color sense.....
No. with complete color-blindness.....
No. with defective visual power.....
Connected with which railroads.....

"

In compliance with this law and these regulations, two ophthalmic surgeons have been recommended by the Connecticut State board of health and appointed by the governor to thoroughly carry out the examinations. They are Dr. W. H. Carmalt, professor of ophthalmology of Yale University, and Dr. W. T. Bacon, of Hartford. To them is first committed in this country this extremely delicate duty. The results of their work in the report of the State board of health will be most interesting and of great practical value.

The American Ophthalmological Society, at its annual meeting last week at Newport, indorsed by vote these standard requirements of the State board of health of Connecticut in reference to visual power and color-blindness.

It will thus be seen what has been done in the necessary work of reform the past year. It would be an injustice to a fellow-townsman not to recognize that, to the unremitting though unrequited labors of Dr. B. Joy Jeffries, is the movement in this country due. His services in the cause of science and the community, by his testing all the public school children of Boston above the primary, has been recently admitted by the school board printing his report to them as one of the school documents. The Nation of January 15, 1880, well says:

"The subject offers the most striking recent instance of a strictly scientific inquiry that has suddenly been transformed into a serious question of every-day practice."

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN H. EVINS,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. EVINS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a measure which should be discussed without partisan or sectional feeling. It is a question simply of giving to each State the representation in this House to which its population, as ascertained by the recent census, entitles it. Of course there may be differences of opinion as to whether the number of Representatives should remain the same as at present, be increased or diminished. My own opinion is that it will be unwise greatly to increase the number which now makes up this body. It seems to me we cannot do better than to stop at 307. This number comes as near doing exact justice to all the States and to all the sections as any which it is possible to adopt, without converting the House into a huge mob.

I have no objection to 301, or any number less than 307, which will be equally just with the one I have named. I think it probable, however, that we can more readily agree upon 307; and I am willing to concede whatever preferences I might entertain for a smaller House in order to put an end to discussion and pass the bill.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] as well as the gentleman who has just spoken, [Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia,] have shown, I think, pretty clearly that, notwithstanding the sweeping terms of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution in reference to the abridgment of or denial of the right of suffrage by any State to "its male inhabitants, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States," it was intended to apply only to cases in which the negroes of the South were denied the right to vote on account of their color or previous condition of servitude.

If this be true, the fifteenth amendment having rendered impossible such an abridgment or denial on the part of any State, we have nothing whatever to do with the qualifications and restrictions which the States have imposed upon the right of suffrage. While I might not approve the election laws of some of the States which have been so severely criticised in this debate, I am satisfied they do not violate the Federal Constitution, or render the States which have enacted them liable to any loss of representation in this House. Holding these views, I would not have thought it necessary to say anything in reference to the pending bill had not several gentlemen on the other side, with that persistence which seems to me never to flag or to grow weary, insisted upon converting this subject also—like every other which is presented for our deliberation—into a sectional question.

Mr. Speaker, during the four years I have been a member of this body I have anxiously wished for and waited for the hour when matters which concern the whole people of this country would be discussed without sectional feeling, and without intolerance of opposing opinion. I am pained to say that the clock has not yet struck that hour. Are we never to reach it? We of the South had to forget many things and to subdue prejudices which were a part of our inheritance in order to adapt ourselves to the new order of events. Cannot our friends on the other side of this Hall forget some of the prejudices of their birth and early training and put aside the passions engendered by a war, which ended fifteen years ago, long enough to consider calmly this southern question about which they talk so much and seem really to know so little? I ask them just for a moment to view this southern problem from a stand-point from which, possibly, they have never looked at it.

The people of that section were suddenly and at once forced to consider not only how they could provide the necessary means of living, but how they could preserve their civilization and a semblance at least of free and honest State governments. The negro had just been emancipated and endowed with all the rights of a freeman. On the one side stood the former master invested with all the high instincts which belong to his Anglo-Saxon blood, intelligent, proud, accustomed to command and to receive obedience from his slave. On the other side was the newly enfranchised negro, with his dark face, his dark mind, his dark superstitions, and with all the confidence and affection which he once entertained toward his master and the members of his master's family, now turned into distrust and hate by the malign teachings of his pretended friends. These incongruous and now opposed social and political forces were thenceforth ordained to live at least under the same government.

A majority of votes, even though cast by negroes ignorant of the very names written or printed upon the ballots they place in the ballot-box, is to rule the State and to furnish the only security for life, liberty, and property. Is there nothing in this picture to excite grave apprehensions and to try the souls of liberty-loving white men? Is it easy to conceive of a problem the solution of which under the circumstances involves more wisdom, more forbearance, more heroic endurance, more self-sacrifice, a more thorough surrender of all preconceived notions and ideas, a more radical change in thought, in sentiment, and feeling?

In several of the States (my own, one of the original thirteen, among the number) these semi-barbarians, inflamed with wrath and hatred, and supremely incompetent for the duties of citizenship, were made the governing majority. If my friend from Michigan or my friend from Indiana, who have spoken so lightly in regard to this matter, had seen the heathen Chinese suddenly thrown into their States, enfranchised in a mass, in such preponderating numbers that the political power of their Commonwealths was likely to pass immediately into their hands, they might have some proper realization of the fearful condition of things brought about at the South by the reconstruction measures enacted into law by their party. History has never recorded a peaceable solution of any such problem, and I doubt not the people of the States just named, awaking to behold the horrors of such a condition of things as I have suggested, would not stop to count the cost before sounding the call to arms.

Failing to appreciate how fearful has been our struggle to preserve even our very civilization, and unable to understand the dreadful apprehension which still hangs like a pall over our future, lest we be again subjected to the blind and barbarous rule of an ignorant and irresponsible majority, you are fearfully shocked because things do not sometimes run so smoothly at the South as in New England, or that voters do not always walk up to the polls and cast their votes in the orderly manner characteristic of the men of that land of steady habits. What, I ask, in all sincerity, were the results which might have been reasonably expected to follow the turning loose of millions of slaves armed with the ballot? It has been well said that "if pillage, plunder, arson, murder, rape, which, indeed, largely followed, had at once become universal throughout the South, the law would not have been more guilty than it is, for it was the logical tendency of the law to produce exactly these and similar results."

I do not refer to these matters for the purpose of criticising or finding fault with your action. You no doubt felt that the only way in which the freedom and rights of the negro could be secured was by giving him the ballot. I refer to them rather with a view of enabling you if possible to understand something of the nature and magnitude of the struggle we have made and are making to secure the blessings of an honest government for both races at the South I have often felt pained that our motives and actions in political matters are so frequently called in question, and that our best efforts to solve this great problem have received so little encouragement from our friends on the other side of this Hall and from the constituencies they represent.

It was perhaps our misfortune that we inherited the institution of slavery from our fathers. The civilized world was arrayed against us, and had every motive to malign us, and to make us the bloody heroes of its wild romances. One generation has passed away from our midst and another has grown to manhood in their stead, many of whom still retain the belief of their fathers, that we are more intelligent but little less savage than the red men upon our western plains. Perhaps no people on the face of the globe have been so persistently and grossly misrepresented. We, however, have accepted this as part of our fate, and have long since ceased to hope for that measure of justice awarded to others.

But I am digressing from the line of thought I intended to pursue. Without a bitter thought or a bitter word, I want to talk very plainly for a moment with my republican friends. It is certainly to the interest of both sections that they should understand each other better. You will agree with us that the ballot in the hands of a basely ignorant majority, unless that majority can be controlled in some way by superior intelligence and virtue, is fatal to civil liberty and to everything we hold dear. Now, in South Carolina we have a large majority of ignorant negro voters, nine-tenths of them not being able to tell when they have deposited their ballots whether they voted for James A. Garfield or Andrew Jackson. The minds of these ignorant people have been so thoroughly poisoned by the teachings of bad men claiming to be republicans that as a body they have arrayed themselves politically against the white people.

With this condition of affairs, how are the ends of honest government to be secured? If the ignorant prejudices of their superstitious natures had not been so cruelly turned against us by the fiendish cunning of those who only sought an opportunity to plunder and oppress us, we might control them by an appeal to the kindly affections which grew out of the former relations of master and servant. If they had sufficient intelligence to appreciate their own interests, we might convince them that they would best secure those interests by co-operating with us. If they had a higher moral sense, they could be persuaded to vote for honest men instead of notorious thieves for office.

Shall we disfranchise them by creating an educational qualification? You would not, and I do not favor such a remedy. Such a law, if it could be passed, would take the ballot not only from nine-tenths of the negroes in my State, but I regret to say from a large number of white men. We cannot afford to have such a law, unless it is to take effect ten or twenty years hence, and such a one would be no remedy for present evils. Our greatest difficulty is in knowing how to deal with such voters. If, failing to reach or influence their dull minds in any other way, we attempt a little "object teaching" by such spectacular demonstrations of men in "red shirts" as we have had in two or three campaigns, you at once cry out against it as an attempt at bulldozing. You, by banding them together in your Union league organizations and fettering their superstitious minds with solemn oaths, made them believe there was no greater crime in the catalogue which any one of them could commit than to vote with his former master. Hence those who could be induced to break the shackles thus put upon them and to co-operate with us in our efforts to secure good government, were followed by the fiercest persecutions of their fellows, and we, on our part, were forced to demonstrate our power to give such new allies protection and in some way to overawe their assailants.

That disorder and sometimes riot and bloodshed grew out of this attitude of the two races was natural and almost inevitable. But what could we do? Quietly submit and allow the yoke to be put again upon our necks? You say the solution is a simple one, only come over to the Republican party and vote with the negro instead of attempting to prevail upon him to vote with you. In 1872, I think it was, my friend Governor Orr, late minister to St. Petersburg, proposed the same remedy. He had not then gone over to the Republicans; and in a conversation with a number of gentlemen at my house he urged, as the only method of regaining the confidence of the negro, that we should join the Republican party. I replied to him "that for every ten honest men he could carry with him to that party an equal number of dishonest ones, who were only kept out of it by the force of public opinion, (emboldened by his example,) would go over, and, joining with the thieves and robbers who already had possession of the negro, would bring to naught all his efforts at reform."

I said to him it was not so much a question of politics as of honesty. He thought differently and went over. I am sure he was actuated by pure and patriotic motives. He went soon afterward as a delegate to a State convention of his party in Columbia, and did his best to prevent the nomination of Franklin J. Moses, jr., who even then was known throughout the State and to every member of that convention as a public plunderer and shameless thief.

I saw my friend again some months after this convention, and, recalling our former conversation, he admitted to me that his plan was a failure, and that he never had the slightest conception until he was thus brought into close political affiliation with the leaders of the party how low and debased were the methods by which they obtained and held their power over the ignorant mass of negro voters, making it impossible for an honest Republican to reach them by any sort of appeal to their better nature. This was the confession of a man, not only of distinction and great ability, but of one who possessed in an eminent degree that rare power by which multitudes are moved and controlled.

But you say things have greatly changed since then, and that your plan could now be adopted successfully. Even supposing we are willing to change our political creed as we do our clothes, and join with your party, what assurance have we that the result would be different? Every political party has its bummers and camp-followers, and we have a woful experience of those who have followed in the wake of your party. Would not such political cormorants swoop down upon us again, and by the same methods which once made them so powerful for evil, reassert their sway over the negro? You perhaps cannot understand it, but we know how easy it would be for them to convince the ignorant mass of negroes that they alone were to be trusted, and that we were simply masquerading as Republicans in order to re-enslave them, or in some way to deprive them of their rights. No; the truth is, you do not and in the nature of things cannot fully understand the character of the negroes with whom we have to deal, or appreciate the difficulties which environ us on every hand. To thousands of your people the negro is still the polished "ebony idol"—a white man with a black skin—set up by the early anti-slavery agitators; or the "Uncle Tom" of Mrs. Stowe's cabin. Left to themselves, and uninfluenced by the vile teachings of the corrupt and miserable wretches who have used them simply as stepping-stones upon which they could mount into office, they are as kindly disposed as any race of people on the face of the earth. But, by no fault of theirs, the great mass of them are basely ignorant, and as the result of generations of slavery they have a very low moral sense. Accustomed, as a majority of them were while slaves, to think that the crime of stealing consisted only in being detected, the large body of them still think no less of a member of their own race, or of the white race, because he has been convicted of this crime. These plain truths, which are known and understood by every southern man, should be known and appreciated by you and the constituencies who stand behind you, if you intend to take any further action in regard to this question.

But, putting it on no higher ground, would it not be well for you to inquire whether you are seeking or promoting the best interests of the freedmen by attempting to make them so important a factor in all election contests? You strive to keep them solid so far as you can for the republican party, and yet you are greatly exercised over the fact that the white people are solidly democratic. The whites are so because you have forced them to it, not for aggression but for defense. They could find safety alone in united action. Besides, their fathers before them for generations have been democrats; and permit me to say you have done little to invite a change of political faith on their part. You were not distressed because the South was solidly republican a few years ago, nor are you concerned that the North is almost as solid to-day.

Political parties had their origin among those who founded our Government, and their continued existence has been regarded by our wisest men as a part of our good fortune. But I agree with you that it is far better that the line which divides them should not be a sectional one. On our part, however, we believe that republican rule at the South means negro rule, and negro rule means ruin. Until this impression is removed a sense of such impending danger must keep the South united.

How is this impression to be removed? I answer frankly and in the interest of both races: Let us have no further congressional interference with the question. Let the Executive appoint men of character to fill the Federal offices at the South. Let their claims to such appointments no longer rest upon the amount of vile work they have done for their party in the way of deluding with false hopes and alarming with groundless fears the ignorant masses of colored men; knowing full well that by such means alone they can prevent them from becoming subject to the wholesome influences of those who alone have the intelligence and virtue to give direction to the public affairs of the State.

Let those officers, too, understand that while they are to fearlessly perform the duties which the law imposes upon them, they can no longer find political preferment through groundless prosecutions and persecutions of democratic voters. Leave the rest to time and to those who have the deepest interest in a just and right solution of this great problem. We have no hostile feelings toward the negro, but we have been driven sometimes to act under a "necessity that knows no law," and whatever appearance of harshness, or whatever feelings of bitterness grew out of such circumstances, have been eagerly seized upon by those whose interest it was to misrepresent and traduce us. The political adventurers who came among us, and the natives of our own section who joined hands with them for the sake of public plunder, prompted by the basest of all possible motives, for years have labored only too successfully I know to create a belief that we have persecuted the negro and refused to recognize his rights under the law simply because his face is black and because he aspires to be something more than a chattel.

The charge is utterly false and groundless; and I assert that whatever coloring of truth these vile slanderers have been able to give it is directly traceable to their own base and wicked acts and doings. But for them and the unwise encouragement and support afforded them by this Government under the control of your party, I sincerely believe the relations of the two races at the South would to-day be such as to make the solution of this question a simple one. The North knows the carpet-bagger now by his works; we have known him for fifteen years. The average Federal office-holder in the South is but one degree removed from the carpet-bagger. We know him for what he is; sooner or later he will be found out at the North.

This brings me to the point I desire to emphasize, that the condition-precedent for a proper adjustment of this whole question is a restoration of harmony and kindly relations between the two races. This cannot be brought about but may be greatly retarded by further legislation on the part of this Government. It will be hastened by putting good and true men into the Federal offices at the South who will not only cease to provoke strife, but will endeavor to restore harmony between the black man and the white man; men who will hold their party allegiance subordinate to those higher interests which vitally concern not only the political, but the domestic and social well-being of a large portion of the people of this Union. It will be greatly promoted, too, if you will strike from the party catechism out of which you have taught the negro "that the chief end for which he was made a freeman and a voter was to support and vote the republican ticket." Let him understand that the duties of good citizenship consist in something more than an unreasoning and blind adherence to party, whatever may be the issues involved.

We invoke your aid in making him a good citizen, rather than a bad partisan. Patient effort on the part of the good people of the South will, I am convinced, if unhindered by adverse influences from other quarters, bring back and re-establish these kind relations, and at an early day. With the governments of all the States of the South in our possession, we are endeavoring to administer them in such a way as to secure the rights of every citizen, without regard to his color or previous condition. Everywhere the negro is the equal before the law of the white man. We have provided as generously for his education as our limited means would enable us to do. His children are not only being educated, but he is beginning to prosper, and is to-day enjoying more of the comforts of life than he ever knew before. Many of the vile men who so long held him in bondage to their thirst for power and greed of gain have taken flight, thus diminishing the elements of strife and causes of irritation.

Vigorous efforts are also being made, with encouraging results, to suppress lawlessness. That violations of law are of more frequent occurrence at the South than at the North will not appear strange to those who are unprejudiced enough to look for the real causes which necessarily make them more frequent. We are, however, making progress, and if let alone we have strong hopes of bringing order and harmony, peace and prosperity, back again to become the heritage of all our people.

I know full well the answer which perhaps you are anxious to make to all this. You are ready to say, this is all very well from your stand-point; but what will become of the poor negro when thus left to the tender mercies of the southern bulldozer? The popular notion of a bulldozer is a rough, reckless fellow with a pistol or club, ready to break the head of a negro whenever and wherever he dares to raise it in opposition to the political plans of the white man. While I have no personal knowledge of such persons, I will not deny that we have bad men at the South, as you have at the North; but I am sure the number of this class has been grossly and willfully exaggerated. If, however, your question could be propounded to one of these so-called bulldozers, even he, palliating his offense, might answer you by saying: "Yes, I confess I have, under a deep sense of many wrongs inflicted through the negro, treated him harshly, sometimes cruelly if you will have it so, and I am sensible I did him great injustice; but you armed him with the ballot and with the bullet, and turned him loose upon me and my people, and, under the leadership of men intent upon destroying all that made life desirable to me, he put his heel upon my neck and by your aid kept it there until by a superhuman effort I regained my feet. I desire to be on good terms with him and see him prosper, and if you will cease your efforts to again foist him into power, I will lay down my club and join with all good citizens in seeing that he is fully protected in all his rights."

Is it not well to disarm this class of persons (whom you insist upon making a very large one) of their fears, if they can thus be converted into law-abiding citizens? Is this not indeed the first and most important step toward accomplishing the object you profess to set above every other, the welfare of the negro? Further legislation, further interference through partisan investigating committees of this House, in my humble judgment, will only furnish new causes of irritation and create a wider breach between the two races. I know how easy it is by turgid rhetoric about rebellion, fraud, bulldozing, and the sacred rights of American citizens to carry the multitude against the policy I have advocated; but as legislators to whom is intrusted in a large measure the welfare of all the people, we should divest this subject of all sentiment and treat it as a matter demanding practical statesmanship.

Mr. Speaker, no people in any section of this broad land sympathize more sincerely with the negro, and none are more ready to do him acts of kindness than the intelligent white men of the South, but they have suffered such grievous wrongs and oppressions through his utter lack of moral fitness and supreme incompetency to govern that they view not only with the deepest concern but with horror his return to power. The vice and corruption, the bribery and debauchery, the pillage and plunder, the tyranny and oppression which characterized his reign form the darkest page which has yet disgraced our history. With us it is a question, not which party shall rule the State, but whether we shall have a government under which anybody can live.

In such a contest will you make the occurrence of disorders which are inseparable from it an excuse for the adoption of measures which will tend to make it only more doubtful and bitter? It is for you to decide.

In conclusion, I desire to say a few words in reference to the charge made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] against the census returns from my State. That a gentleman so distinguished and so well informed on most subjects should be found repeating, even with dramatic manner and utterance, a charge which had been sometime since so thoroughly disproved, only shows how slow the refutation of any slander touching the South travels when it reaches Republican channels. I am sure my friend is a diligent reader of his party newspapers, and yet they had told him nothing about the complete manner in which General Walker had refuted this slander. The truth is the census of 1870, so far as South Carolina is concerned, was a shameless fraud; and that of last year is as complete and trustworthy as any which was ever taken in any of the States.

Let me further say to my friend, for whom I entertain a very kind feeling, that even with his eloquence he can never vindicate the name of "carpet-bagger" from the just infamy to which it has been consigned by the judgment of the good and virtuous everywhere. Out of the number of those who earned a just title to this name, with all the ignominy which rightly attaches to it, in my State, two were sent in disgrace from this Hall by a republican House, one is now in an Ohio jail for murder, another is wanted to fill a cell in the Kansas penitentiary, and most of the others are fugitives from justice or aimless wanderers and outcasts. Let them alone; darkness and obscurity form their only shelter from public indignation and scorn.

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. DANIEL L. RUSSELL,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census—

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The Constitution of the United States, in the second section of the first article, provides that Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons three-fifths of all slaves, and that there shall be an enumeration of all the inhabitants every ten years; and that every State shall have at least one Representative. From 1790 until now a census of the people has been taken at the end of every ten years. The basis of representation has been founded upon numbers, and numbers alone. Upon the whole subject of suffrage the States have always been and, save only as restricted by the fifteenth amendment in the matter of color, they are now sovereign. The provision for the representation of "three-fifths of all other persons"—that is, slaves—was the result of a compromise between the free and the slave States which gave to the slave States, calculating upon the basis of suffrage, a large advantage over the free States. The war abolished slavery and brought about the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, which simply prohibits slavery throughout the Union.

When the North came to reconstruct the South it started out by adopting the fourteenth amendment, and required the insurrectionary States to adopt and ratify it also as a condition precedent to their admission to representation in Congress and rehabilitation as States. That amendment in its second section is this:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

The history of this amendment, the causes which led to its adoption, the mischiefs which were intended to be remedied, and the purposes and policy upon which it was founded are known to every reading and thinking man in this country, whether he be lawyer or layman. The North saw, if the insurrectionary States were reconstructed without some guarantee in regard to suffrage, that the white slaveholders of the South could by disfranchising the emancipated blacks regain the same unequal political power in the popular House which they had enjoyed under the institution of slavery. It was unwilling that two white men in the South should longer be equal to three white men in the North in political power in the House of Representatives.

At the same time the North was afraid of negro suffrage. The statesmen of the dominant party, the party which had conducted the war to a successful issue and struck down the institution of slavery, fully appreciated the difficulties of inducing the loyal States to accept the black man as a political equal. Many of the great war States of the North at that very time by their constitutions excluded the black man from the polls. Some of them, after the war, in the full flush of its success and glory, voted by large majorities against admitting the insignificant number of their own blacks to the suffrage. These statesmen were willing to make negro suffrage universal, but they were afraid that the people of their own States would not stand it. To meet the case and keep themselves within the bounds of prudence and caution, they adopted the fourteenth amendment, which did not establish negro suffrage anywhere, but which cut deep into the political power of those Southern States, where the black population mainly resided, which should refuse suffrage to the negro. On the other hand, on account of the small number of blacks inhabiting the Northern States, it could not appreciably affect their political power.

Now, sir, everybody knows that these were the causes and purposes which led to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment. But it does not follow upon any principle of statutory or constitutional construction that the amendment must be restricted to such purposes as were directly in the view of its framers; nor to the particular mischiefs which it was intended to meet, and without the existence of which it would not have been adopted. If its words are broad enough to cover other cases, and to subserve other purposes, and to meet other mischiefs, then full scope and effect must be given to them. This is too plain for argument; and yet it is gravely asserted on this floor that the amendment means the negro and nothing but the negro. Any school-boy will tell you when he reads it, if he is sufficiently matured to understand plain English words, that it no more means the negro than the white man, and that it is not confined to race at all. And yet because its particular intention was to induce the insurrectionary States to accept black suffrage, and to impose upon them a penalty in the loss of representation for the non-acceptance of it, we are now told that its plain words must be disregarded and its meaning restricted to the particular case which led to its adoption.

The argument is, if it had not been for the negro the fourteenth amendment would not have been adopted; ergo, it means the negro and nothing else. So the thirteenth amendment was adopted to emancipate the negro; ergo, it is entirely constitutional to reduce the white man to chattel slavery. A State by its statute to prevent horse-stealing denounces the death penalty against horse-stealing and child-stealing. Previous to the statute there had been no case of kidnapping children, but horse-stealing had been frequent and serious, and was the sole cause which led to the adoption of the statute; ergo, that law does not apply to kidnapping children. And so statutes and constitutions are to be read, not by their words, not by their language, not by what they plainly say, not by what their words necessarily import, but by the antecedent and contemporaneous history of their adoption. If we want to find out what the law is, we are not to look at it as it is written, but go behind it and read the stump speeches of the men who advocated and approved it.

Such arguments as these the lawyers who make them here and elsewhere would be ashamed to address to any intelligent court in this land. They know that no honest and intelligent judge would listen in patience to such puerile nonsense; but they also know another thing. They know that this never can be made a judicial question; that it never can be carried to the courts of the country to be decided according to the principles of reason and law. They know that it is a political question, to be decided by a political tribunal, and they rely upon what is coming to be the general understanding of this country, that political bodies decide the law just in that way which will best subserve and promote their political purposes.

These lawyers know themselves that they are not arguing to show that their contention is correct in law, but simply to furnish an excuse and pretext for construing away the Constitution of the country.

Let us look for a moment at the consequences to which their construction will lead. If the fourteenth amendment protects only the negro, then the fifteenth amendment protects only the negro. Its particular purpose was to protect him, and but for that purpose it would never have been thought of. So the black men of South Carolina and Mississippi, where they are largely in majority, may change the constitutions of their States and disfranchise all the white men within their borders! Yet the Supreme Court of the United States, in all the numerous cases where the question has been brought before them, has been particular to say that the amendments are not confined to the black man, but protect the white man as well To meet the express dicta of the Supreme Court on this subject these absurd constitutional constructionists are forced to fall back and admit that the amendments do protect the white man and to contend that while they cover race discriminations they do not cover any other discriminations, unless it may be such as are founded on qualities which are inherent and irremovable. The moment they admit this, they are driven entirely from the whole ground upon which their construction stands, because everybody knows that the protection of the white man was not the particular purpose which led to the adoption of the amendments; that if he only had been considered they would not have been adopted at all. It is readily seen that in this admission they are construing them upon their plain words and according to reason and common sense.

When they get on this ground, that is to say the ground of reason, of right, of justice, of common sense, and of law, they cannot stop at the race line; that is purely arbitrary. The words of the fourteenth amendment necessarily import more. There is no more in it about race than there is about the negro. The language is "when the right to vote shall be denied to any of the male inhabitants or in any way abridged" the basis of representation shall be reduced. It does not say that the denial or abridgment must be on account of race, but it does say in substance that if it be for any cause except rebellion or crime the representation shall be reduced.

The fifteenth amendment is confined by its words to discrimination by the State on account of race and color. If it were not so who would dare to insert those words into it, and thereby give it a different meaning from what the words themselves necessarily import?

But even taking the fourteenth amendment in connection with the history of its adoption it is to be observed that its framers expressly declined to confine the "denial" and "abridgment" to such cases as were founded upon race only. The amendment, as first reported by the committee on reconstruction in the House, was in these words:

> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed; provided that whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

In these words substantially it was passed by the House. In the Senate, in the course of an exhaustive discussion, it was pointed out that under this language the States might resort to denials and abridgments of the right on grounds other than of race. They might impose tax and property and educational qualifications, thereby barring from the suffrage the great mass of male citizens and accomplishing by indirection the precise mischief which it was intended to avoid. And so it was determined that the idea of race should be discarded and the principle of manhood suffrage should be substituted. And so the language was changed to that which is now embodied in the fourteenth amendment. We see, therefore, that interpreting the fourteenth amendment by the actual purposes of its framers as well as by its plain express words, it was intended to cover all denials or abridgments of the right to vote founded on property or educational qualifications or other tests of that character.

Driven from the position that the fourteenth amendment applies only to denials or abridgments on account of race, the opponents of free suffrage fall back on the assertion that the amendment cannot be executed. They say that no sufficient data has been obtained, or is obtainable in the nature of things, whereby the apportionment, based upon population and suffrage, as the amendment requires, can be made. They say to us, "If your construction is right, then every State is disregarding the fourteenth amendment, which you say means manhood suffrage, pure and naked; that is, that every male citizen of the United States, twenty-one years of age, who is an inhabitant of the State on the day of election, must be permitted to vote, and any restriction whatever upon this right is within the amendment. So the States must be punished if they do not allow idiots and lunatics to vote. They must not be permitted to pass registration laws. They must not fix residence qualifications, because if a man is an inhabitant on the day of election he is within the definition of the fourteenth amendment, although he may have acquired his domicile on the very day of the election. All the States require a residence previous to the election, varying from six to twelve months; so an enumeration must be had to ascertain how many citizens, inhabitants of the State on the day of election, had not resided in the State the prescribed time. The number of these is as changing as the sands of the sea, and never can be ascertained with any degree of certainty. Besides, you break down all the barriers by which the States protect themselves against election frauds. If they cannot pass registry laws and make residence qualifications, then all of them are now subject to the penalties of the fourteenth amendment, and none of them can ever provide for honest elections in the future. You thus strike down the last vestige of sovereignty in the State and leave your whole elective system without a safeguard. Now, if you admit the power of the State to do what all of them are doing in this regard, and what, according to the common acceptation of the whole country it has been and is their right to do, then it follows that you cannot put a limit upon the exercise of their discretion. If the State may require a residence of one year it may require a residence of twenty years, or forty years. If it can exclude idiots and lunatics because they are, as everybody admits, incompetent to exercise the right of suffrage, so it may exclude ignorant persons generally for the same reason. If it may require a registration of the voter antecedent to the election, it may require that the voter shall register himself, that is, write his own name on the registration books, which would, in effect, disqualify all the illiterates. So, if you once depart from the letter of the fourteenth amendment, you give up your whole case, and admit that the entire question of suffrage is with the States and that they may control it as they please without subjecting themselves to the loss of representation.

The answer to all this is plain and simple. A mere reference to the settled principles of election law as frequently adjudicated by all the State and Federal courts brings the mind to the distinction between the right of suffrage and the regulation of suffrage. The fourteenth amendment speaks only as to the right of suffrage, the regulation of it is with the States. The amendment holds out the inducement to the States to confer the right upon all male citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age residing in the State. Whenever the State by its laws denies or abridges this right it is within the purview of the amendment, but it may regulate the exercise of the right as it chooses, without regard to the amendment. So it may provide for voting by ballot or viva voce, or in any other reasonable way. It may say how many poll-holders there shall be, and where the place of election shall be. It may require the voters to be registered; it may require a reasonable length of residence prior to the election. All this is regulation. It does not impair the right of the citizen of the United States. It is a mere regulation intended for the protection of the ballot-box, and it will not do to run out this idea of regulation to extreme cases, so as to show that the right itself is affected. Whenever the State law passes beyond regulation and invades the dominion of right, then the State does subject herself to the penalty.

The regulation must be reasonable. When it becomes unreasonable, it is no longer regulation, but it affects the right itself. Who shall draw the line between what is reasonable and what is unreasonable? Who shall administer the rule as thus laid down? Manifestly the Congress which makes the apportionment, and which is the only tribunal having jurisdiction of the question. It shall judge and it shall draw the line, just as the courts do in cases involving the doctrines of reasonable time, of probable cause, and many other cases where the line of demarkation can only be stated in general words, and where it largely depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. A man makes a contract, and agrees with the other contracting party to do a particular thing; nothing is said about the time for the performance. The law says that he has contracted to do it within a reasonable time. The court looks at the contract and the circumstances which surround it and says what is a reasonable and what is not a reasonable time. So Congress looks at the Constitution and says that the right is conferred, and the regulation left to the States. It must say, looking at the law of each particular State, whether it is within the bounds of regulation, or invades the dominion of right. If the State should prescribe a twenty years' residence as a qualification to suffrage any court in which it became a judicial question would instantly say that this was something more than a mere regulation of the right of suffrage; that it manifestly appeared that there was an intention to disfranchise thousands of the bona fide citizens simply because they were not old residents, and hence that is not a regulation at all, but an invasion of the right itself. But if the State prescribes only a twelve months' residence the court would say this is merely a reasonable protection to the right of suffrage; it is not intended to disfranchise bona fide citizens, but only to prevent bogus citizens from exercising the right of suffrage.

The Constitution uses the word "inhabitant." This means, in that connection, a resident; that is, that he shall have a domicile in the State. Now, clearly, the States may declare that no one shall acquire a domicile in the State until he shall have actually resided there twelve months, and that in all questions of domicile arising in its courts the party claiming a domicile shall not only show his actual intention but shall show the fact of residence for twelve months. This would be a mere rule of evidence which the State is entirely competent to establish. But if the State should say that no person not born in the State should ever become a resident of the State until he had resided there sixty years the court would say that this was something more than a mere rule of evidence; that it was intended to exclude non-resident citizens of the United States from the rights of State citizenship, and was in clear violation of the first sentence of the fourteenth amendment, which declares that all persons born in the United States are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

As to the argument about idiots and lunatics the answer is that they are not persons within the meaning of the Constitution and the laws. The word inhabitant in the fourteenth amendment means a person inhabiting the State. Horses and cattle are in one sense inhabitants, but when the Constitution speaks of civil and political rights it refers to persons. Idiots and lunatics are civiliter mortuus. As a rule they are not embraced by general words which cover other persons. The law says no person shall commit larceny or perjury, yet idiots and lunatics may commit it without being subjected to the penalty. Why? Because they are not persons within the meaning of the law.

The same argument which is here made by the enemies of free suffrage against the protecting clauses of the fourteenth amendment, and which is founded upon the universality of the protection, and the absurdities to which they attempt to carry it, was made by the dissenting judges in the Virginia jury cases decided in the Supreme Court of the United States in 1879. There the court held that to exclude men of color from the jury-box was to deny to them the equal protection of the laws, and hence within the inhibition of the fourteenth amendment. The dissenting judges said that if this was so, then it followed that all persons, whether permanent residents or temporary sojourners, women, children, aliens, (they knew too much law to say idiots and lunatics,) must sit on the juries of the State.

But the court said that although the word person was used, which included them all, it referred to such persons as under the acknowledged policy of the State and the country, and in the nature of things, should reasonably exercise their right of composing juries, and only to these.

The attempt has been made by the opponents of free suffrage to state a distinction between those grounds of disfranchisement which are founded upon qualities that inhere in the individual, and are inseparable from his existence and are not removable by his effort or will, and those which do not inhere in the individual, but which may by his own act be removed. That is to say, that you may impose a tax or property qualification, or you may require that the elector shall be able to read the English language, because these things by sufficient effort he may do, and thereby qualify himself; but you must not found your disqualifications upon his nativity, or the length of his foot, or the color of his hair, because these things are inseparable from his existence, and not removable at his will. It is difficult to see how this distinction can be anything more than a merely arbitrary one, set up and contended for by the disfranchising States as necessary for their own purposes, unless it proceeds upon the idea that this imposition of these removable disabilities is mere condition precedent to the exercise of the right, and does not necessarily involve an absolute denial of it. You say to a man, You shall not vote unless you pay taxes or own property, or can read the Constitution in English. He may perform these conditions, and so the right is not denied. But when you say to him, You shall not vote because your hair is straight, or your foot is long, or you were born in Ireland, you absolutely deny the right, because these are disqualifications which are beyond his power to remove or control.

In regard to property, tax, and educational qualifications, this distinction is not sound. It is not true that the poor, the humble men of this country, have it in their power to acquire property or education, or even to pay at all times the tax which the States impose. In the thickly-populated States of New England, where wealth has accumulated and men decayed and poverty become the heritage of the vast mass of their people, it is nothing less than a cruel mockery to say to the poor that they can accumulate property and pay taxes and acquire an education. There are thousands of men of foreign birth within their limits who to comply with such requirements must study and learn a new language. It is false and wicked to say that they, in the few hours of rest from incessant toil necessary to support themselves and their families can master a language foreign and new to them. If these men of foreign birth and the emancipated blacks of the South were compelled to do so and to lose the time from labor necessary to do it, they would be driven to beggary and starvation. There are to-day hundreds of the children of the very millionaires and plutocrats who are, in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, imposing this condition on their less fortunate fellow-citizens, who, even taking them at a reasonably advanced age, could not learn to read the constitution with facility in two years. Take these same children and advance them to an age past the meridian of life and deny all educational advantages until that time, and they could not learn it so soon, and many of them could never learn it at all. An unlettered man past the meridian of life who speaks only a foreign tongue presents a still stronger case. It is, therefore, the cruelest mockery to say to these men that you are simply fixing a condition to the exercise of their rights which they can perform. It is false, and you know it. Thousands of them cannot and never will attempt it.

The State of Connecticut requires that every person shall be able to read any article of the constitution or any section of the statutes of that State before being admitted as an elector, and has no saving whatever for unfortunate men who are prevented by physical disability from complying with these requirements.

But even if there was any practical truth in the distinction which is here attempted to be set up in favor of disfranchisement on account of poverty and ignorance, the apologists and defenders of it are met by the very words of the fourteenth amendment. As has been said, there is no sense in the distinction, unless it proceeds upon the idea that such requirements do not deny the right to vote absolutely. But the fourteenth amendment, in order to meet just such cases, adds an additional powerful and far-reaching word. Not only shall you not "deny," but you "shall not in any way abridge" the right to vote. Will any of these defenders of the disfranchisement of citizens give us a construction of the word "abridge" that is consistent with their theory? Was it not intended to meet these very cases of conditions precedent to the right? To "abridge" means to cut off, to lessen, to curtail. Now, when you say to the citizen, "You shall not vote under any circumstances," you "deny" the right. When you say to him, "You shall not vote unless you comply with a certain condition," not in the nature of a mere regulation, although it may be in his power to comply, you "abridge" the right to vote. The word "abridge" was put in to meet all such cases as might not be included in the word "deny." The word "abridge" is much more comprehensive than the word "deny," and it was inserted to reach every possible case where the right of suffrage should be interfered with. An impossible condition "denies" the right; a possible condition "abridges" it; and one reduces the basis of representation as much as the other.

Citizens may refuse to comply with hard conditions for the very purpose of bringing the penalty on the State as the best means of redress for the wrong done them, thus falling back on the General Government to protect them against the wrong done them by the State.

It is idle to attempt to give the word "abridge" a less scope than the word "deny." They both apply to "any citizen" and to "any election," and are precisely equal in the extent of their application. "In any way abridge" is another use of words showing that the right was meant to be absolute and unrestricted. To prescribe educational, property, or tax qualifications, or any other not connected with the orderly and honest exercise of the right of suffrage, such as registration, residence, and the like, is to "abridge" it, make it less than the simple manhood suffrage meant to be secured by the fourteenth amendment. No lawyer in this country, if he were employed to write the principle of manhood suffrage in the Constitution, with the brevity necessary in such an instrument, could do it better or state it stronger than it was done by those who framed it in the words in which we find it written there in the fourteenth amendment.

Now, let us glance at the States which are now violating the Constitution by holding representation in this House to which they are not entitled. Before coming to that, however, let us for a moment go back to the census of 1870 and the apportionment act of 1872, under which these States are claiming the representation which they now possess. Let us see how it happens that for ten years the Constitution has been persistently violated by some six or seven States which are this day exercising illicit power in the popular House of the country, and thereby, in the very teeth of the Constitution, diluting the power of all the other States of the Union.

When Congress came to provide for the census of 1870, it was suggested that it would be necessary to ascertain the number of men disfranchised under the fourteenth amendment, and a provision looking to such count was adopted by the House of Representatives. In the Senate it was contended that it would be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to execute the Constitution in this respect, and provide by regulations of his office for such return, and hence that no legislation was necessary. This view finally prevailed in the Senate, and the matter was left with the Interior Department. The Secretary of the Interior instructed the deputy marshals to make a return of the disfranchised persons, and blanks were sent to them for this purpose. They did go through the motion of making such returns, but they were so manifestly incomplete and so ridiculously untrue that the Secretary of the Interior, in an official communication, stated that no reliance could be placed upon them. In the State of Rhode Island they reported some two thousand disfranchised persons, when it was well known that the State disfranchised many times that number; and in all the States the count was a mere mockery.

Speaking with reference to that report and to the meaning of the fourteenth amendment, Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, said:

> As a matter of history this amendment was intended to declare simply that should suffrage be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color representation should be diminished in the proportion of such denial or abridgment; and this was a wise and just proposition. But in adopting the negative form with a view to the inclusion of only two classes, they did as a matter of fact include many classes who were manifestly not in the minds of the authors of the amendment at the time. Thus they made the back of the blade cut as sharp as the edge itself. * * * But, Mr. Chairman, the Constitution is here in the words that have been quoted several times during this debate. Can we obey its requirements? If so, how? Or shall we neglect it?

Again he said, speaking of the insufficiency of that report in the census:

> It seems to me that we are bound to take this report into account, and I hope this work will compel after Congresses to provide some more efficient mode for taking these statistics.

It is thus seen that Mr. Garfield rejected the restricted construction of the fourteenth amendment which is now contended for, and interpreted it according to its manifest scope and meaning. He held that the amendment should be enforced, and hoped that future Congresses would take such steps as were necessary to do it in good faith. Let us see what has been done in that direction. That Congress, in pursuance of the views of Mr. Garfield and others, inserted in the apportionment bill this provision:

> Should any State, after the passage of this act, deny or abridge the right of any of the male inhabitants thereof, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, to vote at any election named in the amendment to the Constitution, article 14, section 2, except for participation in the rebellion or other crime, the number of Representatives apportioned to such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall have to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Now, what was the purpose of this section of the apportionment act of 1872, and what was the reason and policy which led to its adoption? Congress was making an apportionment and claiming to execute the Constitution, which required an apportionment based not only upon numbers but upon suffrage also. It was admitted on all hands that the data in hand in so far as suffrage was concerned, that is, the number of disfranchised persons in each State, were totally inadequate, insufficient, and incorrect, but they held that it was such a return as they could lawfully act upon prima facie. In order, however, to give full effect and validity to the fourteenth amendment they inserted the clause which I have just read. What did it mean? It meant that the States themselves should be compelled to enforce the fourteenth amendment, and that they should send their Representatives to the Lower House at their peril; that if they should after the passage of this act so disfranchise their citizens as to curtail the number of their Representatives, they as States, through their Legislatures, should reduce the number according to the true facts and figures. They knew, or ought to have known, what the true number was. The facts were or might have been peculiarly in their possession. If they did not have the number of disfranchised citizens they could provide by law for obtaining it, and they were expressly commanded, in case they should disfranchise their citizens, to reduce their representation accordingly. Now, this provision either meant that or it was mere nonsense. It was not contemplated to take a new census, and it might well be doubted whether there is any authority in the Constitution to take a new census until the ten years had expired. So that we see that this provision of the apportionment act of 1872 was intended to operate upon the States as States, and to compel them at their peril to comply with the Constitution.

It is insisted by these States which have disregarded this law that it does not apply on account of the words "after the passage of this act." They contend that this means only to apply in case they should after the passage of the act, by some affirmative action of their own, disfranchise their citizens. It means no such thing. It means, as it says, if they shall do it, whether they do it in pursuance of some antecedent or subsequent legislation of their own. The only question was, shall they do it, no matter how, whether by an old law or by a new law. If they do it they must submit to the penalty.

Now, let us see how the law and the Constitution have been carried out. The State of Massachusetts has continuously and persistently from that day to this disfranchised large numbers of her citizens who are within the fourteenth amendment. She requires the payment of a tax, and that the elector shall be able to read the constitution in the English language, and write his name. The most distinguished citizen of that State now living declares that according to the best information that is obtainable this disfranchises about one hundred thousand of her male citizens over twenty-one years of age. It can be shown that according to the figures given by her Representatives here the disfranchisement is sufficient to impair her representation; and yet she sits here, and has been here since the passage of that act of 1872, with eleven members, not one of whom is entitled, or has been entitled, to his seat under the Constitution and laws of the country. I say none of them, because it is manifest that if a State sends more members to this House than she is entitled to under the Constitution and laws, they come all affected with the same infirmity, and there is no distinguishing between them. You can not select one, or two, or three arbitrarily, and turn them out so as to reduce the number to her constitutional quota. You can do nothing but execute the Constitution by rejecting the whole of them and inviting the State to send her lawful number. But they say, who is to fix the lawful number? I say the law which you have made, and which is now on your statute-book, has fixed it by leaving it to the State to say how many, subject to the review of this House, which under the Constitution is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. But they say, how can this House ascertain what is the true number? I answer, that it must ascertain it precisely as it ascertains any other fact, by investigation, if it chooses; through committees, if it sees proper; by the ordinary channels of information and communication, such as it acts upon in arriving at other facts of the most momentous character. Suppose the State had changed its laws after the apportionment act of 1872 so as to disfranchise its citizens, thereby curtailing its representation, and still refused to comply with the plain mandate of the law and sent more Representatives than it was entitled to; suppose Massachusetts had after the passage of the act disfranchised all her male citizens under the age of sixty years by act of her Legislature or constitutional convention, thereby leaving herself entitled to only one member, would it be contended that she could still have eleven, and that this House was powerless to protect itself and the other States and enforce the Constitution?

If the words "after the passage of this act," in the apportionment law of 1872, are to be construed as I contend, then the conclusion is irresistible that none of her members are entitled to seats on this floor; and they should be remanded to that State to the end that she shall enforce the Constitution and the laws. Otherwise you might as well say that the State which sends 40 members, and is only entitled to 1, shall have them here to dilute and destroy the political power of other States, and in the very teeth of the Constitution magnify her own. And so the State of Rhode Island most flagrantly disfranchises vast numbers of her male citizens otherwise qualified. She requires the payment of a tax of all her native-born citizens as a condition precedent to the enjoyment of the elective franchise, and as to her foreign-born citizens, who constitute the bulk of her population, she requires a property qualification to the amount of $134 in real estate, over and above all incumbrances. In all probability, if the Constitution and laws were enforced upon her, she would only be entitled to one member, and that not by reason of her population and voters, but under that clause of the Constitution of the United States which guarantees to each State at least one member.

The State of Connecticut disfranchises all who cannot read the Constitution and statutes.

The States of Delaware, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Georgia require the payment of taxes antecedent to the exercise of the elective franchise.

It is marvelous that a great State like Pennsylvania, the bulk of whose people are not inimical to manhood suffrage, should have adopted the fourteenth amendment; and although she has held a constitutional convention since its adoption, should have failed to conform her constitution so as not to expose her representation in this House. The tax which she requires of her voters is much less than that of the other disfranchised States, and I am told by her members that it is merely nominal. It may be that it would fall under the maxim de minimis non curat lex. It might be likened to the case where the States require a small registration fee of the voter for the purpose of paying the expenses of conducting the election, which I submit would fall within the line of regulation, and would not impair the right itself; but since it is a tax which at the will of the Legislature may be largely increased, and may at any time be made burdensome, it would seem to be an invasion of the right of suffrage.

All these States which impose the tax qualification do abridge the right of all their citizens within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. The abridgment applies not only to those who from inability and indisposition to pay the tax do not vote, but it applies to every citizen otherwise qualified within their borders. It imposes a condition precedent to the right of voting upon every man within their limits. As to those who cannot possibly pay it amounts to a denial; as to those who can pay it is an abridgment of the right. It is making the right less than absolute, and it applies not to a part but to all male citizens over twenty-one years of age. In this respect it is unlike the case of the illiteracy disqualification. There the abridgment applies only to those who cannot read. As to them it is either a denial or an abridgment, according to the circumstances of each case. When one, from poverty or physical disability, cannot comply, it is a denial, otherwise it is an abridgment; and so as to those who are already qualified, that is, those who can read there is neither a denial nor an abridgment; no condition is required of them, but when you require the poll-tax you impair the right to vote by saying to every voter in the State that he must comply with your requirement before he can exercise the right. This is an abridgment applying to all. In this view these States are entitled to no representation whatever except to one member, which the Constitution gives to every State without regard to its population or its suffrage laws.

Now, I have shown how the Constitution and the laws upon this subject have for ten years been systematically, persistently, and wilfully disregarded. In the census of 1870 they did pretend to attempt to execute the Constitution by going through the forms of obtaining a report as to the disfranchised persons in each State. Then Congress by the apportionment act says to the States they must send their members to the House of Representatives, and fix the number so as to conform to the Constitution, and their action shall be subject to the review of the House itself. This, I say, is what the section which I have quoted of the apportionment act of 1872 meant, and is the only construction of which it is susceptible that is consistent with reason and common sense. It has turned out that it was a mere brutem fulmen which nobody regarded. Now we see these disfranchising States again preparing to drive a coach and six through the Constitution and laws. The census of 1880 is provided for by Congress, and not one word said about obtaining the statistics necessary for the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment. No attempt is made to ascertain how many men are disfranchised in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Virginia, and Georgia. We have not even the worthless return such as we had in 1870. They have ceased even to go through the forms of executing the Constitution; and now, almost by common consent, we are having a new apportionment, lasting for ten years, based upon numbers alone.

The sooner we have an understanding about this matter the better. If Massachusetts and Rhode Island can disfranchise the poor and the humble citizens of foreign birth within their limits, then South Carolina and Mississippi may easily avoid what they regard as the danger of universal negro suffrage.

The leading newspaper of South Carolina, a little while ago, told the country that the white people of that State were growing excessively restive under the constantly recurring necessity of driving the negroes from the polls, and of doing it in such a way as to keep out of the penitentiary; that they are living under a negro majority, and that that majority had to be overcome by force and fraud at each recurring election, and that it was about time to put a limit on the suffrage by law and thereby avoid the necessity for a reign of lawlessness in every campaign.

Now, if Massachusetts may restrict her suffrage without loss of representation, why not South Carolina? Why shall not South Carolina copy the Massachusetts constitution, and adopt it as her own? To do this with a slight variation, she has only to provide that no one shall vote who cannot read the constitution and statute law, with the proviso that no person shall be disfranchised who enjoyed the suffrage previous to the 1st day of January, 1868. This would give South Carolina literally a white man's government. It would be the government of the old slave-holding oligarchy of that State restored. It would disfranchise nine-tenths of her black citizens, and a small proportion of her poor white men. It would not violate the fifteenth amendment, because in it there would be no discrimination on account of color or race.

The history of the last ten years, the present attitude of Congress toward these disfranchising States, the impurity with which these States disregard the plainest requirements of the Constitution, the manifest purpose to construe away the Constitution by silly quibbles and sorry subterfuges, the high-handed violation of the amendments by the very States which forced them on the South and the country, all go to show the existence of a wide and deep conspiracy for the overthrow of free suffrage in this country. No man can be so blind as not to see that the issue of the future is between the people on the one hand and untaxed and lawless capital on the other. Ten or fifteen years more of submission by the people to the encroachments of monopolists and the demands of capital will see the American aristocracy enthroned and the people powerless. The monopoly classes have now their hands upon the throat of the Constitution. They have ceased to work to accumulate money except as a means for obtaining political power. They dominate courts and Legislatures. They have their representatives by the score in this House; they are fast capturing the Senate. They are to-day exercising more actual power than the Congress itself. They can by a stroke of the pen fix the price of bread in every Atlantic city, and pinch with hunger the toiling millions. The press they have already bought and paid for. With only a few exceptions, they carry in their pockets a bill of sale for all the leading daily newspapers of the country. Even the great channel of speedy communication and thought, the telegraph, is theirs. Vanderbilt and Gould are our masters. You cannot speak to a friend at a distance, or send a quick order for a dozen shirts, without paying tribute to them. Their grip is fast closing upon the entire railway system of the country. This colossal interest, embracing seven or eight thousand million dollars in capital and bonded debts, employing an army of 600,000 servants, is rapidly falling into their hands. They, with a few other kings with whom they are combining, handle double the revenue of the Government, and stand menacingly at the gates of commerce. And yet when we attempt to pass an interstate-commerce bill that shall in some degree put a curb upon their power and afford some little protection to the people, we find that it receives less than a hundred votes in the popular House. When we try to establish a postal telegraph for the protection of the people, we cannot even bring it to a vote in this House.

Eastern capital sees that its cheapest enemy is universal suffrage. It is debauching that enemy by introducing habits of venality among the poorer classes, by buying up ward and township politicians and primary meetings. The results of elections depend upon the "influence," as they call it, that is, the amount of money which each side puts into the business. Every recurring election is more expensive than the one that preceded it. If it goes on every election will bring about a redistribution of property to some extent at least. Capital sees this, and is preparing to stop it. How? By disfranchising the poor and the humble. It is cheaper to disfranchise them than to buy them up at every election.

Those who hope for the success and permanence of free institutions must begin to look to the great and free West and central States like Tennessee, North Carolina, and Virginia, and growing States like Texas. The alliances of the future ought to be between these States on the one hand and eastern millionaires and southern Bourbons on the other. The West has adopted universal manhood suffrage; Tennessee and North Carolina have it in substance as well as in name.

As the Representative of a State which has put free suffrage into her constitution I demand that her representative power shall not be diluted by other States in violation of the Constitution of the country. Execute the Constitution or change it.

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. J. H. ACKLEN,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of representation in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. ACKLEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It was not my intention to have participated in this debate, but owing to certain criticisms of gentlemen on the other side of this House upon that section of the country which I have the honor to represent, I have felt compelled, wedded as I am to my people and their every interest, to reply.

Much has already been well and eloquently said on the subject of the apportionment, and I hardly deem it necessary now to more than cursorily touch upon it, but a few suggestions may be pertinent.

In a country growing so rapidly as ours past precedents are not always the best guides for the future. Perhaps in England, where it is said "freedom slowly broadens down from precedent to precedent," such a rule might apply, but America stands a phenomenon among nations, and has in one century grown from a child to a giant in strength. As the wisdom of the past would be the folly of to-day, so a national policy based upon existing conditions must prove inapplicable to our future welfare. As nations progress or retrograde, so should the views of those who govern them be modified to meet the requirements of the time. From 1803, when our representation of 105 was based upon 33,000 of population to each member, the country has taken a grand step forward, until to-day our House of 293 members has a population of 50,000,000 at its back. The apportionment upon the last census gave 130,533 of population to each member; to-day, if that number should be retained for the House, the number of population to each member must be largely increased. The following short table is of interest in this connection:

Decade ending—	Number of members.	Population to each Representative.
1793	65
1803	105	33,000
1813	141	33,000
1823	181	35,000
1833	212	40,000
1843	240	47,700
1853	223	70,680
1863	234	93,500
1873	241	127,941
1883	293	130,533

Shall we go forward and increase the size of the House in a ratio equal to the increase of our population? This is an important question, and merits careful consideration. It is well known that very large bodies of men tend rather to delay than expedite legislation. On the other hand, we must bear in mind that our first object should be to give every section of this country the fairest representation. I have no sympathy with views based upon purely partisan feeling, views which, if enacted into law, would enlarge the political power of one section to the detriment of the other.

If we cannot cut loose from politics in the consideration of such a question, we are not fit to deal with it. In the history of all countries we find one section increasing in population while the other stands still or falls off. This is the case in ours, but it should be no ground for boasting on the one side and anger and regret on the other. Are we not a common country, having a like destiny, and should we not be proud of the welfare of the whole without reference to the vantage or disadvantage of a part? Why, sir, while glad and proud that the South has taken a great step forward in the last ten years, I have no feeling of exultation that New England has stood still. As the birthplace of freedom, as the educator of the nation, she will ever hold an honored position. The recent census points with the unerring finger of fate to the West and South as the seat of future power and wealth of the country, but no man of the East with the patriotism of a true American should find aught therein for regret.

In dealing with this question of apportionment party bias and feeling should be laid entirely aside, and the only sentiment which should animate members ought to be a fixed determination to do each and every part of this country even-handed justice. Four numbers are particularly mentioned for the increase of Representatives: 301, 307, 311, and 319. I do not advocate 311, as in my opinion it would give the democratic party an advantage in the apportionment which they cannot justly ask, and for the contrary reason 319 would not be equitable to them. Either 301 or 307 offers to both parties the fairest representation that the apportionment could afford, and, so far as I am individually concerned, I will support either of these.

Considering our population, 307 is not too large a House. Great Britain, with a population of 31,628,338, has a House of Commons of 652 members. The Chamber of Deputies of France consists of 532 members, on a population of 36,905,788. Germany, with a population of 42,727,360, has in the Reichstag 397 members. Austria has 21,742,884 in population and her Lower House has 353 members. The Cortes of Spain consist of 408 members. In Italy the Camera de Deputati consists of 508 members, and that upon a population of 27,769,475. In Hungary, where the population is 15,609,455, the House of Representatives consists of 444 members. Belgium has only 5,412,231, but her Chamber of Representatives consists of 124 members. Three hundred and one or 307 will therefore not be too large a number for our House of Representatives, but there exists no reason why we should increase this representation beyond these figures.

The brief time accorded me will not permit an enlargement upon this subject, but I wish to reply before concluding to certain remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] who has raised the question as to whether the South should be represented upon the basis of her population or upon the vote cast at the last election.

What, in substance, are we then to judge is a summary of the position assumed by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR?] It is that the republican vote in the South has been suppressed by violence and intimidation. I will not pretend to deny that in some instances violence has been practiced, but it sprang out of that feeling of political animosity which is ever prevalent in that sharp struggle between two parties for dominance in a State; but that this has been generally the case I most emphatically deny. In the third district of Louisiana, which I have the honor to represent, I maintain that there has not been since the war one single well authenticated case of violence springing from political animosity to the colored voter. On the contrary, from the tables which I will incorporate as a part of my remarks, it will be seen that prior to the change in the political government of the State in 1876 the republican vote in the third district was no greater than it is at present.

The registered vote of the twelve parishes of the third congressional district for 1880 was 37,782, of which there were 17,100 white voters and 20,687 colored. At the election for governor in 1872, when the political machinery of the State was entirely in the hands of the republican party, there were cast in this district 23,198 votes, 13,572 republican and 9,626 democratic. Again, in 1874, while the State was still in the control of the republican party, the aggregate vote in the district was 25,132, of which 13,256 were republican votes and 11,876 democratic. In the great struggle of 1876, when the State was racked to its very center with political excitement, and which contest resulted in the election of Governor Nicholls, the aggregate vote was 29,159, there being 15,626 republican and 13,533 democratic votes cast. In 1878 the political machinery of the State passed from the hands of the republican to those of the democratic party.

Now, then, we should note, according to the position assumed by the gentleman from Michigan, a decided change, but although at the election of 1878 there was but one State officer to be voted for, namely, the State treasurer, the aggregate vote was 21,154; of which 10,700 were republican and 10,454 democratic votes. In 1879, when the State officers under the new constitution were to be elected, the aggregate vote was 25,560; of which 14,387 were republican and 11,173 democratic votes. Contrast the republican vote at this election of 1879 with the republican vote of 1872 and 1874, when the State was entirely in the hands of the republican party, and we find it to be in excess of the republican vote at either one of these elections. Now, in 1880 there were no State officers to be elected. The only names of candidates appearing upon the ballots being that of a member of Congress and the presidential electors, and yet, although there was but 21,630 votes cast, yet 13,648 were republican and but 7,982 democratic. These facts and figures unquestionably answer the position, in so far as this district is concerned, assumed by the gentleman from Michigan.

If we examine these tables more in detail we will find in the parish of La Fourche where the registered vote stands 2,391 democrat as against 2,001 republican, a majority of 390 democratic votes. The returns at this last election gave Hancock 1,433 and Garfield 1,699, or a republican majority of 266. The parish of Vermillion, with a registered vote of 1,240 democrats and 312 republicans, gave Hancock 474 votes and Garfield 116. The parish of Calcasieu, with a registered vote of 1,739 democrats and 389 republicans, gave Hancock 784 and Garfield 109 votes. The parish of Saint Mary, with a registered vote of 1,236 democrats and 3,288 republicans, gave Hancock 561 votes and Garfield 2,181.

Mr. Speaker, the time has gone by when the charge of fraud and violence against the South will have any effect upon the people of this country. The incoming President said in substance, while a member of this body, that "he who strove to array the sections against each other should be frowned upon." What we want is only to be let alone in the management of our political affairs. What we ask at the hands of the Government is only equal consideration in the public improvements of our rivers and harbors with other sections of this country. We have accepted in good faith the results of the war, and mean to stand by the Union, and should the welfare of this country be in the future threatened by foreign powers, the men of the South will be found the first to stand like a wall of fire in defense of our common country.

Third congressional district of Louisiana—vote by parishes, elections of 1878, 1879, and 1880.

PARISH OF ASCENSION.

Wards and precincts.	Election of 1878.			Election of 1879.		Election of 1880.				Registered voters.
	Acklen.	Hebert.	Merchant.	Wiltz.	Beattie.	Hancock.	Garfield.	Billin.	Darrall.	White.	Colored.
First police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 1	27	161	.....	20	170	22	158	22	158	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 2	41	.....	.....	8	65	10	48	10	48	.....	.....
Second police-jury ward....polling precinct No. 3	163	12	.....	15	193	11	136	11	136	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 4	93	12	.....	22	174	26	200	21	200	.....	.....
Third police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 5	35	1	.....	100	338	89	294	89	294	.....	.....
Fourth police-jury ward....polling precinct No. 6	226	3	.....	28	152	17	83	17	83	.....	.....
Fifth police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 7	23	.....	.....	3	65	6	54	6	54	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 8	9	3	.....	15	94	35	149	35	149	.....	.....
Sixth police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 9	54	91	.....	9	131	9	127	9	127	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 10	52	.....	.....	3	60	1	35	1	35	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 11	26	.....	.....	23	154	47	114	50	109	.....	.....
Seventh police-jury ward...polling precinct No. 12	29	.....	.....	3	56	8	59	8	59	.....	.....
Eighth police-jury ward....polling precinct No. 13	116	.....	.....	42	129	23	126	24	125	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 14	80	59	.....	22	.....	16	13	16	5	.....	.....
Ninth police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 15	24	4	.....	75	64	79	.....	79	.....	.....	.....
Tenth police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 16	17	.....	.....	26	1	12	84	15	72	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 17	64	124	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Total	1,089	388	.....	414	1,846	411	1,679	418	1,654	1,048	2,350

PARISH OF CAMERON.

First police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 1	29	.....	.....	30	.....	21	.....	21	.....	35	.....
Second police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 2	69	.....	.....	55	.....	48	.....	48	.....	57	13
Third police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 3	59	.....	33	41	31	20	21	23	15	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 4	52	.....	9	57	2	19	20	17	22	130	28
Fourth police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 5	9	.....	3	11	.....	17	2	17	2	51	3
Fifth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 6	67	.....	2	58	6	41	14	41	15	75	19
Total	285	.....	47	252	39	166	57	138	62	348	63

PARISH OF ASSUMPTION.

First police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 1	91	221	.....	156	246	73	196	73	195	178	275
Second police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 2	106	125	.....	152	170	98	137	98	137	149	205
Third police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 3	44	143	.....	116	235	48	179	48	179	88	338
Fourth police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 4	82	35	.....	143	55	100	32	100	32	156	61
Fifth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 5	62	25	.....	141	47	56	44	56	44	167	59
polling precinct No. 6	64	131	.....	90	181	76	138	76	138	119	189
Sixth police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 7	36	3	.....	63	2	24	.....	24	.....	89	3
Seventh police-jury ward ...polling precinct No. 8	39	260	.....	108	353	67	289	67	290	153	438
polling precinct No. 9	45	64	.....	48	86	25	57	25	57	86	94
polling precinct No. 10	4	9	.....	6	33	.....	.....	.....	.....	32	6
Eighth police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 11	141	1	.....	199	218	91	178	91	178	238	230
Ninth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 12	31	.....	.....	54	27	2	.....	.....	.....	111	4
Tenth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 13	91	6	.....	146	249	68	199	68	199	125	303
Eleventh police-jury ward ..polling precinct No. 14	110	2	.....	84	12	70	8	70	8	142	16
Total	996	1,025	.....	1,506	1,914	798	1,457	796	1,458	1,833	2,221

Third congressional district of Louisiana—vote by parishes, elections of 1878, 1879, and 1880—Continued.

PARISH OF CALCASIEU.

Wards and precincts.	Election of 1878.			Election of 1879.		Election of 1880.				Registered voters.
	Acklen.	Hebert.	Merchant.	Wiltz.	Beattie.	Hancock.	Garfield.	Billin.	Darrall.	White.	Colored.
First police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 1	33	.....	.....	52	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	68	3
polling precinct No. 2	107	.....	.....	113	5	35	8	35	8	93	54
polling precinct No. 3	49	.....	.....	47	.....	18	.....	14	.....	51	9
Second police-jury ward .... polling precinct No. 4	61	.....	.....	69	.....	46	.....	46	.....	88	9
polling precinct No. 5	17	.....	10	26	4	14	.....	14	.....	43	5
Third police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 6	266	.....	22	295	83	205	80	198	81	384	124
polling precinct No. 7	32	.....	1	26	.....	14	.....	14	.....	43	8
Fourth police-jury ward .... polling precinct No. 8	104	.....	.....	134	1	75	2	70	2	104	26
polling precinct No. 9	70	.....	.....	91	30	52	11	51	12	88	56
Fifth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 10	41	.....	.....	47	.....	42	.....	42	.....	53	7
polling precinct No. 11	24	.....	.....	32	.....	13	.....	13	.....	43	2
polling precinct No. 12	26	.....	.....	35	.....	24	.....	24	.....	45	8
Sixth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 13	25	.....	.....	32	.....	14	.....	14	.....	25	13
polling precinct No. 14	89	.....	.....	76	.....	61	.....	60	.....	98	19
polling precinct No. 15	29	.....	.....	31	.....	13	.....	13	.....	47	6
Seventh police-jury ward... polling precinct No. 16	150	.....	4	150	6	89	8	89	8	209	5
polling precinct No. 17	67	.....	.....	68	.....	39	.....	39	.....	86	1
polling precinct No. 18	33	.....	.....	37	.....	15	.....	15	.....	46	1
Eighth police-jury ward.... polling precinct No. 19	43	.....	4	47	.....	15	.....	15	.....	55	15
polling precinct No. 20	75	.....	.....	66	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	70	18
Total	1,341	.....	31	1,474	129	784	109	766	111	1,739	389

PARISH OF IBERIA.

First police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 1	221	.....	395	183	305	127	218	119	226	.....	.....
Second police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 2	39	.....	170	29	175	15	156	15	156	.....	.....
Third police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 3	62	.....	93	46	121	34	98	34	98	.....	.....
Fourth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 4	163	.....	109	178	63	76	58	76	58	.....	.....
Fifth police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 5	89	.....	204	87	179	55	157	45	167	.....	.....
Sixth police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 6	219	3	65	262	315	243	330	228	340	.....	.....
Seventh police-jury ward ... poilling precinct No. 7	104	.....	211	101	155	51	98	11	118	.....	.....
Total	887	3	1,447	886	1,313	601	1,115	528	1,163	1,642	1,802

PARISH OF LA FOURCHE.

First police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 1	48	46	.....	66	75	44	60	44	60	96	80
polling precinct No. 2	62	143	.....	96	170	60	160	60	160	140	197
Second police-jury ward .... polling precinct No. 3	218	227	.....	275	283	264	272	264	272	328	327
polling precinct No. 4	31	53	.....	29	72	22	67	23	66	49	77
Third police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 5	28	9	.....	26	68	38	31	38	31	72	42
polling precinct No. 6	50	10	.....	63	23	45	19	45	19	74	25
polling precinct No. 7	75	21	.....	98	39	93	29	93	28	114	30
Fourth police-jury ward .... polling precinct No. 8	70	.....	.....	99	9	94	3	95	2	120	12
polling precinct No. 9	52	1	.....	53	23	29	2	28	2	121	1
Fifth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 10	69	57	.....	118	142	102	109	99	109	172	124
polling precinct No. 11	42	154	.....	74	169	58	186	56	181	83	212
polling precinct No. 12	50	61	.....	82	131	63	122	63	122	110	144
Sixth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 13	30	31	.....	51	37	32	38	32	38	76	40
polling precinct No. 14	1	3	.....	20	21	4	23	4	24	64	15
polling precinct No. 15	28	.....	.....	19	23	26	8	27	7	54	2
Seventh police-jury ward.... polling precinct No. 16	41	47	.....	83	113	87	97	87	97	112	121
polling precinct No. 17	89	40	.....	88	63	74	64	74	65	100	72
polling precinct No. 18	55	156	.....	95	140	79	159	78	158	78	209
Eighth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 19	39	20	.....	52	57	57	65	62	65	69	74
Ninth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 20	57	17	.....	35	86	30	86	31	85	42	115
polling precinct No. 21	58	17	.....	71	34	48	29	48	29	79	35
Tenth police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 22	66	39	.....	93	59	63	50	61	51	160	39
polling precinct No. 23	24	13	.....	29	29	21	19	19	21	78	8
Total	1,283	1,165	.....	1,715	1,866	1,433	1,699	1,418	1,694	2,391	2,001

PARISH OF LA FAYETTE.

First police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 1	85	.....	10	90	17	37	.....	34	.....	96	29
polling precinct No. 2	123	.....	45	135	30	54	16	46	16	159	69
Second police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 3	101	.....	43	153	45	32	21	31	21	171	37
polling precinct No. 4	71	.....	40	110	47	48	49	45	49	81	74
Third police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 5	110	.....	89	137	115	73	5	54	4	148	142
polling precinct No. 6	165	.....	197	188	185	141	189	135	189	250	245
Fourth police-jury ward .... polling precinct No. 7	57	.....	53	63	52	32	35	28	35	74	75
polling precinct No. 8	127	.....	66	173	79	89	77	81	77	219	96
Fifth police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 9	153	.....	141	156	120	84	45	76	45	188	188
Total	992	.....	684	1,205	690	590	437	530	436	1,386	955

PARISH OF IBERVILLE.

First police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 1	17	517	.....	60	593	75	579	75	578	.....	.....
Second police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 2	31	318	.....	66	405	43	395	49	399	.....	.....
Third police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 3	90	121	1	168	180	149	145	150	194	.....	.....
Fourth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 4	233	11	.....	72	285	78	255	85	248	.....	.....
Fifth police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 5	2	122	.....	29	220	31	180	142	69	.....	.....
Sixth police-jury ward ..... polling precinct No. 6	8	7	184	37	205	37	270	37	278	.....	.....
Seventh police-jury ward.... polling precinct No. 7	21	30	.....	125	290	53	137	55	135	.....	.....
Eighth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 8	19	48	.....	69	67	33	82	33	82	.....	.....
Ninth police-jury ward..... polling precinct No. 9	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	25	120	25	120	.....	.....
Total	421	1,174	185	626	2,245	524	2,163	651	2,095	834	3,027

Third congressional district of Louisiana—vote by parishes, elections of 1878, 1879, and 1880—Continued.

PARISH OF SAINT MARTIN.

Wards and precincts.	Election of 1878.			Election of 1879.		Election of 1880.				Registered voters.
	Acklen.	Hebert.	Merchant.	Wiltz.	Beattie.	Hancock.	Garfield.	Billin.	Darrall.	White.	Colored.
First police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 1	185	459	4	166	456	108	423	108	423	.....	.....
Second police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 2	42	.....	.....	53	1	75	1	56	1	.....	.....
Third police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 3	125	176	.....	123	165	54	126	54	126	.....	.....
Fourth police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 4	287	204	.....	57	50	240	227	240	227	.....	.....
Fifth police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 5	284	198	1	225	195	156	172	156	172	.....	.....
Total	923	1,037	5	624	867	633	949	614	950	1,250	1,328

PARISH OF SAINT MARY'S.

First police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 1	47	40	24	118	31	46	61	46	61	88	122
polling precinct No. 2	71	49	132	82	172	63	171	59	170	104	257
Second police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 3	151	32	125	27	254	45	251	45	251	111	405
Third police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 4	10	40	70	12	117	15	112	15	72	26	141
polling precinct No. 5	144	186	336	253	414	157	418	156	416	314	686
Fourth police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 6	29	181	5	15	52	45	214	45	214	91	282
polling precinct No. 7	27	131	43	8	197	20	85	20	85	54	134
Fifth police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 8	13	12	44	.....	.....	68	352	68	352	135	470
Sixth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 9	40	8	213	.....	.....	93	458	80	449	292	725
polling precinct No. 10	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	19	59	19	59	23	66
Total	532	679	1,012	515	1,237	561	2,181	553	2,129	1,236	3,288

PARISH OF TERRE BONNE.

First police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 1	21	187	.....	40	219	37	228	37	227	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 2	3	124	.....	27	139	20	132	20	132	.....	.....
Second police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 3	45	184	.....	56	232	76	194	76	194	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 4	18	98	.....	17	112	13	131	13	131	.....	.....
Third police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 5	2	5	.....	20	.....	13	.....	13	.....	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 6	36	22	.....	41	22	38	21	38	21	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 7	107	86	.....	180	173	168	136	168	137	.....	.....
Fourth police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 8	32	267	.....	41	303	50	274	50	274	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 9	21	167	.....	19	220	22	164	24	162	.....	.....
Fifth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 10	67	27	.....	58	25	54	25	46	25	.....	.....
Sixth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 11	11	70	.....	35	75	13	79	75	17	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 12	56	2	.....	51	6	77	1	77	1	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 13	40	.....	.....	46	.....	50	.....	50	.....	.....	.....
Seventh police-jury ward ...polling precinct No. 14	65	43	.....	68	40	53	22	53	22	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 15	47	14	.....	36	11	22	3	22	3	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 16	38	6	.....	40	10	38	11	38	11	.....	.....
Eighth police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 17	38	18	.....	51	21	52	16	52	16	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 18	35	71	.....	30	72	40	62	40	62	.....	.....
Ninth police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 19	36	88	.....	33	127	27	97	27	97	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 20	74	23	.....	39	44	47	24	47	24	.....	.....
Tenth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 21	62	64	.....	44	78	50	75	49	75	.....	.....
polling precinct No. 22	48	7	.....	35	7	47	.....	47	.....	.....	.....
Total	903	1,573	.....	1,007	1,936	1,007	1,695	1,004	1,689	1,866	2,269

PARISH OF VERMILLION.

First police-jury ward.....polling precinct No. 1	79	.....	29	153	42	66	19	66	19	182	49
Second police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 2	116	.....	8	137	12	77	.....	77	.....	184	17
Third police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 3	147	.....	99	149	116	100	61	104	55	214	115
Fourth police-jury ward ....polling precinct No. 4	109	.....	32	121	54	24	13	24	13	159	49
Fifth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 5	76	.....	8	115	.....	32	.....	32	.....	143	.....
Sixth police-jury ward .....polling precinct No. 6	132	.....	21	134	28	45	5	45	5	179	14
polling precinct No. 7	35	.....	.....	47	6	6	.....	7	.....	62	8
Seventh police-jury ward ...polling precinct No. 8	96	.....	48	107	47	21	18	21	18	128	66
polling precinct No. 9	12	.....	.....	13	.....	3	.....	3	.....	27	1
Total	802	.....	245	976	305	474	116	379	110	1,278	319

Third congressional district, Louisiana—election November 2, 1880.

Parishes.	W. S. Hancock.	J. A. Garfield.	J. S. Billin.	C. B. Darrall.
Ascension	411	1,670	418	1,654
Assumption	798	1,457	796	1,458
Calcasieu	784	109	766	111
Cameron	166	57	138	62
Iberia	601	1,115	528	1,163
Iberville	524	2,163	651	2,095
La Fayette	590	437	530	436
La Fourche	1,433	1,699	1,418	1,694
Saint Martin	633	949	614	950
Saint Mary's	561	2,181	553	2,129
Terre Bonne	1,007	1,695	1,004	1,689
Vermillion	474	116	379	110
Total	7,982	13,648	7,795	13,551
Majority	.....	5,666	.....	5,756

Third congressional district, Louisiana—the vote by wards for General W. S. Hancock; election November 2, 1880.

Parishes.	Police-jury wards.											Total.
	First.	Second.	Third.	Fourth.	Fifth.	Sixth.	Seventh.	Eighth.	Ninth.	Tenth.	Eleventh.
Ascension	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	411
Assumption	73	98	48	100	132	24	92	91	2	68	70	798
Calcasieu	53	60	219	127	79	88	143	15	.....	.....	.....	784
Cameron	21	48	39	17	41	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	166
Iberia	127	15	34	76	55	243	51	.....	.....	.....	.....	601
Iberville	75	43	149	78	31	37	53	33	25	.....	.....	524
La Fayette	91	80	214	121	84	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	590
La Fourche	104	286	176	123	223	62	240	57	78	84	.....	1,433
Saint Martin	108	75	54	240	156	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	633
Saint Mary's	109	45	162	65	68	112	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	561
Terre Bonne	57	89	219	72	54	140	113	92	74	97	.....	1,007
Vermillion	66	77	100	24	32	51	24	.....	.....	.....	.....	474
Total	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	7,982

Official returns of elections, third congressional district, 1872 and 1874.

Parishes.	Vote for governor in 1872.						Vote for governor in 1874.			Census, 1870.
	Herron board, (rep.)			Foreman board, (dem.)			Rep.	Dem.	Total.	White.	Colored.
	Rep.	Dem.	Total.	Rep.	Dem.	Total.
Ascension	1,840	666	2,506	1,840	666	2,506	1,950	859	2,809	4,265	7,312
Assumption	1,912	1,276	3,188	1,403	1,730	3,133	1,530	1,498	3,037	6,247	6,987
Calcasieu	96	548	644	64	610	674	6	1,172	1,178	5,171	1,562
Cameron	40	176	216	40	176	216	47	203	250	1,249	342
Iberia	965	616	1,581	965	616	1,581	923	939	1,862	4,330	4,512
Iberville	2,239	691	2,930	2,239	722	2,961	2,167	770	2,937	3,671	8,676
La Fayette	482	884	1,366	482	892	1,374	530	976	1,506	5,629	4,759
La Fourche	1,792	1,697	3,489	1,096	1,773	2,869	1,846	1,905	3,751	8,059	6,660
Saint Martin	718	670	1,388	()	()	(*)	704	921	1,625	4,284	5,088
Saint Mary's	1,667	739	2,406	1,367	1,239	2,606	2,148	1,050	3,198	4,202	9,668
Terre Bonne	1,593	1,407	3,000	()	()	(*)	1,168	891	2,059	6,080	6,371
Vermillion	228	256	484	229	676	905	228	692	920	3,480	1,048
Total	13,572	9,626	23,198	9,725	9,100	18,825	13,256	11,876	25,132	56,667	62,985

* Did not count votes; fraud and violence claimed.

Statement of the registered voters of the parishes constituting the third congressional district of the State of Louisiana, taken by the assessors of the said parishes during the year 1880.

Parishes.	Total number of registered voters.	Number of native-born.	Number of foreign-born.	Number of white voters.	Number of colored voters.	Number of white voters who write their names.	Number of white voters who make their marks.	Number of colored voters who write their names.	Number of colored voters who make their marks.
Ascension	3,398	3,312	86	1,048	2,350	824	224	340	2,010
Assumption	4,410	4,301	109	2,078	2,323	1,042	1,036	273	2,050
Calcasieu	2,173	2,074	99	1,800	373	1,197	603	28	345
Cameron	906	376	30	345	61	215	130	9	52
Iberia	3,444	3,337	107	1,642	1,802	1,140	502	231	1,571
Iberville	3,860	3,788	72	833	3,027	757	76	202	2,825
La Fayette	2,347	2,271	76	1,407	940	774	733	51	889
La Fourche	4,473	4,343	130	2,423	2,050	1,386	1,037	229	1,821
Saint Martin	2,578	2,532	45	1,250	1,328	780	460	123	1,205
Saint Mary's	4,511	4,277	214	1,168	3,343	1,030	138	446	2,897
Terre Bonne	4,135	4,017	118	1,866	2,269	911	955	173	2,096
Vermillion	1,552	1,506	46	1,240	312	572	668	36	276
Total	37,787	36,134	1,132	17,100	20,178	10,628	6,562	2,141	18,087

I, the undersigned, secretary of State, do hereby certify that the above is an accurate report of the number of registered voters in the parishes of the third congressional district of the State of Louisiana.

Parish of Orleans, this 18th day of November, 1880.

OSCAR ARROYO, Assistant Secretary of State.

Abrogation of Clayton-Bulwer Treaty.

SPEECH OF HON. SAMUEL S. COX,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Lo! on a narrow neck of land
'Twixt two unbounded seas I stand,
Alone, insensible!

Mr. COX said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to present my views on the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, proposed in the joint resolution which I reported from the Foreign Affairs Committee. There will be no other germane proposition or opportunity for this purpose except on this bill.

That report made last session by that committee comprehends every reason pertinent to its adoption. It has been commended by patriotic men of all parties. It would open the way anew for our best aspirations as a people. It recognizes our continental relations, which include commercial relations. Whether we should vote money for coaling stations on the Isthmus, as a collateral proposition to this continental policy, I do not propose now to consider.

The House was confiding, beyond the ordinary trusts which committees receive from it, in referring resolutions to the Foreign Affairs Committee pertaining to this question, in view of the fact of the existence of a special committee on a kindred subject. The Committee on Foreign Affairs took no material or narrow view of the matter intrusted to their judgment. It did not consider appropriations for maritime stations. It dealt only with the higher questions of the lex gentium. These include not only the treaties, the best virtues and conscientious convictions of right and duty, but the natural justice recognized among nations. It regarded them as a bar to the general retrogression of our race by the abrogation of our duties upon this continent as the chief government and the best helper to its civilization and advancement.

This Congress, in its daily routine, and especially in this hurried short session, hardly has the leisure to mark time, much less to move forward to generous policies, which have their best champion in these federated States of North Amercia. Still we do sometimes pause, even on appropriations for coal, to lift above the dull and mercenary round of our legislation an ensign, whose sacred cross in the southern skies is brighter and loftier than that which Constantine saw in the heavens, and in whose sign he conquered?

The President of the United States recognized the sign, and his message of March 8, 1880, illustrates how the American idea rises above the ordinary schemes of men and parties. No microscopic horoscope of our relation to this hemisphere is now possible or honorable. The report recognizes the adhesion of the executive department to the doctrine of our supremacy as a leading power on this hemisphere. It recognizes our "rightful control" over isthmian enterprises, in which we have the paramount interest. It recognizes the necessity of clearing away the debris created by improvident diplomacy, such as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the end that we may securely found a policy indispensable to our safety, security, commerce, production, and advancement. The obstacles the Executive hints at, the report of our committee would remove by a bold and unmistakable revocation of the obnoxious treaty.

The report rehearses the story of the Isthmus and the wiles of diplomacy to counteract, impede, and destroy our "rightful control" in that remarkable neck of land. The alarm felt in 1849-'50, and which led to the "ill-omened treaty," as if it were portentous of a conflict with Great Britain, has been dissipated. Crops—surplus crops here and failure of crops abroad—commercial changes, and the advance of popular principles and liberal trade—these and other elements of our country, not excluding our material strength, developed against ourselves since 1849, make the fears of those early days as to war and its consequences as unsubstantial now as the mist that evaporates before the sun.

Nearly all that could be said as to the diplomatic blunders of Mr. Clayton, our former Secretary of State, has been well said by our leading statesmen, such as Cass and Douglas. But the inside history, the wiles and devices of the English diplomats who captured Mr. Clayton, and whose record has transpired lately, as well as the violations of the treaty by England, are stated in the report with sufficient fullness. They need no repetition from me here and now. It might be permitted me, not because of any vanity of consistency but out of the logic of events, to recur to some early discussions, so as to show what is of moment and pith in the present emergency.

We abandoned "through pusillanimity great and splendid advantages fairly secured to us by treaty." It is our duty, now that the apprehensions growing out of the balance of power between free and slave States is ended, to recognize ourselves as sole arbiters of our interests upon this continent.

On the 18th of January, 1859, I had the honor to address the House in words and with meaning very similar to the language and tenor of this report. At that time there was a disquieting aspect in our affairs growing out of English pretenses. It looked to changes in territory and power. The law governing such changes was expressed with more latitude than would now perhaps be compatible with my relation to foreign affairs; for I said, speaking almost abstractly, that nationalities of inferior grade must surrender to those of superior civilization and polity. The expression was this:

The largest expression of this law of annexation is that no nation has the right to hold soil, virgin and rich yet unproducing—no nation has a right to hold great isthmian highways or strong defenses on this continent without the desire, will, or power to use them. They ought and must inure to the advancement of our commerce. They must become confiscate to the decrees of Providence.

After showing our relations to Cuba and the hostility of Spain by tariff discriminations and otherwise, these remarks of mine appear in the Globe of that time:

As to Central America, we know well the impediment existing in the way of our acquisition there. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the diplomatic blunder of the century, stands as a huge gorgon in our path. The policy of its abrogation is conceded; but "how not to do it" seems to have been the practice. The present Executive, in his message of December 8, 1857, bewailed this condition of things. He inherited, as did President Pierce, this treaty of peace, which has proved a treaty of offense. England and the United States have been quarreling over its construction when its destruction was the most pacific course that could have been adopted. Collateral treaties may be made which will prevent the consequence of an abrupt abrogation of this treaty. Diplomacy is now, we are told, working to this end.

But as we now know all such collateral endeavors utterly failed. The civil war came; and the utter oblivion of isthmus routes followed under the pressure of our great necessities. In pursuing this theme at that day, I said further:

But there is in the American mind a chronic distrust of England. It is well grounded in her laxity of faith. When her interests can be subserved, she breaks any compact; and only adheres to it when demanded by her interests. Whether the treaties to be made with Honduras, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua throttle this bantling of Bulwer, whether we are to lose still more by British dilatory diplomacy, remains to be seen. One thing is remarkable, that we have not advanced since 1849, when Nicaragua, in the Hiess-Selva treaty, proposed to "confer on us the exclusive right" of an interoceanic canal or highway. Had that treaty been confirmed, we might have had to-day forts and free cities along its route and at its termini, with full right to protect Nicaragua by all the strength of our Navy and Army. A year later, and that wily diplomatist, Bulwer—who, for his tact, is sent to the Bosphorus to teach Russia her rôle in the East—comes forward with his projêt. Our Government nibbles coyly at his bait; but, like a foolish fish, at last leaps for the fly, is barbed, and hauled in to flounder for the amusement of the world. Would that Mr. Clayton had weighed the meaning of Smelfungus's philosophy: "It is always time to cut your throat; but if your throat is once cut, there are certain difficulties in the way of reconsidering your determination."

Crampton and Webster tried in 1852 to unravel the web. Then Webster and Molina tried it with the aid of Costa Rica. Then Wheeler and Escobar, acting for Nicaragua, made an effort, which our Government failed to accept. Then Clarendon and Herran, for Honduras, sought to untie the knot, and this led the way to the Cass-Yrissari treaty in the fall of 1857, which began de novo. Then a fair treaty was made, allowing us the protectorate of the transit, but through foreign influence, it was so modified by Nicaragua as to be unacceptable to our Government. Now, Sir Gore Ouseley, having ceased to be a diplomatic myth here, has gone to the South where, we trust, something may be done to cancel that part of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by which we agreed with England to cut our throats by never "occupying, fortifying, or colonizing, or assuming or exercising any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America." We trust that such an agreement may be made to this end; but my reading of history is vain if we do not find thrown about this abrogation some clog which the American people will not bear.

Then, as a public man, jealous of foreign domination over the interests of our continent, I foresaw the relations and designs of France and England. They had designs upon our continent which appeared afterward, but did not appear so clearly when I remarked:

Their entente cordiale, as Clarendon said it would be, is extended to this hemisphere; and here we have them! They are, by their presence, if not by their diplomacy, ignoring the far-famed doctrine of Mr. Monroe, which had, when first given, as general a meaning and as practical a use as it ought now to have a specific application. His doctrine was that the countries of the American continent, by the free and independent condition which they assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization or influence by any European power.

Let controversy contend as to the meaning of this doctrine. I know that when Yucatan was about to be taken by England, and when English arms were furnished her for an independency of Mexico, which would have been a dependency of England, Mr. Calhoun then tried, in an able speech, to limit the application of that doctrine to the surroundings out of which it grew, namely, to the intervention of the Holy Alliance to recover the revolted American States for Spain, and the Russian occupation on our northwest. But the declaration has a larger meaning; it has become settled policy. In 1823 Mr. Jefferson laid it down thus:

"Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe; our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cisatlantic affairs."

Yet this doctrine is sneered at, as if Monroe's ghost were invoked to do a kind of constable's duty, to warn all foreign intruders from this continent. So far as emigration is concerned, this continent is open as day; but no flag, no policy, no institution, no colonies, no protectorates of Europe, can exist here without endangering the peace, infringing the rights, or disturbing the order and prospective interests of this continent.

Whatever may have been the occasion of the Monroe declaration, which has been so truthfully and cogently set forth in the admirable report of my colleague on the Foreign Affairs Committee, [Mr. HILL, of Ohio,] its cause is as eternal as liberty and its consequences will be as progressive as our nation. I care not for its traditionary emphasis. Democrats, at least, can afford to let that go. Is it sound doctrine for the present? If so, it ought to be the enthusiastic sentiment and genius of this Government. If so, let it be no more the jeer of Europe, the swagger of America, but a fact as much a part of our historic life as the Declaration of Independence, which was its procreant source. It is the law of self-preservation. General Cass gave it proper direction. It was intended to guard this continent against the incursion of any alliances, "holy" or unholy. It looked to that law which I have laid down, by which the interests and honor of this hemisphere were to be guarded by none but ourselves. We do not want to be foreclosed against its occupation, fortification, and annexation. In the present feeling of this country, no treaty can be made, and made to stand, if it does not break down all protectorates of England and all interference of Europe.

England pretended to settle all in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; yet that treaty was a delusion and a snare. While that treaty was yet warm, England drove the Nicaraguan forces out of San Juan del Norte; then she pirates that entrepôt from an independent State; anoints a hybrid savage as a king; gives to a few Jamaica negroes, dressed like the Georgia major without his spurs, the constabulary baton; and builds a congeries of negro huts, which she nicknames after the Earl Grey. She performs the same office for Honduras by what Clarendon called the "spontaneous settlement" of the Bay Islands, and then claims from us good faith in keeping the compact which she breaks. Then comes Sir Gore Ouseley to maintain the delusion, in spite of Lord Napier, who goes home. What more? She approves of the Cass-Yrissari treaty by fomenting difficulties in the way of its ratification. She pretends to Mr. Dallas, through Malmesbury, that Belly is a French adventurer for whom she has no sympathy, yet in acts gives to him French and English protection through the alliance.

These facts now almost forgotten show that it is not safe to trust her. Her treaties are ropes of sand. Her international law is too elastic for use by any but herself. All complications with her are dangerous and entangling. Thank God, we have had a Secretary of State like General Cass, whose life was marked with signal ability in anticipating, demonstrating, and frustrating her designs. This nation will sustain him in his declaration that—

The establishment of a political protectorate by any one of the powers of Europe over any of the independent States of this continent, or, in any other words, the introduction of a scheme of policy which would carry with it a right to interfere in their concerns, is a measure to which the United States have long since avowed their opposition, and which, should the attempt be made, they will resist by all the means in their power.

It will do more. Irrespective of party, it will sustain the present Administration on the principles of the recent message, in which the doctrine of our democratic statesmen like General Cass is reiterated.

I am ready either to give the moral force of a resolution such as that now referred to the Committee of the Whole, to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, or I am ready to go further and to clothe the President with extraordinary powers, and to give him means, or the authority to procure means, by which his recommendations may be acted on.

But it may be said, why so much risk of war with the combined powers of Europe? Why so much anxiety for the Isthmus or Central American route? Not because we are in danger of being cut off from its dominion. That will come if these Central American States remain independent of European constraint. Not because it is the only feasible mode of transit for the great oriental trade between the oceans, for in time there will be rapid and safe transits on our own soil; not so much because we ought to have and hold the hundred and fifty millions of trade with these Spanish American tropical lands, instead of but ten millions which we now have; but nature never made so narrow an obstacle, one so easily severed, and on which such great commercial and economical results depended, as that at Darien or Nicaragua. She buried mountains and valleys beneath the wave to narrow that neck and thus expand the bounds of interchange and encircle the earth with a white zone of argosies.

If this Congress has optic nerve enough to look a few years ahead, it will at least start a policy that will secure all the Isthmus highways, which are so indispensable to our development and power. Its first duty is to repel every attempt of the remotest influence, come from what quarter it may, which may impede this procession of events or arrest our inevitable and legitimate aggrandizement. No nation with one harbor, much less a nation with a coast bestrewn with harbors like ours, can be long prosperous within that does not prosper and grow without. When a State which is commercial by situation forgets the work of outbuilding its empire it loses its inner vitality. The day that marks its failure to meet every rising opportunity of advancement abroad, marks its sure decline at home. As with the individual, so with the State; if its ambition be dead and its hopes of expansion smoulder, its dissolution is speedy and sure. While its intellectual and physical energies are tense and grasp a large range, its internal and foreign empire will become consummate, because it has the everlasting law of growth.

Believing that the baleful shadow over the Isthmus, which came through bad diplomacy, against the general sentiment of our country, should be removed, and that the way should be cleared for our proper relation to the interoceanic transit and "its rightful control," I hope that the resolution from the Foreign Affairs Committee may be adopted as a part of the advanced policies looking to our supremacy on this hemisphere.

A Plea for the Education of the Poor.

SPEECH OF HON. J. S. RICHARDSON,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 22, 1881,

On the bill (S. No. 133) to apply the proceeds of sales of public lands to the education of the people.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill is very similar to one I had the honor to introduce during the extra session. It meets my most hearty approval. The importance, yea, the necessity of educating all classes of our people will not be questioned, and cannot be overestimated. It is true that in the earlier days of the Republic our legislators placed great importance upon the education of the people, and gave much care and considerable grants of land to that purpose. But of late years the American statesmen, judged by what they have attempted as well as by what they have accomplished, seem in a great measure to have lost sight of this most important of all the means for promoting the welfare and preserving the liberties of a people.

It was not so with the fathers of our country. It may be well said, there was no subject on which they laid greater stress or more importance. Washington, in his first annual message, endeavored to impress upon the country the importance of educating the people. Said he:

> Knowledge is in every country the surest basis of public happiness.

And in his farewell address he was careful to leave this injunction upon his fellow-countrymen:

> Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

John Adams, Jefferson, and Madison, each and all, endeavored to impress upon their countrymen the education of the people "as the means of a better administration of our Government and the eternal preservation of its republican principles."

And Monroe in his inaugural address said, "it is only when the people become ignorant and corrupt, when they degenerate into a populace, that they become incapable of exercising the sovereignty." And he added:

> Let us by all wise and constitutional measures promote intelligence among the people as the best means of preserving our liberties.

These views, after the lapse of nearly three-quarters of a century, have lost none of their force and none of their truth. It is beyond questioning that if we are to have good citizens we must have an intelligent people, and if we are to have independent voters we must not have an ignorant people. And yet what has the Government, with its vast and ever-increasing resources, done to insure that every citizen shall be an intelligent voter? What has it done in the last quarter of a century for the cause of general education? While it has given its millions upon millions for local, State, and private purposes, for the construction of railroads and canals, for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and for the erection of costly edifices, the education of the people has been left, in great measure, to take care of itself. Whatever has been accomplished has been effected by individual or State effort. The General Government has, within that time, done little or nothing. The beneficent and wise requirement that each new State shall set apart so much of the land, within its own borders, for educational purposes can hardly be called a gift or donation by the Government to the cause of general education.

Much might be said upon this branch of the subject, but the limited time at my disposal will not permit of my pursuing further this review of the failure of our Government to foster, encourage, and provide for the educational wants of her people. But I must not fail, in this connection, to call attention to a comparison between what we, in like circumstances, have failed to accomplish, and what France, with her immense war debt pressing upon her people, has done within the last few years. Notwithstanding the devastation of war which so recently swept over her sunny hills and fair valleys, and her immense debt, France gave, in 1877, $23,160,000 in order that a school-house should be erected in every hamlet, and by statute provided for the education of the youth throughout her entire borders. Shall it be said that France, but yesterday born into the family of free nations, fosters with greater care and more wisdom than free America this true germ and best safeguard of liberty?

But leaving to others the discussion of the general subject of education, its importance and necessity in a Government constituted as ours is, and the propriety and wisdom of devoting the proceeds of sales of the public lands to the cause of general education, I ask the attention of the House for the few remaining moments of my time to the claims of the Southern States, and especially of the lately enfranchised freedmen, to the assistance of the General Government in the education of her people.

The Southern States were once rich and prosperous. They are not so now. On the contrary, they are poor and unable to educate their people. In 1860 the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, according to the United States census, possessed an aggregated wealth of $5,192,166,107; and in 1870, their aggregated wealth was only $2,739,290,037. Even this enormous falling off does not show the true condition of the people of that unfortunate region of our country. It should be remembered that, without exception, they were weighed down with very large State, county, municipal, and, in many instances, individual indebtedness, which the casualties of war had left them poorly able to meet. And I venture nothing in saying that while the taxable property of these States was but little more than one-half of what it had been in 1860, the non-tax-payers were fully two-thirds of the entire population. The people of these States on the cessation of hostilities found themselves face to face with a population, according to the United States census of 1870, of 5,544,388 whites, and 3,938,993 colored—the colored population being over two-thirds of the white; and the children of both races, in whole or in part, uneducated. The war and poverty after its ravages, in many cases, prevented the white children from securing an education, while the colored youths were entirely ignorant.

In solving the problem whether the General Government should do anything toward educating these people three questions present themselves as preliminary and necessary to be first answered:

First. Have these States done their duty, and all within their reasonable power, toward providing education for their people?

Second. Have they given assurance that funds provided for educational purposes will be fairly, equally, and economically expended?

Third. Is there any special reason why the General Government should assist in the education of the colored people?

My time will not permit me to tell in detail what each of these States has done, since the war, for the education of their people; nor how great with each is the necessity for help from the General Government.

An examination of the reports on education exhibits the fact, however, that they have all established free schools for colored and white children alike, which are superintended by State officers and supported by taxation; that in each of these States the school funds are divided in proportion to the school population without regard to race, and that all children between the school ages have the right to attend the schools; that the schools are being more and more generally patronized, and year by year becoming more and more popular.

But here the bright side of this picture ends. The reverse side exhibits the fact that the funds collected for school purposes in all of these States are utterly inadequate to the wants of the people and the demands for education, that in that want the children of the white citizen fares equally with the children of the colored, and that as a general rule the schools have not been able to be kept open longer than from three to five months in any one year; in most cases not over four months. The great need felt and lamented by all, but overpowering and insurmountable, is the want of means. The great obstacle is our poverty and the vast numbers of the helpless thrown upon our hands.

It is the simple truth to say, "the people of these States have imposed upon themselves as great an educational tax as they are able, in their poverty, to bear; and help must come from the General Government, or from others, if the ignorant in our midst are to be educated and thus made useful citizens and intelligent and independent voters.

In order that those unacquainted with the history of education in the South since the war may have a better idea of this whole subject, I ask the attention of the House for a few moments to education as presented in my own State, (South Carolina,) with which I am more familiar, and which I am satisfied is but a counterpart of what exists in each of the other Southern States.

The constitution of South Carolina makes it the duty of the General Assembly to "provide for a liberal and uniform system of free public schools throughout the State." This has been done, and these schools have been in operation for years; but until 1878 they were supported chiefly by a voluntary tax imposed by the citizens of each township, and was, of course, variable and uncertain. In that year (1878) an amendment to our State constitution was ratified which provides that for the support of public schools "the boards of county commissioners shall levy an annual tax of not less than two mills on the dollar of all the taxable property in their respective counties."

The amount thus raised, together with the poll-tax, which is also set apart for school purposes, constitutes the school-fund. The schools and school-houses in the State have been equally divided between the white and colored children, and by amendment to our constitution recently adopted it is further provided that "the school-tax shall be distributed among the several school districts in proportion to the respective number of pupils attending the public schools." This provision is faithfully and fairly carried out.

Now, under these provisions of our constitution and laws, what has been actually done?

The entire taxes collected in any one year since 1877 for all State purposes, not including the interest on our State debt, does not exceed $300,000; while the school tax amounts to something over three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Now, when it is remembered that the entire taxable property of the State is only $115,007,862, it will be admitted by all candid people that that is all the school tax the State can bear. Thus, too, it will be seen that South Carolina devotes to the education of her people, white and colored, a sum greater than the entire amount collected for her State government. And yet, as has been said, the amount falls far short of what is needed to afford even a moderate education to her 134,072 school children or to run her 2,973 schools for more than from three to four months in the year.

The superintendent of education in South Carolina is an educated and cultivated gentleman, faithful and conscientious in the discharge of all the duties of his office, and deeply interested in his work. In his report for 1879 he says:

It is true that the negroes continue to show a praiseworthy desire to avail themselves of the benefits of education; but it is equally true that they are receiving encouragement from the whites, and their full share of the school fund from the officers intrusted with its disbursement. Not only are school officials discharging their duties impartially, but, from personal observation, I assert that in every part of the State men of character and of influence are cheerfully giving to the negroes aid and counsel in the management of their schools and in all matters tending to the general improvement of their race.

The reports of my predecessor, which cover the period of time from 1869 to 1876, show that the average attendance of colored pupils was 41,691, while my reports, which include the returns from 1876 to the present time, show the average attendance of colored pupils to be 60,723, an increase of a little more than 45 per cent.

The increased attendance is proof that the colored schools receive their share of the school fund, and is the best answer to the charge that the negroes are denied the opportunities of education. While it is true that in the country districts there is much need for improvement, both in white and in colored schools, it is not true that discriminations have been made in favor of one or against either race. The public schools for the colored in Charleston deserve especial notice. The first school established in Charleston for the colored was the Morris street school, which was opened in September, 1867. The school board at that time was composed of leading citizens of Charleston. Under the administration of Governor Scott the members of the school board were selected from men in sympathy with what was then the dominant political party in this State. At no time while the schools were under this management did the number in attendance at the Morris street school exceed nine hundred. In June, 1871, the public schools of Charleston were closed, the salaries of teachers and employés for the preceding six months being unpaid. The democratic board, elected in the latter part of 1871, found empty buildings and an empty treasury, but the public schools, including the Morris street school, were reopened with a full corps of teachers. Since 1872 the Morris street school has steadily increased in numbers, the greatest increase being since 1876–'77. The report for October, 1879, shows the following figures:

Number of departments—grammar, intermediate and primary	3
Number of pupils enrolled	1,404
Average daily attendance, (per cent.)	93
Number of teachers	26

The principal of this school is a distinguished graduate of the South Carolina military academy. The other teachers are all native whites, the majority being graduates of the Charleston normal school. These teachers receive the same salaries as are paid in the white schools and are subject to the same rules. The school building is the best in the city, and cost when completed and furnished about thirty thousand dollars. It possesses all necessary facilities for teaching, being well supplied with maps, globes, and the other appliances of a well-equipped school. This school will bear comparison not only with the schools for the whites in Charleston, but with any public schools in this country.

The Mary street school, which is also for the colored, has a corps of thirteen teachers, with an enrollment of over six hundred pupils.

It will be seen from this statement that in the public schools for the colored in Charleston there are at this time over two thousand pupils and thirty-nine teachers. The whole number of colored pupils attending the public schools in Charleston for the last school year was 3,568. It is probable that the number for this year will be larger.

There is one more statement in this connection which should be made. It is this: The only institution in South Carolina for higher education which now receives State aid is the Claflin University and College of Agriculture, which is devoted solely to the education of the colored race. This institution receives annually from the State $7,500. It is in successful operation, with a large number of students. The president, Rev. Edward Cooke, D. D., is a northern man, eminent as a minister of the gospel and as a successful teacher of large experience. He is ably supported by a carefully selected faculty, two of whom are natives of this State. Before the civil war South Carolina boasted with pride of her State college and her State military schools. In these institutions many of her most useful and some of her most distinguished sons were educated. Now, although unable to support either of these seats of learning, she is nevertheless contributing liberally to maintain an institution for the higher education of the colored race.

This, then, is what South Carolina in her poverty has done and is doing toward educating her white and colored children. She is not able to increase her educational facilities, and the wants of her people in the matter of education are not more than half met. Her children are asking and hungering for education.

Dr. Sears, speaking of education in the Southern States, in his report for 1879 to the trustees of the Peabody fund, says:

I have alluded to the debts which, with almost crushing weight, hang over most of the Southern States. Among other questions of fearful import which are engaging the attention of public men in these States, that of supporting or not supporting the schools in their existing financial condition is not the least perplexing.

It is not for me to express an opinion how far it would be expedient or possible for Congress to come to the aid of these impoverished States by making temporary or permanent provision for national education. The subject is not a new one to Congress. But if ever there was a moment when its consideration seemed called for by the exigencies of the cause of education in the Southern States it is this moment. Nor can it be regarded as a mere local or sectional question. No part of the country can be uninterested in its decision. The want of good schools in any quarter of the Union is an injury to the whole Union, as the success of republican institutions rests upon the intelligence and capacity for self-government of the whole people and of all the States. The inability of some of the States to maintain their schools for more than four months in the year may have influences far beyond the region in which the inability exists.

Every member in this House from the South can bear testimony to the truth of what Dr. Sears says as to the poverty of the southern people and the present pressing necessity there exists for help, and for immediate help. A generation is growing up in comparative ignorance. The facts which I have stated in reference to the conduct and management of the educational facilities afforded by South Carolina to her people I have no doubt can with equal truth be said of all the Southern States. They furnish conclusive evidence that these States have done their duty and all within their power toward providing education for their people, and that any assistance rendered by the General Government will be fairly and equally expended upon the education of all classes of our population. It remains but to consider the claims of the colored people to the assistance of the General Government in providing education for their children.

The colored people were not responsible for being slaves, nor were the southern people alone responsible for it. If sin or wrong it was, that sin or wrong was equally the sin or wrong of the American people. It was an institution originated as much at least by the North as by the South. The North sold their slaves to the South, and the South thus became in the end the only pecuniary losers from the emancipation of the slaves. The true history of slavery in the United States cannot be said with fairness or candor to fix the responsibility of the institution on one section more than on the other. But let the responsibility rest where it may, the result to the colored people was the same. In consequence of being slaves the colored people were not educated. It was no fault of theirs. They had no opportunity or means of obtaining education.

The United States Government has made them free. In doing this it has taken them from under the care and guardianship of their late owners, and as the result of their freedom they have been invested with the right of suffrage. What was their condition when set free by the United States Government? To say that they were in utter poverty hardly expresses their true condition. They had neither land to live on nor food to satisfy their hunger, without property and utterly without education, and yet the Government called upon them and still calls on them to vote. It certainly was not liberal to them if it was fair to give them freedom and the ballot and yet give them no means of a support and no education to guard and direct the right of suffrage. All will admit that in order to be intelligent voters it is necessary that they be educated; and few will deny that in order to be safe and trustworthy voters they must not be ignorant voters.

View it from any stand-point you please, all will admit they should and must be educated. The southern problem will be solved when and, in my judgment, only when education is given to the illiterate masses within her borders. Now, who is to educate them? Who ought to do it? Who can do it? Is it right to say the southern white people should educate them because freedom happened to find them upon southern soil and at our doors? Who put them there as freedmen and in their helpless condition?

Ah, who educate them as they need and ought to be educated? Not the southern people, stripped as they were by the results of the war of three-fifths of their entire property and with little else left them but the land on which they lived. Without the means of educating their own children, and scarcely able to feed and clothe them, it is amazing what they have done toward educating the children of their former slaves. But with all their willingness they have been unable to educate the colored people as they should be educated. I ask, then, again, who educate them?

The United States Government can, and in my judgment ought to, provide the means of educating them. Whatever may be said to justify the failure heretofore of the United States Government to provide the means of education to the five millions of poor, starving, almost naked, ignorant, and helpless colored men, women, and children, who it set loose without a foot of land they could call their own, and without the means of utilizing their freedom or making of themselves intelligent and useful citizens, has not the time now come when it can and ought to make provision for their education? After the war the Government felt itself crippled and burdened with an enormous debt, but now it is prosperous and wealthy, our resources year by year increasing, and there seems to be no bounds to our future growth and prosperity. And here by the provisions of this bill is the way pointed out whereby without the expenditure of a single dollar or the addition of a single cent to our indebtedness the education of these people can be secured.

The simple question is, Will the Government donate the proceeds of sales of public land to this great object, or will it keep it for other railroad subsidies and grants?

The leading nations of Europe are providing educational facilities for all classes of their people. Germany is constantly improving her system of education. Austria, France, and Russia are making the most liberal provision for the education of the masses. When the English Government liberated the slaves of the West Indies it made provision for their education. Can free America, where every citizen by his vote helps decide the destinies of the Republic, afford to do less?

Railroad Wrongs in Nevada.

SPEECH OF HON. R. M. DAGGETT,

OF NEVADA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 25, 1881.

The following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada being presented for reference—

Joint resolution to the Congress of the United States in relation to discrimination in fares and freights by interstate railroad companies.

Whereas the people of the State of Nevada have long suffered and do now suffer under the impositions and exactions of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, which, besides retarding enterprise, injures the business and prosperity of the people of this State, and amounts to the most enormous, unjust, and oppressive tax ever laid upon the industry of a people. The said railroad company exercises over the persons and property of others an almost absolute power, vicious and tyrannical, destructive of the rights of persons and of property, and opposed to common justice, as well as to every principle of civil and constitutional liberty known since the days of Magna Charta; and

Whereas it is proper that the truth should be known concerning this corporation and its transactions, the following facts are herein stated: The people of Palisade, distant four hundred and thirty-five miles east from Sacramento, have to pay for freight on flour (fourth-class freight, per published special-rate tariff of Central Pacific Railroad) per car-load the sum of $282 from Sacramento, while the people of Toano, one hundred and twenty-nine miles further east, pay freight on flour per car-load, according to the printed special rate, the sum of $275 per car-load, while the merchant having a contract for some so-called competitive point with this railroad company pays freight on the same article, to wit, flour, per car-load, only $200. The merchant at Toano, having a special contract pays $82 per car-load less freight than the merchant at Palisade, although, as before mentioned, the carriage is one hundred and twenty-nine miles more. The goods delivered at Palisade or Battle Mountain, distant respectively four hundred and thirty-five and three hundred and eighty-three miles from Sacramento, have a freight charge of $480 per car-load, while at Toano the freight amounts to $275 per car-load to persons having special contract rates for so-called competitive points, the greater service being performed for the less amount. Persons shipping wool or other products from Palisade, Battle Mountain, Elko, or other points in this State to the Eastern States, have to pay local rates to Sacramento, thence freight at through rates back over the same road to the point of destination, the shipper being often compelled to pay freight at local rates for a distance of over five hundred miles, a service useless and unnecesary even if rendered. The same unjust discrimination is practiced by this railroad company against the people of this State in the rates of freight upon goods shipped from points east of this State. The freight on a box of eggs from Ogden to Toano costs one man $3.35 per box, and the same number of eggs, in the same sized box, and of the same weight, costs another man sixty-five cents. A hundred pounds of squashes costs one man in freight $1.36, while it costs another fifty-five cents. Hams and case goods costs one man $2.04, while it costs another but fifty-five cents. The distance from Ogden to Toano is one hundred and eighty-three miles. The same unjust discrimination is also practiced by this railroad company in passenger fares. A ticket from Omaha to San Francisco costs $100, while a ticket from Omaha to Palisade, being six hundred miles nearer, costs $95. A person desiring to go East is charged within a fraction of the full fare, through and from San Francisco to the point he desires to reach, although he may ride over one-third or less of the line of the Central Pacific Railroad. More appalling examples of injustice than are shown by the above instances, selected from among a myriad of kindred transgressions, are hard to conceive; and

Whereas such pernicious practices should be no longer tolerated: Therefore,

Be it by the senate and assembly conjointly resolved, That the passage of the bill now before Congress, known as the Reagan bill, prohibiting discrimination in fares and freights on interstate railroads, will be hailed with joy by the people of this State as a measure of justice and relief.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to vote for and use all honorable means in their power to secure the earliest passage of said Reagan bill.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor is hereby requested to transmit an engrossed copy of these resolutions, under the great seal of the State, at the earliest moment, to each of our Representatives in Congress.

STATE OF NEVADA,
Secretary's Office, ss:

I, Jasper Babcock, secretary of state of the State of Nevada, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true, full, and correct copy of the original joint resolution which passed the Nevada Legislature February 10, 1881, on file in my office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of State. Done at office in Carson City, Nevada, this 12th day of February, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.]

JASPER BABCOCK,
Secretary of State,
By J. J. CHESLEY, Deputy.

Mr. DAGGETT said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In presenting this joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, I ask permission, since the story is but partially told, to supplement its declarations with certain other facts and figures pertinent to its prayer.

RAILROAD METHODS AND PRACTICES.

Some one has said, or should have said, that excessive discretion is the twin-sister of cowardice, and he who recognizes and fails to rebuke a wrong is scarcely less guilty than the one who commits it. Whatever may be the prevailing judgment here, to my humble thinking the time has at length been reached in the history of national railroad legislation when it behooves every Representative upon this floor whose action has not been circumscribed by unwholesome influences, or whose lips have not been sealed with doubt, to speak plainly.

It is impossible for any member to shut his eyes to the character of the struggle which, since the convening of the present Congress, has marked the action of this House concerning the legislation referred to in this joint resolution. In every feature have been made manifest the resources, the craft, the audacity which the railroad rulers of the land are prepared in extremity to summon to their assistance.

With their millions wrung from the many they have purchased and enslaved abilities ennobled in better fields of effort. They have subsidized the public press. They have fouled the fountains of justice. They have stifled the expression of public sentiment. They have corrupted the ballot, and sought to undermine the morality of every department of State and National Government; and their accredited agents have abused the privileges of this floor by obtruding their presence among the members during legislative hours.

Nor this alone. Many-tongued rumor, the unblest evangel of calumny, has more than hinted that to the glitter of gold have been added the enchantments of beauty to warp the judgments of men, and that the corporate Aladdins of the land, whose influence it is impossible not to feel, even in the inner chambers of this temple, have called to their councils both the sightless son of Ceres and the star-eyed cyprian whose home is on the heights.

I must not, dare not, will not give credence to reports so humiliating to the membership of this House; and, to borrow a figure for the occasion, even were it possible for me to believe them, over my shoulders I would hang the mantle of doubt, and, like the blessed of Noah's sons, walk backward with it to cover the infamy before the world beheld it or our own eyes were blasted by the unwelcome vision.

RAILROAD BILLS BEFORE THE HOUSE.

But let us glance for a moment at the situation, without further reference to the circumstances which may have conspired to create it. During the last Congress what is known as the Reagan bill passed this House by a large majority. Its provisions were everywhere discussed, and almost everywhere approved. It was plain, straightforward legislation, and the people could understand it. If it did not completely correct railroad discriminations, it fixed a limit, at least, beyond which they could not be exacted, and embodied a principle in interstate railway transportation so just, so reasonable, so necessary, that it received the prompt indorsement, I am warranted in believing, of a majority of the constituents of four-fifths of the members upon this floor. If they doubt it, let them call the roll on the question at the next election, and they will return to their seats instructed.

After passing the House this bill died with the Forty-fifth Congress in the Senate. The manner of its death was never reported by the committee having it in charge. One Washington correspondent said it died of neglect, another that it was disemboweled and then strangled, and a third that the chairman sat down upon it, I presume by mistake. But, whatever may have been the cause of its death, let him be punished according to his deserving who harbors a suspicion that the funeral expenses were paid by the railroad companies. I am not permitted to believe it.

The same bill was reintroduced in the House during the extra session of the present Congress. After due consideration the Commerce Committee authorized their chairman to report it back to the House. Such action thus early in the session did not accord with the plans of the railroad managers. Should it go to the Senate within two or three months of the opening of the session, it would be difficult to hold it in committee there until the close. Hence, they asked that the report might be withheld long enough for them to be heard before the committee. They intimated that they had some new and overwhelming testimony against the bill, and their request was granted.

Their ablest attorneys were hastily summoned to the capital; their lobby force was increased and redrilled in desperate and shameless tactics; they interrupted communication between the committee and the House; their subsidized journals threw open their throttle-valves, and the assault began. We know the result, if we do not the details, of the struggle. The committee yielded to new convictions, and in the end agreed to a new bill instead of the one which they had a few weeks before authorized their chairman to report.

THE COMMISSIONER BILL.

When the committee finally reported, in graceless compliance with a popular demand which could not be well disregarded, it was to hand in silence to this House three distinct railroad bills. The first was the commissioner bill, agreed to by a majority of the committee after the rehearing, and which, it seems to me, should be satisfactory to the railroad companies. The second was the Reagan bill, modestly appearing as an amendment—a bill which has already received the indorsement of the people. The third was the substitute bill of Mr.

McLANE, which says nothing, means nothing, and provides for nothing. It is a ghastly mockery of railroad legislation—something which resembles an uncharged shell from a railroad battery, spluttering, fizzing, but harmless, and therefore entitled to no further attention.

Now, let us glance for a moment at the two bills remaining for consideration. The commissioner bill, or the bill of the majority, is a dangerous measure, for it wears upon its face the smile of honesty. It is adroitly and carefully drawn; so carefully that its enforcement as a law would not seriously interfere with existing discriminating railroad practices. Its aim seems to be to supply the people with litigation rather than legislation, and perpetuate evils which it is the duty of Congress to correct.

In a speech before the committee one of the attorneys of the railroads remarked that there was a knife in the fourth section of the Reagan bill, and the trouble seemed to be that his clients could not get hold of the handle. The hallucination was not new with the gentleman, and in recalling similar examples of mental distemper the air-drawn dagger of Macbeth presents itself as a kindred case. But if there is a knife in the fourth section of the Reagan bill, there is a whole cuttlery establishment in this commissioner bill, with every edge turned toward the people. Read thoughtlessly it sounds well. It abounds in sections of tender solicitude for the people and clauses of stern restraint of railroad rapacity. Both are mere mouthings. Accommodating public journals have been prompted to say that there are sections in the bill highly unsatisfactory to interstate railroad managers. This may be so. It may be more difficult to please these gentlemen than we imagine. But the sections are coupled together like a train of cars, and in reading them we can catch the echo of the sound of wheels.

Now, permit me to make a very brief synopsis of the vital provisions of this commissioner bill in plain English, and I will then dismiss it. It provides for the appointment of a board of three railroad commissioners, who shall have supervision over the interstate business only of interstate railroads. This supervision is limited—now mark this provision—to questions of commerce between the States, and does not extend to any other portion of the business of the roads. That is, the commissioners are not permitted to inquire either into the cost of construction and maintenance or the earnings or expenses of the roads gravely mentioned as being under their supervision. They can take cognizance alone of the methods of operating railroads by railroad corporations, as affecting interstate commerce. This, and nothing more.

Having no supervision, then, of practical value over interstate roads, what are the commissioners authorized to do in the way of equalizing or reducing the rates of carriage for freights passing from one State or Territory into another? Why, they are to see that the railroads charge no more than "a fair and reasonable rate" for full carloads of freights—for full car-loads, let it be observed, and nothing less—conveyed by rail from one State or Territory to another; and it is left with them to determine what rates are "fair and reasonable" for such service.

Now, I ask, what facilities have the commissioners for determining what are "fair and reasonable" rates, since they are expressly prohibited from inquiring into the costs of construction and operation of the roads under their exceedingly limited supervision? None, whatever. They must accept the figures of the railroad companies as they are given to them, and base their schedules of "fair and reasonable" rates upon a return to the corporations yearly of a "fair and reasonable" rate of interest on from three to five times the amounts actually expended in construction, together with a deduction from the gross earning of exaggerated expenses of operation. In this I am referring more especially to the overland roads.

Then, since the commissioners in their "supervision," as it is called, are permitted to do little more than watch the cars as they pass from State to State, and since the information is withheld upon which "fair and reasonable" rates alone can possibly be fixed, of what value can their services be to the public? Certainly of little or none in the investigation of complaints against railroad lawlessness, for they are not empowered to investigate charges of that character unless they are approved and forwarded by an incorporated board of trade or chamber of commerce, or a State or city government—thus practically locking the doors of relief against individual grievance and popular complaint.

The twelfth section of the bill says "the commissioners shall inquire into that method of railroad management or combination known as pooling." What for? Why, to ascertain whether or not it should be restricted by legislation! And then, to cap the climax of absurdity, a cruel farce is made of the entire eighteen sections of the bill by extending every interstate railroad restriction and prohibition to every "steamboat, canal or other water craft" engaged "in the transportation of property between the States."

"It needs no ghost come from the grave to tell us" the meaning of this provision. The purpose is to render the bill inoperative, should it become a law, and invoke for it merited derision and contempt, by attempting to apply general transportation laws alike to railroads constructed over condemned lands by legislative authority, and the grand river highways of the Republic, fed by cloud and fountain, and given in perpetuity to the free and unquestioned use of the dwellers in the lands they make fruitful by the providence of God. However it may be concealed, the aim is to subject to the same rules of interstate transportation the unpretentious barge floating with the current down the broad thoroughfare of the Mississippi, with its cargo of coal or lumber, and the train of freight cars flying from State to State under the impulse of special privileges, and robbing one community for the benefit of another.

But, sir, I have not the patience to discuss in further detail the provisions of a bill so disrespectful to the intelligence of this House, so flagrantly treasonable to popular demand. From every congressional district west of the Alleghanies comes the voice of petition asking for railroad legislation, and in response this masterpiece of ambiguity and deception has been laid before us. What the people demand is positive legislation, and not laws to inquire into the necessity of it. They want statutes that can be neither misunderstood nor evaded, and not boards of corrupt or incapable commissioners to tardily deliberate upon their grievances and extend the tenure of railroad imposition. They want laws, not empty promises. They want the substance, and not the shadow that vanishes when the twilight comes. They want definite action by Congress—ay, and they will have it, too, no matter what may be the result of the deliberation here to-day—and not wily subterfuges in eighteen sections to beguile the thoughtless and prolong the years of corporate tyranny.

THE REAGAN BILL.

In short, sir, what the people want—what the people will have, either at our hands or the hands of our successors, if we fail to do their bidding—is a law embodying substantially the vital features of what is known as the Reagan bill, the central provision of which is that connecting interstate railroads shall charge no more for conveying full car loads of similar freights a shorter than for a longer distance. This does not mean that the charge is to be no more per mile for a shorter than for a longer distance in a continuous carriage, but no more in the aggregate. In other words, and to illustrate, the provision is, that if the freight charges on a car load of clothing from New York to San Francisco are $1,800, they shall be no more than $1,800 if the car is to be switched off five hundred or a thousand miles this side of San Francisco, thus giving the railroads the benefit of hundreds of miles of unaccomplished carriage. In the name of all that is reasonable, what more can they have the face to demand?

This question I shall now proceed to answer. I am not sure, now that a bill calculated to afford relief is again before this House, that the necessity of legislation is fully appreciated by a majority of the Representatives here. Hence, in the belief that I may be able to throw some additional light on the subject of railroad overcharges, I ask the privilege of presenting a few facts and figures, not generally known, in relation, more especially, to railroad management in the State of Nevada.

Bewildered in the mazes of a trackless forest, the sun obscured, and nothing in the surrounding vegetation to indicate the points of compass to an unaccustomed eye, the traveler moves round and round in a wearying and endless circle, and finally, when darkness closes around him, finds himself at the same spot from which he started in the morning. So, it seems to me, sir, is it with many who have sought and are still seeking to find their way out of the tortuous labyrinths and impenetrable jungles of interstate railroad government. To the right and to the left, to the East and to the West they adventure, but no furlong of real progress ever marks their steps. They attempt an egress, in turn, through the paths of compromise, the narrow avenues of competition, and the broader but no less bewildering thoroughfares of State legislation; but in the end they return, and must continue to return, discomfited to the spot from which they started, and upon which is based the broad warrant of the measure known as the Reagan bill:

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.—Constitution, article 8.

From this point, it seems to me, the pole-star is plainly visible to all who know how to read the heavens, and with them there should be no doubt; and the way is clear to those who have the courage to follow it, and with them there should be no hesitation.

Although the course may be still uncertain to some of us, be assured that it is no longer so to the millions whom we in the aggregate represent. They have counseled together, for suffering has made them thoughtful; their purpose is fixed, for their wrongs have made them resolute; and now, from the very foundation of power and source of law itself, an undeviating finger is pointing the way to deliverance.

The Representative in these halls is worse than blind who fails to see it, and seeing, worse than dead who fails to heed; for he who turns his face against the right and his heart against his people is dead to everything which gives a man the right to live.

RAILROAD OUTRAGES IN NEVADA.

I admit that I have not made myself very familiar with the details of railroad discriminations east of the Rocky Mountains; yet, were it possible for me to shut my ears to popular complaint and my eyes to unchallenged statement, the consideration of this bill, radical in purpose and general as it is in application, would in itself be evidence that the evil is as widespread in the States east of the Mississippi and Rio Grande as it is unjust and commercially demoralizing everywhere.

But however oppressive or general may be the burden of railroad discrimination on this side of the Rocky Mountains, or however emphatic may be the demand for congressional action in restraint of interstate railroad imposition throughout the Central and Southern States, I am here to-day, sir, to place before and upon the records of this House a verified complaint of discriminations against the State of Nevada, in character so monstrous that beside the exhibit the recital of other grievances will sound like favors conferred and the sweet promise of still greater benefactions to come.

Gentlemen from Illinois may bring their statements of railroad wrongs, and I will pile an Ossa upon the Pelion of their complaints; they may bring them from Texas or Colorado, and I will Hood the Shasta of their appeals for relief, and still fall short of expressing in the double monument of outrage the full measure of discriminations practiced against Nevada. Their statements tell of a few dollars per ton unjustly collected; mine of $200, $300, $400, $500 per car-load wickedly, audaciously, remorselessly taken from the pockets of consumers without even the pretense of consideration.

Discrimination! They will never understand the full meaning of the word until they have settled for the carriage of a ton of freight, I care not of what kind, by rail from New York to any railroad point in Eastern Nevada.

Their railroad managers are comparatively mild-mannered gentlemen. They collect more than is honestly their due, but are gracious enough to try to explain the reason. This is not the case in Nevada. There the merchant is compelled to pay through rates from ocean to ocean, and from $200 to $500 per car-load in addition for the privilege of paying it, and the mouth of protest is closed by the threat of increased exactions.

These statements must be regarded as strange by those who know nothing of their truth; but I am strangely well prepared to establish that they are strangely correct.

Possessing no especial knowledge of railroad discriminations east of Nevada, and assuming that a majority of the members upon this floor can know but little of railroad tariffs west of the Rocky Mountains, inasmuch as the effort has been ceaseless to disguise or keep them secret, I shall confine myself to the operations of the eight hundred and ninety-five miles of road between San Francisco and Ogden, and incidentally to the 1,032 miles stretching eastward thence to Omaha. Of the eight hundred and ninety-five miles of track belonging to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, about four hundred and fifty miles wind across the State of Nevada, passing through or near its most populous counties and most productive mining districts. Hence, the general dependence of the people of the State for transportation over this road.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

And now, sir, lest I may overlook the explanation, I will take the occasion to mention here that, personally as well as politically, I entertain toward the directors of the Central Pacfic Railroad Company no feeling of hostility, and no desire that they may be deprived of anything that is justly theirs.

Like myself, Governor Stanford, the president of the company, was a republican when the title carried with it persecution and reproach; when the public addresses of the Bakers and Traceys of California were answered, as they only could be answered, by tumult and violence; when the dissenting Brodericks of orthodox democracy were healed of their apostacy by half-ounce bullets and modest monuments in Lone Mountain. I assisted, and most cheerfully, in his election as governor of California, and well and faithfully did he perform the duties of his high office.

It is therefore with regret that I am compelled to assail the greater and later acts of his life, and make such showings as must bring in serious question his corporate integrity. But I have a duty to perform, and have neither the right nor the will to shirk it; and if in my allusions to the public acts of these gentlemen inferences may be drawn prejudicial to their individual honesty or sense of justice, friendship will permit me to offer nothing in return beyond the assurance of my pity for all whose greed of gain makes a footstool of equity, and in the midst of their millions bankrupts them in the respect of mankind.

THE CENTRAL PACIFIC.

Passing entirely through the State of Nevada, eastward from the Sierra Nevada Mountains, and tortuously following its most fertile valleys for the sake of the land grants, without especial regard to distances, is the railroad of the Central Pacific. Along its four hundred and fifty miles of track in the State are scattered fifty or sixty villages and other stations, a few of the more prominent of which I shall now mention, together with their distances from San Francisco. They are as follows:

Distances by the Central Pacific from San Francisco eastward to points in Nevada.

	Miles.
From San Francisco to Reno	306
From San Francisco to Wadsworth	340
From San Francisco to Winnemucca	475
From San Francisco to Battle Mountain	535
From San Francisco to Palisade	587
From San Francisco to Elko	619
From San Francisco to Kelton, (Utah)	803
From San Francisco to Ogden, (Utah)	895

As it will be shown that the nearer these towns are to the Missouri River the greater is the charge for the transportation of freights from that point, or in other words, that the freight rates from the East increase in rigid and unconscionable uniformity with the decrease in distance, it is essential to a proper understanding of the figures following that the respective distances from San Francisco of the towns just noted be borne in mind.

TARIFF SCHEDULES OF THE COMPANY.

I will now give, under warrant of the printed schedule of tariffs of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, (Appendix A,) the through rates from New York to San Francisco on such freights as embrace the leading articles of consumption in Nevada. The schedule, however, which names and classifies between twelve and thirteen hundred distinct commodities, will be given entire as an appendix to these remarks, believing that it will be instructive reading to many. The charges are all the way from $300 to $1,800 per car-load of ten tons.

This schedule is issued and signed by the general freight agent of the Union Pacific in Omaha, the general freight agent of the Central Pacific in San Francisco, and the general agent of both companies in New York. The title of the schedule is as follows:

Special through freight tariffs, in force February 1, 1877, to San Francisco, Sacramento, Marysville, San José, Stockton, and Oakland, California.

Freights are rated from four different points and their surroundings in the East, namely, New York, Cincinnati, Chicago, and Omaha, and no distinction in prices is made between the cities named for delivery in California; that is, the prices are precisely the same, for example, at Sacramento and San Francisco, although the latter point is one hundred and fifty-one miles farther westward.

Although a distinct line in the title of the schedule announces that it is "published only for the information and guidance of agents and employés of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads," I have availed myself of its figures just as freely as if it had been printed for the benefit of the public; and as it is further declared that "no contracting agent has authority to deviate from the rates herein given," I must assume that they are, what I know them to be, the through rates actually charged, except in special cases where they are dishonorably lessened as a reward to sycophancy or a punishment of complaint.

With this explanation I present the through rates on a few articles, per one hundred pounds and per car-load of ten tons:

Through rates from New York to San Francisco.

Articles.	Per 100 lbs.	Per car-load.
Coal-oil	$1 50	$300
Candles	1 50	300
Machinery, in car-loads	----------	600
Dry goods, in bales or cases	6 00	1,200
Fine machinery, boxed	5 00	1,000
Clothing, in cases	6 00	1,200
Iron, (bar, band, or boiler)	1 50	300
Liquors, in barrels	2 50	500
Shovels and spades	3 00	600
Pumps, steam or hydraulic	5 00	1,000
Picks and mattocks	1 75	350
Nails and spikes, in boxes	1 50	300

These rates, be it remembered, are for the transportation of the freights mentioned from ocean to ocean, representing an aggregate carriage of over thirty-one hundred miles. The rates to Sacramento and San Francisco are the same, as shown by the schedule from which these figures have been compiled; but does the Central Pacific Railroad Company charge San Francisco rates to Reno, three hundred and six miles nearer New York, or to Winnemucca, four hundred and seventy-five miles nearer, or to Elko, six hundred and nineteen miles from the Golden Gate? Let us see. I may possibly be able to show that the collection of San Francisco rates, six or seven hundred miles east of that point, for freights delivered from New York does not quite satisfy the railroad freebooters who fix the rates of transportation in Nevada, but that to the through rates from the Atlantic to the Pacific they add a godless, lawless, merciless tariff of their own.

Having given the through transportation rates on certain standard commodities from New York to San Francisco—all passing through the State of Nevada, let it be borne in mind—I now present another printed schedule of freight tariff on merchandise consigned to Nevada, (Appendix B.) Consigned from where? No one knows. It may be from New York, from San Francisco, from heaven or hell—and from the prices it might be from any of these points—but the destination alone is mentioned. The title of this mysterious schedule is as follows:

Special freight tariffs for freights consigned to Winnemucca, Wadsworth, Reno Virginia City, and Carson, Nevada; and Truckee and Colfax, California; to take effect Monday, October 29, 1877.

Consigned from where, I repeat? The schedule is silent; but from anywhere, let me answer, since it seems to fix the rates either from Ogden, Omaha, New York, or San Francisco. Between two hundred and three hundred articles are enumerated and classified, and the transportation charges authorized by it are as follows to Reno and Winnemucca, respectively three hundred and six and four hundred and seventy-five miles from San Francisco:

Special freight rates from San Francisco to points in Nevada.

Merchandise.	Reno, per car-load.	Winnemucca, per car-load.
Coal-oil	$236	$416
Candles	236	416
Mining machinery	218	396
Dry goods in boxes	236	416
Clothing in bales	246	596
Iron	154	276
Liquors in barrels	236	416
Other machinery	246	596
Nails and spikes	236	416

As the schedule gives the rates no further east than Winnemucca, I must rely upon other information for the charges from San Francisco to other points beyond; and as the classifications at those places are vague and capricious, I have selected two of the cheapest articles of freight, as follows:

Special freight rates for coal-oil or candles from San Francisco to points east of Winnemucca, Nevada.

Coal-oil or candles.	Per 100 pounds.	Per car-load.
To Battle Mountain	$2 25	$450
To Palisade	2 40	480
To Elko	2 50	500

A car-load of coal-oil or candles is taken from New York to San Francisco by rail for $300. This is the printed rate, the rate that is actually charged; but here are charges of $416 at Winnemucca, $450 at Battle Mountain, $480 at Palisade, and $500 at Elko for precisely the same service. Whether representing the rates from New York or San Francisco, these charges are absolutely atrocious, and I cannot wonder that the directors of the overland roads have deemed it prudent to withhold them from print—at least, the charges east of Winnemucca.

But these charges of from $416 to $500 for a car-load of candles delivered in Nevada do not tell the whole story of railroad pillage in that State. "What!" must in thought be asked, "do you intimate that $500 per car-load on the very cheapest freights scheduled does not pay the bill in full—that additional transportation charges are collected from the people of Eastern Nevada?"

The thought is natural. One would imagine that human rapacity had exhausted itself in these monstrous exactions; that the heart that could demand and mercilessly collect this lawless spoil—this excess of $200 per car-load on through charges from New York to San Francisco, with a saving of six hundred and nineteen miles of carriage—was dead to every instinct of justice, every suggestion of humanity, and was already tottering on the decrepitating edge of burglary, arson, and murder.

But it seems that, within the scope and possibility of unbridled railroad brigandage, the gentlemen who fix the rates for Nevada did not think that in these charges—these outrageous advances over through tariffs—they had quite reached the limit between which and confiscation stretches a narrow and misty zone which honest traffic dare not travel; and, therefore, still deeper they adventured into the pockets of our people, and drew forth this additional mountain of charges which they cruelly and without remorse added to the already staggering burden of almost double rates.

In direct and authoritative proof and explanation of this, I quote from the printed schedule from which I have drawn the exhibit entitled "special freight rates from San Francisco to points in Nevada," the schedule which authorizes the charges of from $416 to $500 per car-load for the cheapest of freights consigned to prominent points in Nevada. The instruction, printed in two places that it may not be overlooked, reads as follows:

> Freights for the points named below [Winnemucca, Wadsworth, Reno, &c.] may be contracted through to destination [from where is not mentioned] by adding to the through rates given in the tariffs dated February 1, 1877, the amounts stated below.

Is there any doubt about the intent or meaning of these words? If there is, sir, I am prepared to dissipate it with the receipted bills of the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

The plain meaning, verified by practice, is this: that on all merchandise consigned from New York to railway points in Nevada, and there delivered, must be paid the following charges:

First. Full through rates from New York to San Francisco, when in reality the freights are not taken through, but delivered six hundred or seven hundred miles east of San Francisco; and,

Second. Excessive way rates back from San Francisco to points of delivery in Nevada of the same freights, which have neither been forwarded beyond nor brought back by the railroad company making the cold-blooded charge.

So inhuman, so infamous are these combined charges, that, familiar as I am with their enforcement, I should refer to them with hesitation but for the proofs in my possession, to which I invite the scrutiny of the skeptical.

And now, sir, that the full rates exacted in Nevada may be seen at a glance on commodities of largest consumption there, together with the distinct charges embracing the unwholesome aggregates, I present the following exhibit, and challenge the world to produce a parallel of tabulated railroad robbery. Should the showing fail to appall, I will submit to a change in the title:

APPALLING EXHIBIT.

Through-freight rates from New York to San Francisco, added to way rates back from San Francisco through the State of Nevada.

Car-load of ten tons.	Through rates from New York.	Back rates from San Francisco.	Charges at Reno.	Through rates from New York.	Back rates from San Francisco.	Charges at Winnemucca
Coal-oil	$300	+$236	= $536	$300	+$416	= $716
Candles	300	+ 236	= 536	300	+ 416	= 716
Machinery, in car-loads	600	+ 218	= 818	600	+ 396	= 996
Dry goods, in boxes	1,200	+ 236	=1,436	1,200	+ 416	=1,616
Clothing, in boxes or bales	1,200	+ 246	=1,446	1,200	+ 596	=1,796
Iron, bar, band, or boiler	300	+ 154	= 454	300	+ 276	= 576
Liquors, in barrels	500	+ 236	= 736	500	+ 416	= 916
Fine machinery, boxed	1,000	+ 246	=1,246	1,000	+ 596	=1,596
Nails and spikes, in kegs	300	+ 236	= 536	300	+ 416	= 716

The charges in this table are compiled from the printed schedules of rates of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, and must therefore be authentic. East of Winnemucca, as I have mentioned before, their figures do not extend. I therefore supplement the exhibit with the following figures, derived from receipted railroad bills and other information:

ADDITIONAL EXHIBIT.

Through-freight rates from New York to San Francisco, added to way rates back from San Francisco to points in Nevada east of Winnemucca.

Coal-oil and candles, per car-load.	Through rates from New York.	Back rates from San Francisco.	Total.
To Battle Mountain, 535 miles, from San Francisco	$300	+$450	=$750
To Palisade, 587 miles, from San Francisco	300	+ 480	= 780
To Elko, 619 miles, from San Francisco	300	+ 500	= 800

Is comment necessary upon these terrible rates? Do they not speak trumpet-tongued of impositions unparalleled in the annals of railroad ruffianism? These charges have been neither known nor credited beyond the State of Nevada. When mentioned by the press they have been denied, and with threats of still greater oppressions the railroad dictators have silenced the complaints of their victims.

Nevada is an orange which for ten years these railroad vampires have been sucking in silence. We have been, and are still, bleeding at every pore, but the extent, I am satisfied, has not been even imagined by those in whose will has reposed the means of relief. I am here to-day to make proclamation of these wrongs, that others may understand them as I do.

THE TESTIMONY OF RECEIPTED BILLS.

The plans of the well-conditioned gentlemen who manage the affairs of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies will doubtless be somewhat interfered with by these expositions, resulting, as they may, in acquainting the Forty-sixth Congress with the full measure of railroad tariffs in Nevada; but since their plans and purposes are equally lawless and infamous, they cannot reasonably expect that any consideration personal to themselves will check the development.

Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; yet the figures I have presented have been drawn from their own printed schedules. Let it die with the unsavory breezes of the great basin, whose partial nature with foot of ashes has trampled out the green; yet will I add to their admitted rates the testimony of their receipted bills.

It may be imagined that, although the printed schedules of the railroad companies exact certain extravagant rates in Nevada, they are really not charged as a matter of fact; that they are simply an exhibit of what might be done in the way of charges, rather than of what the consciences of the railroad managers will permit their agents to do. In other words, that these printed schedules are but harmless exhibitions of power, intended to reconcile shippers to lower but still excessive rates.

Assuming that some such idea may be entertained, I will proceed to dissipate it at once by the production of copies of a few of the receipted railroad bills in my possession, all showing that the scheduled rates are adhered to. I will first present four or five bills for merchandise delivered from the east at Reno, the receiving overland railway point for the Comstock and its surroundings. Reno is three hundred and six miles east of San Francisco. Some of the freights were delivered at Virginia from Reno by the Virginia and Truckee Railroad, but to avoid complications I have omitted the latter carriage from the bills, and they embrace the overland charges alone. They are as follows:

Expense bill.

No. 2310. RENO, NEVADA, 10—13, 1879.

Messrs. J. & J. B. Mallon, to Central Pacific Railroad Company, debtor, for transportation of merchandise from Ogden:

Merchandise.	Weight.	Rate.	Amount.
500 boxes candles	20,000	$1 14	$228 00
Advances, (meaning through rates to San Francisco) State toll.			302 50
Total			530 50
Storage. Date of way-bill, 10—9. No. of way-bill, 371. No. of car, 380.

Received payment for the company,

J. E. WRATTAN, Agent.

Expense bill.

No. 337. RENO, NEVADA, 10—6, 1879.

Mr. J. J. Quinn, to Central Pacific Railroad Company, debtor, for transportation of merchandise from Ogden:

Merchandise.	Weight.	Rate.	Amount.
19 small six-plate stoves	1,470	$1 19	$17 57
B. C., (meaning through rates to San Francisco)			36 75
Total			52 32
Date of way-bill, 10—3. No. of way-bill, 114. No. of car, 3404.

Received payment for the company,

HURD, Agent.

Expense bill.

No. 1137. RENO, NEVADA, 10—21, 1879.

Messrs. Hagerman & S., to Central Pacific Railroad Company, debtor, for transportation of merchandise from Ogden:

Merchandise.	Weight.	Rate.	Amount.
12 sacks ham 1 case bacon	2,626	$1 14	$29 87
B. C., (meaning through rates to San Francisco)			75 45
Total			105 32
Date of way-bill, 10—20. No. of way-bill, 816. No. of car, 4756.

Received payment for the company,

HURD, Agent.

Expense bill.

No. 253. RENO, NEVADA, 9—11, 1879.

Messrs. J. & J. B. Mallon, to Central Pacific Railroad Company, debtor, for transportation of merchandise from Ogden:

Merchandise.	Weight.	Rate.	Amount.
500 boxes candles	20,950	$1 14	$238 83
Advances, (meaning through rates to San Francisco) State toll.			312 00
Total			550 83
Storage. Date of way-bill, 9—8. No. of way-bill, 263. No. of car, 5008.

Received payment for the company,

J. E. WRATTAN, Agent.

Expense bill.

No. 689. RENO, NEVADA, 8—12, 1879.

Messrs. J. & J. B. Mallon, to Central Pacific Railroad Company, debtor, for transportation of merchandise from Ogden:

Merchandise.	Weight.	Rate.	Amount.
250 cans lard-oil	22,200	$1 14	$253 08
Advances, (meaning through rates to San Francisco) State toll.			441 02
Total			694 10
Storage. Date of way-bill, 8—9. No. of way-bill, 327. No. of car, 520.

Received payment for the company,

J. E. WRATTAN, Agent.

What do these bills show? They show that the rates of the printed schedules have been observed to the letter. Take, for example, the bill of the Messrs. Mallon for a car-load of candles from the East, which was switched off at Reno. I have shown that the through rates for a car-load of candles of ten tons from New York to San Francisco is just $300, and it will be seen by this bill that to the through rate of $312, in payment for a car-load and nine hundred and fifty pounds, is added the back rate from San Francisco of $1.14 per hundred pounds, making a total charge of $550.83. And be it forever remembered that that car-load of candles was not moved a single mile beyond Reno. And so with the other bills.

THUMB-SCREWS TO SILENCE COMPLAINT.

It is possible that the railroad tyrants of the Pacific may devise some punishment for the gentlemen who have furnished these bills, for they brook no interference with their plundering practices in Nevada. But I warn them to move with caution. This is an inauspicious time for them to single out men who have dared to speak for their especial vengeance, for there is a spirit abroad which is growing red-eyed under the contemplation of such tyranny, and those who are now intolerant of reproach have reached the verge of a visitation of radical, irresistible, and irrevocable retaliation. Up the bronzed and sturdy arm of toil is steadily being rolled the sleeve of preparation, and they are wise who will not provoke the blow.

I now offer the following bill from Palisade, five hundred and eighty-seven miles east of San Francisco. It is the railroad supply point for Eureka, in importance the second mining locality in the State:

Expense bill.

No. 418. PALISADE, NEVADA, 9—17, 1879.

Mr. H. Johnson, to Central Pacific Railroad Company, debtor, for transportation of merchandise from Ogden:

Merchandise.	Weight.	Rate.	Amount.
6 boxes canned goods 25 boxes common soap 6 boxes Castile soap 6 boxes maple molasses 2 boxes sardines 2 barrels baking powder	3,480	$1 91	$66 48
Advances, (meaning through rates to San Francisco) State toll.			73 51
Total			139 99
Storage. Date of way-bill, 9—14. No. of way-bill, 1409. No. of car, ——.

Received payment for the company.

J. L. FAST, Agent.

THE TESTIMONY OF MERCHANTS AND OTHERS.

It will be seen by the foregoing bill that the excess over through rates to Palisade is $1.91 per hundred pounds, while at Reno, as a rule, it is $1.14. The Palisade tariff is charged from Ogden, and the Reno rate from San Francisco. But no matter at what point in Nevada east of Winnemucca the railroads begin to charge Ogden instead of San Francisco rates, the extortion is about the same; and under the India-rubber way rates prevailing there it makes but little difference to the Elko merchant whether he pays through San Francisco rates to Ogden and way rates thence to Elko, or through rates at his own door and way rates back from San Francisco. Through rates added to way rates, either from San Francisco or Ogden, are charged and collected, no matter how the bills may be made out to mystify the public.

In further explanation of the freight charges at Palisade, and of the mysterious manner in which the business of the railroad is conducted there, I will now read a brief but pertinent extract from the letter of Mr. Johnson, referring to and inclosing with some others the bill last given. Mr. Johnson is a reputable merchant of Palisade and Eureka. He says:

The rate from Ogden to Palisade is almost invariably $1.91 per hundred weight. We have the utmost difficulty in getting expense bills from the Central Pacific Railroad. All their business, to the most trivial matters, is clouded in mystery. In the matter of kerosene-oil in car lots, the price from Pittsburgh to Eureka is $1,075 per car freight. (Equivalent to not less than $975 at Palisade.) We find that we can buy oil in San Francisco, (that has gone past our doors,) and pay $2.55 per hundred weight from that place to Palisade, and lay it down here $100 per car-load cheaper than we can get it by direct shipment from the East. We have at this end of the State a tough time, being in the squeeze both ways, and are praying for relief. We have immense quantities of ores which cannot now be worked, as none yielding less than $40 per ton can be reduced at a profit.

I have placed the rate from San Francisco to Palisade at $2.40 per hundred pounds, while Mr. Johnson makes it $2.55. These differences are doubtless due to the irregular classifications of freights between Winnemucca and Ogden. Either rate, however, is sufficiently monstrous.

I now offer the following bills for freights delivered at Battle Mountain, the point from which Austin and tributary mining districts receive their consignments by rail. The importance and extent of traffic of the locality will be appreciated when I mention that Battle Mountain and Austin were recently connected by rail, the distance being between ninety and one hundred miles. Like the country south of Palisade, the Austin section abounds in valuable mineral deposits of base and free ores, many of which would be worked but for excessive railroad rates, and the consequent high prices of almost everything consumed. Battle Mountain, permit me to repeat, is five hundred and thirty-five miles from San Francisco, and three hundred and sixty miles from Ogden. The bills referred to are as follows:

Expense bill.

No. 425. BATTLE MOUNTAIN, NEVADA, May 16, 1878.

Mr. A. A. Curtis, to Central Pacific Railroad Company, debtor, for transportation of merchandise from Ogden:

Merchandise.	Weight.	Rate.	Amount.
13 boxes machinery—100 boiler tubes; 3 iron drums, 1 casting, 2 sections W. pipe, 12 pieces W. pipe, 1 balance W. pipe	20,600	$2 04	$420 24
Advance, (meaning through rates to San Francisco) State toll.			502 88
Total			923 12
Storage. Date of way-bill, 5—13. No. of way-bill, 603. No. of car, 4764.

Received payment for the company,

J. BROWN, Agent.

Expense bill.

No. —. BATTLE MOUNTAIN, NEVADA, February 16, 1878.

Mr. A. A. Curtis, to Central Pacific Railroad Company, debtor, for transportation of merchandise from Ogden:

Merchandise.	Weight.	Rate.	Amount.
1 punch, 4 boxes P. plates, 2 crates	7,700	$2 09	$160 93
Advances, (meaning through rates to San Francisco) State toll.			360 56
Total			522 49
Storage. Date of way-bill, 2—14. No. of way-bill, 508. No. of car, 2740.

Received payment for the company,

JAMES BROWN, Agent.

Expense bill.

No. 6260. BATTLE MOUNTAIN, NEVADA, 7—24, 1879.

Messrs. Gage, Curtis & Co., to Central Pacific Railroad Company, debtor, for transportation of merchandise from Ogden:

Merchandise.	Weight.	Rate.	Amount.
260 cars refined petroleum	20,600	$2 25	$463 50
Advances, (meaning through rates to San Francisco) State toll.			310 25
Total			773 75
Storage. Date of way-bill, 7—16. No. of way-bill, 10829. No. of car, 776.

Received payment for the company,

JAS. BROWN, Agent.

Although this last bill has been made to conform with the others from Battle Mountain, the charges are really embraced in two distinct bills—the first from Pittsburgh to Sacramento, comprising the through rates, amounting to $310.25, and the second from Sacramento back to Battle Mountain, with an additional charge of $463.50, and a total of $773.75.

INTIMIDATION OF BUSINESS MEN.

From Elko, the receiving point of Tuscarora, Cornucopia, and other important mining districts stretching to the southern boundary of Idaho, I have been unable to procure the testimony of receipted railroad bills. Why? Because, under the frown of their railroad tyrants, the merchants have been afraid to furnish them. Something of railroad rates at Elko, however, and the extent to which the merchants of that place have been terrorized by railroad management may be gathered from the following extract from a letter, under date of December 9, 1879, from a prominent and respected citizen of Elko. I quote:

In relation to getting railroad receipts for freights I have been unsuccessful, for the reason that merchants and business men are afraid to have their names connected with the matter. They say the railroad company could and would ruin them in their business; therefore, they decline to give any printed receipts. Hence, I have only been able to collect the following items from a few of our leading merchants:

The Central Pacific Railroad Company charge $350 for a car-load of coal from San Francisco to Elko.

From Cleveland, Ohio, to Elko, freight charges on a car-load of oil, (ten tons,) $806.

Car-load of wagons from Racine, Wisconsin, to Ogden, $350; from Ogden to Elko, on the same, two hundred and seventy-five miles, $350; total, $700.

Car-load of stoves, from Ogden to Elko, two hundred and seventy-five miles, $344.

The merchants and business men of Eastern Nevada would be perfectly satisfied if they were not charged more for the delivery of freights at Elko than is charged for through freights to San Francisco, a distance of six hundred and nineteen miles farther on; or, in other words, they believe the Reagan bill now before Congress will give the desired relief, and all join in hoping that it may become a law.

What little I have written you in this matter is in confidence, as the little property I have is on the line of the railroad, and I, like others, am at their mercy.

What, I ask any gentleman upon this floor, is the meaning of this strange revelation? It means a lawless and cold-blooded levy of over five hundred dollars per car-load upon the people of Elko, with a threat to increase the amount should they make it public. It means highway robbery, sir, with hot pincher and thumb-screw accompaniments.

The gentleman who furnished the Battle Mountain bills, writes as follows:

I inclose herewith several bills of lading of the Central Pacific and Union Pacific Railroads. It is difficult to understand their system, except that they get all they can, as they have four or five classes, and seem to use their own judgment or whim as to which class they will rate your freight under. The bills are all of the Manhattan Company, which has shipped a large amount of machinery from the East during the past two years. We have simply paid whatever they asked without growling, as that would do no good.

Certainly not; growling "would do no good." The agents of the Central Pacific Railroad Company are instructed to dismiss their consciences, close their ears to protest, their hearts to mercy, and their eyes to everything beyond the ghastly schedule of rates which has been placed in their hands, and charge—charge to the right of them, to the left of them, in front of them—charge everywhere and everything, and see that the charges are collected. That is their business, their sole business, and it is no part of their duties to listen to complaints and rectify wrongs. Life is too short for that; and the directors of the Central Pacific, who are fast nearing the misty realm beyond the cloud-rifts and the storm, have not yet completed by some miles the southern road, which they expect in time to exchange for the one they are now operating in Nevada.

FALSEHOOD AND AUDACITY.

I think I have now satisfactorily shown that the people of Nevada are struggling under a weight of railroad impositions alike unprecedented and unendurable. Yet, in his annual report of July, 1879, and in his late reply to Judge Black, the president of the Central Pacific Railroad Company audaciously attempts to defend these outrages. He says:

Discriminations, in one sense, may be said to be made only upon compulsion, and always against the carrier, as he would not take less than his maximum rate unless forced to do so by some of the causes above stated. Discrimination against an individual or a community is a thing unknown. The discrimination most prejudicial to the interests of the company is that which arises from competition by other carriers, which forces a lower rate than could otherwise be wisely obtained.

Here is the cool admission that, but for competition, the managers of the Central Pacific would charge maximum rates in all instances, whereas it is now done on but 7 per cent. of the freight business of the road.

In reference to their freight charges in Nevada, I should like to know what they would consider "maximum rates," the rates I am warranted in believing they would fix but for the unembarrassing competition of pack mules and ox teams. Why, sir, incredible as it may seem, seventeen years ago freights were hauled on wagons from Sacramento to Virginia City, up through the heated valleys and over the rough roads and frozen summits of the mountains, for prices but a trifle in advance of existing railroad rates between those two points. In favorable weather Sacramento freights were then delivered in Virginia City at $1.50 per hundred pounds. The railroad rates are now $1.46½—but three and a half cents per hundred less than old teaming rates.

This is the only competition which the people of Nevada have to offer to railroad imposition, the only competition with which the railroads are confronted in fixing their rates between the Rocky and Sierra Nevada Mountains, for our streams die in the great basin, and desert barriers and mountain ranges fretting the clouds have closed to us all cheaper avenues of commercial supply.

Yes, pack-mule competition in Nevada, of which the directors of the Central Pacific inferentially complain as a sort of wicked and unnecessary menace to their financial well doing, is indeed all that stands between them and the establishment of rates in keeping with their rapacity, and their charges are scheduled just a shade below figures that would line the roads again with pack-trains and wagons.

It will be observed that the directors of the Central Pacific, through their president, report that—

Discrimination against an individual or a community is a thing unknown.

In view of the terrible showing that has been and can be made to the contrary, what must be thought of an assertion such as this? The spirit of falsehood itself should feel like standing uncovered in the presence of the chilled-iron cheek and sublime hardihood of the gentlemen who, in their names, permitted this declaration to reach the eye of the public.

What is "discrimination?" What is the meaning of the word? Is it to charge the people of Elko $800 per car-load for freight and $300 for a precisely similar car-load delivered in San Francisco, six hundred and nineteen miles beyond? Is it to exact $14 freight per ton for Wyoming coal delivered at Reno, the supply point of the Comstock, and $9 or $10 per ton for the same article taken through to San Francisco, three hundred and six miles farther westward? Is it to charge two prices widely apart for the same classes of freights delivered at Winnemucca or Kelton, the larger price to be paid for commodities to be consumed there and the smaller for such as are to be conveyed thence to Idaho? Is it to give one man special and another general rates in the same place for the same carriage of the same freights at the same time? If this is not discrimination against both individuals and communities, then in the name of Heaven what is it? Perhaps in the new railroad lexicon it has either been stricken from the language as an obsolete term or given another definition. Very well; then let us drop the word and substitute the more fitting one of larceny.

No discrimination against either individuals or communities! I have shown by the schedules of the railroad companies and their receipted bills that the farther overland freights are moved in Nevada the less is the charge. This would seem to be a discrimination against communities, notwithstanding ox-team competition. I assert, and can prove, that special rates are given to the friends and supporters of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, both in California and Nevada, thereby affording the favored few unjust, dishonest, and unlawful advantages over their business rivals. This would seem to be a discrimination against individuals, notwithstanding the flimsy explanations of the directors in their annual reports, which must be regarded as specimens of commercial literature absolutely approachless in ingenious delusion and deliberate falsehood.

SOPHISTRIES OF RAILROAD BRIGANDAGE.

It is not denied by the Central Pacific managers—or rather it dare not be now denied—that back rates are added to full through rates on freights consigned to Nevada from the East. But this, they tell us, is not a discrimination against communities, but against themselves, and is the result of competing carriage which will not permit them to charge maximum rates at all points. In other words, they charge all that competition will allow them to charge where there is competition, and where there is no competition all their consciences can be made to approve under the inspiration of boundless greed and lawless enterprise; and when I mention that the charges in Nevada are the conscience rates of the directors, it seems to me that an appeal to this House for relief should be irresistible, without the exhibit of a single fact or figure beyond.

As it is assumed by the directors that all the discriminations are against themselves, it would be but natural that they should seek to correct the inequalities when pointed out, especially where they would be exclusively benefited by the change. A single illustration will show the manner in which these discriminations against themselves—and they admit no other—are corrected.

HOW RATES ARE "EQUALIZED."

Not long since Colonel C. was the owner of a large wheat-farm in Colusa County, California. The railroad rates for wheat from that locality to San Francisco were $6 per ton. Considering the distance of the carriage, these rates were excessive, but the farmers of Colusa were compelled to submit to them. In San Joaquin County, about the same distance from San Francisco, was another wheat-growing section, among the prominent farmers of which was Mr. E. The railroad charges for wheat to San Francisco from that district were $9 per ton. Learning of the Colusa rates, and not understanding why his should be any greater, since the carriage was about the same from both places, Mr. E., after consulting with the colonel, decided to confer with the railroad authorities with a view to their equalization. A few days after the gentlemen again met. "Have you equalized your wheat rates?" inquired the colonel. "Oh, yes," replied Mr. E.; "I had a long talk with President Stanford, and he promised that I should have Colusa rates." "Then your rate has been reduced from nine to six," returned the colonel; "I am glad to hear it." "Oh, no," was the answer; "the thing has been equalized by raising your rate from six to nine."

Thus was the railroad company happily relieved of a complaint of discrimination, which the directors declare to be "a thing unknown." It certainly ought to be when it is susceptible of a correction so satisfactory to the railroad company.

The annual reports of the directors of the Central Pacific are simply ingenious fictions, intended to deceive the world and divert attention from their conscienceless dealings with the public. Behind these narrow screens of deception and sophistry they attempt, like an ostrich with its head in the sand, to hide the body of their acts; but the sleek and greasy carcass of their misdemeanors, pompously adorned with feathers and bedecked with the gaudy trappings of vulgar taste, finds no concealment.

THE PASSENGER TRAFFIC.

But the impositions of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads are not confined to the carriage of freights. The through passage rates between San Francisco and Omaha are over five cents per mile, with the addition of $14 for a single berth, and $13.50 for meals at their eating-stations. The most of these eating-stations are appurtenances of the railroads, and the food hastily served is as economical in cleanliness, variety, and wholesome material as it is extravagant in price. I do not mention this in the way of complaint exactly, for passengers can carry their own lunch-baskets, and a rough pioneer experience of thirty years on the frontiers of the Pacific has rendered me somewhat indifferent to the luxuries and appointments of a well-spread table. My object is simply to show that the exceedingly thrifty managers of the overland roads are not restrained by any feeling of pride from swelling their annual receipts with the profits of badly-provisioned lunch-stands.

The price of a through ticket from Omaha to San Francisco is $100.50; distance, 1,927 miles. But this represents the price as well from Omaha to Reno, 306 miles from San Francisco, and from San Francisco to Cheyenne, 516 miles from Omaha. Excessive and discriminating though the rates be, the passenger can at least congratulate himself on possessing the advantage over candles of not being compelled to pay way rates back from San Francisco should he stop at Reno on a through ticket from Omaha. His facilities for unloading the freight of his own person at his point of destination, together with a not unreasonable repugnance to being carried five or six hundred miles out of his way, are circumstances which have happily relieved him from the operations of the back-rate schedule.

EXCLUSIVE OUTRAGES OF THE CENTRAL PACIFIC.

Having thus far devoted myself to the freight rates of the Central Pacific in Nevada, in connection with other roads, I will now say a few words in relation to the freight rates of the company exclusively over its own rails. The rates from point to point in Nevada amount almost to an interdiction of internal traffic, and farmers wagon their grains to the mills and their produce to the markets from station to station along the railroad track. Why, the farmers of Big Meadows are to-day hauling their grains in wagons along the line of the railroad from Lovelock Station to Winnemucca for milling, and profitably competing with railroad charges. A correspondent of the Silver State, writing from Lovelock under date of November 29, 1880, gives the following:

The farmers of Big Meadows, not having received any encouragement from the Central Pacific Railroad Company, in the matter of reducing rates for transporting grain, have raised a yell of indignation and started eight teams, loaded with about sixty thousand pounds of wheat, for the flouring mills at Winnemucca. It looks like old times to see so many teams leave a small place like this at one time to compete with the railroad. The farmers purpose exchanging their wheat for flour, and by doing so will have loads back. They expect to make the round trip in seven days, and give employment to several men and a large number of horses, and make money by doing so, and running in opposition to the railroad company. As soon as the teams return they will be loaded again and their number will be increased.

The farmers save on this trip $1.08 per hundred pounds, making a total for the eight loads of $648, and all this money is kept at home. Even by paying drivers $2 per day and board, the farmers claim to make from $10 to $15 per day on each team, which they would have to feed if idle in their stables, and that is a good price for small teams nowadays. There is plenty of grain on the Meadows this year, and there is talk of hauling the barley by wagon to Wadsworth instead of shipping it by rail.

And no wonder the farmers of Big Meadows are hauling their grains to market along the line of the railroad when the charges for a distance of less than seventy-five miles are over two hundred dollars per car-load. Yet the gentlemen who manage the affairs of the railroad company talk of their efforts to develop the resources of the State.

PARALYZING OUR INDUSTRIES.

Nevada abounds in rich and rebellious ores, requiring the expensive aid of fire in reduction. To be reduced at a profit they must be either cheaply transported to cheap fuel, or cheap fuel must be cheaply transported to them. These railroad promoters of our industries will fulfill neither requirement, and while the mines remain undeveloped, and thousands of hands are vainly seeking employment, their cars are hourly running unburdened through the State.

Their object seems to be to crush, not to develop, the industries of Nevada, and to this end the competition of special rates from California is employed when there is danger of an industry growing into importance. Lest I may not be quite understood, permit me to cite an example or two:

Limestone is rare in the neighborhood of the Comstock. Finally, to the gratification of all, a quarry was discovered and opened about ten miles south of Virginia City, and for a few months lime was furnished on the Comstock cheaper than it had ever been sold before. California lime was no longer required in Virginia, and its transportation to Nevada almost ceased. The opening of this quarry was an interference with the business of the railroad company, and they promptly closed it by putting the rates on California lime to figures below the cost of local production. The quarry was abandoned, many men were deprived of employment, a growing industry was crushed, and the price of lime has gone back to its old figures.

There are valuable sulphur deposits in Humboldt County, and large quantities of the article were used in the manufacture of acids near Virginia. Nevada sulphur is no longer in demand. It can be laid down in Virginia City cheaper from Europe than from Humboldt County.

We have salt and soda in abundance, but they cannot be transported beyond the State, and farmers along the line of the railroad are kept in poverty by special rates from California.

SPECIAL DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST NEVADA.

With San Francisco rates of transportation the foundries and machine shops of Virginia and Gold Hill would be able to supply Eastern Nevada and Utah with large quantities of mining machinery; but the Central Pacific folks will not permit it, and to prevent it they charge $200 per car-load more for machinery forwarded from Reno to Utah than from San Francisco to Utah. In verification of this strange statement I submit the following copies of telegrams in my possession.

In explanation I will state that the Ontario Mining Company, in Utah Territory, required a quantity of heavy machinery, which Mr. Eckart, an enterprising foundryman and machinist of Virginia City, believed he could furnish at San Francisco prices, provided he was charged no more than San Francisco rates for transportation. Mr. Eckart was in San Francisco at the time, and telegraphed to the freight agent of the Virginia and Truckee Railroad Company to get the lowest rates of transportation from Virginia City to Reno and from Reno to Ogden. In reply he received the following dispatch:

VIRGINIA, August 21, 1878.
(Received at San Francisco, August 21, 1876—11:50 a. m.)

To W. R. ECKART:
Your message promptly answered. Central Pacific rates from Reno to Ogden, $2.66 per hundred. Our (Virginia and Truckee) rates to Reno, $75 per car. Have no authority to name special rates over the Central Pacific, but I will join them in any reduction of tariff rates above named.

D. A. BENDER.

But no reduction in the rates telegraphed was made, and the machinery was furnished from San Francisco. Curious to know what rates had been charged on the machinery from San Francisco to Ogden, after its delivery Mr. Eckart telegraphed the superintendent of the Ontario Mining Company at Salt Lake, making the inquiry. The reply was this:

SALT LAKE, February 12, 1879.
(Received at Virginia City, February 12, 1879—3:10 p. m.)

To W. R. ECKART:
Three hundred and twenty a car for machinery.

R. C. CHAMBERS.

Freights which the railroad company refused to take from Reno to Ogden for less than $532 per car-load they forwarded from San Francisco to Ogden for $320, and made a longer carriage by 306 miles. In this instance there was no connecting road to dictate terms. It was a matter entirely with the Central Pacific, and I am curious to know what the explanation can be for such heartless discriminations against the manufacturers of Nevada.

BLIGHTING THE FUTURE OF THE STATE.

Not only are these excessive railroad rates and discriminations an unjust and barbarous affliction to those who are compelled to endure them now, but they are blighting the future of the State with a cureless evil. To keep hot the flues of Story County alone, tens of thousands of acres are being denuded of the grandest timber that ever lifted its wealth of green above the valleys. In a few years will vanish the snow-fed streams which now breathe their healthful balm upon the summer air, and deserts will crawl up to the feet of ravaged mountain sides, and with them curse the children of the men who made the land a desolation.

For these disappearing forests the owners of the Central Pacific Railroad are in a measure responsible. Years ago had they been grateful enough for what has been done for them to deliver Rocky Mountain coal in Reno at San Francisco rates, they would have taken every stick of wood from the furnaces of the Comstock, and saved from destruction hundreds of square miles of timber. Hence, I am warranted in saying that the passage and approval of the Reagan bill would be an important element in the legislation contemplated for the protection of the timber ranges of the Sierra Nevada Mountains.

HOW THE RAILROADS ATTEMPT TO JUSTIFY THEIR ROBBERIES.

When confronted with this array of outrages, what are the explanations offered by the overland railroad owners and their agents? I can answer the question, for I am somewhat familiar with their sophistries. They tell us that they are forced by the Eastern roads to discriminate against Nevada on through rates; that there is little or no profit in the carriage of freights from ocean to ocean, owing to the low rates compelled by water competition; and, finally, that their charges and discriminations are in accordance with commercial law.

The assertion that they are forced by the Eastern roads with which theirs connect to charge way rates back from San Francisco or Sacramento to points in Nevada cannot be properly classed, I think, among the frozen truths which sometimes sanctify the utterances of men. If I am correct, and I shall assume that I am, Mr. J. C. Stubbs, the general freight-agent of the Central Pacific, testified before a committee of the Nevada senate, in 1879, that these back rates collected in Nevada were not accounted for east of the Mississippi, but were apportioned and retained as follows: Central Pacific, twelve-twentieths; Union Pacific, eight-twentieths. I shall believe Mr. Stubbs.

They next tell us that their profits amount to little or nothing on through freights. If so, then, in the name of all the gods at once, where have they made their millions annually? As about one-half the Central Pacific road lies in Nevada, and its owners have derived but little profit from through carriage, it follows that in some manner the people of Nevada have been plundered annually of an amount equal to about one-half the profits of the road. This gives the explanation an ugly look, but I shall not stop to smooth down its unpleasant features.

The "commercial law" under which they find warrant for their depredations is a statute of their own creation. All recognized laws are founded in justice. Theirs is the law of piracy; the law of him whose business capital is a skeleton key and dark lantern. It is the law of lawlessness; the very law which it is the purpose of the Reagan bill to repeal; a law which, carried to its ultimate by aggregated arms instead of aggregated dollars, would make tramps of its authors along the rails of their own roads. When all other explanations fail the railroad owners and their feed advocates fall back behind that ridiculous defense which, for the lack of a better name, we may call the "long" and "short-haul" theory. The Commerce Committee have courteously listened to a volume of this kind of argument, if argument it may be called, during their patient consideration of this bill; and I especially request that no shadow of reproach to the intelligence of the distinguished gentlemen who compose that committee may be inferred when I express the opinion that the "long" and "short-haul" theory is still something of a mystery to them. And it could not well be otherwise, for its advocates know not what it means. But it must mean, if it means anything, that long hauls can be made cheaper per mile than short hauls. No one will deny this; yet, in the name of common sense, does it follow that the cost of transporting a car-load of freight is in the aggregate greater for a shorter than for a longer distance, and that railroad companies may therefore charge more dollars for moving a car-load of freight five hundred miles than for a thousand?

"Springes to catch woodcocks." Sophistry itself furnishes but an indifferent prop to an argument so feeble, and for support it is leaned against the audacious assumption that the growth of the West has been promoted by railroad discrimination. Wherever prosperity has been thus created it has been dishonest, fictitious, and in the end hurtful, for other communities have been robbed to secure it. Without the restraints of legislation it is doubtless possible for railroads connecting with the Atlantic seaboard to penetrate lands in the West, which five years ago were purchased at a dollar and a quarter per acre, and advance their value a hundredfold by giving their products the advantages of cheaper rates of carriage than are exacted from farmers farther east. The fact that the railroads possess this almost omnipotent power—that they are permitted to do what the Government itself cannot do, which is to lay unequal burdens of taxation on the several States—is an overwhelming argument in favor of the necessity of railroad restriction. According to their own admissions, these railroad princes have become our State-makers. It is at their feet that "the solemn tides of empire ebb and flow." They can make or unmake communities; destroy or commercially aggrandize whole sections; and yet we hesitate about taking from them these more than royal prerogatives.

This argument, then, briefly expressed is, that the prosperity of the West has been promoted through the cheap rates of "long hauls." At what degree of longitude does the railroad West begin, and where does it end? The State of Nevada is well toward the sunset. From the croppings of the Comstock can almost be heard the beating of the waves against the pillars of the Golden Gate; yet the only prosperity vouchsafed to us has been under the inspiration of double the rates charged from New York to San Francisco. And as for the "haul," ours is long enough, certainly, to entitle us to all the advantages of that seductive character of railway business; but the figures I have given show that the benefits of 2,500 miles of continuous carriage are not especially inviting.

The West of the railroads, like their "hauls," is a movable and indefinite point, meaning anything or nothing, to meet the exigencies of defenseless discriminations and drown the clamors of complaint.

It may perhaps be said that it seems scarcely reasonable that men should thus oppress the people, discourage the industries, and retard the growth and development of a State holding within its boundaries so many miles of their road. But, sir, the future of Nevada is nothing to them. They have another continental road which will soon be completed—a road which they are building on the spoil of back rates—and I cannot question that it is their purpose to adandon the old road for the new, whenever the maturity of its accumulating obligations will warrant the transfer of the property to the Government. They have made and are making no adequate preparations to meet the bonds guaranteed by the Government, and in the end the road will be permitted to go for its mortgages. Meantime, they will have sold their vast subsidies of lands, and are not over-anxious to pass with the transfer of the road the competing advantages of the trade of a populous and prosperous State.

Hence, their sole object is to make the most of the present, and their operations in Nevada show how well they are succeeding. The flight of their trains through the State is like the winging of vultures, and ruin stalks in the shadow of their boilers and sleeps beside their depots. The whistle of their locomotives through our narrow valleys is a scream of defiance, and the thunder of their wheels a mockery of commercial law and individual justice. Behind their smoking chariots, with heels bored, is being dragged the living body of the State. Shall tardy legislation like Priam come hereafter to beg the corpse for sepulture; or will Congress now stretch forth its hand and rescue the victim before life becomes extinct? And who are the men who have been made the victims of these especial corporate cruelties? Are they outcasts, felons, fugitives from prisons, who, recognizing no law themselves, should be judged and treated without the pale of law? No, sir! They are a part of that grand army of men who years ago became the State-makers of the Republic; who, with ax and rifle on their shoulders, plunged boldly into the wilderness, uncovering its riches, and blazing the ways for timid feet to follow. Strong arms and fearless hearts were their heritage, and their lives have been full of hardships and dangers. Many of them have gone down by the wayside, with no hand to help, no human voice to cheer, and their humble graves are found in the sands of the desert and under the shadow of the pines.

These, sir, are the men who, venturing beyond the reach of railroad competition, have been singled out as especial victims of unusual railroad greed. Had the overland roads been built by their owners, there would have been some poor excuse for these exactions; but when we consider that they were constructed by the Government, and paid for at almost double their value, the excess being absorbed by the directors themselves, it is difficult to refer with patience to the wrongs for which we are seeking a remedy.

HOW THE CENTRAL PACIFIC WAS BUILT.

Nor can the necessity of securing a fair return for the money invested by the Central Pacific Railroad owners be urged in explanation of their extraordinary charges. When they began the construction of the road they paid taxes in the aggregate on property of all kinds amounting to less than $150,000. To-day their railroad property alone, with the indebtedness standing against it deducted, is valued by them at the enormous sum of over one hundred and eighty-six million dollars. But it cannot be shown that they ever advanced money enough from their own pockets to build a single mile of the road. The bonds of the Government and the subsidies and gifts of the people were more than sufficient to build and stock the road entire.

The original incorporators paid in 10 per cent. on $1,000 a mile for one hundred and fifteen miles, the estimated distance from Sacramento to the Nevada line. Twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock were subscribed at $100 per share, of which Messrs. Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker took six hundred shares. Assuming, however, that they advanced the required 10 per cent. on all the shares subscribed, and their original investment did not exceed $12,500 all told. On this small investment the gentlemen have done well—so well, in fact, that in 1877 President Stanford reported the property of the Central Pacific to be worth $187,003,680.66, while Mr. Crocker, president of the Southern Pacific, valued the property of that road at $115,359,011.98, making a total valuation of $302,362,692.64. The indebtedness of the Central Pacific was given by Mr. Stanford at $85,391,350.64, and the indebtedness of the Southern Pacific was placed by Mr. Crocker at $30,415,332.95, making the total indebtedness of the two roads $115,806,683.59. The account then stood as follows:

Value of the property of both roads	$302,362,692 64
The indebtedness of both roads	115,806,683 59
Assets over liabilities	186,556,009 05

Independently of the United States bonds loaned to the Central Pacific, the gifts to the two roads amount to $91,011,280, according to the estimates of their executive officers. The net earnings of the roads are reported at $75,000,000. In reality they have been much larger, as their expenses, like their construction accounts, have afforded large margins of profits to their managers in other capacities.

A part of the wealth of these railroad gentlemen two years ago consisted of $54,000,000 of watered stock of the Central Pacific and $36,000,000 of the Southern Pacific, being an aggregate of $90,000,000 in stock, which cost them only the price of printing, and upon which they are compelling the public to pay them 8 per cent. yearly in dividends.

The Southern Pacific has been constructed and paid for from the earnings of the Central Pacific, yet the owners issue $50,000 in stock and $40,000 in bonds per mile, and charge such rates as will enable them to collect annually 8 per cent. on the stock and 6 per cent. on the bonds.

But, inviting as the subject may be, it is not my purpose now to inquire into the methods by which the owners of the Central Pacific have acquired their stupendous wealth. I have desired only to show that their extortions are as unnecessary as they are ungrateful and dishonest.

WHAT THE PEOPLE OF NEVADA WANT.

In relation to excessive charges and discriminations in Nevada—and I have not deemed it necessary to go beyond—I have presented facts which in no essential particular will be denied. I have submitted the printed rates and instructions authorizing these merciless charges, together with receipted bills showing that they have been collected. I have shown that instead of advancing the industries of the State, the railroads are sitting like an incubus upon the breast of enterprise and dwarfing the energies of the people with the paralysis of their almost boundless impositions; that for every dollar they collect legitimately for services performed they extort another in addition in the form of charges for services never rendered; that their discriminations extend to individuals as well as to communities, and that their favor frequently decides who shall succeed and who fail in business; that with a full knowledge of this merchants along the line of their road, fearing the penalties they have so often seen meted out, tell in whispers of the rates they pay and hesitate to exhibit their receipted railroad bills.

And in connection with these facts and statements I now make the assertion, based upon a reasonable estimate, that during the past ten years the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies have insolently and without explanation taken from the pockets of the people of Nevada $30,000,000 in gold more than they were justly entitled to, and for the collection of which they have had no authority more respectable in the eyes of fair-minded men than that of "Stand and deliver!"

All that the people of Nevada ask is that their freights from New York, Chicago, or Saint Louis may be delivered from two hundred and fifty to seven hundred miles east of the Golden Gate at San Francisco rates from the same points. Is this unreasonable? They are willing to pay for hundreds of miles of carriage which their freights never receive, but, in the name of humanity, they implore that they may be relieved of the additional burden of way rates back.

The Reagan bill will give them this relief. After the showing that I have made, will it be denied by this House? Let not the provisions of the bill be misunderstood. It speaks not of miles, but of distances, and provides simply that car-loads of the same classes of freights passing over interstate roads shall be subjected to charges no greater for a shorter than for a longer distance—not charges per mile, I repeat, but in the aggregate, without respect to miles.

This bill does not go far enough, but it will answer for the present as a compromise between unchecked discrimination and complete restraint, and railroad owners will do well if they accept it. It embodies but a part of the true principle of railroading, which is that charges for carriage should be the same per mile for the same classes of freights, irrespective of distance, with a reasonable allowance for handling freights when carried less than a certain number of miles.

Congress created the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, and has thereby made the Government a party to their acts. It is by the authority of their charters that for ten years they have exacted double rates in Nevada, and through the patronage of Congress they have been enabled to violate the laws of trade and set at defiance the decencies of commercial intercourse. Vainly may we look for relief in competition; in appeals for mercy; in popular or individual protest. The strong arm of that power alone which has rendered this railroad tyranny possible, must now be stretched forth either to curb or crush it.

PUBLIC RAILROADS ARE NOT PRIVATE PROPERTY.

I shall not consume much time in discussing the constitutional aspects of this most important of questions, or in referring to the relations between the railroad corporations and the political powers under which, and subject to which, they hold alike their being and their life. The decisions of the highest tribunals in the land, as well as the reasonable suggestions of common sense, warrant us in assuming without further question that corporations existing by virtue of special grants are entitled to special privileges just so long, and so long only, as they subserve the special purposes for which they were created.

Their roads are public highways, and not private property, and as such are as legitimately subject to the restraints of legislation as are toll-roads or private bridges, for the use of which tolls are exacted. The rolling-stock is theirs; the rails and the ties are theirs; the depots are theirs, to rent, sell, or give away; but the highways they have constructed through condemned private property and over the legal thoroughfares of the land can never cease to be the property of the public, for they become the estate of all through a sacrifice of private rights. This is a sacrifice which the State alone can command for its uses, and neither in its name nor by its authority can this prerogative be transferred, either directly or indirectly, to others.

The few who contend that railroads are private property, and as such beyond the control of legislation, attempt to sustain themselves with the assumption that, admitting the right of the law-making power to regulate railroad rates, there would then be nothing to prevent railroad corporations from being legislated into bankruptcy.

These railroad gentlemen are driving their tent-pins on high altitudes. It has been maintained by the Supreme Court, and properly, that if a State possessed the right to tax the securities of the General Government, then might it be taxed out of existence by State conspiracy. This position is based upon the theory of a supreme and indestructible central authority. Do our railroad autocrats claim exemption from legislative control on the ground that they too occupy a lofty plane beyond its constitutional reach? From their acts this presumption is reasonable. But the illustration is unfortunate, since it suggests the other extreme of unbridled railroad license. Say it were possible to legislate railroads into bankruptcy—a presumption too absurd to be seriously entertained—what, on the other hand, would there be to prevent railroad corporations, if unrestrained by legislation, from taxing communities and individuals to the very verge of ruin? The answer to this is, that competition may be relied upon to prevent excessive charges. True, where there is competition rates are usually satisfactory; but instead of competing with each other railroads have fallen into the more profitable habit of making a combined assault upon the public by agreeing upon rates and dividing the plunder. Hence, even where competition is possible it cannot be depended upon for the maintenance of reasonable rates. But competition is not always possible, and where not, what are the people to rely upon then? There are but few practicable railroad passes through the Sierra Nevada Mountains. What if there was but one? This would render competition impossible, and enable the overland roads connecting at Ogden to absorb in charges, unless checked by legislation, the entire profits of our continental commerce, whereas they now content themselves with about two-thirds.

I spoke a moment ago of the purposes of legislation in granting special privileges to railroad corporations—of the considerations urged in warrant of the concession of unusual franchises, trampling to some extent upon personal rights. These considerations are public convenience and increased commercial facilities between communities, and whenever a corportion fails to confer these benefits, its contract with the State falls equitably if not legally void, and its chartered rights, forfeited by every suggestion of fair dealing, revert to the people. Railroads not only fail to benefit but wantonly injure communities when they discriminate against them, and by the act their charters are annulled and their corporate privileges cease. If we cannot take away these violated charters, we can at least compel a better observance of the spirit of their provisions. We might in justice do more. In strict regard to our obligations we cannot possibly do less.

LEGISLATION MUST CONTROL RAILROADS, OR RAILROADS WILL CONTROL LEGISLATION.

With a community of interest steadily drawing them together in aggressive as well as defensive alliance, the railroad corportions of the country, representing a capital of over four thousand million dollars, and as a rule controlled by able but conscienceless men, have at length acceded to a commercial and political power as omnipotent in some of the States of this Union as it is dangerous to them all.

With this menace to personal rights and good government, and with justices upon the supreme bench openly justifying their usurpations, it has become the unquestioned duty of Congress—a duty so plain that it seems to me no member can safely disregard it, unless he is helmeted against his own conscience—to put an end to the encroachments of these overshadowing combinations, whose arms of steel, like the tentacles of the devil-fish, are taking a continent to their vast embrace.

And when should this duty be performed? Not next year, but this; not to-morrow, but to-day. We should not sleep until this gigantic power, growing bolder with its successes, shall have pinioned the arms of authority and stifled the voice of legislation. We are unshackled now, and may be able to do what the future might be powerless to accomplish. Therefore, let us act—act at once—and not leave to men who may be less resolute, and to events which may be less propitious, the performance of a duty already loo long neglected and plainly ours.

CONCLUSION.

It is in no spirit of personal unfriendliness to the managers of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies that I have made this showing of their misdemeanors. I have simply told a part of the simple story of the people of one of the States of this Union whose burdens have become well-nigh unendurable; and in the humility of a great grief I am here kneeling at the feet of legislation and imploring that relief for a brave and patient people which I believe the manhood and magnanimity of thirty-eight Christian Commonwealths will not deny.

APPENDIX A.

Special through freight tariffs in force February 1, 1877, to San Francisco, Sacramento, Marysville, San José, Stockton, and Oakland, California.

From—	Rate per hundred pounds.
	First class.	Second class.	Third class.	Fourth class.	Class A.	Class B.	Class C.	Class D.
New York	$6 00	$5 00	$4 00	$3 00	$2 50	$2 00	$1 75	$1 50
Cincinnati and Indianapolis	5 31	4 25	3 19	2 65	2 39	2 12	1 86	1 59
Chicago and Saint Louis	5 00	4 00	3 00	2 50	2 25	2 00	1 75	1 50
Omaha	4 50	3 75	2 75	2 25	2 00	1 85	1 70	1 50

CLASSIFICATION—NOTE IMPORTANT CHANGES.

[NOTE.—"D 1" indicates double first-class rates; "1½" one and one-half times first-class rates, and "3 t 1" three times first-class.]

A.

Acids	2
Advertising almanacs, circulars, pamphlets, and posters	4
Agricultural implements, owner's risk, in less than car-loads, as follows: Reapers, mowers, harvesting-machines, thrashers, plows, feed-cutters, and harrows	1
Metal appurtenances of agricultural implements, iron-work and castings of reapers and mowers, when K. D., in small quantities, apply machinery rates.
Seed-drills, corn-planters, cultivators, shovel-plows, fanning-mills, horse-rakes, and similar light and bulky machines	1½
Do., knocked down	1
Plows and harrows, knocked down and boxed	4
Agricultural implements, named above, in car-load of 20,000 pounds	A
Albums	2
Alcohol, in cans, boxed	A
Alcohol, whisky, highwines, and pure spirits, in wood, owner's risk of leakage	B
Alcohol, whisky, highwines, and pure spirits, in wood, shipped under valuation, $1 per gallon	C
Ale and beer, in glass or stone, packed	4
Ale and beer, in wood, owner's risk of leakage	A
Ale and beer, bottled or in wood, owner's risk of leakage, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	B
Alum, in barrels	D
Ammunition, fixed	1
Anchors	D
Anchovies	4
Andirons	4
Antimony	4
Anvils and anvil-dies	D
Apples, dried	4
Apple-parers	4
Argols	4
Artificial flowers and feathers	D 1
Asbestos	D
Augers, post-hole, boxed	4
Axes, without handles, in boxes	C
Axes, on handles	4
Axle-grease	B
Axles, carriage and wagon	C
Axles, car	D
Axle-clips	4

B.

Backing	C
Bacon, in boxes, barrels, or casks	4
Bacon, in sacks	3
Bacon, hams, and all cured and salted meats when not in regular packages, same as bulk meats.
Bags, paper	C
Bags and bagging, cotton, compressed, in bales, released	2
Bags and bagging, burlap, compressed, in bales, released	4
Bags and bagging, gunny, compressed, in bales, released	B
Baking-powders	A
Bark, extracts	4
Barley, pearl	4
Barometers	1
Barrels, empty	1
Barrels, knocked down or set up, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	D
Barytes	D
Base balls and bats	3
Baskets, willow	D 1
Baskets, splints, nested	1
Bath boilers, iron, rubber-coated, as machinery, boxed	2
Bath-brick	C
Bath-tubs	1
Bath-rims	1
Batts	1
Batts, compressed	2
Beans	4
Bed-plate of an engine, as machinery.
Beef and pork, (mess,) in barrels	4
Beef-tongues, as ham and bacon.
Bee-hives, prepaid	2
Beer, (see ale.)
Beeswax	4
Bedsteads and bunks, iron	1
Bed-slats, wooden, in bundles or packages	C
Bells, less than 100 pounds each	4
Bells, 100 pounds or over, each	3
Bellows, blacksmith	2
Belting, rubber	4
Belting, owner's risk, released from chafing	A
Belting, leather	3
Belting, leather, released	4
Benzine	A
Benzine, owner's risk of leakage and fire	C
Bird-cages, boxed	D 1
Billiard-tables, boxed, owner's risk	2
Billiard-tables, complete, including slate or marble, car loads of 20,000 pounds	3
Billiard-tables, woodwork of separate, without slate or marble	1½
Binder's boards	D
Bitters, in glass, owner's risk	4
Bitters, in glass, owner's risk, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	C
Bitters, in wood, same as liquors.
Blacking, in boxes and barrels	C
Blacking, liquid	C
Black lead, barrels and boxes	C
Blackboards, in racks and boxes	4
Bladders and sausage skins	1

Special through freight tariffs in force February 1, 1877—Continued.

Blankets in bales, released	2
Bleaching-salts	C
Blinds	1
Blowers	2
Blue vitriol, or blue stone	D
Blueing, liquid	4
Bobbins, wound	1
Bobbins, spools	A
Boats, not over twenty-six feet long	D 1
Boats, in sections	1
Boiler felting	3
Boiler flues, copper or brass	4
Boiler flues, iron	D
Boilers, not more than twenty-six feet long	1
Books	1
Books, blank	3
Boots and shoes, leather, strapped	1
Boots and shoes, leather, not strapped, $1 above first-class.
Bottles, empty, in crates or boxes, owner's risk	D
Bottles, druggists', fancy and nursing	A
Box stuff, in packages	C
Brackets, bronze, brass or fine metal	2
Brackets, wood or iron	4
Brandy peaches	5
Brass kettles	2
Brass, castings, sheet, wire, nails, and tacks	4
Brimstone	D
Bristles	D 1
Bristol board	A
Britannia-ware	1
Bronzing powder	1
Brooms	1
Broom-corn, compressed	3
Brushes	2
Buckets, nested	2
Buck saws and frames	4
Buckwheat	4
Buffalo robes	1
Buggies, taken apart and all parts boxed in tight cases, completely inclosing them	1½
Buggies, taken apart and inclosed in open boxes, crates or skeleton frames	D 1
Buggy bodies, in the white, in crates	D 1
Buggy reaches, in the white	4
Bulbs and roots, (must be prepaid)	1
Bulk meats	1
Bulk meats, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	3
Bungs, wood or iron	B
Burial cases, metallic	3
Burial cases, wooden	2
Burr blocks and millstones	4
Butter	2
Butter tubs	4
Butts, hickory	C
Butts, hinges, hooks, and staples, (if specified on receipt as such)	B
Buttons, pins, needles, hooks and eyes, buckles, and corset clasps	1

C.

Candles	D
Canned fruits and vegetables	D
Canned fish and meats	D
Canvas, in cases	1
Canvas, in bales	1
Canvas, in bales, owner's risk of chafing, released	2
Caps, percussion	1
Capstans	C
Cards, playing	4
Cardboard	A
Carpets, in cases	1
Carpets, in bales	1½
Carpets, in bales, owner's risk of chafing, released	1
Carpet lining	3
Carpet sweepers	2
Carriages, taken apart, wheels and poles taken off, and the carriage and all its parts packed in tight boxes completely inclosing them, if not too large to be loaded in a box car	1½
Carriages, taken apart, wheels and poles taken off, and the carriage and all its parts packed in tight boxes completely inclosing them, if too large to be loaded in a box car	D 1
Carriages, taken apart, wheels and poles taken off, and the carriage and all its parts packed in open boxes, crates, or skeleton frames, or covered with tarpaulin, if not too large to be loaded in a box car	D 1
Carriages, taken apart, wheels and poles taken off, and the carriage and all its parts packed in open boxes, crates, or skeleton frames, or covered with tarpaulin, if too large to go in a box car	3 t 1
Carriages, omnibusses, street-cars, buggies, and stages, released, in car-load lots, estimated at 20,000 pounds	3
Carriage castings	4
Carriage springs	B
Carriage and coffin trimmings, silver-plated	1
Car-wheels	D
Car-springs, rubber or steel, boxed	C
Car-springs, rubber or steel, in bundles, released	C
Car-springs, rubber or steel, in bundles, not released	A
Castor-oil, in cans, boxed	A
Celery salt	4
Cement, plaster, and stucco, in barrels	D
Chains	C
Chalk	4
Cheese	2
Chests of personal effects	1
Chicory	4
China-ware and porcelain, boxes or casks	2
Chocolate and cocoa	4
Churns	1
Churns, boxed or racked	2
Cider, same as liquors.
Cigars, packed in cases	D 1
Cigars, in cases, corded, sealed, and strapped	1
Cigar-molds	4
Citron	4
Clocks and weights	4
Clothes-pins, boxed	C
Clothes wringers and horses	4
Clothing, in cases	1
Clothing in bales	1½
Clothing, in bales, owner's risk of chafing, released	1
Coal-oil or petroleum, at owner's risk of leakage and fire	D
Coal-scuttles, nested	2
Cocoa and straw mattings and mats	4
Cocoa-nut, desiccated	4
Codfish, desiccated	4
Cod-liver oil	4
Coffee, in sacks	4
Coffee-mills, common, small, for family use	B
Coffee-mills, fine, grocers', with fly-wheels	2
Coffee extracts	4
Cologne spirits, in wood, same as liquors.
Coloring	4
Condensers	2
Condensing-tubes, iron	D
Comfortables, as dry goods.
Composition for roofing	D
Concentrated lye	C
Condensed milk	D
Confectionery	1
Copper—wire, nail, sheet, bolts, rods, rivets, and tacks	4
Copper, ingot	B
Copper bottoms, tubes, and pipes	4
Copper vessels	2
Copy-books, either impression copying books, or copy-books used in schools.	3
Copying-presses	A
Cordage	4
Cork and corks	1
Corn and corn-meal	4
Corn and corn-meal, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	D
Corn starch, prepared as food	A
Corner irons, or castings for trunks	B
Cornices, zinc or galvanized iron	1
Cotton, compressed	3
Cotton, uncompressed	1
Cotton, waste	4
Covers	1
Cove oysters	D
Cow-bells	4
Crackers	1
Cranberries, owner's risk only	3
Crayons	4
Cream of tartar	4
Crockery, in casks and crates	A
Crockery, in boxes and barrels	3
Croquet sets	3
Crowbars	C
Crucibles, black lead	4
Crucibles, clay	A
Currants, in casks, (original packages)	A
Curry-combs	4
Cutlery, pocket and table	2
Cutters, for cutting out boot and shoe soles	4

D.

Dates	4
Demijohns	1
Dental and surgical instruments	1
Dry goods, in cases	1
Dry goods, in bales	1
Dry goods, in bales, at owner's risk of chafing, released	2
Doors	2
Dressing-cases	1
Dried fruit, not otherwise specified	4
Drill-frames	1
Drugs and medicines	4
Drums, including all kinds, children's and musicians	D 1
Dumb-bells	4
Dye-stuffs, not otherwise specified	4

E.

Earthenware	B
This rate applies only on common dark earthen or stoneware of domestic manufacture. All whiteware should be rated as crockery.
Earth paints	D
Egg-beaters	4
Eggs, owner's risk	2
Emery	4
Emery-wheels, paper and cloth	4
Emigrant movables, including live stock, man in charge to pay emigrant fare from Council Bluffs, (must be prepaid)	A
Enameled cloth, as dry-goods.
Engines, steam and portable	2
Engines, steam and portable, car-loads, 20,000 pounds	4
Envelopes	4
Essential oils	1
Excavators	1½
Excavators, car-loads, 20,000 pounds	A
Excelsior	3
Excelsior cooking-utensils	1
Extract of beef	4

F.

Facing-sand	3
Fans, in boxes	1
Fancy goods, not otherwise specified	D 1
Farina	4
Faucets, brass or iron	4
Faucets, plated	1
Feathers, in bags	1½
Feather dusters	1
Felt	1
Figs	4
Files	4
Fire-arms, boxed	1

Special through freight tariffs in force February 1, 1877—Continued.

Fire brick and clay	B
Fire-works	1
Fire-extinguishers, boxed	2
Fish, pickled	3
Fish, pickled, released	4
If the difference between billed and correct weights is not more than 5 per cent., it will be considered the result of shrinkage in transit and no correction will be made.
Fish, dried and salted, boxed	4
Fishing-rods and tackle	1
Flavoring extracts	4
Flax	3
Florida water	4
Flour, buckwheat or other	4
Fluting-irons	4
Fluting-machines	2
Fly-paper	4
Fulling-mills	1
Forges	2
Forks, hay and manure	4
Forks, wooden, grain	2
Fountains, automatic, well boxed	1½
Fountains, automatic, well boxed, owner's risk, released	1
Fruit butter	4
Fruit-jars, empty, owner's risk	A
Fruit juice, not otherwise specified	4
Fruit jellies	4
Furnaces, for heating, same as stoves.
Furnaces, for smelting, as machinery.
Furnishing goods	1
Furniture, except chairs, as follows:
Set up, not boxed, not taken except in car-loads of 20,000 pounds.
Set up, well boxed	1
Knocked down, not compact, well boxed	2
If in bundles, knocked down, flat, and compact, finished	2
Finished or upholstered, knocked down, flat, and compact, well boxed	3
Black walnut or other valuable wood, in the white, not upholstered, knocked down, flat, and compact, well boxed	4
Same, crated or in bundles	3
Not black walnut or other valuable wood, in the white, not upholstered, knocked down, flat, and compact, well boxed	B
Same, crated or in bundles	A
School-desks, knocked down, flat, well boxed or racked	A
Chairs, set up, if completely boxed	1½
If set up in racks, released	D 1
Upholstered, knocked down, and well boxed, including ordinary upholstered chairs, barbers' and dental chairs, and iron-framed, invalid, and easy chairs	1
Not upholstered, made of black walnut or other valuable wood, knocked down, flat, and compact, if finished, well boxed	3
If finished, crated	2
If finished, in bundles, at owner's risk	1
If in the white, well boxed	4
If in white, crated or in bundles	3
Not consisting wholly or partially of black walnut or other valuable wood; cane seated; knocked down flat and compact, if finished and well boxed	B
If finished and crated	A
If finished in bundles, at owner's risk	4
If in the white, well boxed	C
If in the white, crated or in bundles	B
Any or all of the above-described chairs, with or without other furniture, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	B
Common kitchen wood-seated chairs, knocked down flat and compact, in either car-loads or smaller lots, if finished, well boxed	C
If finished, crated	B
If finished, in bundles, at owner's risk	A
If in the white, well boxed	D
If in the white, crated or in bundles	C
Iron theater-chairs	3
Furniture and chairs, consisting in part of black walnut or other valuable wood, will take the same rate as if consisting wholly of such wood.
Furniture and chairs having one or more coats of oil, shellac, varnish, paint, or other similar preparation, will take the rates provided for finished chairs.
The rates provided for chairs and furniture "in the white," will be applied only to chairs and furniture coming strictly under that designation.
Boxes must be tight and completely inclose the freight to entitle it to the rates provided for freight "well boxed." Open boxes will be considered same as crates.
Chair frames, iron, reclining	3
Furniture, including school, released, in car-loads, 20,000 pounds	B
Furniture castings	4
Furs	1
Fuse	1
Fuse, car-loads	3

G.

Galvanized ring-bolts, ship's clews, belay pins	B
Gang-plow irons	4
Gambia	4
Garden seeds	2
Gas fixtures and burners, boxed	2
Gas stoves, released	4
Gasoline	A
Gasoline, owner's risk of fire and leakage	C
Gas-pipe, iron	D
Gelatine	2
Ginger	4
Ginseng	A
Glass chimneys, in boxes and barrels	5
Glass, plate, not over 6 feet long, released	1
Glass, plate, over 6 feet long, released	D 1
Glass, rough	D
Glass signs	1
Glass garden-vases or flower-pots	A
Glassware, except chimneys and globes	A
Glass, window, not over 3 feet long	D
Glass, window, over 3 feet long	4
Glaziers' triangular points	1
Glue	4
Glycerine, less than 5,000 pounds	4
Glycerine, 5,000 pounds or more	B
Granite iron-ware, same as hollow-ware.
Grass and clover seed	3
Grass and hemp matting and mats	3
Grindstones	D
Grist-mills, iron, as machinery.
Gum, chewing	1
Gums, copal and shellac	4
Gum-kowrie	4
Gunpowder and other explosives not taken except by special contract.
Gun-stocks	4
Gun-wads	1
Guttering, copper and tin	4

H.

Hair, in sacks	1
Hair, compressed or in rope	2
Hair-oil	1
Hair goods, imitation	1
Hair, human	D 1
Hair-cloth, in cases	1
Hair-pins	1
Hames	4
Hams, same as bacon.
Hammers and hatchets	4
Hammocks	1
Handspikes	C
Handles, broom or mop without heads	D
Handles, ax and pick	B
Handles, drop, brass and ebony, used for bureaus, &c	4
Handles, plow, in the rough	4
Hardware, not otherwise specified	4
Harness, in boxes	1
Harrow-teeth	4
Hassocks and ottomans	1
Hats and caps, men's, straw, fur, or wool, in cases, strapped	1½
Same, not strapped	D 1
Hats, ladies', in case, strapped	1½
Same, not strapped	D 1
Hay-knives	4
Hay-presses	2
In car-loads, machinery rate.
Head-lights	2
Hearses, see vehicles
Hemp carpet	2
Hemp, in bales	3
Hempseed	3
Herring and bloaters, in boxes	3
Herrings, in kegs. (See fish, pickled.)
Hobby horses, knocked down	3
Hobby horses, set up	1½
Hoes and rakes	4
Hollow-ware, released	4
Hominy and grits	4
Hominy and grits, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	D
Honey	4
Hoop-skirts	1
Hoop-skirt wire	A
Hops, compressed	4
Horse-collars	1
Horse-nails, in bags	A
Horse-nails, in boxes	B
Horse-shoes	D
Horse-posts	A
Horse-powers, tread-mill	1
Horse-powers, circular	2
Hose-reels, knocked down and compactly boxed	2
Hosiery, as dry goods.
Household goods and personal effects, packed in trunks, prepaid	D 1
Household goods, not new furniture, well boxed, released, must be prepaid.	1
Household goods, car-loads of 20,000 pounds, must be prepaid	A
Hydraulic jacks and handles	4

I.

Ice-cream freezers	1
Indigo	2
Ink, in glass or stone, owner's risk	B
Ink, printing or other, in wood	C
Ink, printing, in cases	C
Ink-stands of crystal glass	1
Irish moss	2
Iron beams, columns, and girders, not over 27 feet long	B
Iron and coal facings	B
Iron, bar, band, or boiler	D
Iron.—All sheet or plate, band or hoop iron thinner than No. 12 (Birmingham wire-gauge) will take the rates provided for hoop and sheet iron. No. 12 plate and band iron, and all thicker grades, when shipped at owner's risk of injury from wet, will take Class D rate. No 12 Birmingham wire-gauge is the number applied to iron twelve one-hundredths of an inch in thickness. Iron thinner than this is described by a higher number.
Iron and steel, shoes and dies	D
Iron, furniture, carriage, wagon, and plow castings	4
Iron castings, not otherwise specified	2
Iron casters	4
Iron crowbars	C
Iron head-rests, photographers' use	3
Iron, hoop or sheet, except Russia or imitation	A
Iron, hoop or sheet, (except Russia or imitation,) released, at owner's risk of rust	C
Iron, malleable castings	4
Iron nuts and bolts, washers, and boiler-rivets	B
Iron rivets, other than boiler-rivets	4
Iron bolts, carriage, door, &c	4
Iron pipes and tubes	D
Iron pipe-fittings	B
Iron railing	A
Iron roofing	B
Iron shafts, wrought, not over twenty-seven feet long	3
Iron shutters	B
Iron vault fronts, linings, and facings	A

Special through freight tariffs in force February 1, 1877—Continued.

Iron, galvanized	4
Iron, galvanized, released	B
Iron garden vases and ornaments, owner's risk, released	A
Iron railroad chairs, spikes, splices, and bolts, taken only by special contract.
Iron wedges, in cases	C
Ironware, granite, same as hollow-ware.
Irons, soldering, well boxed	4
Iron screw-plates and dies	4
Iron safes, weighing three thousand pounds each, or less	4
Over three thousand pounds, and not exceeding six thousand pounds, each	3
Over six thousand pounds, each.	2
Iron sinks	4
Iron tubs, galvanized	1
Iron tubs, galvanized, nested	4
Isinglass	2
Ivory	1
J.
Jar rings	4
Japanned ware	1
Japanned tins, boxed	A
Jack screws	4
Jute and jute butts	4
K.
Knitting machines	2
L.
Ladders, not over fifteen feet long	1
Lampblack, casks or barrels	4
Lamp globes and shades	2
Lamps, lanterns, and fixtures	2
Lamp-posts, iron	B
Lard	4
Lasts, boxed	4
Lawn mowers	2
Lead, bar and sheet, in boxes	C
Lead bullets	4
Lead pipe, in casks	C
Leather	2
Leather belt-lacing	2
Leeches	4
Lemons and oranges, owner's risk, prepaid	2
Lemon peel	4
Lentiles	4
Licorice	4
Linen sets and collars, as dry goods.
Life rafts	D 1
Lignum vitæ	A
Lime water, in wood	4
Liquors, in glass, owner's risk of leakage	4
Liquors, in wood, owner's risk of leakage	A
Liquors, $1 per gallon valuation	C
Lithographic stones	2
Live plants and trees, boxed, prepaid	1
Live stock, at estimated weights as follows	1
Horses, mules, and horned animals, not valued at over one hundred dollars each—one, 2,000 pounds; two, 3,500 pounds; three, 5,000 pounds. Each additional animal, 1,000 pounds. Stallions, 4,000 pounds each.
The same when valued at more than $100 each, add to the rate 5 per cent. of the increased valuation.
Hogs, sheep, lambs, and calves, actual weight, but not less than three hundred pounds each.
Live stock (except blooded horses) shipped by special contract, in car-loads of not less than 20,000 pounds	3
At the above rate the owner is to enter into a contract, agreeing to feed, water, and take care of the stock at his own expense, and assuming all risk of injury or damage that the animals may do to themselves or each other.
In consideration of the above agreement, one man, in charge of the stock, will be passed free with a shipment of two or three car-loads; two men with four, five, or six car-loads; over six car-loads, three men.
No pass will be given with the shipment of one car-load, and no return passes will be given in any case.
Whenever the owner or man in charge requests or requires the use of a whole car for his animals, he will be charged the full car-load rate, though he has but one animal.
For blooded horses in car-loads, valued at over two thousand dollars to the car-load, add 5 per cent. of the increased valuation to the car-load rate.
Contracting agents are notified that the Pacific roads will not accept fictitious valuations, but the actual cash value of the animals must be stated.
Locks, exclusively of iron	B
Locks, iron, with brass bolts and keys	4
Locks, pad and prison	4
Locomotives and tenders, narrow gauge, on cars, taken only by special contract.
Locomotive tires	C
Looking-glasses, not over 6 feet long, released	1
Looking-glasses, over 6 feet long, released	D 1
Logwood	C
Lumber, hard and soft, less than car-load, not exceeding 16 feet in length	A
Lumber, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	C
M.
Macaroni and vermicelli	4
Machinery, coarse, not boxed, not otherwise specified	2
Machinery, fine, boxed	2
Machinery, fine, not boxed, not otherwise specified	1
Machinery, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	4
Machines, woodworking	2
Mahogany	A
Mallets and handles, wooden, boxed	4
Manilla, in bales	3
Mantels, iron and slate marbleized, including grates, not boxed, released	3
Mantels, boxed	4
In car-loads, same as stoves.
Maps, boxed	1
Map rollers	4
Maps, not mounted on cloth and not on rollers	3
Marble, wrought, owner's risk, (if lettered must be prepaid)	B
Marble, unwrought, owner's risk	D
Marble dust, in barrels	D
Mast hoops	4
Matches	4
Matches, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	B
Match-safes, bronzed iron	4
Mattresses and spring beds, and bottoms	1½
Mattresses, wire and spring beds and bottoms, knocked down or rolled together so as to form a compact package	2
Mats and rugs, not otherwise specified	1
Medicines, patent	4
Meat choppers	3
Merchandise.—Shippers are requested to give full description of contents of packages. All articles described as merchandise will be charged double first-class rates.
Metallic cartridges	1
Metallic soda-bottle tops	3
Meters	2
Miller hooks, buffers, links, pins, and other attachments, truck frames, equalizers, brake shoes, and railroad draw-bars	4
Millinery and straw goods	D1
Mills, bark, cider, feed, corn, and paint	2
Mineral waters, in glass or stone, packed, owner's risk, prepaid	4
Mineral waters, in wood, owner's risk of leakage, prepaid	C
Mince-meat	2
Molasses, owner's risk leakage	C
Monuments and headstones, cast zinc	A
Monuments and headstones, cast zinc, released	B
Money-drawers, in nests or boxed	4
Mops, in bundles	4
Moss, in barrels	1
Moss, pressed in bales	3
Moss and excelsior, when used as packing to protect furniture, same rate as the furniture. This applies only when in sufficient quantities to protect and no more, and does not include hair or feathers.
Moldings, either wood, iron, papier-maché, or gilt	4
Mower knives and sickles	4
Musical instruments not otherwise specified	1
Mucilage and mucilage bottles, with caps and brushes	3
Mustard seed, in bags or casks	4
Mustard, ground	4
N.
Nails, in boxes	B
Nails and spikes, cut, in kegs	D
Nails, iron and brass shoe	4
Nails, yellow metal	4
Naphtha	A
Naphtha, owner's risk of leakage and fire	C
Narrow-gauge cars, taken only by special contract.
Nets, fishing	1
Newspaper files	1
Nickel-plated goods	1
Nutmegs	2
Nuts, in barrels, boxes, or bags	3
O.
Oakum, in bales	B
Oars	4
Oil-cloth, floor, boxed, not over 12 feet long	B
Oil-cloth, floor, boxed, over 12 feet long	2
Oil-cloth table covers, as dry goods.
Oil, in glass, owner's risk	4
Oil, (not otherwise specified,) in cans, boxed, or in barrels and casks, owner's risk of leakage	B
Oil-stones	4
Oil-tanks, in crates	1½
Oil-tanks, completely boxed	1
Organs, church	1½
Oysters in shell, in barrels, owner's risk, prepaid	4
Ox bows and yokes	4
Ox goads	4
P.
Packing, rubber and other	A
Pails, nested	2
Paintings and pictures, owner's risk, valued at not over $200 per package	1
Paintings and pictures valued at over $200 per package, not taken.
Paints in boxes, not otherwise specified	B
Paints, assorted cakes of water-colors	1
Paints, in glass, boxed	4
Paints, white lead or zinc, dry or in oil, in kegs or cans, boxed	C
Empty kegs with a car-load of white lead	C
Paper collars, cuffs, and bosoms, boxed	1
Paper collars and cuffs, flat and compact	3
Paper, gilt, fancy writing, or note	1
Paper, drawing, mounted on cloth	1
Paper, medicated	4
Paper, posters	4
Paper, tissue	B
Paper, blotting	B
Paper, blotting, printed	3
Paper, flat in boxes, not ruled or printed	A
Paper, printed or ruled	3
Paper, news, printing, in bales or bundles	C
Paper, news, printing, in bales or bundles, released	D
Paper hangings, in boxes	A
Paper, roofing and building, uncolored	D
Paper, building, tinted for inside walls, &c	A
Paper carpetings, or imitation oil-cloth	3
Paper, straw, wrapping	D
Paper, wrapping, manilla and hardware	C
Paper, for covering trunks	A
Paper, paper goods, and paper ware, not otherwise specified	1
Pasteboard	A
Paraffine and spermaceti	A
Pease	4
Pedestals, cast iron	A
Peg scrapers	4
Pen racks	1

Special through freight tariffs in force February 1, 1877—Continued.

Perfumery	1
Pepper	3
Photographic goods	1
Photographic cardboard	A
Phosphorus, not taken.
Pianos, organs, and melodeons, boxed	1
Piano stools, boxed	2
Pickles, preserves, and sauces	4
Picks and mattocks, iron, boxed	C
Picture frames, boxed	1
Pigs' feet and sausage	3
Pill boxes	4
Pipes, clay	4
Pipes, other	1
Pitch, owner's risk	D
Plaster of Paris ornaments, released	1
Plated ware	1½
Plow beams, iron, steel, or wood	4
Plow beams, in the rough	B
Plow castings	4
Plow points	4
Plumbago	C
Pocket stoves	2
Pork, dressed, owner's risk, prepaid	3
Portmanteaus, satchels, and valises, boxed	1
Potash, in boxes, barrels, or casks	C
Potatoes	4
Potted ham	4
Poultry, dressed, owner's risk, prepaid	1
Poultry, live, car-loads, 20,000 pounds	3
Less quantities not taken.
Printers' cases, racked	4
Printers' iron frames	3
Printing-presses	3
Prunes, in casks, (original packages)	A
Prunes, boxed	4
Prunes, canned in liquid, hermetically sealed	D
Prunes, when packed dry, in tin cans, not hermetically sealed, or if in glass jars	4
Prune-juice	C
Pulleys and blocks	4
Pumps, hand, released	4
Pumps, steam or hydraulic	2
Pump-valves	4
Pumicestone	4
Putty	D

Q.

Quicksilver, in flasks	4
Quicksilver flasks, empty	4
Quicksilver flasks, car loads	D
Quilts	1

R.

Rags, in bales	4
Rags, in sacks	2
Raisins, strapped	4
Rattan, reeds, and willows	1
Razor straps	2
Refrigerators and water-coolers	2
Regalias	1
Resin, owner's risk	D
Retorts, clay	3
Retorts, clay, owner's risk, released	A
Ribbons	1
Rice	C
Rice starch	A
Rollers, as machinery or castings, to be judged by inspection.
Roofing, felt	A
Ropes, exceeding one inch in diameter	C
Ropes, one inch or less in diameter. (See Cordage.)
Rubber, boots, shoes, clothing, and goods not otherwise specified	4
Rubber hose, in bales	4
Rubber hose, in cases	B
Rubber hose, in bales, released	A
Rubber caps	C
Russia sheet-iron, or imitation	1
Russia sheet-iron, or imitation, released, owner's risk of wet	2

S.

Saddlery	1
Saddlery hardware	4
Saddles	1
Sad-irons	B
Safes, milk and cheese	1½
Same, at owner's risk chafing	1
Saleratus	A
Salts, epsom, in barrels	A
Saltpeter	A
Sal-soda	A
Sand, except "facing"	4
Sandpaper	4
Sardines	B
Sash cords	4
Sash weights, boxed	D
Sash, doors and blinds, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	B
Sauer kraut	4
Saws, on board	2
Saws, boxed	4
Saw-frames	4
Scales and scale beams, boxed	A
School slates, boxed	B
Scrapers, road	4
Scrapers, car-loads, 20,000 pounds	A
Screws	4
Scythes	4
Scythe snaths	4
Scythe stones	4
Seed, not otherwise specified	2
Seed sowers	1
Sewing-machines, boxed	2
Sewing-machines, knocked down and boxed	4
Sewing-machines, in racks	1
Sewing-machines, wood-work, when separate, in boxes	2
Sewing-machine heads, when separate, in boxes	2
Sewing-machines, (castings of,) when separate, in boxes	B
Parts of sewing-machines when all shipped together may come forward with the castings and wood-work, packed in separate boxes, at fourth-class rate.
Shawls, as dry goods.
Sheep-shears	4
Sheep soap	4
Sheet music	1
Shipping tags	A
Ship and boot spikes	D
Shoe-thread	1
Shoe pegs and nails, iron or brass	4
Shoe-findings	1
Shot, in kegs and boxes	C
Shovels and spades, owner's risk	4
Show-bills advertising	4
Show-cards	1
Show-cases, owner's risk	D 1
Shuttles	1
Sickles	4
Sieves and rims	1
Silk goods, in boxes	1
Skins, sheep, goat, or deer, &c	2
Skiving-machines, as machinery.
Slate-pencils	1
Slate, roofing, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	D
Sledges, with handles	4
Sledges, without handles	C
Snuff, boxes and barrels	2
Soap, common, lots of 5,000 pounds or over	D
Soap, common, lots less than 5,000 pounds	B
Soap, fancy, castile or imitation castile	4
Soap, (except castile or imitation,) when in bars, same as common soap.
Soapstone	3
Soda, in kegs and boxes	A
Soda caustic	C
Soda-fountains	1
Spectacle-glasses and optical goods	D
Spelter and solder	B
Spices	3
Spirits turpentine, in barrels or cases, owner's risk of leakage	C
Sponges	1½
Sponges, compressed in bales	1
Spring bars, in the white	4
Springs, rubber, as car springs.
Springs, steel	B
Springs, wire, in boxes or casks	4
Squares	4
Stamped ware, (articles each made from a single piece of metal without solder)	B
Stair-rods	2
Stamps, for stamping impression for office use	2
Starch	D
Stationery	1
Statuary, owner's risk, valued at not over $200 per package	1
Statuary, valued at over $200 per package, not taken.
Staves, headings, and shooks	4
Staves, headings, and shooks, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	D
Steam ganges and indicators	2
Steam-drums, as machinery.
Steel, cases and bundles	B
Steel wedges	4
Steel shanks, for boots and shoes	4
Stirrups	4
Stoneware. (See earthenware.)
Stoves, ranges, registers, radiators and reservoirs, released	4
Stoves, ranges, registers, radiators, reservoirs, stove furniture and hollow-ware, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds, owner's risk of breakage	B
Stove-pipe and elbows, in crates or boxes	1
Stove-castings, bundles, released	4
Stove-castings in boxes	B
Stove-polish	C
Straw boards	D
Straw, saw-dust, and tan-bark, used to protect property in box-cars	D
Sugar	C
Sugar-cane	1
Sugar, maple and lemon	3
Sugar, grape	A
Sulphur, flour of	4
Sulphur, roll	D
Sumac	A
Swords	1
Sirup, released, owner's risk of leakage	C
Sirup, maple, owner's risk of leakage	3
Sirups and coloring, in wood, not molasses	3

T.

Tacks	A
Tallow	B
Tar, owner's risk	D
Tassels, cord, &c	1
Tea	1
Teazles	1
Telegraph instruments	1
Telegraph insulators	4
Telegraph-battery material	4
Telegraph cable	4
Thread	1
Thread cabinets	1
Tiling, marble or slate	D
Tiling, earthen, fancy	4
Tin-foil, boxed	4
Tin-pans and covers, nested	A
Tin-plate	D
Tin-plates, nested	B
Tin, pig or bar	C
Tin tubes and pipes	1

Special through freight tariffs in force February 1, 1877—Continued.

Tinned spoons	4
Tin-waiters, boxed	A
Tinware, boxed	1
Tinners' trimmings	4
Tire benders	4
Tobacco, manufactured	2
Tobacco, manufactured, released	3
Tobacco, leaf, domestic	3
Tobacco, leaf, domestic, released	B
Tobacco, leaf, foreign	3
Tool chests, mechanics'	2
Tools, edge	4
Toothpicks	4
Tow	4
Towel-racks	4
Toys, boxed	1
Traps, animal	4
Trucks	3
Trunks, empty or filled, released	D 1
Trunks, when completely boxed, rate on actual contents.
Truss hoops, not too large to be loaded in box-car	3
Tubs, nested	2
Turbine-wheels	A
Twine, in cases or barrels	3
Twine, in bales	2
Twine, in bales, owner's risk chafing, released	3
Twine, fish-net, linen	1
Type or type-plate, in boxes	4
Type-writers, as fine machinery.
U.
Umbrellas, boxed	1
Underwear, as dry goods.
V.
Varnish, owner's risk of leakage	B
Vases, China, bronze, or Bohemian glass, as chinaware.
Vault lights	D
Vegetine	4
Vehicles of all kinds, not boxed, set up, owner's risk of chafing, fire, weather, and breakage, at estimated weights, as follows:	1
Stage-coaches, omnibuses, hearses, carriages, hacks, and extra large wagons or sleighs, five thousand pounds each.
An ordinary two-horse express wagon, buggy, or sleigh, three thousand pounds each.
A one-horse buggy, chaise, cab, cart, wagon, or sleigh, with top, twenty-five hundred pounds each.
Same, without top, two thousand pounds.
A gig or sulky, fifteen hundred pounds.
An ordinary one or two horse wagon or buggy, without top, cart or sleigh, taken apart so as to be loaded in a box-car, fifteen hundred pounds each.
A two-horse peddler's wagon, 3,000 pounds.
A one-horse peddler's wagon, 2, 500 pounds.
Fire-engines, hand, each, 4,000 pounds.
Fire-engines, steam, each, 8,000 pounds.
Hose-carts, each, 1,500 pounds.
Street-cars, one-horse, 6,000 pounds.
Street-cars, two-horse, 8,000 pounds.
Fire-engines and fixtures, hook-and-ladder trucks, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	3
Velocipedes, knocked down, boxed	1
Verdigris	4
Veneering, boxed	4
Vinegar	C
Violins and cases, boxed	1½
Vises	A
W.
Wadding	1
Wagons, children's, set up	D 1
Wagons, children's, knocked down and boxed	3
Wagons, common, in pieces	1
Wagon fellies, spokes, and hubs	B
Wagon rims and bows, bent	4
Wagon rims and bows, bent, released	B
Wagon whiffletrees	B
Wagon single and double trees	B
Wagon and carriage wheels, poles, and shafts	1
Wagon poles and shafts, rough	4
Wagons—ordinary farm wagons—without springs, car-loads of 20,000 pounds.	A
Smaller lots, taken apart, wheels and poles taken off, actual weight	1
Spring wagons, car-loads of 20,000 pounds, not released	3
Car-loads, of 20,000 pounds, released, at owner's risk of chafing	4
Smaller lots. (See Vehicles.)
Mixed car-loads of ordinary farm wagons and spring wagons will take the rate provided for spring wagons in car-loads.
Wagons, Concord, knocked down and boxed, same as carriages knocked down and boxed.
Wagons, Concord, set up same as stage coaches.
Wagons, express, knocked down so as to be loaded in a box car, shall be classed same as buggies and carriages knocked down and boxed.
Wagons, in car-loads; shippers frequently load with these wagons kegs of nails. In all such cases charge car-load rate on 20,000 pounds of wagons and tariff rate on actual weight of the nails.
Wagon, castings, not otherwise specified	4
Wagon skeins	B
Warp	2
Washboards, boxed	4
Washing-machines, boxed	2
Watch crystals	D 1
Water-closet sinks, iron	4
Water-closet sinks, crockery	3
Wax	4
Weather-strips, boxed	4
Webbing	1
Whalebone, manufactured	1
Wheelbarrows, knocked down	A
Wheelbarrows, set up	3
Whips, boxed	1
Whiting	C
Wicking	1
Willow-ware	D 1
Wind-mills	1
Wind-mills, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	4
Windlasses, as machinery.
Windlasses, ship, same as capstans.
Window-shades	1
Wine, in boxes and baskets	4
Wire, coppered	B
Wire, copper or brass	4
Wire cork-fasteners	4
Wire, bonnet	1
Wire cloth and netting boxed	4
Wire goods	1
Wire, fence	B
Wire, barbed fence	4
Wire fencing	4
Wooden-ware, boxed	4
Wooden ironing-boards	4
Wood skewers	4
Wood pipe	4
Wool, compressed	2
Woolen goods, in cases	1
Woolen goods, in bales	1½
Woolen goods in bales, owner's risk of chafing, released	1
Wrenches	4
Y.
Yarn, in cases	1
Yeast-powders	A
Yeast-cakes	A
Yellow metal	D
Z.
Zinc, sheet, in casks or boxes	B
Zinc paints	C
Zinc plates, stamped and Japanned	4
Zinc, slab	B

APPENDIX B.

Special freight tariff for freight consigned to Winnemucca, Wadsworth, Reno, Virginia City, and Carson, Nevada, and Truckee and Colfax, California, to take effect Monday, October 29, 1877.

NOTE.—Freight for the points named below may be contracted through to destination, by adding to the through rates given in the tariffs dated February 1, 1877, the amounts stated below.

[Rates in cents per hundred pounds, United States currency, to be added to the through rates given in the tariffs dated February 1, 1877, subject to the rules and conditions of such tariffs respecting weights and dimensions to be loaded in one car.]

Articles.	Winnemucca.	Wadsworth.	Reno.	Virginia City and Gold Hill.	Carson.	Truckee.	Colfax.
All articles not otherwise named	$2 08	$1 43	$1 18	$1 59	$1 49	$0 91	$0 40
A.
Acids, owner's risk	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Agricultural implements, owner's risk of chafing and ordinary breakage, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
At company's risk	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
In less than car-loads, owner's risk, as follows:
Reapers and mowers	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Threshing and harvesting machines	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Plows, feed-cutters, and harrows	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Seed-drills, corn-planters, cultivators, shovel-plows, fanning-mills, smut-machines, horse-rakes, cider and wine mills, and similar light and bulky machines	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Knocked down and boxed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Gang-plows, each	13 90	7 95	6 15	8 25	7 70	4 65	2 10
Antimony, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26

Special freight tariff for freight consigned to Winnemucca, &c.—Continued.

Articles.	Winnemucca.	Wadsworth.	Reno.	Virginia City and Gold Hill.	Carson.	Truckee.	Colfax.
B.
Barrels or casks, empty, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	$1 38	$0 95	$0 77	$1 19	$1 08	$0 60	$0 26
Baskets	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Bath-tubs	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Batting or batts	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Bacon, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Band-boxes	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Bee-hives	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Bees, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	80	70	33	17
In less quantities not taken.
Beef and pork, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Benzine, or benzole, same as coal-oil.
Bellows	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Billiard-tables, boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Bird-cages	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Blue vitriol, or blue stone, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 16	1 08	60	26
Boats, not over twenty-eight feet long	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Over twenty-eight feet long by special contract.
Boilers, steam, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds, loaded and unloaded by the owner or at his expense	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads, loaded and unloaded by owner or at his expense	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Borax, refined, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Crude, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	80	70	33	17
Crude, less than car loads	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Borate of lime, crude soda or ermal, in car loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	80	70	33	17
Less than car-loads	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Brimstone, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Brick, fire, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Brooms, bundled or packed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Broom-corn, bundled or baled	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Loose not taken.
Bran, (see mill stuff.)
Burning fluid, same as coal-oil.
Buckets, loose or nested	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Bulbs and roots, well packed, prepaid	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Burial cases, metal or wood, boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Buggies, knocked down and completely boxed or framed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Buckwheat, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Bulk meat, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
C.
Candles, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 56	1 49	91	40
Carwheels	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Camphene, same as coal-oil.
Carboys, empty, estimated weight 100 pounds each	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Carriages, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads, knocked down and completely boxed or framed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Cars, horse railway. (See Vehicles.)
Cars, railroad, on their own wheels, by special contract.
Cars, railroad, not on their own wheels, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 03	60	26
Less than car-loads by special contract.
Cauldron kettles	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Cartridges, metallic, if well packed and name of contents plainly marked on outside of package	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Caps, percussion, same as cartridges.
Carpets, in bales, released or unreleased	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Cement, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 13	1 08	60	26
Charcoal, in sacks	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Chicory, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
China baskets and contents at owner's risk	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Children's sleds or sleighs, cabs or wagons, (not toys,) set up	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Knocked down and boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Cigars, in cases, (if not well boxed not taken)	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Clothing, in bales, released or unreleased	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Coal and carbon oil, owner's risk of fire or leakage and company's convenience, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 56	1 49	91	40
Less quantities	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Corn and corn meal, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Cotton, car-loads, (freight in all cases to be charged on 20,000 pounds)	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
In less than car-loads as follows:
If compressed in bales so that about 20,000 pounds can be loaded in one car	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
If not compressed as above, or if in sacks	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Copper vessels, unless nested and packed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Nested and packed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Cornices, zinc or galvanized iron	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Cordage, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Crucibles, blacklead or clay	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
If well packed in casks	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
D.
Demijohns	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Doors, fine, boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Doors, sash, and blinds, straight or mixed lots, 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Door and window frames	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Dry goods, in bales or trunks, released or unreleased	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Dry goods, in boxes	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
E.
Eggs, well packed, owner's risk	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Not well packed, not taken.
Emigrants' movables. (See Household goods.)
Engines, steam and portable, including boiler, loaded and unloaded by owner, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Engines, steam and portable, including boiler, loaded and unloaded by owner, in less quantities	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Excavators, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Excelsior, well baled, owner's risk of fire, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Less than car-loads	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
F.
Feathers and feather-beds	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Fire clay, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	49	33	28	69	58	22	16
Fire-crackers and fire-works, securely packed, owner's risk and company's convenience	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Fowls, live, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	80	70	33	17
Crates and coops	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Furniture, including school and cabinet ware, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42

Special freight tariff for freight consigned to Winnemucca, &c.—Continued.

Articles.	Winnemucca.	Wadsworth.	Reno.	Virginia City and Gold Hill.	Carson.	Truckee.	Colfax.
G.
Gasoline, same as coal-oil.
Glass, plate, under eight feet long, well boxed, owner's risk	$2 98	$1 59	$1 23	$1 65	$1 54	$0 93	$0 42
Over eight feet long, by special contract.
Grain, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 40	1 40	83	34
Grape cuttings, same as shrubbery.
Gunpowder, transported only by special contract.
Giant powder and other nitro-glycerine explosives not taken by Union Pacific Railroad.
Gypsum, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	80	70	33	17
H.
Hair, in sacks or barrels	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Compressed, in bales or in rope	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Hats and caps	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Hay and wool-presses, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads, set up	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Less than car-loads, knocked down	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Hams, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Hops, baled	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Hominy and grits, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Household goods (including old furniture, emigrants' movables, utensils, kitchen and farm, comprising the plunder of a family moving, and domestic animals) in mixed lots, car-loads of 20,000 pounds.	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Less than car-loads, if boxed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
If not boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Household goods will not be received for transportation unless well boxed, or the company is released from all liability for breakage or chafing resulting from shipments without boxing.
I.
Iron, pig, bar, band, or boiler, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 16	1 08	60	26
Less than car-loads	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Iron castings, heavy, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Frail, boxed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Frail, not boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Settler bottoms, mining pans, pan shoes, and dies	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Battery shoes and dies	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Iron, railroad, by special contract.
Sheet, common	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Sheet, Russia	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Iron pipe, car-loads of 20,000 lbs	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 47	1 40	83	34
Less than car loads, as follaws:
Cast-iron pipe	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Sheet-iron and asphaltum pipe	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Iron water-wheels	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
K.
Kerosene, same as coal-oil.
L.
Liquors and liquids, in demijohns, (not taken unless completely boxed,) owner's risk	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
In jars or china baskets, owner's risk	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Wines	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Whisky	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Live plants and trees, boxed, prepaid	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Live stock, taken only under contract wherein the shipper agrees to feed, water, and take care of the stock at his own expense, and assumes all risk of injury or damage the animals may do to themselves or each other, and stipulates that in case damage occurs for which the carrier may be liable the actual value at date and place of shipment shall constitute the measure of damages to be collected from the carrier, provided that in no case shall it exceed: for stallions, $200; horses, $100; mules, $65; cattle, $50; and other animals $20 per head.
In car-loads of 20,000 pounds, as follows:
Horses, mules, and horned animals	64	47	39	90	55	33	17
Hogs, in single-deck cars	64	47	39	49	55	33	17
Hogs, in double-deck cars	96	71	59	74	83	50	26
Sheep, in single-deck cars	54	40	33	06	49	28	15
Sheep, in double-deck cars	81	60	50	55	74	42	22
In less than car-loads, as follows:
One horse, mule, or horned animal, (charge for the animal)	41 60	28 60	23 60	31 80	29 80	18 20	8 00
Charge for two horses, mules, or horned animals	72 80	50 05	41 30	55 65	52 15	31 85	14 00
Charge for three horses, mules, or horned animals	104 00	71 50	59 00	99 50	74 50	45 50	20 00
For each additional animal, add	20 80	14 30	11 80	15 90	14 90	9 10	4 00
Stallions and breeding bulls double the above amount.
One mare and sucking colt	52 00	35 75	29 50	39 75	37 25	22 75	10 00
One cow and sucking calf	52 00	35 75	29 50	39 75	37 25	22 75	10 00
Colts and cattle under one year old, one-half live-stock rates.
Hogs, each	6 24	4 29	3 54	4 77	4 77	2 73	1 20
Calves, each	10 40	7 15	5 90	7 95	7 45	4 55	2 00
Sheep and lambs, each	4 16	2 86	2 36	3 18	2 98	1 82	80
In no case will the charges on less than a car-load of stock be extended in a sum greater than the car-load rate.
Looking-glasses, under eight feet long, well boxed, owner's risk	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Over eight feet long, by special contract.
Locomotive engines, on their own wheels, man in charge, to pass free one way, by special contract.
Not on their own wheels, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds, same as machinery.
Less than car-loads by special contract.
Lumber, lath, and shingles, straight or mixed lots, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	76	56	17	13
Lumber and timber of any length requiring more than one car for support, unless loaded with short lumber, making full car-loads	2 60	1 79	1 48	1 89	1 79	1 14	50
M.
Machinery, car-loads of 20,000 pounds, owner's risk	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 47	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads, properly packed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Marble, wrought or finished, plain or lettered, owner's risk, well boxed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Not boxed, owner's risk	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Marble, in blocks or slabs, rough, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	49	33	28	69	58	22	16
Mattresses and spring beds and spring-bed frames	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Matches, well packed, with name of contents plainly marked on outside of package	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Meats, salted or cured, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Moss	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Musical instruments (except pianos and organs) boxed	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Not boxed, not taken.
N.
Nails, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 56	1 49	91	40
Naphtha, same as coal-oil.
Nitro-glycerine will not be received for transportation under any circumstances whatever.
Niter, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 16	1 08	60	26

Special freight tariff for freight consigned to Winnemucca, &c.—Continued.

Articles.	Winnemucca.	Wadsworth.	Reno.	Virginia City and Gold Hill.	Carson.	Truckee.	Colfax.
O.
Oil, coal, &c. (See Coal-oil.)
Ornaments, plaster, bronze, and terra-cotta, well boxed	$2 98	$1 59	$1 23	$1 65	$1 54	$0 93	$0 42
P.
Paintings and pictures, well boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Not boxed not taken.
Paper-hangings, boxed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Bundles	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Pianos, organs, and melodeons	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Picture-frames	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Pitch, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Plaster, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 13	1 08	60	26
Plow points and shares, same as frail castings.
Poultry, dressed, prepaid	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Pulu, in bales	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
R.
Rags in bales, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	80	70	33	17
Less than car-loads	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Resin, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Rope, two inches in diameter and over, unless securely boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
If boxed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Rope and cordage, car-loads of 20,000 pounds, owner's risk of chafing	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
S.
Sewing-machines, knocked down and boxed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Set up	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Show-cases, must be well boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Shrubbery, hot-house plants, &c., loose, owner's risk, prepaid	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Closely packed in bundles, owner's risk, prepaid	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Smoke-stacks	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Soda, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 16	1 08	60	26
Spirits of turpentine, (same as coal-oil.)
Statuary, iron, bronze, or marble, boxed, owner's risk, prepaid	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Staves and heading, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	80	70	33	17
Stone in blocks, dressed or rough, car-loads of 20,000 pounds, owner's risk	49	33	28	69	58	22	16
Stone or earthenware, car-loads of 20,000 pounds, owner's risk	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads, properly packed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Loose, not taken.
Stoves, ranges, registers, radiators, and reservoirs, car-loads of 20,000 pounds, owner's risk	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads, owner's risk	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Stove pipes and elbows	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Stove-plates, same as frail castings.
Sulphur, car-loads of 20,000 lbs	1 38	95	77	1 16	1 08	60	26
T.
Tallow, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Tar, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 38	95	77	1 19	1 08	60	26
Telegraph-poles, by special contract.
Tinware, boxed or in barrels	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Loose, not taken.
Tiling, floor and roof, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	80	70	33	17
Less than car-loads, if boxed	2 08	1 43	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
Less than car-loads, if not boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Tiling, drain, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	49	33	28	69	58	22	16
Less than car-loads	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Tobacco, in caddies, drums, or pails	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Toys, well packed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Trees, fruit and shade, owner's risk, prepaid, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	64	47	39	80	70	33	17
Less than car loads, owner's risk, prepaid, closely packed in bundles or boxes	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Loose, not taken.
Trunks, empty or filled	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Turbine-wheels	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
V.
Valises, same as trunks.
Vehicles of all kinds, not otherwise provided for, securely boxed, actual weight	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Car-loads of 20,000 pounds, owner's risk of chafing	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Of all kinds, not boxed, set up, owner's risk, as follows:
Stage coaches, omnibuses, and extra large wagons and sleighs	104 00	71 50	59 00	79 50	74 50	45 50	20 00
An ordinary two-horse carriage, hack, wagon, or sleigh	62 40	42 90	35 40	47 70	44 70	27 30	12 00
A one-horse buggy, chaise, cab or wagon, with or without top	41 60	28 60	23 60	31 80	29 80	18 20	8 00
A gig, cab, or sulky	31 20	21 45	17 70	23 85	22 25	13 65	6 00
A two-horse peddler's wagon	62 40	42 90	35 40	47 70	44 70	27 30	12 00
A one-horse peddler's wagon	52 00	35 75	29 30	39 75	37 25	22 75	10 00
Vehicles, taken to pieces (box and wheels off, tongue and coupling pole out, hounds off, &c.) will be taken as follows:
A one or two horse wagon	31 20	21 45	17 70	23 85	22 35	13 65	6 00
A four or six horse wagon	41 60	28 60	23 60	31 80	29 80	18 20	8 00
An extra large wagon	83 20	57 20	47 20	63 60	59 60	36 40	16 00
Fire-engines and fixtures, hook and ladder trucks, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
In less than car-loads, as follows:
Fire-engines, (hand,) set up, each	83 20	57 20	47 20	63 60	59 60	36 40	16 00
Fire-engines, (steam,) set up, each	166 40	114 40	94 40	127 20	119 20	72 80	32 00
Hose-carts, set up, each	41 60	28 60	23 60	31 80	29 80	18 20	8 00
Street cars, one-horse, each	124 80	85 80	70 80	95 40	89 40	54 60	24 00
Street cars, two-horse, each	166 40	114 40	94 40	127 20	119 20	72 80	32 00
Vitriol. (See Acids.)
W.
Wagons, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Waste	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Wadding. (See Batts and Batting.)
Wheelbarrows and trucks, set up	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Whisky. (See Liquor.)
Wheels, iron, (not car-wheels,) not boxed	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Willowware and wickerwork	2 98	1 59	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42
Wines, native and foreign. (See Liquor.)
Wind-mills, car-loads of 20,000 pounds	1 98	1 34	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Wool, car-loads, (freight in all cases to be charged on 20,000 pounds)	1 98	1 44	1 09	1 50	1 40	83	34
Less than car-loads, as follows:
If pressed, in bales, 19 pounds to cubic foot	2 08	1 4	1 18	1 59	1 49	91	40
If not compressed, as above, or if in sacks	2 98	1 5	1 23	1 65	1 54	93	42

Abuse of Power in the District of Columbia.

SPEECH OF HON. N. W. ALDRICH,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 28, 1881,

On the bill (S. No. 1681) to provide for funding the 8 per cent. improvement certificates of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALDRICH said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill proposes to fund into 3-65 interest notes of the District of Columbia all of the outstanding 8 per cent. special improvement certificates issued by the board of public works together with interest thereon, amounting to $800,000. It proposes to add this large sum to the funded debt of the District, for one-half of which, principal and interest, the United States is responsible, to redeem certificates of indebtedness, for the payment of which ample security was originally provided by law. The security has been wasted and destroyed by the authorities of the District, until the holders of the certificates are now compelled to appeal to Congress for relief. Although there is little prospect that the measure can become a law at this session it will doubtless be again presented to this House, and I desire to place on the public records a statement of the manner in which the commissioners of the District have performed their duty in relation to the certificates which it is now proposed to fund and to the securities which were pledged for their payment. A year ago the whole subject was fully investigated by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the duty was devolved upon me, as a member of a sub-committee, of preparing a report thereon. I cannot better express my views upon this measure than by quoting at length the report which I had the honor to submit to the full committee, but which was never formally acted on by the committee, although the greater portion of it was informally assented to by a majority of the members:

The investigation originated in certain complaints made by the Treasurer of the United States, as the successor of the commissioners of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, concerning the manner in which the commissioners of the District had performed their duties relative to the revision and collection of the special assessments pledged to the sinking-fund office. To properly understand the subject, it is necessary to review as briefly as may be the legislation governing assessments for special improvements in the District. Prior to the passage of the act of Congress of February 21, 1871, (16 Statutes, 427,) known as "the organic act," establishing the "territorial form of government," assessments for all special improvements in the city of Washington were levied for their entire cost upon the adjacent property, under authority of the act of Congress of February 23, 1865, (13 Statutes, 434,) and numerous ordinances of the corporation of Washington passed in pursuance of that act. The thirty-seventh section of the organic act enacted that the board of public works "shall assess in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, upon the property adjoining and to be specially benefited by the improvements authorized by law and made by them, a reasonable proportion of the cost of the improvement, not exceeding one-third of such cost, which sum shall be collected as all other taxes are collected."

An act of the Legislative Assembly of August 10, 1871, "prescribing the mode of assessment for special improvements and providing for the collection thereof," provided (section 3) that if any person notified of an assessment should neglect or refuse to pay the amount assessed against his property after the expiration of thirty days, the board of public works should immediately issue against the property certificates of indebtedness bearing interest, until paid, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum; that, until paid, the assessment and certificate should be a lien upon the property; and that, if the assessment should not be paid within one year, the board should, upon the application of the holder of the certificate of indebtedness, proceed to sell the property.

May 29, 1873, the Legislative Assembly passed an act "for extending the time of payment of special assessments, and for other purposes," under which most of the questions at issue between the Treasurer and the commissioners have arisen. This act authorized (section 1) the board of public works, for the purpose of extending the time of payment of the assessments for special improvements, to issue $2,000,000 in 8 per cent. certificates of indebtedness, payable in five annual installments and receivable in payment of special assessments. To secure the payment of these certificates the act required (section 2) the board of public works to deposit with the commissioners of the sinking fund all tax-lien certificates thereafter issued, and declared that "such assessment certificates, and all payments thereon, shall be, and hereby are, pledged to and shall be received, held, and applied under the direction of said commissioners for the payment of the principal and interest of the certificates of indebtedness authorized by this act, and for no other use or purpose whatever." The act further authorized (section 5) the commissioners of the sinking fund "to prescribe proper rules and regulations in order to effectually secure the application of the proceeds" of the tax-lien certificates to the payment of the 8 per cent. certificates, and required "all officers of the District government" "to obey and conform to such rules and regulations."

The full amount of $2,000,000, in 8 per cent. certificates, was forthwith issued, payable in five equal annual installments, beginning July 1, 1874. (page 291.) The principal and interest of these certificates outstanding February 21, 1880, the Treasurer stated to exceed $890,000. (page 4.) Under this act $1,068,310.11 in tax-lien certificates were deposited with the commissioners of the sinking fund, the last deposit having been made on August 9, 1876, (page 18.) These certificates, it would appear, represented assessments made up to May, 1876, (page 6.) For the assessments made by the commissioners since that date no tax-lien certificates have been delivered to the sinking-fund office. As the commissioners state that the assessments pledged for the redemption of the 8 per cent. certificates represented originally $3,456,821.94, (page 12,) it would appear that the assessments, for which no tax-lien certificates have been issued, amounted to $2,388,502.98. It is not known what proportion of these assessments was paid before the expiration of the thirty-days' notice required to be given before issuing the tax-lien certificates; but it is safe to say that for at least $1,500,000 thereof tax-lien certificates ought, under the law, to have been issued and deposited in the sinking-fund office.

The seventh section of the act of Congress of June 11, 1878, (20 Statutes, 107,) abolished the offices of sinking-fund commissioners, and enacted that "all duties and powers possessed by said commissioners are transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Treasurer of the United States, who shall perform the same in accordance with the provisions of existing laws." June 19, 1878, an act was passed by Congress (20 Statutes, 166) directing the commissioners to enforce the collection of all special assessments prepared under the act of August 10, 1871, and authorizing them, upon complaint being made to them within thirty days from the passage of the act, of erroneous or excessive charges in respect of any unpaid special assessments, to revise and correct the same. Where tax-lien certificates had been issued the commissioners were required to issue to the holder of the certificate a drawback certificate for the amount of the erroneous or excessive charges, receivable at any time in payment of special assessments. June 27, 1879, a further act was passed, providing for the revision of paid assessments, as the former act had provided for the revision of those which had not been paid. This act authorized (section 1) the payment of all special taxes in arrears due to, and the liens for which were held by, the District of Columbia, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, if paid on or before October 1, 1879. This provision plainly had reference to the special assessments pledged to the sinking-fund office, as the liens for all others were held by private parties.

The third section of the act authorized and directed the commissioners, upon written complaint being made to them within sixty days from the passage of the act, by any persons who had, prior to June 19, 1878, paid their special-improvement taxes, prepared under the act of August 10, 1871, that their assessments were erroneous or excessive, to revise and correct the same; and to issue for the amount of the erroneous or excessive charges drawback certificates, receivable in payment of all special assessments and for all general taxes due before July 1, 1877: "Provided, That complaints filed under the act of June 19, 1878, (paid or unpaid,) by a property-holder, his agent, or attorney, need not be refiled under this act."

It was under these various provisions of law that the proceedings took place of which the Treasurer of the United States complained in his letter of February 21, 1880, (page 3,) to the Secretary of the Treasury, and which the committee was directed to investigate. These complaints were formulated by the Treasurer in his testimony, (page 16,) as follows:

"1. That the District authorities have not issued and delivered to the sinking-fund office all the 10 per cent. tax-lien certificates required by the second section of the assembly act of May 29, 1873.

"2. That they have not demanded, and do not now demand or collect, any interest whatever upon tax-lien certificates not delivered as above.

"3. They have, since October 1, 1879, in collecting the assessments covered by tax-lien certificates in the sinking-fund office, demanded but 6 per cent. interest to that date, and for the time subsequent to that date they have demanded no interest whatever.

"4. They have revised assessments, paid and unpaid, for special improvements, prepared under the act of August 10, 1871, though such assessments have not been complained of as erroneous or excessive, as required by the acts of Congress of June 19, 1878, and June 27, 1879, by the owner of the property or his authorized agent.

"5. They have revised assessments for improvements, prepared under an act of the corporation of Washington, dated long prior to the assembly act of August 10, 1871, referred to in the acts of Congress conferring upon the District commissioners authority to revise assessments and issue drawbacks. The drawback certificates issued under this revision are excessive and illegal."

A great amount of testimony was taken by the committee, filling three hundred and thirty-six printed pages, (Forty-sixth Congress, second session, House of Representatives, Miscellaneous Document No. 39; the references to pages, when not otherwise stated, are to this document,) and covering not only the subject of the Treasurer's complaints, but the general management of the revision authorized by the acts of Congress. The evidence given under each charge will be first considered, and then the evidence as to the general conduct of the revision.

THE WITHHOLDING OF THE TAX-LIEN CERTIFICATES.

It was conceded by the commissioners at the outset (pages 6, 20) that no tax-lien certificates had been delivered to the sinking-fund office since May, 1876, but the reasons given for their non-delivery were conflicting and unsatisfactory. As early as May 15, 1876, the commissioners of the sinking fund informed the commissioners of the District, that if all the tax-lien certificates in their custody were paid "the proceeds would not suffice to meet the outstanding 8 per cent. certificates by $369,026.55," and that they would "require an additional amount to supply this deficiency." (page 294.) Again, on August 13, 1877, they called the attention of the District commissioners to the fact that the tax-lien certificates held by them were insufficient to secure the redemption of the 8 per cent. certificates, and requested that all tax-lien certificates provided for by existing laws, including those upon the property of the several street railroads, should be issued and placed in their hands as early as practicable, (page 17.) To this request no response appears to have been made. October 26, 1878, soon after taking charge of the sinking-fund office, the Treasurer renewed the demand, in order, he said, that the full security contemplated by the act of May 29, 1873, for the redemption of the 8 per cent. certificates might be provided, (page 18.) The commissioners replied that the former commissioners, having become satisfied that the rules under which they were making assessments did not comply entirely with the law, and that the surveyor had acted under an erroneous interpretation of those rules, had suspended the issue of tax-lien certificates "until a further revision of all assessments could be made." They promised to issue and hand over the certificates as soon as the revision should be completed. The Treasurer replied (page 19) that the reasons given for the non-delivery of the tax-lien certificates did not satisfy the law requiring their issue. He protested against their revision and correction before delivery as illegal, and asked the commissioners without further delay to place his office in possession of them, "without deduction of the amount or change of date." The commissioners replied (page 19) that they had not yet issued any tax-lien certificates, and had none in their possession issued by their predecessors, but promised to forward them as soon as they should be ready for delivery. After waiting fourteen months, the Treasurer, on January 6, 1880, (page 19,) renewed his demand for their delivery. The commissioners in reply referred the Treasurer to their former letters on the subject, dated more than a year before, (page 20.)

In their letter of February 19, 1880, in answer to inquiries from the committee, the commissioners for the first time publicly ascribed the non-delivery of the tax-lien certificates to the discovery by the late board of commissioners of "gross errors in nearly all of the assessments of the board of public works," (page 6.) The Treasurer promptly called the attention of the committee to the fact (page 13) that tax-lien certificates for all of the assessments of the board of public works were delivered to the sinking-fund office within six months after the abolition of that board; that the commissioners had for seventeen months been issuing certificates against their own assessments when the issue was suspended; that, although the issue of the certificates was suspended in May, 1876, the rules of assessment, as shown by their own reports, were not changed until January, 1877; that their report for 1876 showed that the rules of the board of public works were still being applied and were working satisfactorily; that the assessments made by the commissioners were found, on revision, to contain errors more gross than those of the board of public works; and that the assessments made after the modification of the rules in January, 1877, were, so far as revised, even more erroneous than those previously made.

The president of the present board of commissioners, on being questioned as to his authority for the statement that the issue of tax-lien certificates was suspended in May, 1876, on account of the discovery of gross errors in the assessments of the board of public works, testified at first (page 121) that there was evidence on the records of the office of that fact. On being requested to produce that evidence, however, he was compelled to admit, (page 125,) after having examined the records of the office, that he could not "point to any particular record" of the reasons of the suspension.

The former president of the commission appeared as a voluntary witness before the committee, and devoted much time to an explanation of the reasons for the non-delivery of the tax-lien certificates. His testimony cannot, however, be regarded as clear or conclusive. Considering the circumstances under which this witness appeared and the fact that he had evidently prepared himself with some care for the examination and that the suspension of the issue of the tax-lien certificates and the changes in the rules of assessment, which were alleged to have led to that suspension, were the principal topics of his testimony, his lack of memory and of information on essential points and his contradictory statements of fact are destructive of the value of his testimony as a defense of the action of the commissioners.

The evidence presents no well-defined or satisfactory reason for the failure of the commissioners to deliver the remainder of the tax-lien certificates to the sinking-fund office. Even if errors in previous assessments had been discovered in May, 1876, that fact would have furnished no reason for withholding the tax-lien certificates against assessments made thereafter. The law requires the certificates to be issued within forty days after the completion of the assessment. If this requirement had been complied with by the commissioners, the discovery at any time of errors in previous assessments would, at the most, have affected only the certificates against assessments made within the preceding forty days. All others would have been delivered to the sinking-fund office.

Nor does the fact that a revision of the assessments was authorized by Congress justify the failure to issue the certificates. The revision was not authorized until June 19, 1878, more than two years after the errors in the methods of making assessments are said to have been discovered, and more than a year after the last assessment was made. If the commissioners had performed their duty under the law, the tax-lien certificates would have been deposited in the sinking-fund office before the revision was authorized. Even if their view was the correct one, that the certificates ought not to have been issued for assessments known to be erroneous, and that interest ran only on the certificates, there was nothing to prevent them from issuing the certificates for the correct amount, and transmitting them to the Treasurer immediately upon the completion of the revision.

INTEREST ON UNDELIVERED TAX-LIEN CERTIFICATES.

The non-delivery of the certificates would be of little moment had it not resulted in the failure to collect any interest whatever on the assessments, the certificates against which were not delivered. This is the burden of the Treasurer's complaint.

It was the plainly expressed intention of the law that 6 per cent. interest should be collected on all unpaid assessments. It would be absurd to suppose that Congress would pass a law giving the tax-payer the privilege of paying at 6 per cent. when he already had the privilege of paying without any interest whatever, and would continue to have that privilege even after the passage of the law. The interest was remitted, the president of the commission testified, for the "reason that the attorney decided that the interest was an incident of the tax-lien certificate, and not of the assessment," (page 122.) This opinion is not well founded. The issue of the tax-lien certificates is a purely ministerial duty imposed by the law, in no wise affecting the relation of the tax-payer to the District. If the assessment is not paid within thirty days after the proper notification is issued, the tax-payer is in default and is chargeable with interest. The failure of the commissioners to sign and transmit to the sinking-fund office the formal evidence of this fact does not lessen the default or relieve the tax-payer from the penalty.

But even if the theory of the commissioners were correct, it would increase rather than diminish their responsibility. If the omission to issue the certificates deprives the District of the penalty which the law imposes, so much the greater is the responsibility of those to whom the omission is due. Nor does the plea avail that the commissioners had discovered that the assessments were erroneous and deemed it "unjust to cloud the titles of citizens with liens for taxes known to be erroneous and excessive," (page 6.) It is the assessments themselves which encumber the property. The delivery to the sinking-fund office of the certificate of the assessment would in no wise increase the incumbrance or darken the cloud upon the title. As a matter of fact, in searching titles, no attention is paid to the tax-lien certificate. Only the assessment itself is regarded.

Had the certificates been issued the Treasurer would have been compelled to accept, in discharge of them, in common with the other certificates held by him, the reduced assessment plus the penalty of 6 per cent. By the commissioners' action he has been compelled to accept, in full discharge, the face of the reduced assessment, without any penalty for from two to four years' delay in payment.

INTEREST ON ASSESSMENTS PAID AFTER OCTOBER 1, 1879.

On this point there was a conflict of testimony. The commissioners stated in their letter of February 19, 1880, to the committee, that "no payments of taxes under the act of 27th June, 1879, have been accepted since 1st October, 1879, with 6 per cent. interest, or at a lower rate of interest than that provided by law, except in cases where, on or before the 1st October, the parties had tendered payment, or had presented themselves to the collector offering to pay, but could not do so because their accounts could not be revised and corrected within the time limited," (page 7.) When, however, the Treasurer's charge on this point was read to the commissioners, in the course of the former's examination, it was positively denied by the president of the commission without any of the qualifications made in this letter, and the commissioners asked for "a specification of the cases in which the charge is made," (pages 25, 26.) On the 27th of March the president of the commission, on being asked whether he meant to say that in no case had payment been accepted since October 1, 1879, at 6 per cent. or lower, except in cases where the party had made a tender of payment before October 1, answered that he did, and promised to produce evidence of that fact, (page 128.) On the 13th of April, seventeen days after the later of these emphatic denials, the collector of special taxes testified that out of five hundred assessments, "more or less," bearing interest, paid prior to that date, "probably eight or ten or a dozen" only had been paid at 10 per cent., and that all of these latter payments had been made "within the last two or three weeks." Up to that time all bills for which tax-lien certificates were held by the Treasurer had been collected with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. up to the 1st of October, and with no interest whatever after that date, precisely as the Treasurer had charged, and no one had been charged 10 per cent. and no evidence was required that a tender of payment had been made prior to the 1st of October, (pages 241, 242.) It appears, moreover, that this practice was not confined to assessments, the revision of which was not finished until after October 1, but was extended to all unpaid assessments due the District of Columbia, on which interest was collected, no matter when they were revised.

The evidence shows that no record was kept of the cases in which tender had been made, and that no inquiry was made of parties whether they had made tender or not. The delinquent tax-payer, who did not tender payment until after the time limited by the act, was put in a better position than the citizen who paid his taxes within the appointed time. The commissioners are responsible not only for having remitted all interest on the special assessments for which they failed to issue tax-lien certificates, but for having abated all interest on all other assessments pledged to the sinking-fund office, paid between October 1, 1879, and April 1, 1880, and for having collected a penalty of only 6 per cent. in a large number of cases where 10 per cent. was legally due.

REVISION OF ASSESSMENTS NOT COMPLAINED OF.

The Treasurer's charge that the commissioners had revised assessments for special improvements of which complaint had not been made, as required by the acts authorizing the revision, was denied by the commissioners, who informed the committee that they would "require specifications under that head also," (page 26.) In their letter of February 19 they informed the committee that the complaints were "very numerous, almost universal," (page 7,) and that over "thirty thousand were filed on the last day limited for such applications" by the act of June 19, 1878, (page 6.) The president of the commission, in his testimony, (page 123,) declared that there "was an overwhelming amount of complaints;" that "they were practically universal." The chief of the special-assessment division, with whom the complaints were filed, on being examined as to the manner in which the complaints were made, testified, however, (page 65,) that of the complaints of the assessments on certain streets, which had been selected at random, and examined by two members of the committee and himself, "about 5 per cent. of the complaints were signed by parties in their own proper signatures; about 5 per cent. were represented by lawyers and brokers, and about 90 per cent. on those streets were represented by William Dickson." The complaints made by William Dickson were on printed forms, signed by clerks in his office with the names of property-holders without their knowledge or authority. On "West street," Georgetown, one of the streets examined by the sub-committee, "there were one hundred and thirty property-holders, and only eighty of them filed complaints." On Massachusetts avenue, another street examined, and the assessments on which had been revised, the witness testified that no complaints were filed under the act of June, 1879, within the time specified, although a large part of the assessments had been paid prior to June 17, 1878, (page 65.) After having "checked back certain streets," in order that he might form an idea as to the proportion of complaints, he testified (page 73) that "the complaints signed by the owners, under all circumstances, were a very small percentage;" that the complaints of the owners, when made by other persons, were "very seldom" accompanied by a power of attorney, or "any evidence showing that the owners had authorized the complaints to be made;" that the complaints in such cases were signed by "the broker, agent, or attorney representing the owner;" and that most of them in number were filed by William Dickson, whose signature as attorney, when he signed as such, was lithographed, and whose complaints were not accompanied by any power of attorney. He admitted that his office "paid no attention as to whether complaints were filed or not after one particular period." He admitted, also, that the two streets selected, on one of which complaints were made by only about 50 per cent. of the property-holders, were "fair average tests as to the number of complaints filed," (page 75.)

Evidence was also given by a number of property-holders that their assessments had been revised without complaint by them or on their behalf, (pages 30, 39, 42, 44.) William Dickson testified (page 149) that he filed "in the neighborhood of 15,000 claims," (complaints,) as his records and books showed, instead of 30,000, as stated by the chief of the special assessment division. He averred (page 151) that he had authority, either written or verbal, to make them all; but he subsequently testified (page 250) that his record showed that he had received in all only one hundred and eighty-five powers of attorney to act for property-holders, including those given before, as well as after, the passage of the act of June 19, 1878.

It thus appears that the complaints covered only a portion of the assessments revised, and that, of the so-called complaints accepted by the commissioners, only about 10 per cent. were made in the manner prescribed by the law—by the "property-holder, his agent or attorney." The remainder were made by brokers and attorneys—mostly by one man—who furnished no evidence of their authority to represent the property-holders, and who evidently filed the complaints in the expectation of afterward obtaining from the owner of the property a power of attorney to receive the drawback certificate, and of charging him a commission thereon. Such complaints were plainly not within the meaning of the law, and should not have been regarded by the commissioners.

The claim is set up by the commissioners in defense of their action, that, as the total cost of improving a street was assessed, pro rata, against the various lots abutting on it, a single complaint of erroneous or excessive charges on any street necessitated the revision of every assessment on that street, whether paid or unpaid, (page 6.) This claim was not supported by the engineer under whose direction the assessments were made. Their construction of law was, however, supported by an opinion of the attorney, which was not put in writing until February 2, 1880, (page 10,) just five days after the committee made inquiry as to the number of complaints filed under the act of June, 1879, and as to the amount of the assessments complained of. This opinion is directly opposed to an opinion given on September 6, 1879, by the same officer, (page 322.) In that opinion he held that "the claim must be made in writing within sixty days after June 27, 1879. I know of no power to enlarge any of these conditions by the commissioners. The claim must be made by the person who paid the assessment." There is no doubt that this earlier opinion embodied the true construction of the law, by which the commissioners should have been guided. Their authority to revise was confined to the cases in which bona fide complaints were made within the time limited by the acts of Congress.

The evidence presents the spectacle of the revision, under laws authorizing revision only in cases where specific complaint was made, of the entire body of assessments, of which only 10 per cent. of the persons affected had complained, and with which the other 90 per cent. were presumably satisfied; and, as to that 10 per cent., it does not appear that the commissioners knew that even that proportion of the tax-payers had legally complained until after an investigation into the subject had been ordered by Congress, or that they now know that there was that or any other percentage of legal complaints against all of the assessments which they have revised.

THE REVISION OF THE "COOKE" AND "EMERY" ASSESSMENTS.

The final charge of the Treasurer is, substantially, that the commissioners have unlawfully revised certain assessments prepared under acts of the corporation of Washington, dated prior to the assembly act of August 10, 1871, and signed by M. G. Emery, as mayor of Washington, and by H. D. Cooke, governor, as successor of the mayor, whereas the acts of Congress authorized the revision only of assessments prepared under the act of August 10, 1871. The so-called "Emery" assessments were thirty-four in number, and amounted to $66,073.24, (pages 11, 12.) They bore date from March 20 to June 30, 1871, and were levied under acts of the corporation of Washington, passed at various dates, from August 12, 1869, to March 8, 1871. Only a very small fraction of the work was, however, done under ordinances passed after February 21, 1871, the date of "the organic act," (pages 158, 159.) The "H. D. Cooke" assessments were sixty-eight in number, and amounted to $233,743.11, (pages 11, 12.) They bore date from May 14, 1871, to June 12, 1872, only three, however, being dated subsequent to December 16, 1871. They were levied under ordinances dated from May 28, 1868, to April 27, 1871, (pages 159–165.) These various ordinances were enacted under authority of an act of Congress of February 23, 1865, (13 Stats., 434,) amending the charter of the city of Washington, and giving to the corporation "full power and authority to lay taxes on particular wards, parts, or sections of the city, for their particular local improvements," and "to lay and collect a tax upon all property bordering upon each street or alley" that might be improved under the provisions of the act. Pursuant to these provisions the total cost of the improvements covered by the assessments in question was levied upon the property bordering thereon, and for the deferred payments paving "stock certificates," bearing 10 per cent. annual interest, were issued under authority of an ordinance of the corporation of October 28, 1867.

Without entering further into the facts, it seems perfectly clear that the commissioners had no power to revise these assessments. In both the act of June 19, 1878, and the act of June 27, 1879, the power of the commissioners to revise assessments was limited to assessments for special improvements "prepared under an act of the Legislative Assembly of August 10, 1871." The "Emery" and "Cooke" assessments were notoriously not prepared under that act, and it would not seem possible for any refinement of legal sophistry to bring them within the operation of the acts authorizing revision.

The commissioners, however, claim that they had full authority under the law to revise them, and their claim is supported by several opinions of their attorney. It is claimed that the improvements for which these assessments were made, although begun by the old corporation authorities under contracts made by them, were finished under the board of public works. No evidence in proof of this claim was, however, submitted to the committee.

Reliance is also placed upon an act of the Legislative Assembly of December 19, 1871, which provided "that all improvements made subsequent to February 21, 1871, the date of the approval of the organic act, shall be assessed in accordance with the requirements of the thirty-seventh section of said act; "that is," it is claimed, "on the one-third principle," (pages 315, 316.) If the Legislative Assembly had authority to pass this act, which is not conceded, it merely tends to show that these assessments ought to have been prepared by the board of public works under the act of August 10, 1871, but does not, by any means, bring them within the scope of the acts of Congress authorizing the revision.

In his opinion of July 19, 1878, the attorney held that "the act of August 10, 1871, prescribed the mode of assessment in the first section," and "is recognized as binding law" by the act of June 19, 1878; "that all of the assessments under it are legal and valid;" and that "they are to be enforced according to that act [the italics are his own] and the acts amendatory of it," (pages 318, 319.) All of these sound propositions are denied in the ex post facto opinion of March 6, 1880.

Another important fact concerning these assessments is that they were not complained of as erroneous. The chief of the assessment division testified (page 71) that he did not know that any of the persons assessed under either the "Cooke" or the "Emery" assessments filed complaints under either the act of June, 1878, or that of June, 1879.

The Treasurer further charges that "the drawback certificates issued under this revision are excessive and illegal," (page 17.) The testimony shows (page 11) that the assessments were cut down by the revision to one-third of the original amount, or from $299,816.35 to $99,938.78. There was issued to the holder of the lien certificate a drawback certificate for the two-thirds of the assessments remitted, plus interest at 10 per cent. from the date of the lien certificate—about eight years and a half. By this means the drawback certificate was made to exceed by more than 20 per cent. the amount of the original assessment.

Both of the acts governing the revision authorize the commissioners to issue drawback certificates only for the amount of the "erroneous or excessive charges," and neither expressly nor by implication do they authorize the addition of interest to that amount. The action of the commissioners is deprived of all defense by the fact that the drawback certificates, issued under precisely the same provision of law to the property holders who had paid their assessments, were for only the amount of the original error, without interest. In other words, the speculator who bought the lien upon the assessment at a discount, and subject to all the risks of the transaction, receives 10 per cent. on the face of his certificate, while the citizen who promptly paid his tax and virtually redeemed the certificate against his property is compelled to lie out of his money without interest. Any argument in favor of allowing interest to the lien-holder would be vastly stronger in favor of allowing it to the property-holder. In this, as in other cases, the commissioners discriminated against the prompt tax-payer in favor of the delinquent and the speculator.

The fact is not overlooked that the lien-holder may possibly have an equitable claim for the amount paid to the District for his certificates and for legal interest thereon. But even if this were so, the commissioners had no power under the law to recognize the claim. Congress is the only power competent to deal with such a claim. The present president of the commission, in a statement published in September, 1878, at the very time that the "Cooke" assessments were being revised, took the same view of the case. "The holders of the tax-lien certificates," he declared, "occupy the position of purchasers at tax sale or sale under execution, and as investors in this species of property they assumed all the risks incident to the speculation. The rule of caveat emptor clearly applies to them, and no doubt their risks have been covered by ample margins. The fact is well known that these certificates were, to a large extent, issued in payment for work to contractors whose necessities compelled them to sell, and that for a time they were purchasable in the market at forty to fifty cents on the dollar. * * * Those aggrieved, if any, must look to Congress or the courts for redress." An opinion given by Messrs. Caleb Cushing, William E. Chandler, and Walter S. Cox, in April, 1873, strongly supports this statement. They held that the 8 per cent. certificates "are in fact the indebtedness of the individual property-holders converted into negotiable form * * * for the convenience and relief of the individual property-holders assessed and indebted. They are not a debt of the District of Columbia." (Senate Report No. 453, first session Forty-third Congress, page 481 of governor's answer.) If the 8 per cent. certificates were not a debt of the District, it is clear that the lien certificates, on which they were based, could not be. Besides, the lien certificates issued against the "Cooke" and "Emery" assessments state on their face that "the principal and interest * * * is to be paid out of the special-tax fund," (page 74.) If the special-tax fund failed to produce the amount required to reimburse the lien-holder, the commissioners had no power to make him whole. The attorney of the District undoubtedly held this view when he advised the commissioners, in his report for 1875, (commissioners' report, page 36,) that the "grounds of objection to the assessments are of such a nature that, if sustained, the holders of the certificates of indebtedness will not have recourse against the District government."

The only defense offered by the commissioners for ignoring the requirements of the law was that the acts were "measures of relief," and they point with satisfaction to the fact that "they have afforded great relief to individuals," (page 6.) They forgot, apparently, that the law granted the relief only on certain conditions, and that they had no authority to waive one of those conditions in a single case. To waive all of the conditions imposed by the law in the endeavor to carry out its assumed purpose, when that purpose could be gathered only from its provisions of which the conditions were an essential part, was beyond their lawful power.

OPINIONS OF THE ATTORNEY.

The opinions of the attorney of the District have played an important part in the investigation. With a few marked exceptions, all of the irregularities and the omissions to carry out and enforce the provisions of the law have been based upon or supported by opinions of this officer. No less than thirty-one of these documents have been furnished to the committee and are printed in the testimony, pages 8-10, 140, 292-94, 296-312, 314-30.) All imaginable questions arising in the transaction of their business, including, on the one hand, the simplest questions of executive discretion, and, on the other, important questions affecting the relations of the District to the United States, which must ultimately be decided by the proper law officers of the Government, have been left by the commissioners to his decision.

This officer is not, as might be inferred, an independent officer, with well-defined position and responsibilities, but a subordinate of the commissioners, appointed by them, and subject to removal by them at pleasure. His opinions are simply advisory. The commissioners are the responsible officers. They could not divest themselves of responsibility for illegal acts or omissions by producing an opinion of their attorney defending or supporting their course. On the contrary, they are responsible for his competency and fidelity.

There are grave discrepancies between the earlier and the later opinions of this officer. Among the former are the opinions of July 19, 1878, that interest must be computed from the date of the original assessment, and that the commissioners have no power to declare an assessment void, (page 318;) the opinion of June 24, 1878, that in contemplation of law there is a precise sum due on a revised assessment on which interest would accrue, (page 317;) the opinion of September 10, 1878, that it must be assumed that the property adjoining an improvement is thereby benefited to the extent of one-third of the cost, (page 320;) and that of September 6, 1879, that assessments can be revised only on complaint made within the time prescribed by law, by the person who paid the assessment, (page 322.) Every one of these opinions, all of which are believed to be sound, has either been reversed, or its effect greatly impaired by later opinions. The effect of the opinion that it must be assumed that there is a precise sum due, and that interest will accrue upon it, is largely defeated by the opinion of April 25, 1879, that interest cannot be collected where tax-lien certificates have not been issued, (page 8.) The opinion that the property must be assumed to be benefited to the extent of one-third of the cost of the improvement, is substantially reversed by the opinion of September 2, 1879, advising the commissioners that "from one-third downward, to an amount not worth the collecting, is within the discretion of the assessors under the law," (page 324.) The opinion that the commissioners have no power to declare an assessment void, is disregarded in the opinion in the Water street case, under which the assessment was virtually annulled. The opinion that revision can be made only on proper complaint by each individual tax-payer is flatly contradicted by the opinion of March 12, 1880, advising the revision of all assessments on streets from which a single complaint has been made, (page 299.) In every case, the earlier opinion is favorable to the District and to a strict construction of the law, while the later opinion is invariably against the District and in favor of delinquent tax-payers.

The most remarkable discrepancies exist, however, between the various opinions concerning the "H. D. Cooke" assessments. The former attorney, in an elaborate opinion, reviewing these assessments, held that they were void, (page 316.) The present attorney afterward approved this opinion, (page 317,) but the date of the approval is not given. September 26, 1879, on the other hand, he held that the "Cooke" assessments "are the subjects of revision," and that they are affirmed as valid under the act of June 19, 1878, (page 327.) Certain assessments of this class having been declared void by the supreme court of the District, "correctly," as he said, the attorney, on December 18, 1879, recommended a new assessment in all these cases, declaring that the old assessments were in "violation of all law," and stating that "interest * * * will date from the time of the new, or legal assessment, for the reason that the former assessments were void for all purposes," (page 329.) March 6, 1880, he again shifts his ground, and, notwithstanding the decision of the supreme court of the District, declaring certain of the assessments void, holds that the "Cooke" assessments "are brought directly within the scope of the revising acts of Congress," and are "subject to drawbacks," (page 298.) Here are four different opinions concerning the same class of assessments. They are first held to be void, then valid, then void, and then valid again. As a matter of fact, all of the "Cooke" assessments were revised and reduced to one-third. Against the very assessments held by the court and their own attorney to be void, and the lien certificates against which were held by the court to be no "lien or incumbrance" on the property, the commissioners issued to the holder of the lien certificates drawback certificates for two-thirds of the assessments and 10 per cent. a year for nearly nine years.

It is evident that opinions so contradictory and erratic afford no safe guide for executive action; and that they furnish no defense to the commissioners for disregarding the requirements of law.

It is remarkable that, although the attorney was consulted on some of the simplest details, action was taken in several important matters, involving grave questions of law, without his advice. Among these are the allowance of interest, at 10 per cent., on the drawback certificates issued against the "H. D. Cooke" assessments, and the annulling of the assessments on county roads. The latter action was taken in the very teeth of the decision of the Supreme Court, that the assessments on county roads "were confirmed and ordered to be enforced by the act of Congress of June 19, 1878," (page 133,) and the former was wholly without authority of law.

I may, perhaps, be pardoned for making some allusion to a document which was presented in printed form to the committee by the attorney for the District, after the statement just made had been submitted to them, apparently as a defense against my strictures upon the discrepancies between his various opinions. He says, first, "I nowhere stated that interest accrued on an assessment. It does not." Compare this flat denial with the final words of his opinion of July 19, 1878. "Interest on the revised assessments must date from the expiration of the notice of thirty days, and not from the date of the revision." Certainly nothing more need be said on this point. He declares, second, that an assessment "could only be revised when complained of. When adjudged bad and revised it could alone be enforced against anybody." What this means, or whether it means anything at all, is very doubtful. At any rate, he did advise the commissioners on March 12, 1880, "that a single complaint under the law secures the revision of the assessment of the whole line," and that they were right in "permitting property-owners to have the benefit of the revisions" "made on the complaints of others," although he had unqualifiedly advised them on September 6, 1879, that the complaint "must be made in writing" "by the person who paid the assessment."

The attorney asserts (third) that it is charged that he "denied that the commissioners had power to set aside an assessment, and then said they had." The alleged charge, which the attorney so vigorously denies, was never made. It was simply stated that "the opinion that the commissioners have no power to declare an assessment void is disregarded in the opinion in the Water street case, under which the assessment was virtually annulled," which is literally true. He also denies (fourth) that any contradiction exists between his opinions of September 10, 1878, and September 2, 1879. On this point a single quotation from each opinion will suffice to show what a modification his views underwent in less than a year. In the former opinion he said:

> I know of no practical solution of this matter but to accept * * * the rule * * * that the property adjoining an improvement is thereby benefited to the extent of one-third its cost, and this I understand to be the rule of the books.

September 2, 1879, he says:

> An amount in excess of one-third is forbidden. From that downward to an amount not worth the collecting is within the discretion of the assessors under the law.

He then endeavors (fifth) to extricate himself from the net of contradictions in which he has entangled himself in dealing with the "Cooke" and "Emery" assessments. He says:

> The Governor Cooke assessments also furnish matter of criticism. My predecessor * * * declared these assessments void. Almost my first act in office, under the light I had, was to concur in his views, that was in the fall of 1877, after two years of study and various arguments, after Congress had amended or reaffirmed the law, then these assessments came up again under the revising acts. I then held they were valid.

It is difficult to see how even this lucid explanation explains the opinion of December 18, 1879. At the risk of repetition I insert literal extracts from the remarkable series of opinions given by this officer on the subject of these assessments.

July 28, 1877, (page 316:)

That said assessments having been made in excess of that power and without authority of law, were and are void.

September 26, 1879, (page 327:)

It is clear, then, that the assessments * * * are the subject of revision. * * * I think these assessments are affirmed as valid under the act of June 19, 1878.

December 18, 1879, (page 329:)

The court in general and special terms has pronounced these assessments void, and correctly. I recommend a new assessment in all these cases.

March 6, 1880, (page 298:)

It seems to me that * * * this class of assessments are brought directly within the scope of the revising acts of Congress; they thus get legal confirmation and are entitled to revision.

The attorney, in both his affirmative opinions, it will be noticed, states that the act of June 19, 1878, affirmed the validity of these assessments, seeming to forget that the supreme court of the District had decided in 1879, after the passage of both acts of revision, that the assessments were void.

The effect of this apparently innocent blundering was that, while the court held (with the approval of the attorney) that the assessments and certificates were void, enjoined their collection and relieved the tax-payer from all payment and liability and his property from any lien or incumbrance thereunder, the attorney held that they were valid to authorize the commissioners to issue on account of the District of Columbia drawback certificates equivalent to cash to the amount of nearly four hundred thousand dollars to persons holding these void certificates, and who had no legal claim against the District, having in their purchase "assumed all the risks incident to the speculation."

THE REVISION GENERALLY.

The evidence shows that the entire revision was based upon a grave misconstruction by the commissioners of the law, and of their powers and duties under it. The act of June 19, 1878, directed them to enforce the collection of the special assessments according to existing laws. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that this act "was practically a confirmation of what the board of public works had done," and "that the assessments have been ratified by Congress," (page 133.) The attorney in his earlier opinions took the same ground.

The assessments had been confirmed by Congress and the court of last resort. The Supreme Court decided that all defects in the manner of their imposition or the authority of the board of public works to do the work or to levy the assessments, if any existed, were cured by subsequent legislation.

The commissioners had no power to go behind the assessment and inquire into the validity of the contract under which the work was done. Congress never intended to turn over to them the whole body of assessments for reassessment according to their own or their subordinates' notions of equity. Yet, in the face of the law, of the decision of the Supreme Court, and of their attorney's earlier opinions, the commissioners annulled all of the assessments on county roads, (pages 67, 129;) they reduced the assessments on Columbia road to one-third, and upon the Seventh-street road and the Fourteenth street road to one-fourth of the original amounts; and they reduced the assessment on one side of Boundary street to one-third of that on the other side of the street, (page 67.)

Even less defensible was the revision of the Water street assessment. This assessment was made, not by the board of public works, but by the commissioners, (page 137,) and was "for one-third of the total cost of the improvement." (page 80.) In common with all others it had been confirmed by Congress and the Supreme Court. Whether the contract were valid or not, the work had been done, and the assessment made on a principle decided to be lawful and correct. The commissioners had no power to vacate it. It is notorious that a great number of contracts were "jumped" from one street to another, by a former board of commissioners, in the same manner as the Water street contract. These so-called "extensions" of contracts were investigated in 1876, by a committee of this House, who reported (first session Forty-fourth Congress, Report No. 702, page 8) that the "cost of these extensions amounts to the sum of $2,034,334.04." As these expenditures were made the basis of special assessments, there was quite as good reason for overturning any other of the numerous assessments into which they entered as that on Water street. As the case stands, it appears that the only assessment which was annulled on this ground was one affecting the estate of which one of the commissioners is a trustee, and two members of his family the beneficiaries, (page 133.) The annulled assessment covered eleven squares, on four of which was property owned by this estate. The assessments against the estate were reduced by the commissioners' action from $2,324.82 to $290.82, (pages 80-84,) or 87½ per cent. Although the attorney advised that this was "a case for a compromise," and although the amount tendered by the property-holders was accepted by the commissioners as a compromise, (page 140,) the president of the commission testified that, as trustee and executor of the Linthicum estate, he still has "an outstanding claim for damages," and if he should "choose to press it, a just one," (page 138.)

The facts do not support the theory of a compromise. January 16, 1879, Robert Christy, as the attorney for the Linthicum estate and others, presented to this House a memorial "relative to erroneous assessments in the District of Columbia." (House of Representatives, third session Forty-fifth Congress, Miscellaneous Document No. 15.) In this memorial he gives at length "a statement of the allegations in the bill filed by the executors of Edward M. Linthicum, deceased, in the supreme court of this District, and pending therein prior to the passage of said act of Congress," and declares that "the effect of the said act of June 19, 1878, as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, will be to dismiss this bill of complaint and validate and legalize these assessments." He therefore prays Congress to grant relief. Congress granted no relief, and the record of the court shows that no action was taken on the bill of complaint between the date of the memorial and that of the so-called "compromise." Yet, although the attorney for the complainants had admitted that the decision of the court would be against him, and although Congress had refused to grant any relief, the commissioners of the District, the defendants in the suit, accepted a tender of one-eighth of the sum due as a compromise of the case.

But this is not the worst aspect of the case. The president of the commission testified (page 139) that, "in this particular case, they [the former commissioners] not only extended the contract from First street in Washington to Water street in Georgetown, but, after they had done the work on Water street they went back and finished the contract on First street from Virginia avenue to N street south, as originally contracted, so that both works were done." The impression conveyed by this statement is, that, after the contract had been unlawfully "jumped" from First street to Water street, it was unlawfully "jumped" back again to First street, and that the same contractors did both jobs. Just the reverse of this is true. The evidence taken in a former investigation shows that George Neitzey had a contract with the board of public works, dated July 17, 1873, for grading and paving First street west, between Maryland avenue and N street south; the estimated cost of the work was $78,881.32. (House of Representatives, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, Miscellaneous Document 103, part 2, page 194.) Birch & Fletcher had a contract, dated June 12, 1873, for certain work on Water street, Georgetown. (Ibid., page 214.) Neitzey, after performing work amounting to $35,793.82 under his contract, relinquished the remainder of the work on First street, and in lieu thereof was awarded, on November 30, 1874, the work on Water street, on which the assessment under discussion was based, and for which he received $57,379.91. The remainder of the transaction is explained in the commissioners' report for 1875, (pages 412, 413.) "This transfer of [Neitzey's] work," the report says, "was subsequently found to be an encroachment upon an oral contract with Henry Birch, of which the latter produced satisfactory written evidence. The work on First street was therefore given to Mr. Birch, in place of that taken from him." The estimated cost of the new work thus awarded was $57,397.91, precisely the amount received by Neitzey for the work done on Water street. So it appears that this was not a case of a "jumped" contract at all, in the sense in which that expression has been used. There were valid contracts for both the work on First street and the work on Water street. The sole effect of the former commissioners' action was an exchange of work between the contractors, by which neither the rights nor the liabilities of the property-holders were in anywise affected. The result was precisely the same as if each contractor had worked out his contract on the street which it originally covered—Neitzey on First street and Birch on Water street.

The fact that the commissioner benefited by this action, though present in the room when it was taken, took no part in it, does not lessen his responsibility. The act was the joint act of the commissioners, and no one of them—least of all the one benefited—could divest himself of responsibility by such a plea.

In consequence of these and other like stretches of authority the errors in assessments which were originally computed at but 5 per cent. of the assessments, and which, in a communication made to Congress just before the passage of the act authorizing the revision, were estimated at a little more than 10 per cent., (page 56,) were, on revision made out to be about 18½ per cent., in the assessments of the board of public works, and about 28 per cent. in the assessments of the commissioners. One assessment, and that the very latest of the commissioners reported as revised, was reduced more than 84 per cent., (page 14.) In May, 1878, the errors were estimated at $500,000, in assessments amounting to $4,860,954.35, (page 56.) The errors claimed to have been discovered in assessments revised to the date of the commissioners' report for 1878, including the "Cooke" assessments, were $639,798.36 in assessments amounting to $2,350,284.83, (report, pp. 244-47.)

The errors, since discovered, for some reason, do not appear in the report for 1879, nor is there any testimony on that point. The errors in $1,566,255.25 unrevised assessments, pledged for the redemption of the 8 per cent. certificates, are, however, estimated at $406,714, (testimony, page 13.) Applying the same rate of reduction to the assessments concerning which no report has been made, the aggregate reduction of special assessments by revision, including the "Cooke" and "Emery" assessments, will amount to not less than $1,400,000, as against the estimate of $500,000, on which the legislation authorizing the revision was based. Congress never intended any such wholesale razeeing of assessments as this, and it is almost certain that, had this action been foreseen, the revision would never have been authorized.

By reason of this excessive reduction of assessments, and of the failure to charge interest upon those for which they had failed to issue tax-lien certificates, the surplus of the assessments, pledged for the redemption of the 8 per cent. certificates, over the amount required for that purpose, which, in 1875 and 1876, the commissioners estimated at $1,689,844.74, (reports, 1875, page 10; 1876, page 6,) was reduced to $1,156,810.03 in 1877, (testimony, page 92,) and in 1879 to $182,456.96, (page 93,) an aggregate reduction of more than one and a half million dollars. This reduction has taken place in spite of the fact that the amount of the expenditures on which the assessments were based turned out to be greater than it was expected it would be when the estimate of the surplus was made in 1875, (page 92.) The engineer, by whom that estimate was made, testified that "it was the result of a careful examination," made by himself, (page 91;) that it "was absolutely correct at the time," (page 94;) and that he could not explain the reduction of $1,000,000 between 1877 and 1879, (page 93.)

The law directs the commissioners to enforce the collection of all the assessments for special improvements. They have not only failed to enforce a large portion of the assessments, but they have annulled some of them, and have reduced others to a fraction of their original amount. The law authorizes them to revise assessments only when complained of within a certain time by the property-holder, his agent, or attorney. They have revised assessments on the complaint of brokers, made without authority of the property-holder; they have revised others on complaints made after the expiration of the time prescribed; and they have revised others still of which no complaint whatever has been made. The law authorizes them to revise only the assessments prepared under the act of August 10, 1871. They have revised assessments notoriously not prepared under that act. The law authorizes them to issue drawback certificates only for the amount of the erroneous or excessive charges contained in the assessments. They have issued drawback certificates exceeding by 25 per cent. the amount of the original assessment. The law requires the collection of 6 per cent. interest per annum on all assessments in arrears if paid before October 1, 1879, and, by fair inference, requires the collection of 10 per cent. per annum on all assessments paid after that date. They have accepted payment, long after October 1, of assessments revised prior to that date, with interest at only 6 per cent., to October 1, and with no interest thereafter, and on a large portion of the assessments they have failed to collect any interest whatever, whether paid before or after the expiration of the time prescribed.

The disposition of a portion of the tax-payers of the District to postpone and resist the payment of taxes has been fostered, if not created, by the mistaken leniency of the commissioners in waiving the penalties for non-payment, and in holding out the hope that continued delinquency would result in continued legislative relief. Had the laws been firmly and impartially enforced, and their penalties promptly applied, the amount of taxes in arrears would have been much less, and the condition of public sentiment on the question far more healthy.

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS.

Testimony was taken by the committee concerning numerous alleged frauds and irregularities in the offices of the District, not covered by the Treasurer's charges. While the evidence taken was not sufficiently conclusive to justify the committee in reporting that any corrupt or fraudulent acts had been committed by any persons now connected with the government of the District, it was deemed sufficient to demand an investigation by the proper legal authorities. The evidence on these points was accordingly referred by the committee to the United States Attorney for the District for such action as he might think proper, and has since been made the subject of a report by the grand jury. But as to the general looseness of the management of the revision of assessments, the testimony was conclusive. Of this a few instances, out of many testified to, must suffice.

The acts authorizing the revision provide that the commissioners shall issue drawback certificates for the amount of the erroneous or excessive charges found on revision. Notwithstanding this requirement of law and the fact that the duty is one which, according to the best authorities, cannot be delegated, (1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 180, 181; Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 204,) the commissioners intrusted the entire preparation and issue of these drawback certificates to one of their clerks and allowed them to be issued under his signature. It also appears that no other officer of the District government than the one who signs them, approves, audits, looks over or checks off the certificates, and that neither the collector of the District nor the collector of special taxes, by both of whom they are receivable, has any record of the number or amount of the drawback certificates issued. (page 63.)

The evidence fully sustains the conclusion that the charges of the Treasurer of the United States against the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have been fully proved, the evidence in most instances reaching far beyond the allegation; that the revision of assessments has been conducted in a loose and irresponsible manner, without proper supervision by the commissioners; that the commissioners have, by their acts and omissions, deprived the District of large amounts of revenue justly due to it; that they have improperly discriminated in favor of the delinquent tax-payer to the detriment of the interests of the District and of the conscientious tax-payer; that they have disobeyed the requirements of the law, and have set up evasive pretexts for that disobedience; and that on the plea of construing the acts of Congress as measures of relief they have perverted them from their true intent in order to relieve property-holders from taxes and penalties lawfully due; in all of which various acts and omissions they have been guilty of dereliction of duty deserving of censure.

While the members of the board of commissioners cannot be relieved from responsibility for their acts, it is nevertheless true that inefficiency and lack of responsibility are inherent in the present form of government of the District. That form contains an element which is hostile if not fatal to efficiency and responsibility—a plural executive.

History abounds in examples of the failures of forms of government in which executive power is vested in several hands, by whatever name they may be known. A government of this kind rarely becomes efficient, except when some master spirit usurps supreme control. Ordinarily responsibility is not merely divided; it is completely lost—a truth of which this investigation has given abundant evidence. When the responsibility for all acts is distributed among several a keen sense of it is felt by none.

The requirement of the act of June 11, 1878, that the commissioners shall have been actual residents of the District for three years prior to their appointment is an unnecessary and unwise restriction on the appointing power. The people of the United States contribute one-half of the amount appropriated for the expenses of the District. The commissioners are officers of the United States, and their selection should be subject only to the same restrictions as that of other officers of the United States. Besides, a large proportion of the tax-payers of the District, although thoroughly identified with its interests, have chosen to retain a residence elsewhere rather than surrender the right of suffrage by becoming legal residents of the District. There is no reason why such persons should be excluded from the field of choice.

The board of commissioners should be abolished and their powers and duties be conferred upon a single commissioner, to be appointed without regard to residence in the District, and to whom the engineer and other officers of the District shall be subordinate.

Such, sir, are the views which I had the honor to submit to the committee. They are the result of a thorough examination and careful consideration of the testimony, with a conscientious desire to place before this House and the public an exact statement of the facts. The evidence would have justified a much stronger arraignment of the vacillating incompetency with which the government of the District has struggled with the question of the revision and collection of special improvement taxes. Many irregularities disclosed by the testimony have not even been alluded to.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. DAVID WILBER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 28, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. WILBER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have taken but little time on the floor of this House in debate, and have been surprised sitting here day after day in listening to the wild financial theories advocated by the opposition. It seems to me that they cannot be really sincere in this matter.

If you have not any personal financial interests in the country can you not see in this funding bill "the handwriting on the wall?" Have you no interest in the financial condition of the country you represent? The prosperity which this country has so lately enjoyed and is now enjoying is such as no other has. Every laborer can find employment; a gold and paper dollar are equal. You now attempt to check this prosperity, to throttle our financial interests by forcing upon us a funding bill so obnoxious to the business interests that its effect is like a firebrand thrown broadcast throughout the land, kindling a flame, causing the money market in New York (the money center) to advance 1 per cent. in a single day on call for that cause alone.

I claim that this action shows incompetency on the other side of the House for financiering. Your hatred to national banks causes you to do such foolish things. Do you not want the $17,000,000 of taxes paid the people by the national banks of this country, a sum larger by over two million dollars than they receive in interest on the bonds held for their circulation? Still your cry has been, "Tax them! Tax them! Tax them!" For what would you cause them more expense? For the best circulating notes that ever existed under any banking system, for the safest and cheapest banking system the people ever had the advantage of; or is the reason, as I said before, hatred? You wish to force, to compel them to take 3 per cent. bonds and pay the people over 4 per cent. in taxes. You wish to tax them for the deposits they receive. Did you ever hear of an individual or corporation being taxed for the debts they owe? They see that you mean to try and compel them to take 3 per cent. bonds and gather in their circulating notes before they can get their bonds, making it impossible to close out their business; to fund your debt at your own price, and pay taxes upon the debts they owe. Are you surprised that they have already commenced surrendering their circulation; and do you suppose that they will not continue to do so, when such unheard-of restrictions will be imposed upon them? I have been largely engaged in business for many years. I own stock in three national banks, and the dividends I receive are smaller than from any other investment; even my farming lands pay me better, in which I am more largely interested than in banking. You cannot compel bankers to do your bidding; that is a point they will not submit to and will not yield or be driven to. By this action you will drive the best banking system out of existence. Do you prefer to now cripple this system so that it would have to resemble the old State banks in their charges on exchange between Chicago and New York, (which has been in my day by that system twenty-five to fifty cents on a dollar?)

You want, in your mad career, to impose this outrage upon them; but, thank God, the 4th day of March is near at hand and will check you, and ere long the great financial, business, and laboring interests of this country will rise up and sweep you completely from power, for foolish and incompetent financial legislation, as they ought.

Registering Foreign Shipping.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE W. LADD,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4068) to provide for the registry or enrollment of any vessel built in a foreign country.

Mr. LADD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The House bill No. 4068, which was introduced February 2, 1880, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and by them reported back to the House and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, involves grave questions of vast importance to the American people, especially to the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent.

The bill reads as follows:

A bill to provide for the registry or enrollment of any vessel built in a foreign country.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to issue a register or enrollment for any vessel built in a foreign country, whenever such vessel shall be owned by a citizen of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the many causes that have contributed to the decline of our ocean commerce, I maintain, can be removed or changed by legislation. It is not too late to correct errors and to retrace our steps, if we want to restore our American marine. We can recover all we have lost from ill-advised legislation and through the improvements consequent upon the introduction of iron and steam, now important factors in the commerce of the world.

In order to successfully compete with England, now the acknowledged master of the seas as well as of the workshops of the commercial world, let us adopt those wise rules of industrial progress, such as we have heretofore applied to other industries, and which have worked such a change in our country, the seeds of which were planted when we were comparatively free from class legislation.

From a few dependent colonies scattered along our Atlantic coast, we have, in opposition to the conservative ideas brought with us from the Old World, wrought out a problem of a successful government and abundant prosperity in material results, so that we have grown from three to fifty million. We have constructed a hundred thousand miles of railroad, made rivers navigable, and canals equal to navigable rivers; opened up a country larger than Europe; and this, in part, since our ocean commerce commenced to decline. England has availed herself of our carrying trade from our neglect, consequent upon our proneness to run to extremes in one interest made profitable for a time by the wonderful producing power of our virgin soil.

A nation of States which has produced the large surplus that we have the last few years, which has the capacity to double its production the next decade, (if it has the capital to do it,) which has such abundant facilities to transport its productions to tide-water, need not despair for the want of water carriage to transport its surplus to a suffering world.

Surely there is not much patriotism, but there is abundant short-sighted selfishness, in giving to England our carrying trade as advocated by the selfish merchant who looks for a commission only, when the nation to gratify his wants may lose its very life.

WHAT IS OUR CONDITION?

Have we not at our very doors all the materials needed, the iron, wood, copper, hemp, pitch, and duck, and all the skilled labor desired to build iron and wooden steamers, all waiting our action? Yea, more, the mariners and engineers begging to be allowed the privilege to whiten every sea with our canvas or with our steamers, to take our mails to every port, to waken every sleeper by the whistle of our vapor in iron ships bearing at their peaks the Stars and Stripes, now known and honored throughout the world, but unhappily rarely seen.

There is a class who propose for us to imitate France, to repeal our registration laws, to purchase and register British ships, and thereby make us dependent on a rival. Yea, more, a rival who became so from a knowledge of our superior facilities to cope with her on the ocean; our parent state, who so generously curbed us in youth, who so forcibly fought us in early manhood, and who, now that we have matured, is so anxious to surpass us on the ocean with iron and steam. We inherited too much of her Saxon blood to yield to her any more than her share of the ocean or the power to control it. We learned when first under the maternal roof of her constitution—the production of the wealthy half of her people—what we could do for commerce when we should call all to come hither to form a united country "for common defense and general welfare."

Now, can we afford to be divided in this important service of restoring our commerce, which supports so old and important a part of our Union, that part which will defend all when the dark cloud of war shall lower over our country? Is it wise to repeal our registration laws, and thereby strike from us and the world the better part of the power to produce the vehicle of commerce for the world and concentrate it in the hands of a power thirsting for dominion? And this, too, under the expectation that when our hands are tied and our builders and laborers scattered, repair-shops will spring up among us (as shops of necessity) to blossom into another American marine capable to cope with that of Great Britain, whose power on the ocean had its commencement, as ours did, centuries ago, in its extensive fisheries. Its early and proud existence in her contests with Holland was crowned with glory when she met the first Napoleon with Europe at his feet, who fell as he did before the maritime power of England. It is only England's determined efforts in behalf of her commerce and her industries that has made her successful, notwithstanding her exhausted soil and forests and a declining mineral supply, which her scientists measure with tolerable accuracy. The day when her iron and coal are exhausted will end her dominion of the seas, unless we furnish her with the crude materials to be used to make her great and ourselves dependent.

When our fathers indulged in the proud ambition of commercial success, they had equal rights, equal burdens, equal hopes and aspirations. Whence comes this change? Who has planted in this Eden of ours seeds of unbounded privilege (for a class) and incurable poverty, unbounded wealth and unmitigated suffering, unbounded prerogative and power, unprecedented cringing of the dependent?

Must we call this civilization? If so, give up this monster, the growth of class legislation—"remain by the ship and we all shall be saved." Our motto should be no backward steps. Hold our advanced position upon the ocean, for our boasted freedom is but a myth when we trust our very existence to the hands of that imperious power which to-day is struggling even with its own members as to which shall eat the bread of labor, the industrious producer or the idle land owner, or whether both shall suffer in a wild struggle soon to come.

Our American ships should be held as sacred to us as our soil, and should be as hard to part with.

Let me prophesy that when you give up our registry laws you give up the ocean to England and the power to compete with her. This will not do. We have separated from our mother country; a century has passed, and its history has been written; the world knows it. We cannot go back. If capital requires it, we must resist. We cannot employ her to build our ships, it means too much; that has been settled by our statesmen—by Jefferson, Madison, and others, and by the heroes of our second war, (1812.) We then fought for sailors' rights; we must, if required, fight again for our share of the great oceans and the trade in our own bottoms which our sailors are so manifestly capable to maintain. The hand of destiny directed us hither to lay broad and deep the foundations of our empire, based upon a higher level of humanity than that existing elsewhere, based upon prerogative. Shall we surrender the right arm of defense because the sting so often felt from her power has been mitigated by a prosperity resultant from our own institutions? Shall we deny to the skilled laborer a home which he has adorned by his manhood and made happy by his industry?

If I am wrong, if my imagination and early training on our noble rivers and on our rock-bound coast have stimulated me to magnify in any way the importance of our ocean commerce, give me leave in this short hour to recommend a course of action in harmony with your legislation: Put out your lights except where needed to light the British in and out of a few harbors, pass no more river and harbor bills, roll up your charts for a century, sell your chronometers, burn up your navy-yards, stop your coast survey, discharge your marines, abolish your skeleton Navy, and send your officers on half pay to England to be educated. By this course fifty millions can be saved yearly, and more if you send your now made useless consuls home. This is a great contest, greater than that which Gibbon says existed for one hundred and sixty years between Venice and Genoa for the control of the Mediterranean, and which was settled by the ruin of both, through the enterprise of the mariner in doubling Cape Good Hope.

We must go to the foundation in this matter. No subsidies can cure this decay; they may be made useful, when we have laid the foundations of reform, to expedite us on the road to success, as an offset to similar assistance granted by other nations, as was done for our fisheries in 1819. The United States, finding the fishing industry impoverished and declining, passed a bounty act, which should have been styled an indemnity act, giving to each vessel under thirty tons $3.50 per ton for three and a half months' actual employment in codfishing. Vessels over thirty tons, carrying not less than ten men, received $4 per ton, provided it did not exceed $360 for any one vessel, three-eighths going to the vessel and five-eighths to the crew. This act gave a new impulse to the business, but was repealed some years since.

EARLY HISTORY OF OUR MARINE.

Jefferson, in his famous Report on Commerce in 1794, says:

Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable; but as a resource of defense essential. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear from their landboard, and nothing to desire beyond their present rights. But on the seaboard they are open to injury, and they have there too a commerce which must be protected. This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen seamen, and of artists and establishments in readiness for ship-building. If particular nations grasp at undue shares, [of our commerce,] and more especially if they seize on the means of the United States to convert them into aliment for their own strength and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protecting measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded, or it will be disarmed of its defense, its productions will be at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce. The carriage of our own commodities, if once established in another channel, cannot be resumed in the moment we desire. If we lose the seamen and artists whom it now occupies we lose the present means of marine defense, and time will be requisite to raise up others, when disgrace or losses shall bring home to our feelings the evils of having abandoned them.

I quote now from Henry Hall's valuable book on American Navigation:

The first vessels built on our shores were for the fisheries and coasting trade, but principally for the fisheries. The people were poor, and had to pay for their vessels in grain, calicoes, and similar commodities.

The fisheries were very profitable. They had attracted attention in Europe at a very early period, and large numbers of vessels went out to America for no other purpose than to visit the fishing banks. A voyage generally yielded from £3,000 to £4,000 profit. The consequence was that as early as 1660 there were often as many as six hundred sail from Europe on the banks at one time. The New Englanders went into this business at once. Ship-builders were sent out to them from London in 1631, and they fitted out a large number of vessels of very respectable size for that age, some of them being of three hundred tons burden, and put them at once into the fisheries, and subsequently into trade.

The New England colonies had very little transatlantic trade of their own until shortly before the Revolution, but they supplied the principal part of the colonial shipping which went into the transatlantic commerce of the other portions of the coast. The navigation act protected them against the Dutch, and their abundance of timber and naval stores, and frugal habits, enabled them to compete for the carrying trade with the mother country. A very fair share of the fish, tobacco, rice, timber, and hides of this country, were sent to England in our own shipping. At the time of the Revolution we owned nearly half of the tonnage employed.

Besides this transatlantic trade, the shipping of the early colonies was employed somewhat in trading to the Spanish West Indies. This was against the law. It was in contravention both of English and Spanish policy. It was, however, the principal resource of the colonists in obtaining a supply of silver for ready money, and they carried it on in spite of its illegality and dangers. The enforcement of restrictions upon the freedom of our navigation to the Spanish colonies and to the different ports of Europe was one cause of the Revolution.

During the revolutionary war, navigation received a check, but the building art improved. Nearly all the ships built for the foreign trade were privateers, made for strength and speed, and carrying an armament of guns. The loss of our shipping in that war was very great, for, able as were our sailors, the cannon of the English were superior to ours, and their ships generally larger and stronger as well as more numerous. Mr. Currier, the historian of ship-building on the Merrimac, tells how twenty-two gallant vessels sailed from Newburyport alone during that period, which, with the thousand men on board of them, were never heard of again. But this very superiority of the royal navy in weight of metal and size of ships was the most direct and powerful stimulus to our native builders, and they began to produce excellent vessels, which, before the war was over, attracted attention even in Europe.

John Adams, in a letter to Senator Varnum, gave an illustration of this. He said: "In June, 1879, I dined with M. Thevenôt, intendant of the navy at l'Orient, certainly one of the most experienced, best read, and most scientific naval commanders in Europe. That excellent officer said to me in the hearing of the Chevalier de la Luzerne, M. Marbois, and twenty officers of the French navy, 'Your country is about to become the first naval power in the world.' My answer was: 'It is impossible to foresee what may happen a hundred or two or three hundred years hence; but there is at present no appearance or probability of any great maritime power in America for a long time to come.' 'Hundred years!' said Thevenôt; 'it will not be twenty years before you will be a match for any maritime power of Europe.' 'You surprise me, sir; I have no suspicion or conception of any such great things; will you allow me to ask your reasons for such an opinion?' 'My reasons,' said M. Thevenôt—'my reasons are very obvious; you have all the materials, and the knowledge and skill to employ them. You have timber, hemp, tar, and iron; seamen and naval architects equal to any in the world.' 'I know we have oak, and pine, and iron, and we may have hemp, but I did not know our shipwrights were equal to yours in Europe.' 'The frigate in which you came here,' said M. Thevenôt, (the Alliance, Captain Landais,) 'is equal to any in Europe. I have examined her, and I assure you there is not in the king's service, nor in the English navy, a frigate more perfect and complete in materials and workmanship.'" Other incidents could be cited to show that, even before this country had obtained its independence, the building art had so improved here as to make American ships respected everywhere for their speed, strength, and beauty, and to excite the liveliest anticipations as to the future of this Republic in navigation. Building revived after the Revolution. It is not known what the tonnage was at that time. It could hardly have exceeded 100,000 tons, if it was as much as that. The facts do not appear in the colonial records, and the National Government had no control over the registry of shipping until after the adoption of the Constitution, March, 1789.

In 1789 the registration was 123,893 tons in the foreign trade, 68,607 in the coasting trade, and 9,062 in the fisheries.

Year.	Registered for foreign trade.	Coasting trade.	Fisheries.
1795	529,470	164,795	37,102
1800	669,921	245,295	30,078
1805	749,341	301,366	58,363

The period from 1806 to 1815 I will pass over. We had the non-importation act, and the difficulties growing out of Napoleonic wars between England and France, both parties seizing and destroying our commerce—over 1,660 of our ships, worth millions of dollars. The embargo of December, 1807–9, all to culminate in the war with England in 1812, who had taken from us a million of our men to man her ships.

After the war—

Date.	Registered for foreign trade.	Enrolled for the coasting trade, &c.	Licensed.
January 1, 1815	674,632	338,198	16,453
July 1, 1850	1,585,711	1,899,555	50,188

An era of prosperity came. Mr. Hall says:

Three-fourths of the cotton export went in our vessels, and we got better pay for the service. All the mails and passengers, and a vast majority of the immigrants, were transported under our flag. The British whale-fisheries were almost extinct, while the Americans had over seven hundred ships and 17,000 seamen actively employed in that field. While ship-building stagnated in England, and owners were losing money, building was active here, and owners had many exceedingly prosperous years. From 1820 to 1850 this country built 3,900,000 tons of shipping. In 1831 $5,000 was often paid for a ship over and above the contract price when she was completed, property was increasing so rapidly in value. In 1840 many vessels repaid their original cost in freight-money. The interest was rich, prosperous, aggressive, and public expectation on both sides of the Atlantic would not have been disappointed had America become in twenty-five years the leading maritime nation of the world. It was already only second.

Tonnage of the United States, 1850 to 1880.

Year.	Sail.	Steam.	Total.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons
1850	3,010,020	525,434	3,535,454
1855	4,441,716	770,285	5,212,001
1860	4,485,931	867,937	5,353,868
1865	4,029,643	1,067,139	5,087,782
1870	4,171,412	1,075,095	4,246,507
1875	3,685,064	1,168,668	4,853,732
1880	2,856,476	1,211,558	4,068,034

The Bureau of Statistics report as follows:

FOREIGN CARRYING TRADE.

The imports and exports of the United States carried, respectively, in United States vessels and in foreign vessels, during each fiscal year from 1821 to 1880, inclusive, and the percentage of imports and exports carried in vessels of the United States.

Fiscal year.	Imports.		Exports.		Total imports and exports.		Percentage carried in American vessels.
	In American vessels.	In foreign vessels.	In American vessels.	In foreign vessels.	In American vessels.	In foreign vessels.
1821	$58,025,890	$4,559,825	$55,175,572	$9,798,410	$113,201,462	$14,358,235	88.7
1822	76,984,331	6,257,210	60,715,568	11,444,713	137,699,899	17,701,923	88.4
1823	71,511,541	6,067,726	65,315,666	9,383,464	136,827,207	15,451,190	89.9
1824	75,265,053	5,283,954	67,411,706	8,574,951	142,676,759	13,858,905	91.2
1825	91,902,512	4,437,563	88,799,749	10,735,639	180,702,261	15,173,202	92.3
1826	80,778,120	4,196,357	69,553.516	8,041,806	150,331,636	12,238,163	92.5
1827	74,965,496	4,518,572	72,090,544	10,232,283	147,056,040	14,750,855	90.9
1828	81,951,319	6,558,505	61,108,374	11,156,312	143,059,693	17,714,817	88.9
1829	69,325,552	5,166,975	62,089,441	10,269,230	131,414,993	15,436,205	89.5
1830	66,035,739	4,481,181	63,882,719	9,966,789	129,918,458	14,447,970	89.9
1831	93,962,110	9,229,014	65,546,181	15,764,402	159,508,291	24,993,416	86.5
1832	90,298,229	10,731,037	66,140,760	21,036,183	156,438,989	31,767,220	83.1
1833	98,060,772	10,057,539	68,058,231	22,082,202	166,119,003	32,139,741	83.8
1834	113,700,174	12,821,158	77,693,461	26,643,512	191,393,635	39,464,670	83.0
1835	135,288,865	14,606,877	94,135,191	27,558,386	229,424,056	42,165,263	84.5
1836	171,056,442	18,323,593	97,139,457	31,530,583	268,188,899	49,854,176	84.3
1837	122,177,193	18,812,024	91,207,563	26,211,813	213,384,756	45,023,837	82.6
1838	103,087,448	10,629,956	89,819,799	18,666,817	192,907,247	29,296,773	84.2
1839	143,874,252	18,217,880	94,787,948	26,240,468	238,662,200	44,458,348	84.3
1840	92,802,352	14,389,167	105,622,257	26,463,689	198,424,609	40,802,856	82.9
1841	113,221,877	14,724,300	94,808,628	27,043,165	208,030,515	41,767,465	83.3
1842	88,724,280	11,437,807	79,893,023	24,798,511	168,617,303	36,236,318	82.3
1843	49,971,875	14,781,924	65,053,636	19,292,844	115,025,511	34,074,768	77.1
1844	94,174,673	14,260,362	78,450,529	32,749,517	172,625,202	47,009,879	78.6
1845	102,438,481	14,816,083	86,942,442	27,704,164	189,380,923	42,520,247	81.7
1846	106,008,173	15,683,624	86,550,175	26,938,341	192,558,348	42,621,965	81.7
1847	113,141,357	33,404,281	100,204,804	53,868,210	213,346,161	87,272,491	70.9
1848	128,647,232	26,351,696	109,657,931	44,374,200	238,305,163	70,725,896	77.4
1849	120,382,152	27,475,287	100,533,123	45,222,697	220,915,275	72,697,984	75.2
1850	139,657,043	38,481,275	99,615,041	52,283,679	239,272,084	90,764,954	72.5
1851	163,650,543	52,574,389	152,456,689	65,931,322	316,107,232	118,505,711	72.7
1852	155,258,467	53,038,388	139,476,937	70,181,429	294,735,404	123,219,817	70.5
1853	191,688,325	76,290,322	155,028,802	75,947,355	346,717,127	152,237,677	69.5
1854	215,376,273	86,117,821	191,322,266	84,474,054	406,698,539	170,591,875	70.5
1855	202,234,900	59,233,620	203,250,562	71,906,284	405,485,462	131,139,904	75.6
1856	249,972,512	64,667,430	232,295,762	94,669,146	482,268,274	159,336,576	75.2
1857	259,116,170	101,773,971	251,214,857	111,745,825	510,331,027	213,519,796	70.5
1858	203,700,016	78,913,134	243,491,288	81,153,133	447,191,304	160,066,267	73.7
1859	216,123,428	122,644,702	249,617,953	107,171,509	465,741,381	229,816,211	66.9
1860	238,164,855	134,001,399	279,082,902	121,039,394	507,247,757	255,040,793	66.5
1861	201,544,055	134,106,098	179,972,733	69,372,189	381,516,788	203,478,278	65.2
1862	92,274,100	113,497,629	125,421,318	104,517,667	217,695,418	218,015,296	50.0
1863	109,744,580	143,175,340	132,127,891	199,880,691	241,872,471	343,056,031	41.4
1864	81,212,077	248,350,818	102,849,409	237,442,730	184,061,486	485,793,548	27.5
1865	74,385,116	174,170,536	93,017,756	262,839,588	167,402,872	437,010,124	27.7
1866	112,040,395	333,471,763	213,671,466	351,754,928	225,711,861	685,226,691	32.3
1867	117,209,536	300,622,035	179,788,851	279,399,969	296,998,387	580,022,004	33.9
1868	122,965,225	248,659,583	175,016,348	301,886,491	297,981,573	550,546,074	35.1
1869	136,802,024	300,512,231	153,154,748	285,979,781	289,956,772	586,492,012	33.1
1870	153,237,283	309,140,304	199,732,324	329,786,978	352,969,607	638,927,282	35.6
1871	163,285,710	363,020,644	190,378,462	392,801,932	353,664,172	755,822,576	31.8
1872	177,286,302	445,416,783	168,044,799	393,929,579	345,331,101	839,346,362	29.1
1873	174,739,839	471,806,765	171,566,758	494,915,886	346,306,597	966,722,651	26.4
1874	176,027,778	405,320,135	174,424,216	533,885,971	350,451,994	939,206,106	27.2
1875	157,872,726	382,949,568	156,385,066	501,838,949	314,257,792	884,788,517	26.2
1876	143,389,704	321,130,500	167,686,467	492,215,487	311,076,171	813,345,987	27.7
1877	151,834,067	329,565,833	164,826,214	530,354,703	316,660,281	859,920,536	26.9
1878	146,499,282	307,407,565	166,551,024	569,583,564	313,050,906	876,991,129	26.3
1879	143,590,353	310,499,599	128,425,339	600,769,633	272,015,692	911,269,232	23.0
1880	164,087,606	579,394,159	115,917,891	730,072,637	280,005,097	1,309,466,796	17.6

Now let me examine the causes that have operated to produce this decline in our foreign tonnage, great when we contrast it with our increased exports and imports.

PERIOD OF PROSPERITY.

The discovery of gold in California and the settlement of this vast territory acquired from Mexico, commencing in 1849, undoubtedly stimulated us and the whole world to great commercial activity, and for ten years we had a constantly increasing currency. This was a very prosperous period for our commerce.

The latter part of this decade, England, after years of experimenting, commenced the building of iron ships for sail and steam as a business, having fully settled the question that iron ships for ocean commerce were preferable to wood, less expensive to keep in repair, and insurable at less rates.

Builders in the United States also tried it to a limited extent, but soon gave it up for want of encouragement, England having superior advantages in capital and in material for immediate use.

Next comes the period of our late war, the history of which, so far as our commerce is concerned, is familiar to all, and it is unnecessary to allude to it. The war closed with a large loss of our ocean tonnage, and at this period we may fairly date the permanent decline of our ocean commerce. And this from two causes: First, from a want of a true appreciation of our condition; second, from legislation growing out of different views as to the mode of equalizing our currency and taxation.

FROM 1865 TO 1878.

Infatuated with the idea of making by extraordinary legislation the holders of our bonds doubly wealthy at the expense of all other industries, we were engaged in destroying all values of real property. The period of commercial success, consequent upon an increasing currency from the gold-fields of California and Australia, was now to be followed after a period of inflation by a revolution, a shrinking of our currency for the benefit of a class, initiated by Mr. McCulloch, then Secretary of the Treasury, backed by a willing Congress.

On one side was England with her iron and steam, on the other McCulloch's fallacious doctrines of restoring commercial life by a system of industrial death. A period of weakness and glorification consequent upon proneness to man-worhip came, bringing its train of expenditures and follies, and a disregard for all real wants. Our ocean tonnage daily grew less. Could any other result have been expected?

Frequent struggles for reform were made by voting subsidies. The only result was to keep perhaps one ship-builder afloat while the million went down. But interested parties hoped that this might act as an opiate to quiet the people, while the mammoth bondholder and his worshipers were laying the foundation for the new order of things, which has been already too successful in destroying our shipping industries.

SUEZ CANAL.

Another cause of the decline of our shipping was the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869, which nearly ended our commerce with Asia. Appleton's Cyclopedia says of the commerce of this canal:

From November, 1869, to December 31, 1874, 4,781 vessels, of 6,643,368 tons, had assed through, of which 2,588 entered from the Mediterranean and 2,193 from the Red Sea. Of the same 3,286 were British, 394 French, 281 Austrian, 235 Italian, 121 Ottoman, 109 Dutch, 85 Egyptian, 83 German, 61 Spanish, and the remainder of other nationalities, only 8 being American.

COMMERCE AND FUNDING.

I hardly think the country fully appreciates the magnitude of the disaster to our marine consequent upon the introduction of the new system of funding our debt, a part of which had been so successfully used as a currency, by changing it into interest-bearing obligations. When this became understood all capital was diverted from industry into the more profitable channel of investing in non-taxable bonds. It required no great sagacity to see what would occur. Moneyed men invested all their surplus in our securities. Ships and ship-yards were sold, real estate declined daily, until the low prices of all property culminated in a general bankruptcy. Bankers regarded ship-builders who continued in business as lunatics, soon to fail; local taxation had to be doubled in order to support local communities; expenses increased by reason of the power of the non-taxable part of the community to control expenditures by party machinery.

The few shipbuilders who have survived all this double taxation, decreasing values, and the reputation of a want of sagacity deserve to be regarded as monuments of American enterprise and patriotism.

Capital and labor can have but one interest in this country. Together they prosper; separate them by legislative enactments and ruin follows. This is fully demonstrated in the decline of our ocean marine. Industry must now make it the interest of capital to co-operate for the restoration of our ocean commerce by giving capital no other opportunity to invest in non-taxable bonds.

The average profit of the industry of the shipbuilding States does not exceed 3 per cent. per annum based upon the low taxation formerly made by our communities.

DEBT AND TAXATION.

Our cities and towns after the war found themselves largely in debt. And by the recent returns made by the Census Bureau, which are as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 11.

Mr. Robert P. Porter, special agent of the census on wealth, debt, and taxation, furnishes an interesting exhibit of the outstanding bonded indebtedness of the cities and towns of the United States containing a population of 7,500 inhabitants and upward. Forthcoming tables will show the purposes for which all bonds were issued in each year from 1860 to 1880, and the amounts maturing each year from 1880 to 1900. The figures given in the following table are subject to possible revision:

States.	No. of cities.	Population.	Total bonded debt.	Per capita.
Maine	8	116,098	$11,635,550	$100 22
New Hampshire	5	81,242	2,952,400	36 34
Vermont	2	23,513	607,900	25 85
Massachusetts	39	1,122,084	73,696,019	65 68
Rhode Island	6	181,554	11,424,756	62 93
Connecticut	15	295,300	12,846,564	43 52
New York	28	2,550,157	207,742,881	81 46
New Jersey	13	503,071	38,578,350	76 69
Pennsylvania	29	1,505,705	95,258,134	63 26
Delaware	1	42,499	1,372,450	32 29
Maryland	1	332,190	34,516,417	103 91
Virginia	7	155,956	10,705,177	68 64
West Virginia	1	31,266	506,500	16 20
North Carolina	1	17,361	530,500	30 56
South Carolina	2	60,039	4,775,451	79 54
Georgia	4	100,860	8,387,000	83 15
Florida	1	9,890	.....	.....
Alabama	3	55,448	3,492,500	62 99
Mississippi	1	11,814	373,217	31 59
Louisiana	2	227,157	15,968,570	70 30
Texas	6	92,026	3,141,662	34 14
Arkansas	1	13,185	178,694	13 15
Kentucky	5	198,830	10,321,500	51 91
Tennessee	4	99,636	1,583,400	15 89
Ohio	21	760,363	38,291,926	50 36
Indiana	12	252,823	6,958,700	27 52
Illinois	22	770,244	18,590,660	24 14
Michigan	13	279,409	5,109,775	18 29
Wisconsin	11	227,988	3,683,650	16 16
Iowa	10	152,576	2,749,309	18 02
Minnesota	4	107,647	2,991,911	27 79
Missouri	6	467,871	26,178,449	55 95
Kansas	4	55,618	1,524,777	27 42
Nebraska	2	43,522	428,535	9 85
Colorado	2	50,450	.....	.....
Nevada	1	13,705	112,000	8 17
Oregon	1	17,578	76,500	4 35
California	6	324,097	7,055,115	21 77
Total	300	11,350,772	664,346,913	58 53

Geographically considered, the bonded indebtedness of the cities and towns of the United States containing 7,500 inhabitants and upward is as follows:

States.	No. of cities.	Population.	Total bonded debt.	Per capita.
Eastern	75	1,819,791	$113,163,183	$62 18
Middle	72	4,933,622	377,468,232	76 51
Southern	38	1,073,468	59,964,171	55 86
Western	115	3,523,891	113,751,327	32 28

If 11,350,772 population owe $664,346,913, it is fair to presume fifty million do not owe in municipal debts less than $2,000,000,000. This debt has certainly been increased by a class of "dead-heads," who have acquired wealth, and thereby the power to control communities and perpetuate a system which, if continued, will eventuate in a change of our institutions. Shipping, like real estate, is taxed when it is registered, and, like real property, soon becomes a burden rather than a profit if subjected to a taxation approximating to its earnings.

This is not all. The present system is leading us into deeper water daily. Those who advocate subsidies without reform propose to increase the burden already imposed on industry by increasing taxation without removing the evils that call for subsidies.

Local taxation in the ship-building States is now from 2 to 3 per cent. per annum, and will average 2½ per cent., and is increasing, rather than diminishing. By what process of reasoning do the friends of registering foreign-built ships arrive at a solution of this marine question by free registration? Who will be stupid enough to take vessels (iron or wood) from British register when they pay next to no taxation, (taxation in England being on incomes, not on valuation,) and register in New York or Maine, where local taxation is about 3 per cent. per annum, the average amount of our income?

A recent writer in the New York World, who is anxious for the retention of the "anchor as one of the emblems of American industry," advocates strongly the repeal of our registry laws to admit British ships for registry, which, if it means anything, means to admit them for our coasting trade. He says:

One of the southern railroads, adapted for the carrying of cotton from the interior to a seaboard port, would at once put on a line of freight (cotton) steamers from their terminus to New York, if the proper ships could be obtained at a satisfactory cost. Such ships cannot now be had in the United States, but the company can procure them exceedingly cheap, because of old but desirable pattern for the business in question, in England. But as foreign-built ships cannot participate in the coasting trade the project has necessarily had to be abandoned, and with it the development of a new local southern industry.

If by purchasing British vessels you could stimulate building here and place them when built on the same footing they are on in England, free from taxation, you would have some argument; but this is not proposed. England acted thus years ago by purchasing our wooden ships to fill a gap in her commerce and made it profitable from the fact that she relieved them from taxation; this she did while she was maturing her system of iron ships. To follow her in one and abandon her in the other, would be worse than suicide. Before proceeding to point out a remedy for our declining ocean commerce, let me reproduce the principal argument made at the national shipping convention held at Boston, October 7, 1880, which shows considerable selfishness and but little of old Massachusetts patriotism. William H. Lincoln in his address said:

Greater freedom is what is required. The ocean, the great highway of commerce, is free to all alike. All nations are in competition. It is evident that the nation that can produce the ships the best adapted for the business, and at the lowest price, and that can sail them at the least expense, will outstrip all others. It is admitted by every ship-owner, so far as I can learn, that at present our foreign commerce is not upon an equal footing, and we cannot to-day successfully compete with the navigation of other nations. The problem to be solved is, what will enable us to do so? I reply, we must put ourselves in the line of progress; further restrictions upon commerce will not do it; greater freedom will. Give us ships as cheap as other nations furnish them, and the same advantages in respect to maintaining them, and that is all we ask. To put the proposition in plain terms, change our navigation laws so that any citizen of the United States may purchase steamships or sailing vessels in the markets of the world, and place them under the flag of his country, with this provision, that such steamship or vessel shall be forever excluded from the coastwise trade. As the coasting trade is confined to our own vessels, there is a manifest propriety in excluding all vessels of foreign build from participation in it. The vessels in this business are not brought into competition with those of any other nation, and consequently no relief is demanded. This trade is peculiarly our own, and should remain so. It is where we are brought into the arena of the world's commerce that we require entire equality and freedom.

Again he says:

On the other hand, it is more than probable that the introduction of iron steamships and vessels into our commercial marine will stimulate our own industries in the same direction, and that in consequence of being able to obtain the material at the same price as other nations, we shall secure the natural and legitimate result; our own ship-yards will multiply, and building interests will revive.

There are some timid persons who fear that if any breach in the wall of protection is effected it will invite an assault upon the whole tariff system. But our shipping occupies a different position from all other interests of the country. Our vessels must be brought into competition with those of every other nation, and the desired changes relate only to our foreign trade. The same rules that apply to the one interest cannot be brought to bear upon the other. So that it seems just to assume that the great industrial establishments of the country that have grown up and developed so successfully under our system of protection, that the producers of the raw material who have experienced the benefits of the fostering care of the Government, will suffer no injury by the removal of the burdens upon our commerce. Their interests will not be jeopardized or put in peril, for the parties foremost in urging the removal of restrictions upon navigation would as earnestly oppose any measures that would cause the great industries of the nation to suffer.

AMERICAN PROGRESS IN IRON STEAMERS.

The condition of our iron ocean steamers I quote from one of the few ship-builders who has survived all disaster, and who, from his locality, can be excused for not giving the public all the facts attending the general disaster to our ocean marine.

STATEMENT OF JOHN ROACH.

In this connection permit me to call your attention to the progress we have made in iron-ship building during the past seven years, in the face of the difficulties which I have pointed out. In four iron-ship yards on the Delaware, from 1872 to 1879, there were built seventy-six iron screw steamships, of 152,088 tons, giving employment to a crew of 3,986 men. All these vessels are sea-going, and equal in strength, speed, and finish to any of their class in the world. All are excellent cruisers, having great speed, and easily adaptable to naval uses. With the number of men employed they make in themselves a respectable navy. Of these vessels twenty-five have a speed of fourteen knots, twenty a speed of thirteen knots, and the balance a speed of twelve knots. In tonnage they range from 5,300 to 2,000 tons. At the same time there have been built in this country twenty-five ocean-going wooden screw steamers, with a tonnage of 27,563, most of these steamers having a speed of twelve knots. This makes the following showing:

Steamers built in the United States from 1872 to 1879.

Class.	Number.	Tonnage.
Iron screw steamers	76	152,088
Wooden screw steamers	25	27,563
Total	101	179,651

Referring again, for comparison, to the ocean-going steam tonnage of the world in 1860, we find that it consisted of 338 steamers, with tonnage of 431,000, divided as follows:

Nation.	Number.	Tonnage.
Great Britain	156	250,000
United States	52	71,000
All other nations	130	150,000
Total	338	471,000

A GOOD SHOWING.

Comparing these tables we see that there has been built in this country within these seven years—and years of great business depression—more than twice the tonnage of ocean-going steamers owned by the United States in 1860, and nearly one-half as much as the ocean-going steam tonnage of the world at that time. Our increase in steam tonnage was greater than that of France or Germany, with all their advantages, including that of buying cheap ships in England. Moreover, of the fifty-two steamers owned by the United States in 1860 nearly all were wooden side-wheelers, not fit for the foreign trade; whereas the seventy-six iron steamers mentioned are all screws, of the most improved modern make. Had we possessed these in 1860 we could have thoroughly blockaded our coast, with some ships to spare as cruisers. Of the 179,651 tons 80,000 are in the foreign trade, the balance in the coasting trade. These 100,000 tons, now competing with the railroads, could in case of a European war at once be put into the foreign trade, leaving the coast business to the railroads and wooden side-wheel steamers.

REMEDY NEEDED.

This must come in an American way, based upon sound principles of equal rights, equal burdens and prerogatives. We must abolish class legislation, not imitate it by imposing burdens upon one class to build up another in fostering commerce by subsidies.

Let us come to the fact that selfishness has tempted us to float too long on a sea of doubt and darkness, with an enterprising neighbor at our doors seeking to recover that which she lost a century ago.

To present this question clearly, let me do so by asking a few simple questions.

Our national debt bearing interest is	$1,700,000,000
Railroad bonded debt	2,282,570,065
Railroad (not funded) debt	156,881,052
Cities and towns, debt not less than	2,000,000,000
State debts by last reports	272,990,066
In all	6,412,441,183

Who pays the interest and taxes on this vast debt? On whose property and industry is it assessed? And who escapes taxation, and how? When these questions are answered by our communities one-half of the problem of a declining ocean marine is solved. When we have retraced our steps and have come to equal taxation the burden will be light and easily borne. Then will the hum of industry come from every ship-yard, and the happy sounds of joy and contentment will come up from millions of homes now, alas! shrouded in gloom and sorrow.

To the ship-builder, ship-owner, and to merchants of enterprise and patriotism we owe a debt which we can partly pay by abolishing a system of compulsory pilotage; admit all materials that enter into the construction of ships duty free; permit owners of American vessels engaged in foreign commerce to take all needed stores out of bond free; relieve American vessels of all consular fees; oblige our postal department to send all mail matter in our own ships, (pay them generously, as we do for carrying our internal mails;) modify our laws so that American ships shall not needlessly be burdened; remove all local taxation on all ships engaged in foreign commerce, or advise the States to do it, they to be reimbursed for the loss of this tax by the institution of an income tax on all incomes derived from non-taxable securities, either national or corporate, (now excepted from taxation.)

Again, cannot the same power given in our Federal Constitution to control ocean commerce fix the rate of taxation on the same when its existence depends on the wise use of this power? After having restored to the shipping industry its rights, by placing this important interest upon an equal footing with other industries, do you not owe it another important debt consequent upon injustice to it in the past and for what it can do for us in the future as an arm of defense?

VALUABLE CARGO.

Freighted in our ships of to-day we have the destinies of fifty million people spread over a vast continent, and the last to be discovered. Peopled from all nations, having all the fire of the cavalier, Roundhead and Huguenot; again mixed with the Northman and the descendant of the once ruler of the world, the Roman, with one-half of Britain's better half, tinctured with the sufferings of twenty-five decades of wrong—all Americans, all for self-government, prosperous and happy to-day, hopeful perhaps for the future. Does not history teach us the lesson that success and prosperity will raise up enemies as we year by year increase in power and strength, and the desire to send our humane influences abroad? At some time surely will come a struggle between the two systems of government; kings and people will not always remain contented while both are thirsting for power. Then will come our great struggle for liberty, and those who shall then tread these capacious halls will ask for a record of the men who failed to appreciate in the latter part of the nineteenth century the importance of the American marine as an arm of defense. Rather than take from England her ships let us imitate her foresight and prudent management of her navy and navy-yards, by changing our expensive system of navy-yards, in reducing them in numbers, and by building up private ship-yards as a nursery for our future navy, as a part of a great system of naval defense.

OUR NAVY.

From an elaborate report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs to Congress, February 21, 1879, I quote their conclusions upon the construction account for a period of ten years:

You have sixty-five or seventy millions of dollars to be applied solely to purposes of construction of war vessels, a sum of money which if it had been so expended, burning up every vessel in the Navy, leaving them entirely out, would have given the Navy seventy vessels like the Trenton, one of the best now in the Navy. In other words seventy or eighty millions of dollars of the public money and property has been in these years expended with no responsive results, which in the hands of a prudent man would have purchased and had now in commission from seventy to eighty vessels of war, a number sufficient to have made a navy at once respectable and useful.

It is conceded that for all of the vast expenditure for the construction account of our Navy, we have literally nothing to show but a skeleton. By changing this system we can, without increasing expenditure, subserve two important interests:

First. Produce an ocean marine of steam and iron.

Second. Utilize it as a navy when wanted for war.

Naval vessels to be serviceable must be constructed to meet the improvement in the science of projectiles, otherwise all expenditures on them will be money thrown away.

We should therefore bring our marine and Navy together as far as is possible in a system to be built upon when the exigencies of war call for their use. If our naval vessels are not great and strong, shipyards and laborers will be in a condition to be made serviceable for immediate use for war purposes.

Utilize the six millions per annum which are now appropriated by Congress and thrown away in assisting in a proper manner the construction of iron ocean steamers of 2,500 tons and upward, to be built under the supervision of experienced officers of our Navy in a substantial manner, with all modern improvements, so they can be utilized for war vessels, and when afloat, to be under the command of naval officers, if you please.

For the assistance so rendered in their construction, your consideration to be that they shall never be sold to go out of the country, except by the consent of the Government, and in the event of war that they shall be valued and placed on our Navy rolls. This will build up private yards from Maine to Texas, which will in return for assistance rendered give us from fifty to one hundred (according to size) first-class iron steamers and prepare fifty ship-yards or more to multiply tenfold this production if required.

When legislation has completed this work there will come an era of commercial prosperity, such as came to our internal commerce when the two great parties of 1856 indorsed internal improvements by recommending Government aid for the construction of the railroad to the Pacific.

What have we not done since by legislation to build up internal commerce? I quote the language of Senator BLAINE, in the Senate, January 28:

> During these years, in which Congress has not stepped forward to do one thing for the foreign commerce of this country, for all that vast external transportation whose importance the Senator from Kentucky has not exaggerated but has strongly depicted, the same Congress has passed ninety-two acts in aid of internal transportation by rail; has given 200,000,000 acres of the public lands, worth to-day a thousand million dollars in money, and has added $70,000,000 in cash, and yet, I repeat, it has extended the aid of scarcely a single dollar to build up our foreign commerce.

In conclusion, let me say our builders of wooden ships need no nursing in order to compete with the world. All they require is the repeal of those laws and impositions that are justly obnoxious to the charge of being unequal and burdensome and against our civilization.

Now, that iron is to rule the world, let us make its power our own. Possessing it in larger quantities than any other country of the world, let us successfully work it into plates, as we have into rails, until our abundant supply shall again give us our former position on the ocean.

Mr. Speaker, I can see hopeful signs of a change. From the savannas, prairies, and the mountains of our vast country comes one universal wish for a restored American marine. We are great in production, great in internal commerce, and the whole country is now looking with anxious hopes for some truly American mode of building up our shipping interest, and of making it our principal arm of defense in war and our proudest boast in peace. Why should we not hope for a glorious future for our marine? What is there in the material world that we have grappled with that has not succeeded, when our labor and industry has been untrammeled? What have not the last fifty years accomplished? If the railroad and telegraph have grown from doubtful experiments to be giants in our land, let us change the direction of our enterprise to the more important interest, that of our ocean commerce, so long prosperous, now endangered by an opponent so manifestly our inferior in resources, so far behind us in government and human enterprise. Gentlemen, this aggregation of individuality, this American world of diversified humanity, speaks to-day, discordantly it is true, but earnestly, for that which is all important, the dominion of the seas.

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. H. BISBEE, JR.,

OF FLORIDA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. BISBEE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: There have been opinions expressed upon this floor in favor of an apportionment that would give the State of Florida but one member; and for this reason, if for no other, I think it is my duty to speak in her behalf.

One theory upon which representation in the popular branch of Congress is based is, that no congressional district should extend over so large a territory nor embrace so many people as to render it impossible for a member to become acquainted with their wants and interests and promote their welfare by securing proper legislation.

This, it is true, cannot always be done in new States under constitutional restrictions, but it is a principle in our system not to be lost sight of.

The area of Florida is larger than that of any other State in the Union east of the Mississippi River. She has as yet but two main lines of railroad, one extending from Jacksonville, on the Saint John's River, westward to the Chattahoochee River, to be extended, we hope, very soon to Mobile, Alabama; the other, extending from Fernandina, on the Atlantic, to Cedar Key, on the Gulf of Mexico, with a branch line projected and partially completed from Waldo, Alachua County, to Tampa Bay. Her inland water transportation is at present chiefly on the Saint John's River and its tributaries, which are navigable by ocean and river steamboats over 600 miles in the aggregate. In view of her enormous area, the facilities for travel and transportation are yet insufficient to afford easy and rapid intercourse among her people, which, according to the late census, number 267,351. If, then, there is any force in the argument that the districts should be so constructed that the Representative may hope to be acquainted with the varied industries of the people he represents, the State of Florida has the right to appeal to Congress not to pass an apportionment bill that will give her but one member. But she has the legal right to two Representatives upon any basis of apportionment which any of the bills reported from the committee or introduced into the House have adopted.

Whether the number of members be fixed at 293, 301, 307, 311, 319, or any intermediate number, the State of Florida is entitled to two members, for the reason that the ratio obtained by dividing the population of all the States by any one of these numbers leaves a fraction greater than a moiety of the ratio. There can be no just or constitutional apportionment that does not give to every State having such a fraction an additional member. Great efforts have been made and much ingenious reasoning applied to exclude fractions from being considered at all. The very able and industrious Superintendent of the Census, General Walker, has given us the result of some tables of figures. In his letter addressed to Hon. S. S. COX, on the 15th of January last, he says:

> If this number be exceeded, (the number arbitrarily selected to compose the House,) as in the case of assignment of additional Representatives on account of a moiety, the ratio of representation is thereby changed, whether that excess be one or more, as new ratio is determined, and the work has to be done all over again. It might easily happen that upon the new ratio another State would be found to have a fraction in excess of the moiety, and therefore entitled upon the same principle to an additional Representative.

And then another ratio may be determined, and so on without end. This reasoning may be very interesting as an intellectual exercise, but is of no practical importance. The minority of the committee having this subject in charge have reported a bill for 319 members of the House, which leaves no moiety unrepresented, and leaves no just cause of complaint on the part of any State. If we leave a moiety unrepresented I do not think we obey the Constitution, which requires that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers." This clause of the Constitution, as I shall subsequently show, has been interpreted by that great master of constitutional law, Daniel Webster, to mean that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers," as near as may be. Each State must have its proportionate share of representative power as near as practicable; and nothing less than this meets the constitutional requirements.

I cannot agree to the theory upon which the bill reported by the majority of the committee giving 311 members is framed. Upon the same theory a bill has been introduced, discussed, and favored by some giving 301 members. This bill is constructed by dividing the total population of all the States, to wit, 49,369,595, by 301. This gives a quotient of 164,018 which is taken as a ratio or basis of apportionment. But when the population of each State is divided in turn by this ratio the result is on even division but 281 members, 20 less than the proposed number, 301, which the House is to contain; and this additional number of 20 is made up by arbitrarily assigning another member to the twenty States that have the largest fraction. This is purely an arbitrary process, without any guiding rule or principle whatever. In this manner Rhode Island has assigned her 2 members, 1 of which is given her for a fraction of 112,510, but Florida has assigned her but 1 member, though she has a fraction of 103,333 which it is proposed to leave unrepresented entirely by those who advocate a less number of Representatives than 302.

Now, there can be no reason given why Rhode Island should have an additional member for a fraction of 112,510, and Florida should not have a member for her fraction of 103,333. No gentleman can assign any reason formed in justice for such a discrimination against the State of Florida and in behalf of the people of that State. I protest against such a discrimination and such a result. I have taken Rhode Island to illustrate the wrong and injustice, and, as I contend, the violation of the Constitution itself. But the same comparison could be made with Alabama, Connecticut, Illinois, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Nebraska, Texas, and West Virginia, each of which States in a House of 301 members gets an additional member for fractions ranging from 114,668 to 130,629.

The injustice of apportioning the representative power of the nation in such a manner is too glaring to require any extended argument to expose it. Any method that produces absurd results is an improper method. In Florida you would have a fraction of 103,333 unrepresented, while you would give an additional member for a fraction of 112,510 to Rhode Island, thus virtually assigning 1 member for 9,177 people, the difference between the fractions of the two States.

Mr. Webster's report on this subject in the Senate in April, 1832, presents the true rule of apportionment. He says:

> The Constitution, therefore, must be understood not as enjoining an absolute relative quality—because that would be demanding an impossibility—but as requiring of Congress to make the apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers as near as may be. That which cannot be done perfectly must be done in a manner as near perfection as can be. * * * Congress is not absolved from all rule merely because the rule of perfect justice cannot be applied. In such a case approximation becomes a rule; it takes the place of that other rule, which would be preferable, but which is found inapplicable and becomes itself an obligation of binding force.

After arguing that the only way to conform to the requirements of the Constitution is to give an additional member to each State having a fraction greater than one-half of the common divisor, the number taken as the basis of representation, Mr. Webster said:

> The rule has been frequently applied. It may be clearly expressed in either of two ways. Let the rule be, that the whole number of the proposed House shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective number, giving to each State that number of members which comes nearest to her exact mathematical part or proportion; or, let the rule be that the population of each State shall be divided by a common divisor, and that in addition to the number of members resulting from such division, a member shall be allowed to each State whose fraction exceeds a moiety of a divisor. Either of these is, it seems to the committee, a fair and just rule capable of uniform application and operating with entire impartiality.

Now the bill reported by the minority of the committee, fixing the whole number of Representatives at 319, conforms to this rule, and gives an additional member to each State having a fraction greater than a moiety of the divisor, to wit, 154,764. Dividing the country into North and South—and it is useless to disguise the fact that such sectional division will be considered—the bill giving 319 members preserves the relative strength of the two sections in the electoral college, for it adds thirteen to the Northern States and thirteen to the Southern States, and from a sectional stand-point cannot be reasonably objected to. Believing this bill to be as just and fair and as free from objection as any that can be formed, and that it is constitutional, I shall vote for it, if I am required to vote for any apportionment during this Congress.

But I am opposed to the passage of any apportionment bill at this session of Congress. There is no necessity for it. It is true, most of the Northern States, all but one I believe, have republican Legislatures now, and if an apportionment bill becomes a law this session, such Legislatures will have the redistricting the States into congressional districts. It may be thought this would give some partisan advantage to the republican party. But this by no means necessarily follows. In the Northern States, the unjust division of the States into congressional districts—gerrymandering as it is termed—by either party, is generally rebuked by the people at the first election thereafter. We cannot and ought not to regard any such contemplated partisan advantage, as a reason for making the apportionment now, to the neglect of other important business pending before this Congress. The census has just been placed before us. It is understood that the calculations and consolidation of returns have been hurriedly made by the Census Bureau, in order that the present Congress could make an apportionment, and it may be that mistakes have been made in the additions of figures which a revision thereof would discover.

It is important that we should have a true and reliable census before us before final action is taken, and the country will be restless and discontented if an apportionment is made on any census subject to any doubt or uncertainty.

Besides, fraud is charged, and that the census has been swollen in some of the Southern States by the willful commission of fraud on the part of enumerators or supervisors. There should be ample time for the full investigation of this subject, that the charge may be refuted to the full satisfaction of all portions of the country.

Why this hot and unseemly haste? Perhaps the democratic party fancies that it is peculiarly qualified to perform this work. It has failed in everything else it has undertaken. It promised in 1874 to reduce the expenses of the Government, but has not been able to fulfill its promise. It promised to reduce taxes, but it has not suceeeded. It tried in 1876 to purchase electoral votes, but it found no republican electors who were purchasable. It tried to unseat a President through the Potter investigating committee of the Forty-fifth Congress, and in the attempt so completely exposed the villainy of Mr. Tilden and his corrupt attempt to secure the Presidency by bribery that he was found unfit for nomination to this high office in 1880. The democratic party promised fair elections, a free ballot, and an honest count, but the moment it got possession of both branches of Congress it commenced a gigantic struggle to repeal all the national election laws, without which honest elections in many portions of the country are impossible. It kept the country in turmoil and the business of the people unsettled for months by refusing appropriations to support the Government except on condition that the President would sign a bill to repeal those election laws which, in his judgment, were essential to guard the purity of the ballot-box. During this Congress it attempted to pass the Morgan concurrent resolutions, which would have clothed Congress with discretionary power to reject the electoral vote of any State, on any pretense, for partisan purposes. And it attempted to elect a President in 1880 by forgery in one section of the Union and by fraud in the other. Whether embarked in a good or a bad cause, the democratic party has met with disaster and defeat, because the intelligent people of the country have lost all confidence in its patriotism and integrity.

It is not doubted that the democratic party is skillful in figures. It has demonstrated its capacity to calculate how much money must be drawn from the Treasury to convert brooks and creeks in close congressional districts that will not float a birch canoe into navigable streams. Its skill has been repeatedly displayed in counting out republican candidates in the Southern States, when it underestimated the amount of fraud, bulldozing, and crime necessary to secure their apparent defeat at the polls. These may be virtues that inspire the confidence of democratic constituencies, but among honest people they will not be accepted as a reason for trusting to a democratic Congress the distribution of the representative power of 50,000,000 of population in the Government of the United States.

The discussion on this subject of apportioning Representatives has taken a wide range, and excited not only partisan but sectional acrimony.

It is claimed by Representatives of the Northern States that the Southern States ought not to have that number of Representatives which their population entitled them to, for the reason that by fraud and violence the votes of republicans in many of those States are suppressed and destroyed.

I am not prepared to assent to this. That in many parts of the South the elections are a shameless farce and mockery, no honest man will deny; but I am unwilling to legislate on the theory that honest and fair elections in the South will always be impossible.

I am unwilling to admit that there is not power enough in the National Government and wisdom and courage enough on the part of those whose duty it is to execute its laws to so effectually enact and enforce national election laws that every legal voter shall be secure in his right to vote just once for Representative in Congress and to have that vote counted and returned as cast. The Constitution and the official census must be our guide in fixing the number of members of this House which each State shall have for the next ten years; and I cannot agree to the proposition suggested by some that we must withhold from certain States constitutional rights as a punishment for the crimes of individual citizens of those States, though such crimes are openly approved of and defended by the temper and policy of the democratic party. If in given localities Representatives are certified elected to Congress on a minority of the vote cast, through fraud, violence, usurpation, and crime, as they have been and were at the late election in many of the congressional districts in the Southern States, the House of Representatives ought not to allow, and it is its duty to refuse to allow, persons holding such certificates to take their seats as members of this body. For such action there are precedents; and by such action parties and persons are deprived of the fruits of fraud and crimes on the elective franchise without any disregard of the constitutional rights of States and their just share of representative power of the nation. Let the frauds by which candidates receiving a minority of the votes are certified elected be corrected through the Committee on Privileges and Elections and seats awarded to their opponents who received a majority of the votes cast and tendered to the officers of the election.

Such a policy and line of action will be sustained by the intelligent people of this country and by the friends of civil liberty and popular government throughout the world; but they will not approve of a disregard of constitutional obligations to give to each State representation according to its population.

To make the governments in the Southern States in fact what they are in theory will require all the skill, patient thought, forbearance, and courage of the statesmen of this generation. The theory of our government is based on intelligence and integrity, factors which exist only in a limited degree in many of the States of this Union. These defects cannot be removed by ignoring their existence.

The reconstructed States have all been in democratic hands since 1876. In Alabama, Florida, South Carolina, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana, and in portions of other Southern States, republican majorities have been overcome by fraud and violence, and on a minority vote the democratic party has acquired control. It is a question for thoughtful people to consider whether the masses of the people in those Southern States have made more rapid progress in intelligence or integrity since the democratic party obtained possession of them than they did under republican administration. If they have not, if we are not moving at swifter pace to this standard of intelligence and integrity of the people upon which popular government must exist, if at all, under democratic than we did under republican rule in the Southern States, then the methods and means by which the democratic party acquired and rely upon to continue in the possession of those States can no longer be justified nor find apologists.

It is self-evident that the party that established the common-school system in the Southern States against the opposition of the democratic party is more devoted to the education of all classes of children and to the cause of education itself than the latter. If proof is wanted, it will be found in the legislation of democratic legislatures during the past four years. In Florida, one of the first acts of the democratic party when restored to power was to prohibit the county commissioners from levying more than two mills and one-half school tax, while under republican administration they were authorized to levy five mills. Speaking generally, the dominant elements in the democratic party in the Southern States are opposed to being taxed to educate the children of the poor and the weak, and especially to educate the colored race. There are some marked and prominent exceptions, for there are a few of the more enlightened men among the democratic statesmen of the South who are really advocates of an efficient common-school system, but who have as yet acquired little or no influence over legislation on that subject. As to advancement in political integrity, it is not to be expected that the democratic party will make any progress in that direction as long as its leaders, its voters, its newspapers, and its managers teach the mass of its voters to treat the national election laws with contempt, and to evade and violate them if need be to secure democratic victories.

The party that secured power by stuffing the ballot-box and can perpetuate its power only by continuing to stuff ballot-boxes and by other frauds and crimes on the elective franchise cannot be expected to advocate fair elections and an honest count.

Resolutions of democratic conventions declaring for the freedom of the elective franchise are a sham and a mockery, and their shameless hypocrisy has been exposed so often that the most credulous will not again be deceived by them. This exposure has been so complete, so undeniable, and so humiliating that since the late election the Charleston News and Courier and a few other leading democratic journals of the South have practically admitted that in previous elections the majority have been disfranchised by the minority through violence, intimidation, and fraud.

At first these crimes were denied. When so conclusively proven that the boldest man could no longer deny them, they were justified on the plea of necessity, to prevent what they are pleased to term negro domination. But more recently some of the southern democratic journals are seriously wrestling with the problem of how to maintain in power a political party on a minority of the votes without disfranchising the majority and without neutralizing the votes of any by fraud and violence. The problem, plainly stated, is how 5 can be divided by 7 and leave a whole number for a quotient. This is the question which the genius of democracy is endeavoring to answer.

The fact that such a question has been raised for consideration indicates some progress, or at least an attempt or desire for improvement, and is encouraging to the friends of manhood suffrage and to republican government.

The strength of the democratic party in the South is in the cry of "negro domination." So skillfully have the leaders of the democratic party in the South nursed the race prejudice and magnified what they regard as the evils of the negro race participating in the administration of the laws of the State that white men, republicans and old whigs, have been alarmed and terrified, and, though opposed to the democratic party with respect to its fundamental principles, have cast their votes for democratic candidates.

A little investigation would have shown that there was no just cause of apprehension or fear of "negro domination." Certainly none in the State of Florida; for in this State the colored people are not in excess of the whites. Under the present apportionment of the members of the Legislature the blacks could not if they desired elect a majority of the Legislature. There are but eight counties in the State where the colored voters have a majority, and if they nominated and elected all colored men to the Legislature, they would have but thirty-four members of that body out of a total number of one hundred and nine. At the late election there was but one colored man on the general ticket, and he was a candidate for Congress, and yet people were terrified into the support of democratic candidates by appeals to their prejudices to race, and by the terrible consequences that were predicted as the result of negro rule!

Negro rule was the democratic battle cry in Mississippi in 1875, and it was there that frauds, intimidation, and violence were first openly justified on the plea of necessity to prevent negro and carpet-bag domination, and to restore honest and economical Government to the people of that State. Such were the pretenses which the democrats n Mississippi made to justify a resort to force, violence, and murder of leading republicans in 1875. Let us look into the honesty and purity of the government of the State of Mississippi prior to the ascendency of the republican party in that State, and the economy of its administration.

Defalcations of collectors of the revenue:

In 1838, 13 tax collectors, defaulters in the total sum of..	$23,533 38
In 1839, 21 tax collectors, defaulters in the total sum of..	32,859 25
In 1840, 28 tax collectors, defaulters in the total sum of..	26,980 00
In 1841, 36 tax collectors, defaulters in the total sum of..	96,617 00
Total in four years	179,989 63
In 1843 Mr. Greaves, State treasurer, defaulted in the sum of	165,447 07
Total in six years	345,436 70

Or over fifty-six thousand dollars a year, nearly enough to pay the interest of the $1,000,000 in repudiated Mississippi bonds which Mr. Peabody bequeathed to a trust fund with which to educate the children of the South. During these defaults Governor McNutt, of Mississippi, used this language in one of his messages:

> Not more than one-half of the taxable property in the State is ever assessed, and large portions of the taxes collected are never paid into the treasury.

In 1858 John Malloy, auditor, defaulted in the sum of $54,077.96. In 1866 A. D. Haynes, State treasurer, defaulted in the sum of $61,962.38. So it seems that in official integrity the State of Mississippi, up to the date of reconstruction, ought to hide its head in shame rather than boast of its honesty and purity in the halls of Congress.

It may be confidently asserted that the Haynes defalcation under the Johnson administration of 1876 was greater than the total defalcations under republican rule from the date of reconstruction to the close of 1875, when the democrats obtained possession of the State; and yet dishonest carpet-bag government and negro rule was made the pretense to justify the crimes and frauds committed to crush out republican governments in that State.

The following is a table showing the expenses of the State government of Mississippi from 1857 to 1867, under democratic rule, and for the years of 1874 and 1875, under the republican administration that was destroyed by shot-guns and murder:

Year.	Expenses of State.
Under democratic rule:
1857	$736,531
1858	614,659
1859	740,015
1860	663,536
1861	1,824,161
1862	6,819,894
1863	2,210,794
1864	5,546,732
1865	1,410,250
1866	1,860,800
Under republican rule:
1874	908,330
1875	618,259

This is the record. But this is not all. Under democratic rule the State issued its bonds to the amount of $7,000,000 to the Union Bank and Planters' Bank of that State. After they had been negotiated and sold she repudiated them. And when the banks attempted to collect the money loaned to the citizens of the State by foreclosing mortgages given to secure the loans, the Legislature passed an act authorizing writs of quo warranto to be used to forfeit their charters, under which said charters were forfeited. Thus the bondholders were swindled out of their money by repudiation, and the banks were legislated out of existence to prevent them from collecting from the citizens of the State the money that had been lent to them in good faith.

What State under carpet-bag or negro rule exhibits so infamous a financial record as this? Yet the democracy of this State enjoys the proud distinction of having patented in 1875 the memorable campaign of shot-guns, violence, and murder as justifiable measures to restore to Mississippi a pure, honest, and cheap government!

And a distinguished Representative from the State of Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] forgetting the history of his State and the intelligence of the people of this country, in a speech in this House on the 5th day of February last, employed the following language:

> In 1875 we changed our form of government of the Southern States. How? Not by the white vote alone, because that could not be done; but because the governments which had been established by "carpet-bag" and alien rule, under a law passed by the Congress of the United States, had been found so burdensome in the taxes which they imposed upon the people that every man, whether one of the loftiest intelligence or the humblest citizen, felt the oppression of those governments, felt that they had become too onerous to be borne. * * * No wonder the southern people, colored people as well as white, rose up in opposition to a form of government which had become intolerable.

Intolerable only because Mississippi democrats had never been instructed in the first lessons of free speech, and would not willingly tolerate the best government on earth if it was not in the hands of the democratic party.

The financial record of the State of Mississippi completely refutes the assertion that revolution in 1875 was justifiable to relieve the people of the oppression of a republican administration. The speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] from which the above extract is taken was intended to convey the impression that the colored voter of this State from choice and in the free exercise of the elective franchise voted the democratic ticket in 1875, in order to relieve themselves from a government that in profligacy, corruption, and excessive taxation had become intolerable.

But in point of fact the campaign of that year was organized on the basis of fraud and violence and threats of starvation to all laborers who did not vote the democratic ticket, and was remorselessly conducted to the end by the employment of those methods.

The following extracts from a democratic newspaper published in Mississippi during that eventful campaign, for which I am indebted to a speech of the late Senator Morton, delivered in the Senate January 19, 1876, prove that the lives not only of colored but white republicans were openly and publicly threatened if they did not abandon their organizations and cease all opposition to the "white line" democracy. These extracts will repay reproduction and perusal, and they are fitting illustrations of the Mississippi plan, which has been adopted with terrible effect in other Southern States:

Our correspondent at Running Water Mills makes his points well. His positions cannot successfully be contradicted. The miserable bunglers who have put the negro in the Constitution have certainly written themselves down asses all. When we accept "results of the war," we do not accept the notion of statesmen, but the blunders of unreasoning malice and stupidity, and of course we continue to accept it only so long as we are compelled to.—Meridian Mercury.

I read now from the Aberdeen True Republican, being a report of a speech by Colonel C. E. HOOKER, member of Congress from Mississippi, at Aberdeen, during the late canvass:

"Colonel HOOKER, of Jackson, then addressed the convention in a speech of over an hour, in which he advocated the color-line, and said, in conclusion: 'White men must and shall rule in Mississippi.'"

Vote the negro down or knock him down.

Does not the very thought boil the blood in every vein? Will you still contend that we must not have a white man's party? Away with such false doctrines; we must and will have a white man's party. We have tried policy long enough. We must organize on the color-line, disregarding minor considerations. The white man's party is the only salvation for the State. Show the negro his place and make him keep it. If we cannot vote him down, we can knock him down, and the result will be the same. Either the white man or negro will rule this country; they cannot both do it, and it is for the white men to say who the ruler shall be. Let us have a white man's party to rule a white man's country, and to do it like white men.—Mississippi News.

Colored men, remember that next Tuesday is your golden opportunity. Throw it away and the white people will eliminate you from politics and discard you forever. The Congress already elected is democratic; the next President of the United States will be a democrat; and after next Tuesday this State and county will be democratic. You have no hope and no salvation but in acting with the democratic party in this contest. Will you do it?—Vicksburgh Herald.

Below we give a list of the presidents of the negro clubs in this county. In the coming election these must be marked men. We request every beat committee to save this list for future reference.—Columbus Index.

Let unanimity of sentiment pervade the minds of men. Let invincible determination be depicted on every countenance. Send forth from our deliberate assembly of the eighteenth the soul-stirring announcement that Mississippians shall rule Mississippi though the heavens fall. Then will woe, irretrievable woe, betide the radical tatterdemalions. Hit them hip and thigh, everywhere and at all times.

Carry the election peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must.

* * * * * * *

There is no radical ticket in the field, and it is more than likely there will be none. For the leaders are not in this city, and dare not press their claims in this county.—Yazoo Democrat.

The present contest is rather a revolution than a political campaign; it is the rebellion, if you see fit to apply that term.—Aberdeen Examiner.

Spot the men who try to defeat the will of the people next Tuesday, and remember them hereafter.—Vicksburgh Herald.

The democratic conservative club at Rocky Springs, Claibourne County, on Saturday last discussed the question of renting lands, advancing supplies, and employing men in the year 1876 who voted the radical ticket in 1875. It was finally determined that no member of the club should rent or advance to or employ any but members of the democratic conservative party, and any employed men who voted the radical ticket at the late election should be discharged at the expiration of the year unless they came forward voluntarily and joined the club and promise henceforth to act openly with the friends of honest and good government.

Is it not time that the Raymond club should take some definite action on this subject? We are to have a presidential election in 1876, and in 1877 a governor and all the State officers are to be elected. Our triumph in 1875, great as it certainly is, will not be complete unless we repeat it in 1876 and again in 1877.—Raymond Gazette, December, 1875.

Colonel R. O. Reynolds, our noble standard-bearer in this senatorial district, sounded the key-note of the campaign in his brief but telling speech at Buena Vista last Thursday, when he said that his platform hereafter was that "whoever eats the white man's meat must vote with the white man or refrain from voting at all;" and the immense applause with which this sentiment was greeted showed that he had reached the heart of every auditor.—Aberdeen Examiner.

Remember that you solemnly pledged yourselves, each to each and one to the other, that after the expiration of your present contracts and leases you would neither rent land to nor employ any lessee or laborer, "without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude," who sanctioned the oppression under which you and your dear ones groaned by his voice on the 2d of November; that inasmuch as it was impossible for many of you to make a clean sweep on the 1st of January, you each and every one of you agreed not to lease land or hire one-third of those now your tenants and employés who disdained your proffered friendship, and that no one of you would contract with, as landlord or employer, any laborer or tenant who so refused.

This solemn pledge was made in the hour of danger; it was made for the salvation of all that you held sacred and dear; and you are not true men to yourselves or your country if you do not stand by it now that the storm has passed.—Aberdeen Examiner.

Resolutions adopted by the McCondy Store Club, Chickasaw County.

Resolved, 2. That we organize ourselves into a company, for in time of peace we should prepare for war.

Resolved, 3. That we pledge ourselves individually and collectively not to employ in any manner, for any purpose, directly or indirectly, any man, black or white, who casts his vote with the so-called republican party at the next election.

Resolved, 4. That if any member of this club fails to comply with the provisions of the last resolution he be expelled from the club, and his name be published in the Messenger and Southern States.

How it is done in Chickasaw County.

The democratic clubs of this county are requested to meet at their respective club rooms on Saturday, November 13. Every member will at that meeting give to the secretary of this club a list of the names of his employés with whom he does not expect to make contracts next year. The secretaries of the different clubs will please forward a complete list of these names to the secretary of this committee.

D. P. BLACK,
Chairman Democratic Executive Committee.

A republican victory in Mississippi this fall means 10,000 laboring men out of work and out of food.—Vicksburgh Herald.

Are those who are to be turned off for voting the republican ticket included in this number?—Jackson Times.

That's the understanding in this part of the country.—Aberdeen Examiner.

Men who employ hands or rent lands or advance supplies on crops yet have the right in Mississippi to employ, to rent land, and to advance to whom they please. They are not compelled to contract with radicals, and they may refuse to do so if they think proper. Men do not often willingly feed and provide for their enemies.—Raymond Gazette.

These quotations from the democratic press of Mississippi are made, not for the purpose of exciting sectional animosity and sectional hate, but to expose the hypocrisy that represents the elections in that State as peaceful and fair and that the colored people voluntarily voted the republican ticket.

It is more honorable to admit, frankly and boldly, that the democratic party in the South resort to force, violence, and fraud to carry elections, and as boldly defend it, than to attempt to deceive the country into the belief that the colored republicans of the South have abandoned the party that gave them liberty and clothed them with the rights of citizens.

Every position taken and every prediction made by the leaders of the democratic party at the close of the war of the rebellion with respect to the negro race in the South has been proven to be false. It was predicted confidently that in a state of freedom, without owners to care for and protect them, the blacks would rapidly diminish in population; but the late census shows that they have increased more rapidly than the white race. It was claimed that they would become idle, vagrant, and vagabond; but the products of their labor have increased in volume and value from year to year, and their taxable property at every annual assessment attests their economy and industry. It was asserted by their late owners that they were incapable of mental improvement; but the increasing number of their representative men in public station, and teachers of their own race in the public schools, as well as the increase in attendance of colored children in such schools, have established the contrary.

There are now over six million of the negro race in the United States and over five million in the former slave States. They constitute nearly one-eighth of the population and one-eighth of the voters in this country. They are republicans for the reason that the republican party is regarded by them as both their redeemer and their savior. The supreme law, the Constitution of the United States, has conferred upon them equal civil and political rights. The republican party contends that the law shall be enforced, and that those rights shall become real, substantial things; while the democratic party contends that the law shall not be enforced, and that, as a means for democratic victories, they shall be disfranchised and their votes suppressed. In proportion as their rights of citizenship and their elective franchise is maintained and secured, the strength of the republican party will be increased; and in proportion as their rights are suppressed, the strength of the democratic party will be increased. This struggle will go on, but in the end the democratic party will surrender, as they have on other questions during the past twenty years.

The contest is an unequal one. The republicans have the law, justice, and eternal right on their side, and the intelligence and wealth of the country, and the 6,000,000 of colored people themselves to support them; while the democrats have the lust for power, the assumption of superior ability to govern, and a cultivated prejudice against the negro race to support their side of the issue. When this question has become settled, when the franchise of republicans in the South is held as sacred as in the North, then, and not till then, will there be a true and lasting peace, and sectional agitation be eliminated from national politics.

Interstate Commerce.

REMARKS OF HON. P. V. DEUSTER,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 22, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4748) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce.

Mr. DEUSTER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to ask kind indulgence for a few explanatory remarks defining my views upon the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas. Let me do him the justice to say that he deserved well of the whole country, not merely his particular section, for bringing this important subject to the attention of Congress, and urging with the fidelity and earnestness which a good cause always deserves such legislation as he honestly believes to bring the relief sought and needed. If his efforts are not crowned with success, he will at least always be entitled to the proud distinction of having honestly striven to secure important benefits and long-needed relief to the agrarian and commercial interests of every section of our country. But there are various, and, as it seems to me, weighty reasons why the amendment proposed by my friend, the gentleman from Texas, should not supersede the bill reported after earnest and careful consideration by the majority of the Committee on Commerce. I claim for myself the same honesty of purpose which characterizes my friend, and I have made every due and intelligent effort to inform myself upon this important question.

I will not trespass upon the patience of the House by repeating those objections advanced by others and more effectually than I could have done, or urging the advantages of the bill matured by the committee over the original bill, all the main features of which are embodied in this amendment.

It is a common experience in legislation that too great severity in prohibitive measures generally defeats the very objects for which it is enacted. It seems to me that this amendment, in some of its provisions, suffers from this danger. The principal objection that I must urge here, as I did in the committee, is that against the fourth section, prohibiting discriminating rates within one locomotive haul. The fourth section of the amendment does not attempt to impose upon railroads the obligation to adopt any reasonable schedule of rates for intermediate points, nor to prohibit any increase in through rates to correspond to the high rates maintained between intermediate points; nor to prohibit the grading, assorting, and imposition of requirements in delivery, storage, and other evasive methods of raising the expenses of shippers at intermediate points, or separating their charges of loading, packing, and other incidental work from the item of freight, or carriage upon the rail, or the continuous line of transport of property, which is not clearly defined as "a car-load of similar property." This provision alone, seemingly crushing any resistance to the measure, leaves any number of loop-holes for any company to crawl out of the restrictions of the amendment.

The fourth section of the proposed substitute makes it unlawful to charge a greater compensation per car-load for carrying the same for a shorter than a longer distance. At first sight this rule appears plausible and perfectly right in principle, and everybody will admit at once that it is a grave wrong to charge more for a shorter than for a longer haul. Upon careful examination one will find that this rule corroborates in the fullest sense of the word the old Latin proverb, Summum jus, summa injuria—the greatest right may also be the greatest wrong.

The rule is unjust and decidedly against the interests of cities like Chicago, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, Saint Paul, and many other places, where numerous railroad lines compete not only with each other, but with the cheaper water transportation; and where each road, in striving to build up and maintain its own commerce and its commercial supremacy, is often compelled to carry freight to the seaboard for less than a reasonable rate, and thereby secures to the points named, on account of the existing competition in transportation, advantages which are beneficial not to those cities alone, but to all the producers in their neighborhood.

While I am anxious to secure legislation against charging extortionate and unreasonably high rates, not only from intermediate but from all points, I cannot give my assent to the manner in which this fourth section proposes to remedy the evil. Everybody will admit that freight can be carried for less by water than by rail. When we admit this, shall we prohibit railroads at such points from charging a less amount than from places where there is no such competition with transportation by water? Remedy the evil of extortion by any means, but not at the cost of discrimination against the western cities which are striving to build up a large market, not only for the productions of the West, but also those of the East.

There is no question in my mind but that the purport of this very provision in the substitute has been devised in the interests of the cities on the seaboard, and by the jealousy of designing men, whose aim it is to centralize the commerce of our broad country in the seaboard cities. Let us inquire whether this is true. Last year the Assembly of New York appointed a committee of nine members, with Hon. A. B. Hepburn as chairman, for the investigation of railroad management. The investigations of this committee lasted very nearly nine months. The report says, (page 48:)

> The charge that the railroads of this State discriminate against the citizens of this State and in favor of the western and foreign producers is fully proven by the evidence taken.

A gentleman of New York, connected with the board of trade and transportation of that city, who takes a deep interest in the passage of the substitute under consideration, said:

> It is wrong that the farmers of this State should be charged for transporting their produce a rate proportionately three or four hundred per cent. higher than those of the Mississippi Valley.

The New York Evening Express says:

> The present system of railway discrimination virtually puts every farmer in New York west of the Mississippi.

The Lake Shore News complains thus:

> The Central road alone has made poor men of thousands of New York farmers by reducing transportation from the West to a figure lower than it can be had from the State of New York.

The Patriot and Gazette says:

> The discrimination against our own State [New York] is telling heavily on the farmers. Their lands have declined very largely and are still declining. With the most rigid economy and with the most exacting labor they are constantly growing poorer and poorer. If a barrel of flour can be carried from Chicago to the seaboard cheaper than it can be carried from Oswego, then wheat at Oswego is not worth as much as it is at Chicago.

And then asks the following question:

> Shall the railroads be so perverted as to be made to build up Illinois at the expense of New York, or shall it be made to prove a benefit and a blessing to the State from which it derives all of its power?

The same paper, Patriot and Gazette, in another extract, says:

> The railroads of this State are carrying freight from the West at rates far below those charged on all the above productions of this State, and the result is no farmer or manufacturer is able to hold his own against the competition from the West, aided as it is by the low rates of freight there obtained.

And then states that while flour is carried by all rail from Milwaukee to New York for thirty-six cents per barrel, the charge from Rochester to New York is thirty cents.

The Long Island Farmer says:

> Grain, flour, butter, and cheese are brought from the Mississippi Valley to New York, 1,200 miles, for less than half the freight exacted from farmers living within one hundred and fifty miles of the city, thus practically removing their farms 1,000 miles further from the market, subjecting them to a portion of the expenses for transporting the products of the West, and reducing by one-third the cash value of their land.

The Yonkers Statesman says:

> Our railroads are being run in the interests of the Western States.

These quotations show an intense feeling in the East, claiming that railroads are discriminating against them and that the people of the West receive cheaper transportation in the aggregate than the people of eastern States. The western people have no obligations to the railway companies for transporting their freight at lower rates. Fortunately they are so situated that they are not compelled to pass their products over one road to the seaboard. They enjoy not only the advantage of many competing lines of railroads, but, what is more beneficial, they can ship and receive their freight at cheap rates by way of the lakes or the Mississippi River. The fourth section actually prohibits the competition of the railroad companies with this cheaper medium of transportation; and, unless this section is modified, I cannot vote for the bill, being convinced that it is injurious not only to the people I represent, but to the whole West.

While I entertain no sectional feelings, I cannot support the endeavor of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation to build up and maintain the commercial supremacy for New York at the expense of the West. That the fourth section, to which I entertain the only serious objection, is a blow aimed at the growth and enterprise of western cities is only too clearly shown in the foregoing quotations. If the charges for freight from Rochester, Buffalo, and other points in the State of New York are exorbitant, has not the Legislature of that State, under whose charters these railways obtained their franchises, a right to remedy this evil, without calling for national legislation? Suppose the case that the substitute of the gentleman from Texas should become a law, so that railroad companies would be deprived of competing with the cheaper transportation by water. Would this cheapen the carrying of freight from intermediate points? Might it not have the opposite tendency? The bill does not provide for a just tariff of charges for carrying freight from any point whatsoever.

There were many people, even in my own State, expressing themselves in favor of this amendment. And further, to my utter astonishment, the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee passed a resolution in favor of the Reagan bill, but soon after, to my gratification, declared themselves opposed to the fourth section of the same. The resolutions first passed by that body are an identical copy of the resolutions recently adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of New York, one of whose most prominent members had declared that "it is wrong that the farmers of this State (New York) should be charged for transporting their produce at a rate proportionately three or four hundred per cent. higher than those of the Mississippi Valley." The only explanation I could find for this act of the Chamber of Commerce in my own city is in the fact that I at first approved of the Reagan bill in all its particular provisions until a gentleman of the highest ability and well versed in railroad matters called my attention to the fourth section and its consequences, detrimental to the development of the West.

This gentleman, I desire to state, is not a railroad man in the true sense of the word, although as well versed in railroad matters as any man in the Union. This gentleman is Hon. Theophilus French, Auditor of Railroad Accounts in the Department of the Interior, whose duty it is to examine the books and accounts of each railroad to which the United States has granted any loan of credit or subsidy in bonds or lands, and to see that the laws relating to said companies are enforced. It cannot be said of this efficient officer, who has yearly saved hundreds and thousands of dollars to the United States, that he is in sympathy with the railroad managers of this country, as it is his duty to watch over a large portion of them, and report and inform, under an act of Congress of June 19, 1878, the several Departments of the Government in regard to tariffs for freight and passengers, and in regard to the accounts of said railroad companies as may be by them required, or, in the absence of any request therefor, as he may deem expedient for the interests of the Government.

I afterward found that the statements made to me by the Auditor of Railroad Accounts were fully corroborated by various gentlemen who appeared before our committee. It was for these reasons that I considered it my duty as one of the Representatives of the West to oppose the Reagan bill after my amendment to the fourth section had been defeated. And the same reasons will guide me on the floor of this House if my amendment, which provides that all points shall be excluded where railroads are obliged to compete with transportation by water, is not adopted. Adopt this amendment, and I will readily vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. Without the adoption of this, my amendment, I feel bound to vote against the bill. As I remarked before, the people of the West do not thank the railroads for cheaper transportation to the seaboard. There are many just and loud complaints of extortions by railroad companies; but they are mostly in the local rates, which can and ought to be remedied by the different State Legislatures.

In conclusion, I again repeat that nearly all the important shipping-points from which the productions of the West—grain, flour, cattle, pork—are to be moved to the seaboard are either located upon the shore of a lake or stream available for shipments of these productions, at least during certain seasons of the year. Shall we prevent railroads, in the interest of competing water-routes, from contracting, after shipments of all kinds of goods to the West, such as clothing, groceries, hardware, coal, and so on, for return freight of the products of the West upon the same terms as those offered by cheap water transportation to eastern markets, and thus compel them to haul their cars back empty. I think the return of loaded cars, transporting the products of the West over immense distances at low rates, assists also in cheapening the freight upon goods required in the West. Take, for instance, Chicago and Milwaukee on Lake Michigan, and Saint Louis, Saint Paul, Minneapolis, and other places on the Mississippi; can any railroad be expected to carry the products of its feeding points to the markets at such rates as the provisions of this section endeavor to establish, or tend to establish, and keep up a healthy competition with the water transportation from these points? I think not, and for this reason I have sought to eliminate those features of the section mentioned, calculated to defeat the very objects sought to be attained by the legislation proposed, by offering these amendments to the fourth section.

Permit me also to call attention to the next section requiring the rates for freight to be posted up at every point along the roads. It authorizes the roads to establish for such articles, and, along such continuous lines having no competition in transport, to charge ruinous or prohibitive prices; to make a rate in January that would amount to confiscation of the articles, according to market rates, in February if there should happen to be any delay in shipping, especially under the thousand and one injunctions or legal proceedings authorized to be instituted under this act, or enable the roads to change their schedules six times a month and while the property is on the roads and not contracted for by them for any longer period than twenty-four hours or only for the distance between one intermediate station and the next. All this I believe to have been avoided in the committee's bill, which I do not at all wish to be considered as lauding and praising as the very acme of perfection or the panacea for all the ills complained of, but which I believe to embody the best regulations of this vexed question so far as we can now judge.

The principal feature which commends it to the favorable consideration of this House is the provision, I think, appointing a permanent commission and clothed with full constitutional powers to regulate this subject; this gives us a responsible body of high officials, charged already with the performance of other official duties, and constituting a permanent, watchful board, ready to abolish at once impracticable regulations supplanting additional safeguards to the public interest and fully prepared to afford relief without burdensome and expensive litigation to our citizens, where the amendment proposes an unequal fight before sometimes far distant courts to the party considering himself aggrieved. After nearly fifty years of railroad legislation in our great sister nation across the briny deep, old England finds herself to-day best accommodated by such a commission as is proposed in the committee's bill, and I am one of those who believe that nations, like individuals, should profit by the experience of others instead of hiring that dear teacher themselves. I thank you for your kind attention.

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. J. R. CHALMERS,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. CHALMERS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This debate has taken a very wide range, and many of the speeches on the other side have been directed more to the elections in the South than to the questions really at issue. Again, sir, some of the leaders on the other side, Mr. KEIFER of Ohio, Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York, and Mr. HORR of Michigan, in the debate on the Yeates vs. Martin contested-election case, have given us to understand, in unmistakable language, that many democrats from the South whose seats are to be contested in the next House will be turned out. As notice of contest has been served upon me for my seat in the next House, and as this case has not only been greatly misrepresented, but tried and determined in the republican press, I take advantage of the leave granted by the House to meet these misrepresentations and show the true state of the cause.

In this case the questions to be settled are almost entirely questions of law, involving a construction of the election statutes of Mississippi, borrowed from other States and adopted in this for the first time in 1880. The principal question arises out of the action of the election officers in Warren County, where 2,049 ballots were not counted because they differed from the tickets prescribed by law. The one hundred and thirty-seventh section of the code of 1880 provides:

All ballots shall be written or printed in black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain white printing news paper, not more than two and one-half nor less than two and one-fourth inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket; but this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil-mark or ink upon the face of the ballot; and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted.

If this statute is merely directory, then the ballots rejected in Warren County could, in the discretion of the election officers, have been counted; but if this statute is mandatory, then neither the election officers of Warren County nor any other power could count these tickets without a direct violation of the law of Mississippi. If the law is mandatory, and not unconstitutional, it must be obeyed, not only by all election officers and courts of Mississippi but by the Congress of the United States, when determining the election of a member from Mississippi, chosen under this law.

To show that this law is not only not unconstitutional but simply declaratory of the spirit of the Constitution itself, I quote the following from Judge Cooley, one of the most eminent writers on constitutional law in the United States. Judge Cooley says:

The mode of voting in this country at all general elections is almost universally by ballot. The distinguishing feature of this mode of voting is that every voter is thus enabled to secure and preserve the most complete and inviolable secrecy in regard to the persons for whom he votes, and thus escape the influences which, under the system of oral suffrage may be brought to bear upon him, with a view to overbear and intimidate, and thus prevent the real expression of public sentiment. In order to secure as perfectly as possible the benefits anticipated from this system, statutes have been passed in some of the States which prohibit ballots being received or counted unless the same are written or printed upon white paper, without any mark or figures thereon intended to distinguish one ballot from another.

After giving this statement of the system, Judge Cooley proceeds to use this emphatic language:

These statutes are simply declaratory of a constitutional principle that inheres in the system of voting by ballot, and which ought to be inviolable, whether declared or not. In the absence of such a statute, all devices by which party managers are enabled to distinguish ballots in the hands of the voter, and thus determine whether he is voting for or against them, are opposed to the spirit of the Constitution, inasmuch as they tend to defeat the design for which voting by ballot is established.

Another distinguished law writer, Mr. George W. McCrary, author of The American Law of Elections, not only considers such a law constitutional, but recommended its adoption as a means of preventing fraud. In an article published in the North American Review, May, 1870, he says:

Another mode of cheating at elections is that known as the tissue-ballot fraud and other kindred contrivances, by means of which one person may deposit in the box a number of ballots. For this a plain, simple, and effectual remedy will be found in the enactment of a law prohibiting altogether the employment of such ballots, and forbidding the election board to count them if cast. This can be accomplished either by fixing the size of the tickets to be used or by requiring the voter to place his ballots in an envelope containing nothing else, and hand it thus to the officer authorized to receive it.

Again, Mr. McCrary says:

All devices by which the secrecy of the ballot is destroyed by means of colored paper used for ballots or by other similar means are exceedingly reprehensible, and, whether expressly prohibited by statute or not, should be discountenanced by all good citizens. (American Law of Elections, page 195; People vs. Cicott, 16 Michigan, 283.)

There can be no question, then, that such laws are constitutional. But it is intimated that while such laws are eminently constitutional in the North they are unconstitutional in the South, because the object and purpose to be attained is not the same. It is said the object in the North is to prevent others from distinguishing the voter's ballot, and that the object in the South is to prevent the voter from distinguishing his own ballot. This we deny. But if this were true it should make educated and patriotic citizens of the North pause before they would go further in forcing ignorant suffrage on the South. The ballot-box is morally stuffed and debauched when one man can cast 500 ballots through the hands of five hundred ignorant persons who vote by a mark. Such voting is a shameful travesty upon the elective franchise, and if such voting can be checked or limited by a rigid enforcement of a technical law no honest man should object. If the great republican leader of New York was right as to the general Government when he said the South should not rule the North because "the men who pay the taxes should say who should draw the drafts on the Treasury," then for the same reason the blacks should not rule the whites in the Southern States.

If A makes a law which creates ignorant voters and enables him to tax and govern B through the hands of persons who vote only as he tells them, B has certainly a right to protect himself by making laws which limit the powers of A to guide and control his ignorant herd.

But I insist that there are more colored democrats and more intelligent colored men in the sixth congressional district of Mississippi inclined to be independent voters than in any other district in the Union, and that they need and demand the protection against the persecutions of their own race which the secrecy of the ballot provided for in this law gives them. Such laws are enforced in England, and have been enacted for many years in the Northern States of this Union. The law of Mississippi was copied from the laws passed by the republican party in Ohio and New York, and no man has any right to say it was adopted for a good purpose in Ohio and for a bad purpose in Mississippi, or that it should be enforced in one State and not in the other. We are not called on now to discuss either the wisdom or the intent of the law. The only question for us to determine now is whether this law is merely directory and therefore may be disregarded, or whether it is mandatory and must be obeyed. McCrary, in American Laws of Elections, section 401, says:

It is quite clear where the statute distinctly declares that ballots having distinguishing marks upon them shall not be received or shall be rejected, it should be construed as mandatory and not merely directory.

There can be no doubt on this point as to the meaning of section 137 revised code of Mississippi, 1880. Its language is clear and distinct: "A ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted." The word prescribed is strong and is expressive of the legislative will and intent that this section should be literally complied with. Whenever a statute prescribes a form as of an indictment, or a deed, or an acknowledgment to a deed, or any other instrument, the form prescribed must be followed or the instrument will be null and void. If a statute prescribes three witnesses as necessary to a will devising real estate, it must be complied with or the will is void. If the law says no man shall vote unless registered or unless he offers his vote on the day and at the place and during the hours prescribed for holding the election, the law must be obeyed though thousands be deprived of the elective franchise. If the law says no man shall vote unless he can read and write or has paid his poll-tax, the law must be enforced though many be denied the privilege of voting. So, equally, if the law prescribes a form or a color for a ticket, no man has a right to vote unless he complies with the law; for it must be remembered that voting is a privilege conferred by written law and may be taken away by law for crime, and that it is not one of the natural and inherent rights of man, which are not conferred and cannot be taken away by legislation. And to show that this rule of strict construction is applicable to the right to vote as much as to any other right conferred by law I quote the following decision of Chief-Justice Lowrie in the case of Commonwealth vs. Meeser, 44 Pa. St. R., 343, and Brightley's Election Cases, 448:

No doubt there are very many cases in which a strict adherence to the letter of the law would be destructive of justice, and it is quite impossible for the law to define with precision all the customary rights of a people or to express exactly the duties arising from ever changing forms of social transactions. There is a very large field of social relations wherein the law, whether statutory or customary, must ever remain somewhat indefinite in order to be adapted to society. But is it so with our election law? We think not. All our electoral rights depend on written law, and it only can define them. It is true that written law depends itself on ulterior principles of natural law, but these principles are subject to very great diversities of application, and lack entirely that definiteness which is an essential quality of law as a rule of common or social conduct. Law is intended to be a definition of those principles, in such form as to fit them for a ready and ordinary use, and to avoid the disputes that necessarily grow out of more general principles, and nowhere is clear and precise definition more needed than in the laws that relate to the organization of society and to the maintenance of its organic forms. Form is the sole purpose of them, and we must view them formally and follow them strictly, else the whole society is apt to be disturbed. No latitude or looseness of administration of the law is tolerable when it endangers the peace and order of society; it ought to be so steady as not to be at all shaken by partisan excitements.

This doctrine that "form is the sole purpose" of election laws, and that "we must view them formally and follow them strictly," was followed and applied by Chief-Justice Tilghman, of Pennsylvania, to the very point now under consideration, to wit, the effect of marks to invalidate election tickets, and he declares that the law should be construed as written, and when the law says ballots having anything on them but the names shall not be counted, that ballots found with anything else on them must be rejected. (Commonwealth vs. Woelpen, 3 S. and R., 29.) This was a case arising out of a corporation election, and the form of ticket to be used in the election was prescribed in a by-law in the following words:

If besides the names there are other things on the ticket, or if two or more tickets are found together, such tickets are not to be read off and are not to be counted.

The opinion of the court was delivered by Chief-Justice Tilghman, one of the most eminent judges who ever sat on the bench in Pennsylvania. He says:

The tickets in favor of those persons who succeeded in the election had on them the engraving of an eagle. The judge who tried the case charged the jury that these tickets ought not to have been counted. The case is certainly within the words of the law. The tickets had something more than the names on them. But is it within the meaning of the law? I think it is. This engraving might have several ill effects. In the first place, it might be perceived by the inspector, even when folded. This knowledge might possibly influence him in receiving or rejecting the vote. But in the next place, it deprived those persons who did not vote the German ticket of that secrecy which the election by ballot was intended to secure to them. A man who gave in a ticket without an eagle was set down as an anti-German and exposed to the animosity of the party. Another objection is that the symbols of party increase that heat which it is desirable to assuage. We see that at the election some wore eagles in their hats. The case thus falling within the words and practices of this kind leading to inconvenience I think the court ought not exercise its ingenuity in support of these tickets. Let us at least prevent future altercations at elections by laying down such plain rules for the conduct of inspectors as cannot be mistaken. I am for construing the by-law as it is written, and rejecting all tickets that have anything on them more than the names. This objection strikes at the root of the election, for the evidence is that all the tickets in favor of the defendants were stamped with an eagle. Whatever, therefore, may be the law on other points, it is clear, upon the whole, that the defendants were not duly elected.

If you substitute the word "negro" for the word "German" this opinion could not be better written for this case. And when we call to mind the recent murderous attempts to assassinate Dan Hughes, the colored democrat, near Greenville, Mississippi, and the fierce intolerance of negro democrats by the negroes all over the Union, we appreciate the full value of the secret ballot to the negro who is inclined to vote against the prejudices of his race. And if it is the object and purpose to make free, intelligent, and independent voters of the negro race this protection should be thrown around them. Negro suffrage presents one of the most difficult questions in American politics, and all coercive measures to subdue the sentiments of the whites or stimulate aggressiveness in the blacks will irritate public opinion, retard the healing processes of time and render these difficulties tenfold greater. No statesman would recommend such a course. If, by the adoption of Ohio laws in Mississippi, intelligence acquires an advantage over ignorance, no honest patriot, for mere party gain, should seek to disturb that result.

The case of Druliner vs. State, 29 Indiana, which seems to limit distinguishing marks to exterior marks, turns upon a construction of the Indiana statute, which differs materially from the by-law quoted in the Pennsylvania case and also from the Mississippi statute in that it only prohibited marked tickets from being received and did not, as the Mississippi statute does, say that such ballots should not "be received or counted." Judge Elliott, in delivering the opinion of the court in this case, says:

The act requires all ballots to be written or printed on plain white paper, without any distinguishing marks or embellishments thereon, and makes it the duty of the inspector to refuse all ballots offered of any other description, but does not authorize the inspectors and judges to reject a ballot upon the discovery of such a mark or embellishment at the time of counting out the ballots which could not be seen by the inspector at the time it was voted.

The mark in this case was "The Union City ticket" printed at the head of the ticket, and the opinion of the court shows this was a distinguishing mark, and that the ticket should have been rejected if the Indiana statute had, as the Mississippi statute does, given power to refuse to count as well as to refuse to receive illegal ballots when discovered.

And further to show that I am right in this construction, I present the following from Hon. W. A. Field, of Massachusetts, late a member of the election committee of this House, and now a justice on the supreme bench of Massachusetts. In the contested-election case of Yeates vs. Martin, but recently decided by this House, Mr. Field, a leading republican, prepared the following, which was adopted by the majority of the election committee in their report:

One hundred and eight votes for Mr. Martin were thrown out and not counted, because they had on them the words "republican ticket," at or near the head of the ticket, on the same side as the name of the candidate and office. They were thrown out on the ground that the words "republican ticket" were a device within the meaning of the laws of North Carolina. Mr. Martin contends that these ballots should be counted for him.

Section 18, chapter 275 of the laws of North Carolina, 1877, provides:

"The ballots shall be on white paper and may be printed or written, or partly written and partly printed, and shall be without device.

"SEC. 20. When the election shall be finished the registrars and judges of election in presence of such of the electors as may choose to attend, shall open the boxes and count the ballots, reading aloud the names of the persons who shall appear on each ticket; and if there shall be two or more tickets rolled up together, or any ticket shall contain the names of more persons than such elector has a right to vote for, or shall have a device upon it, in either of these cases such tickets shall not be numbered in taking the ballots, but shall be void, and the said counting of votes shall be continued without adjournment until completed and the result thereof declared."

If these words constitute a device within the meaning of the law, the statute is plain that the ballots are void and are not to be counted. The counsel for the contestee, while denying that these words constitute a device, contends also that being on the inside of the ticket the case is within the decision of D——— vs. The State, (29 Indiana, 308,) and Napier vs. Mahew, (35 Indiana, 275.) See McCrary, section 404; Neff vs. Shanks, (Forty-third Congress.)

The statutes of Indiana provide:

"SEC. 18. When any person offers to vote the inspector shall pronounce his name in an audible voice, and if there be no objection he shall receive his ballot, and in the presence of the other judges put the same, unopened, into the ballot-box, when the name of such elector shall be again distinctly repeated by one of the other judges in the presence of the clerks."

"SEC. 23. That all ballots which may be cast at any election hereafter held in this State shall be written or printed on plain white paper, without any distinguishing marks or other embellishment thereon, except the name of the candidates and the office for which they are voted for, and inspectors of elections shall refuse all ballots offered of any other description: Provided, Nothing herein shall disqualify the voter from writing his own name on the back thereof."

The Indiana statute requires the inspector to put the ballot into the ballot-box unopened, and that the ballots shall be without any distinguishing marks or other embellishment thereon, and that the inspectors of election shall refuse all ballots offered of any other description. Under this statute the Indiana court held that the words "city Union ticket" on the inside of the ballot, even if it be conceded that these words constitute a distinguishing mark, did not render the ballot void, and that the object of the act was accomplished by requiring all ballots to be uniform in external appearance. The same question was decided in Stanley vs. Manley (35 Indiana, 275,) where the words were "republican ticket" on the inside of the ballot. Under the Indiana statute the court say that the statute "does not authorize the inspectors and judges to reject a ballot upon the discovery of such a mark or embellishment at the time of counting out the ballots which could not be seen by the inspectors at the time it was voted." The North Carolina statute is express that the ballots shall be without device, and that if the ticket shall have a device upon it, it shall not be numbered in taking the ballots, but shall be void. This difference in the statutes renders the Indiana decisions inapplicable, and the sole question is, are the words "republican ticket" on the inside of a ballot a device within the meaning of the North Carolina statute. With the policy of the statute we have nothing to do; one purpose of the statute may have been to prevent by-standers from knowing from observation how the voters voted. No statute can altogether prevent this; experts can easily distinguish between different kinds of white papers, and the printing of the ballots of the opposite parties would ordinarily be done at different printing offices with different type and ink, and the arrangement of the names of the persons and of the office, the punctuation, and the place on the ticket of the printed matter would ordinarily be different and apparent to a well trained eye. The intention of the statute could be easily evaded if it did not also prescribe the size of the ticket and the size of the type, which the North Carolina statute has not done. Still the statute, such as it is, must be enforced, even if some provisions have been omitted that are necessary completely to appreciate its intention.

Another purpose of the statute may have been to compel, as far as is possible, the voter to select the persons he votes for independently of any contrivances on the ticket calculated to inform or misinform him of the opinions of the persons voted for, because devices are often contrived to mislead. Either way, we think that words prominently printed on a ticket and intended to designate or describe it, and which have a distinct meaning in themselves, such as, if untrue, might mislead the voter, and whether true or untrue would render the ticket easily distinguishable, must be held to be a device within the meaning of the law. (McCrary on Elections, § 401.) These votes were rejected by the State authorities, and we think rightfully.

But it is contended that the marks found upon the contestant's tickets were put there by the printer; that they were printers' dashes, such as they ordinarily use to divide their subjects, and should not therefore be called marks violative of this statute; and some have contended that no ticket should be rejected unless marked with intent to violate the law. The answer to the latter proposition is plain and simple. Where a statute is merely directory the intention may be considered, but never where the statute is mandatory. The intention of the testator is never considered to aid the attestation to his will. The intention of the grantor cannot be considered in aid of a defective acknowledgment of his deed. The intention of a voter will not entitle him to vote if he has not been registered or fails to come until after the hour for closing the polls. And even in prosecutions for misdemeanors the intention of the defendant is never considered when charged with the violation of some penal statute. In Mississippi if one partner sells spirituous liquor in violation of the statute, another partner may be convicted though he knew nothing of the sale. A retail liquor dealer may be convicted for retailing under a license illegally granted, although he may honestly believe his license to be good. The question of intent cannot be considered, for the intent forms no part of the offense.

So, too, under the United States internal-revenue laws cases are constantly arising where parties have been arrested and punished for violation of some statute when they were utterly unconscious of committing any crime and devoid of any intent to violate law. But if it be necessary to consider the intent in marking before marked tickets can be rejected, whose intent must be considered, the man who offers or the man who prepares the ticket? The printer, without any knowledge, connivance, or consent on the part of the candidate or the voter, and without any intent on his own part except to make a handsome ballot, may print the ticket in fancy ink on fancy paper with both eagles and dashes on it, and yet we presume no man would say such a ticket should be received and counted under this law because there was no intention to violate it. Such a construction would abolish the statute. The intent in law is presumed from the act done, even where it is necessary to prove an intent, but in misdemeanors for violation of positive statutes no intent need be proved or alleged.

But if it were necessary to prove an intent to violate the law before the tickets in this case can be rejected we think the circumstantial evidence is amply sufficient. There were republican tickets printed in Jackson, Mississippi, under the supervision of the State executive committee, like the democratic tickets without any mark on them. The contestant could have procured such unmarked tickets in Jackson for his district at $1 per thousand, and yet he paid $4 per thousand in Vicksburgh for these marked tickets. The contestant examined and approved these tickets before they were distributed and knew the marks were there. The voters knew the marks were there, for some who could not read, when asked how they knew the republican ticket, pointed to these marks, thus showing that these tickets were not only distinguishable but were distinguished by these marks, and that men who could not read had been instructed that these marks indicated the republican ticket. Again, the republican supervisors at the polls wrote down how each man voted as his ticket was handed in, which could only have been done by some mark understood by them.

The other proposition, that a mark should not be called a mark because it is a printer's mark, is simply absurd. The marks found on these tickets were four in number, technically known as follows: First, a flush dash; second, a monkey dash; third, a head dash, and fourth, a monkey dash larger than the second. These dashes are not type, but belong to the class of printing material used to display their work. They are found in sample books of printers' display material, along with eagles, flags, and all such devices, intended to attract attention. The fact that the dash is used oftener than the eagle in printers' work does not alter its character or make it any less a mark, which Webster defines to be "a visible sign, a link, a point, stamp, figure, or the like, drawn or impressed, so as to attract attention," &c. The very use which printers make of these dashes is to attract attention to the fact that the subject has been changed, and this shows they are marks intended and well adapted to attract attention. Nor can the fact of their constant use on tickets when not prohibited by law avail anything. To say that a printer's dash when found upon a ticket, where the law says it shall have no mark or device thereon, shall not be called a mark, because printers constantly use such dashes on such work when not prohibited by law, is as ridiculous as to say a man should not be arrested for carrying concealed weapons in a place where this is prohibited by law because he habitually carries such weapons where it is not prohibited by law. But there is another and more serious difficulty in the way of such a loose construction of the law. To permit election officers to say that one kind of a visible mark should reject a ticket, and another kind of mark, equally visible, should not, would be placing in the hands of such officers a power too dangerous to be intrusted to party men in times of high party excitement.

The only safe rule in all such cases is that laid lown by Chief-Justice Tilghman in the case already cited:

> Let us at least prevent future altercations at elections by laying down such plain rules for the conduct of inspectors as cannot be mistaken. I am for construing the by-law as it is written and rejecting all ballots that have on them anything more than the names.

A strict construction of the law is always safest and best, and especially of law which refers to political powers, duties, or rights.

When we launch into the broad sea of latitudinous construction we have neither chart nor compass, and the law becomes a dangerous instrument in the hands of those who construe it and who may contract or expand it to suit the demands of those in power. But it is urged that this construction of the law should not be enforced because it throws out such a large number of republican votes. The principle is the same whether one vote or one hundred thousand be affected by it.

The whole vote of Wisconsin was once rejected because a snowstorm prevented her electors from assembling on the day appointed by law for them to vote. The whole vote of Arkansas was once rejected because the seal of the State was not affixed to the certificate of the electoral vote. And the vote of Georgia was pretermitted on the last count because her electors failed to vote on the day prescribed by law.

I deem it unnecessary to allude to the charge made that this action of the commissioners was false, fraudulent, and unlawful. This question has been settled by the United States district court sitting at Jackson, Mississippi. These commissioners were arrested and tried for this very action, and after a full investigation the United States district judge instructed the jury to acquit because there was no fraud or falsehood in their action, and they were acquitted. This is a full answer to the contestant's charge of fraud made by himself in his notice of contest and made by his partisan friends in the public press. One of the commissioners was a leading republican, who concurred in this action, and this should have convinced fair-minded men that there was no fraud in it.

But, Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the rulings of courts in other States this case is to be determined on a proper construction of a Mississippi statute, and this construction has been made by the supreme court of Mississippi in a case involving the very question now at issue. This would settle the question if it was before the Supreme Court of the United States, which always holds itself bound to follow the construction of a State statute made by a State court, and it is to be hoped that the fair-minded lawyers of the next House will not be seduced by party zeal to do violence to this well-settled principle of law. The opinion of the supreme court of Mississippi rendered on the 21st day of February, 1881, and received by me to-day, is as follows:

Ira D. Oglesby, district attorney, vs. J. J. Sigman et al., commissioners of election of Tunica County.

Campbell, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This case presents for adjudication three questions, namely:

1. Whether the commissioners of election have the right to reject illegal ballots cast and counted by the inspectors of election and returned to them with the statement of the result at the precincts.

2. Whether the ballots which the commissioners of election for Tunica County refused to reject should have been rejected by them as being illegal, for having on them a device or mark by which one may be known or distinguished from another.

3. Whether the action of the commissioners was final, or whether they may be required by mandamus to meet and act in the matter again, as the court may order.

We think it clear that the commissioners of election have the right, which they should exercise, to reject ballots returned to them by the inspectors of election as having been cast at any of the precincts of their county, which show themselves on inspection to be illegal. The law devolves on the commissioners of election the duty to prepare for the election, by revising the register of electors, and the poll-books of the several precincts, so that they may show who are qualified electors, and by appointing inspectors and an officer to keep the peace at each voting place and by distributing ballot-boxes and poll-books. The inspectors are to judge of the qualification of electors so as to receive or reject ballots offered by them, and when the polls are closed, the ballots are to be counted, and a statement of the whole number of votes given for each person and for what office is to be made, and this statement, certified and signed by inspectors and clerks, and the poll-book, tally lists, list of voters, ballot-boxes, and ballots are to be promptly delivered to the commissioners of election, at the court-house of the county, to the end that they may canvass the returns so made to them, and see that the result of the election at each precinct, as certified to them by the inspectors and clerks, is correct, according to the returns. They are to canvass the returns, that is, they are to scrutinize the acts of those engaged in holding the election at the different places of voting, as shown by the returns made to them in pursuance of law, and determine from such returns who received the greatest number of legal votes, and who is entitled to receive their certificate of election in cases in which they give such certificate, and what return they shall make to the secretary of State.

It is true that commissioners of election are not judicial officers, in the sense of trying causes, hearing evidence, and pronouncing final judgment between parties seeking office, but they are charged with the duty of canvassing returns, which includes the list of voters, and list made in counting, and the ballots, and they must examine such returns and declare the legal result and certify it. If they find an error in computation they must correct it. If they ascertain from the lists of voters that persons not registered, and therefore not legal voters, have cast ballots, they cannot correct that, because of inability to ascertain which ballots are legal and which not, but if they find in the ballot-boxes ballots declared by law to be illegal, and such as shall not be counted, it is their plain duty to reject them; and if in canvassing the returns they ascertain that the inspectors in disregard of law have counted ballots it says shall not be counted, that error should be corrected by the canvassers as certainly as an error of arithmetic should be. The law makes the inspectors judges of the qualification of electors, from necessity, because they are to receive the ballots and when received and deposited in the box, it is not supposed by the law to be possible to identify them, but the ballots show for themselves whether or not they conform to law, and there is neither difficulty nor uncertainty in rejecting ballots as being illegal, because of what is shown by them upon inspection. We think the effect of section 137 of the code of 1880 is to condemn as illegal, and not be received or counted, every ballot which has on its back or face any device or mark other than names of persons by which one ballot may be distinguished from another.

This statute does not condemn devices or marks on the outside of a ballot merely, but clearly embraces the face of the ballot as well. That is apparent from the exception contained in it, and a device or mark on the face of the ballot is as much within what we suppose to have been the object of this provision as one on the outside or back of it. It is apparent from the provision that its object is not only to preserve secrecy as to what ballot an elector casts, which is the leading idea of statutes in some other States, which prohibit any device or mark on a ballot folded which betrays the secret of the voter, its object is to secure absolute uniformity as to the appearance of ballots in order that intelligence may guide the electors in their selection, and not a mere device or mark by which ignorance may be captivated. The Legislature was trying to prevent multitudes from "being voted," and being guided by a mere device or mark by which they should distinguish the ballots they were to use in the process without a knowledge of the names of persons for whom their ballots were being cast. Elections are a contrivance of government which prescribes who are electors and how they may express their will, and it is a legitimate exercise of power to prescribe the description of ballots which shall be used. Section 137 of the code of 1880 does this, and requires all ballots to be written or printed with black ink, with a minimum space between names, on plain white news printing-paper of a certain width, and without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, &c.; and it declares that a ticket different from that prescribed shall not be received or counted. Considerations of policy dictated the description of ballots prescribed, and it was deemed of such importance to secure an observance of the requirement that it is declared that ballots not conforming to the description prescribed shall not be received or counted.

It would have been competent to impose a penalty on the circulation or use of such ballots, but the means by which their use is sought to be prevented is the rejection of the ballot when offered or from the count. It is not penal for an elector to use a ballot differing from the legal pattern, but it shall not be counted, and thus he fails to express his will through such an instrumentality. If the device or mark is external and observed by the inspectors they should not receive the ballot. If it is received, and, on being opened, is discovered to be of the kind condemned as illegal, it is not to be counted, but if the inspectors count such ballots, in disregard of law and their duty, the commissioners of election, assembled at the court-house, with time and opportunity afforded to scrutinize and correct, as far as may be done by the data furnished by the face of the returns, without a resort to evidence aliunde, should reject, as the inspectors should have done, ballots which the law says shall not be counted. The only safe guide as to what ballots are illegal because of devices or marks is the statute. It excludes any mark or device by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another. A distinction between ballots by means of devices or marks instead of by means of the names on them is what the statute aims to prevent, and we are not at liberty to confine the broad language of the statute to any particular description of devices or marks, for ingenuity would evade any such limit. The law should be enforced as written.

There is no room for distinction between what is directory and what is mandatory, what is essential and what is not. The requirement that ballots shall be written or printed with black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between names, seems to have been designed to guard against confusion and mistake as to names of the persons voted for, for the different offices, while the requirement of plain white news printing-paper of a designated width within narrow limits, and the exclusion of any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, must have been intended to secure uniformity in the appearance of ballots, so that ignorance and blind party devotion might not be led to the adoption of ballots by the guidance of some mark and devices, as to which they were instructed by their leaders, and which instead of intelligent comprehension of whom or what they are casting their ballots for, should determine their selection of ballots to be cast. It was well known that ballots are prepared beforehand under the direction of political managers, and are distributed for use among electors; and it was further known that captivating marks and devices on ballots, appealing to ignorance and blind party zeal, were a favorite resort as an electioneering device deemed legitimate, and freely practiced with much effect; and the purpose of section 137 was to stop this pernicious practice, and to make the prohibition effective by prohibiting any mark or device by which one ticket can be distinguished from another, and by rejecting any ballot in violation of its requirements. It was assumed that ballots would still be prepared beforehand by party managers or persons interested in having them legal, and that, as all would be alike, the advantage to one party over another should not consist in tickets, but that ballots must be selected not by devices and marks, but because of the names to be voted for.

We do not think that the commissioners of election can be required to meet and recanvass the returns of the election. Having made their canvass and declared the result, and transmitted a statement of it to the secretary of State, their connection with the returns ended. Any error committed by them is not to be corrected by requiring them to reassemble and correct it. The legality of their action may be the subject of judicial investigation in cases in which provision is made for contesting the election by an appeal to the courts of the State, but only in those cases.

The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter.

This case might properly have been disposed of without considering any of the questions made by the record except that last mentioned, but the attorney-general informed us from the bar that doubts exist as to the proper interpretation of the election law of 1880, and that criminal prosecutions have been instituted against the commissioners of election of some of the counties for supposed violations of the law in reference to their duties, and we have complied with his request in declaring our view of the several questions presented by the record.

Judgment affirmed. To be reported.

Chalmers, C. J., took no part in the decision of this case.

I. D. Oglesby, district attorney, vs. J. J. Sigman et al.

I concur entirely in the opinion of the court, as drawn up by Judge Campbell. The duty to examine and reject illegal ballots rests on every officer or court required or authorized by law to count them. The statute prohibits the use of any mark or device on a ballot by which one "ticket may be known or distinguished from another." That the mark or device adopted is a mere printer's mark, commonly used for ornamentation, makes no difference. The statute prohibits any distinguishing mark whatever, and no court has a right to do away with the effect of the statute by holding that marks which are mere printer's ornaments may be used. It is wholly unimportant whether the marking on the ticket was the result of ignorance or a design to evade the statute. The inspectors and commissioners have no power to inquire into motives; nor has the statute made motives important. It condemns as illegal every ballot or ticket which is so marked "that it may be known or distinguished from another." The ticket used in this case and made an exhibit to the petition is thus marked, and should have been rejected. We have nothing to do with the policy or impolicy of the statute. The language is plain and does not admit of construction; and it is the duty of the courts and other officers to obey and enforce it in the sense the words clearly indicate.

GEORGE.

To be reported.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES PHELPS,

OF CONNECTICUT.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 1, 1881,

On the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. PHELPS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I voted against this bill when it passed this House on the 19th day of January last. I am still opposed to it, and to those Senate amendments which double the length of time which must elapse before the maturity of the bonds, and also unnecessarily, as I believe, double the expense of printing and issuing them.

I am opposed to the refunding in other bonds those which are to mature on the 1st of May and the 30th of June of the present year, amounting to six hundred and seventy millions, less what have recently been and before the 1st of July may be purchased for the sinking fund. I believe there is no necessity for thus extending the full amount of the bonded debt of the Government. Five hundred millions in Treasury notes of proper denominations, payable after one year, bearing a low rate of interest and receivable for customs, may be issued, and the balance safely taken from the large and increasing surplus in the Treasury.

By this method, instead of issuing three hundred millions in Treasury notes and four hundred millions in bonds payable in twenty years, making an aggregate of seven hundred millions as proposed by this bill, we would issue in the whole but five hundred millions, all in Treasury notes and payable in short time, according to the ability and convenience of the Government.

In this way the funded debt would be immediately reduced nearly two hundred millions. The five hundred millions so issued could, under the favorable conditions likely to exist, be readily liquidated before 1891, at which time two hundred and fifty millions of 4½ per cent. bonds mature. That comparatively small amount can in all probability be easily paid or provided for without further refunding.

By this process the bonded debt of the Government would be reduced in 1891 to seven hundred and thirty-eight millions of 4 per cent. bonds which do not mature till 1907, and these would be extinguished before maturity by the regular operation of the sinking fund; while under this bill the debt in 1891, after making liberal allowance for probable reduction through the sinking fund, will be likely to be more than twelve hundred millions.

That portion of the debt now about to mature should be fully paid before the two hundred and fifty millions due in 1891 have to be provided for; and I can see no reason why with proper care it may not be done and the necessity for refunding in other bonds avoided.

A prudent and sagacious business man would endeavor by all reasonable means to so provide against accruing liabilities as to discharge them all as soon as possible, and stop the payment of unnecessary interest.

A Government like this is bound by every consideration of protection to its citizens to exercise an equal degree of diligence to accomplish the same beneficial result, and if it does not, it fails to perform one of its highest and most important duties.

It is said by the friends of the bill that it will be a magnificent achievement for the credit of the Government to refund the maturing portion of the national debt in twenty years' bonds at 3 per cent. This is true so far as the saving of interest over present rates and the question of the public credit are concerned, but it will be a much greater financial achievement, and one that will redound much more to the credit of the Government, to at once reduce the debt nearly two hundred millions, and provide in such manner for the balance as to insure its payment within the ensuing ten years.

By refunding in new bonds on long time even at a low rate of interest, the amount to be ultimately paid will be immensely increased. Hundreds of millions of dollars will be added by this bill, which I desire as far as possible to avoid.

I might present the same startling array of figures and tables which other gentlemen have incorporated into their speeches on this subject to show the enormous amount of interest on our national debt that in the last twenty years has been paid by the people through one form of taxation and another, aggregating two thousand millions of dollars. By the refunding of the less than seven hundred millions embraced in this bill, if the principal remains at the end of twenty years, more than four hundred millions of interest will have been paid, and the debt will still be unreduced, and under the same policy will be again refunded, and the same oppressive consequences be repeated. From 1870 to 1880 there was paid of principal on the public debt four hundred and thirty-six millions, and of interest one thousand and ninety-two millions, and since the commencement of our great national debt nearly three dollars of interest have been paid where there has been one dollar paid of principal.

But it is not my purpose to go at any length into these remarkable statistics so alarming in their magnitude. I only intend in the briefest possible manner to put on record my reasons for refusing my support to the bill now before the House.

A great national debt is not a blessing to the people who are compelled to bear the burden of the payment of the principal and interest, and national credit can never be safely predicated on such a debt unless every honorable effort is faithfully made to redeem and discharge it as rapidly as is practicable. It is not a satisfactory answer to this to say that a large and permanent bonded debt is necessary to either the profit or the existence of any particular system of banking. It is better that the banks should furnish State bonds, or other unquestionable securities, in the place of Government bonds now required, rather than the national debt should be needlessly perpetuated and the interest on it unnecessarily wrung from the people.

If the provision requiring that the greater part of the proposed refunding should be in a new issue of 3 per cent. bonds had not been incorporated in the bill, the recent excitement in financial circles produced by the inexcusable and selfish conduct of the managers of some of the national banks might not have occurred. They might have been satisfied to retain their 4½ and 4 per cent. bonds without making factious and ill-advised opposition to any other provisions of the bill. In their attempted violent contraction of the currency and the temporary stringency and panic resulting from it, they could not have possibly pursued a more unfortunate course for themselves. If the design was to reproduce "Black Friday," and thereby to intimidate, and control the action of Congress upon this bill, the result was a feeling of indignation and intensified opposition both in and out of Congress—a determination that national-bank corporations shall not control the Government and people.

I desire to see an honest and economical administration of the Federal Government; to have the revenue kept at as near the present standard as may be until the national debt is discharged to the uttermost farthing and the Government thoroughly furnished and equipped with every public building of its own necessary to its convenience in every section of the country. When that is accomplished let every species of taxation and every kind of popular burden be at once reduced to the lowest reasonable limit consistent with a wise, honest, and just administration of such a government and for such a people.

Apportionment of Representatives.

SPEECH OF HON. SAMUEL S. COX,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. COX said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The House has allowed leave to print upon the most important matter of the session—apportionment. I avail myself of this leave to print certain significant figures which will aid Congress to a wise determination on this subject at this session. The refinement—almost exquisite—of the number, 307, which I have championed, is apparent by the almost inappreciable difference which the figures or their fractions show between enumeration and representation as proposed.

There is no longer the excuse that 311, which is not so exact as other numbers, is in the way. It has been formally withdrawn since the committee reported, and without solicitation on my part the gentlemen on the committee from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] and Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] have, for reasons given, advocated 307 as their final preference. This, too, was the preference of the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING,] as well as that of my colleague from New York, and on the Census Committee, [Mr. SCOVILLE.] These, with myself, make a majority of the committee now for the magic number of all—307. This majority is not, in any sense of equity or this bill, partisan.

The extracts from two or three leading journals are printed herewith, to show that 307 is not partisan and that the republican party is not committed, unless by conference or caucus, to any number like 319 or 322.

Proposing anew that gentlemen shall have a vote on all numbers, beginning high or low, or any select numbers, alternating with each party, so as finally to fix on the favorite of the majority as the law, and without dilatory or other obstruction, I submit to the candid men of the House to assist me to carry out the command of the Constitution as well to guard the Treasury of twenty biennial States from useless depletion, and thus to assist representative institutions in this propitious hour for their decennial adjustment.

Computations as to the effect of the apportionment on a basis of 307 Representatives.

The population of the old slave States aggregates 18,504,205; that of the former free States, 30,865,390. The old slave States would receive 115 Representatives out of 307, and the former free States 192.

The application of the "rule of three" shows that if 18,504,205 people have 115 Representatives, 30,865,390 ought to have exactly 191.82. In other words, the former free States gain .18 of a Congressman.

To reverse the terms: If 30,865,390 people have 192 Congressmen, 18,504,205 people ought to have 115.107. In other words, the old slave States at 307 lose .107 of a Congressman.

OLD SLAVE STATES.

States.	Population.	Representatives.
Alabama	1,262,794	8
Arkansas	802,564	5
Delaware	146,654	1
Florida	267,351	2
Georgia	1,539,048	9
Kentucky	1,648,708	10
Louisiana	940,103	6
Maryland	934,632	6
Mississippi	1,131,592	7
Missouri	2,168,804	13
North Carolina	1,400,047	9
South Carolina	995,622	6
Tennessee	1,542,463	10
Texas	1,592,574	10
Virginia	1,512,806	9
West Virginia	618,443	4
Total	18,504,205	115

FORMER FREE STATES.

California	864,686	5
Colorado	194,649	1
Connecticut	622,683	4
Illinois	3,078,769	19
Indiana	1,978,362	12
Iowa	1,624,620	10
Kansas	995,966	6
Maine	648,945	4
Massachusetts	1,783,012	11
Michigan	1,636,331	10
Minnesota	780,806	5
Nebraska	452,433	3
Nevada	62,265	1
New Hampshire	346,984	2
New Jersey	1,130,983	7
New York	5,083,810	32
Ohio	3,198,239	20
Oregon	174,767	1
Pennsylvania	4,282,786	27
Rhode Island	276,528	2
Vermont	332,286	2
Wisconsin	1,315,480	8
Total	30,865,390	192

18,504,205 : 115 : : 30,865,390 : 191.82
.18

192 Former free States gain .18 of a Congressman.

30,865,390 : 192 : : 18,504,205 : 115.107
.107

115 Old slave States lose .107 of a Congressman.

POLITICAL EFFECT OF NUMBERS, ETC.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION,
Washington, D. C., February 25, 1881.

DEAR SIR: For the purpose of showing the political effect of the various numbers from 293 to 325 in the apportionment of the tenth census, I have classified the States as follows: Republican—New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Nevada, Colorado; total, 15, with a population of 20,361,154 people. Democratic—New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Kentucky, Arkansas, Missouri, total, 17, with a population of 19,635,188 people. Doubtful—Maine, Connecticut, New York, Indiana, California, Oregon; total, 6, with a population of 9,373,253 people.

As will be seen from the accompanying table, the number which does the least political injustice of any is 307, which gives a very trifling advantage to the republican States at the expense of the doubtful States. But the democratic States get within a tenth of a Representative of their just share. Three hundred and two has substantially the same effect, and comes next in order. Three hundred and eight gives the republican States exactly their share and gives the democratic States an extra half Representative at the expense of the doubtful States.

Yours, very truly,

CHAS. W. SMILEY.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Chairman Joint Special Committee Tenth Census,
United States House of Representatives.

Table showing the effect politically of each number of Representatives from 293 to 325, arranged in the order of least political injustice.

Proposed number of Representatives.	Republican States.			Democratic States.			Doubtful States.			Total political injustice.
	Representatives assigned.	Justly entitled to—	More or less than justly entitled to—	Representatives assigned.	Justly entitled to—	More or less than justly entitled to—	Representatives assigned.	Justly entitled to—	More or less than justly entitled to—
307	127	126.61	+ .39	122	122.10	− .10	58	58.29	− .29	.78
302	125	124.55	+ .45	120	120.11	− .11	57	57.34	− .34	.90
308	127	127.02	− .02	123	122.50	+ .50	58	58.48	− .48	1.00
318	131	131.15	− .15	126	126.47	− .47	61	60.38	+ .62	1.24
304	126	125.37	+ .03	121	120.91	+ .09	57	57.72	− .72	1.44
317	130	130.73	− .73	126	126.08	− .08	61	60.19	+ .81	1.62
301	125	124.14	+ .86	119	119.71	− .71	57	57.15	− .15	1.72
319	132	131.56	+ .44	126	126.87	− .87	61	60.57	+ .43	1.74
305	126	125.79	+ .21	122	121.30	+ .70	57	57.91	− .91	1.82
315	129	129.91	− .91	126	125.28	+ .72	60	59.81	+ .19	1.82
299	124	123.31	+ .69	118	118.92	− .92	57	56.77	+ .23	1.84
303	126	124.96	+1.04	120	120.51	− .51	57	57.53	− .53	2.08
313	128	129.09	−1.09	125	124.49	+ .51	60	59.42	+ .58	2.18
306	127	126.20	+ .80	122	121.70	+ .30	57	58.10	−1.10	2.20
309	127	127.44	− .44	124	122.89	+1.11	58	58.67	− .67	2.22
325	135	134.03	+ .97	128	129.26	−1.26	62	61.71	+ .29	2.52
320	133	131.97	+1.03	126	127.27	−1.27	61	60.76	+ .24	2.54
300	125	123.72	+1.28	118	119.32	−1.32	57	56.96	+ .04	2.56
311	127	128.26	−1.26	125	123.69	+1.31	59	59.05	− .05	2.62
316	129	130.32	−1.32	126	125.68	+ .32	61	60.00	+1.00	2.64
295	123	121.66	+1.34	116	117.33	−1.33	56	56.01	− .01	2.68
324	135	133.62	+1.38	128	128.86	− .86	61	61.52	+ .52	2.76
314	128	129.50	−1.50	126	124.88	+1.12	60	59.62	+ .38	3.00
297	124	122.49	+1.51	117	118.12	−1.12	56	56.39	− .39	3.02
298	124	122.90	+1.10	117	118.52	−1.52	57	56.85	+ .42	3.04
293	122	120.84	+1.16	115	116.53	−1.53	56	55.63	+ .37	3.06
321	134	132.38	+1.62	126	127.67	−1.67	61	60.95	+ .05	3.34
312	127	118.67	−1.67	125	124.09	+ .91	60	59.24	+ .76	3.34
310	127	127.85	− .85	125	123.29	+1.71	58	58.86	− .86	3.42
323	135	133.21	+1.79	127	128.46	−1.46	61	61.33	− .33	3.58
296	124	122.08	+1.92	116	117.73	−1.73	56	56.19	− .19	3.84
294	123	121.25	+1.75	115	116.93	−1.93	56	55.82	+ .18	3.86
322	135	132.80	+2.20	126	128.06	+2.06	61	61.14	− .14	4.40

VOICE OF THE REPUBLICAN PRESS.

[From the New York Times, February 24, 1881.]

The apportionment question.

Mr. COX, after postponing the subject several times in order to give the republican members of the House a chance to confer upon their action in the matter, will call up the apportionment bill after the morning hour to-day, and endeavor to secure action upon it. The bill provides for 307 Representatives under the new census, and apportions them among the States in the customary way. With that number the ratio of apportionment is one Representative to every 160,813 of population. The divisor gives 289 on an even division, and the other 18 are allotted to the States having the largest fractions. Mr. COX's original bill proposed 301 as the total number, and the Census Committee reported in favor of 311, which gave advantage to the South and to democratic States. The number 307 was substituted at Mr. COX's suggestion as a compromise with those who favored a larger increase than he originally proposed, and as securing substantial equity as between sections and parties. Certain republican members proposed 319 as more satisfactory to them, and the caucus last evening, after some discussion, resolved to vote for no apportionment bill providing for a smaller number. With that number the ratio is one Representative to 154,764 of population. The result of an even division is 301, and there are 18 to be allotted to the largest fractions, as before.

The discussions thus far have turned on the question of gain and loss to the different States or to sections of the country, and some of the speakers in the caucus of last evening were in favor of maintaining, so far as possible, the present balance in that respect. This idea is entirely foreign to the purpose of an apportionment, the object of which is not to adjust the relations of party or sectional representation, but to distribute the membership of the lower House equitably among the States according to the number of their inhabitants. In the shifting of population during a decade, it may well be that one section, or the States controlled at the present moment by one party, may have gained or lost more than the rest of the country. If so, that affords no ground for any departure from the principle that representation should be as strictly as possible according to population by States. It is not profitable to attempt to force it in the direction of representation by parties or sections. The object is not to increase the ratio and the total number, and then attempt to make apportionment conform as nearly as may be to the census of ten years ago, but to base it directly and fairly upon the census of 1880.

The present membership of the House being 293, the pending bill proposes an increase of 14. The sections which seem to be regarded as of political significance are simply the North and the South, including under the latter the sixteen old slave States, which are now accounted as solidly democratic, and under the former all the other twenty-two States, in which the republican party largely predominates and "Northern ideas" generally prevail. With this division the North has now 187 Representatives, and the South 106. Under the proposed apportionment, with 307 as the total, the North will have 192 and the South 115, so that of the 14 additional members 5 will go to the former and 9 to the latter section. No Southern State would lose a member, while Arkansas, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and West Virginia would gain 1 each, and Texas would gain 4. Of the Northern States, Indiana, Maine, New Hampshire, New York, and Vermont would lose 1 each, and California, Iowa, and Michigan would gain 1 each, Nebraska and Minnesota would gain 2 each, and Kansas would gain 3. If 319 were taken as the total, the Northern States would have 200 and the Southern States 119, so that of the 26 additional members 13 would go to each section. In that case the changes would be in the South, a gain of 1 in Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, and West Virginia, and 4 in Texas; in the North, Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont would still lose 1 each, Illinois, Iowa, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Pennsylvania would gain 1 each, California, Minnesota, Michigan, and Nebraska 2 each, and Kansas 3.

The latter is obviously more advantageous to the North and to States now controlled by the republican party, but that should not be the decisive question, but rather which plan secures the most equitable apportionment according to population, if sections are to be considered in the distribution of Representatives. The total population of the United States, exclusive of Territories and the District of Columbia, is 49,369,594. Of this, 30,865,390, or about 62.52 per cent. belongs to the Northern States, according to the division adopted above, and 18,404,202, or about 37.48 per cent. to the Southern States. The apportionment provided for in the pending bill gives 192, or about 62.54 per cent. of the 307 to the North, and 115, or about 36.46 per cent., to the South. This is obviously a very close approximation to an accurate representation by population, the slight balance of advantage being on the northern side. With 319 as the total, the North would have 200, or 62.69 per cent. of the whole, and the South 119, or 37.31 per cent. of the whole. Thus it will be seen that aside from the question of an undesirable increase of members, the pending bill provides for the more equitable apportionment. Under these circumstances, we see no ground on which serious opposition is to be defended, to say nothing of any filibustering tactics intended to defeat the measure if the majority appears to be in its favor.

[From the New York Times, February 26, 1881.]

A false move.

Whatever may result from the action of the party conference committee of members of the House in regard to the apportionment bill, there is little doubt that the republicans made a political mistake in adopting a course of filibustering to defeat the pending measure. There was no reasonable ground for evoking a party contest on this subject. Had the democrats attempted to secure any illegitimate party advantage in the adoption of a total number for the House of Representatives under the new apportionment, their opponents might have been justified in resisting the attempt, but the only object which the latter could have had was either to secure a party advantage for themselves or to defeat apportionment altogether at this present session. The bill, so far as the total number is concerned, is a fair one, and should have excited no strenuous opposition. Admitting this, we can find no reason for defeating its passage at this session. The figures of the census on which it is based are complete, and there is no occasion for delay. Legislatures are in session in eighteen States which will not hold regular sessions again before the congressional elections of 1882. If the bill is passed now they can provide for their redistricting. Otherwise, they will have to hold extra sessions at considerable expense for the purpose. If the purpose of postponing action is to furnish occasion for an extra session of Congress, the case is still worse. The occasion would not be sufficient, for if apportionment is not provided for now it may as well be left till next winter. Besides, the people do not want an extra session. It would be an expensive affair, and will not be necessary unless deliberately made so for political purposes. There are, in fact, no political purposes to be subserved by it which would receive the support of the public. Whichever way we look at it, the move is a mistaken one. If intended to defeat a measure in itself unobjectionable, it is a mistake; if intended to prevent the passage of any apportionment act this winter, it is a mistake; and if intended to help prepare the way for an extra session, it is a mistake. In addition to all this, the course pursued has used up precious time in the last days of the session and hindered action on more important matters.

If the leaders in this movement imagine they are making political capital, they therein commit the most serious mistake of all. When a strong party combination was made to prevent the repeal or nullification of the election laws or the adoption of the electoral count resolutions, there was a principle at stake and mischief was threatened. The means were justified by the end, and the responsibility for the delay of public business and the forcing of an extra session rested on the democratic party. The party suffered for it, as it deserved. But now, if the republicans, by filibustering, defeat important public measures or compel an extra session that might, without detriment, have been avoided, the responsibility will rest on them, and their party will suffer for it in public estimation. The course of action imposed by the caucus of Wednesday night betrays shortness of sight among republican leaders in the House in more ways than one. Their object is, apparently, to curtail the representative strength of the South as much as possible. No matter what the motive may be, this persistent dragging of sectional considerations into such a matter as apportioning representation among the States on the basis of population is not calculated to win the approval of sensible men. Moreover, is it quite expedient to assume that the South is to remain "solid" for the next ten years? There are disintegrating forces at work which it is for the interest of the republican party to promote rather than to check. There is far more to be gained by a policy calculated to win favor and strength in that section than by one that assumes it of right to belong irredeemably to the democracy. At all events, there is nothing to be gained either there or elsewhere by action that cannot be defended as absolutely just.

It is to be hoped that the spirit of statesmanship will be displayed by the party about to resume control of the popular branch of the National Legislature, which will serve to strengthen its hold upon that body, and enable it to secure the full co-operation of the Senate at no distant day. But it should be remembered that the fluctuating vote which brought the democrats into power in the House, and sent them out again because they had not the wisdom to command the confidence of the country, may as easily reverse the movement. A course of action that shall disappoint those who expect from the republican party a judicious and business-like treatment of public questions may lead to a reaction that will prevent its obtaining control of the Senate two years hence, and weaken, if it does not destroy, its hold upon the House. The Congress which will come into existence in 1883 will have in its hands the legislation which is to precede the next presidential election and whatever powers and functions may have a bearing on that contest. A political reaction in the middle of General Garfield's administration is not desirable, but it can be very easily produced by subordinating the interests of the public service to purposes of a purblind partisanship. It will be a happy day for parties in this country when politicians learn that public confidence is to be won and retained by a faithful regard for public interests, and not by clap-trap and tricks of management.

[From the Evening Post, of February 25, 1881.]

The reapportionment controversy.

No part of the Constitution is clearer than that which relates to the apportionment of members of the House of Representatives. "Representatives * * * shall be apportioned among the several States * * * according to their respective numbers." The Constitution does not leave the ascertainment of these "numbers" to loose estimate, or to statistics separately gathered by the States. These would prepare the way for gross inequalities. The original apportionment was necessarily arbitrary. The Constitution specified how many members each of the thirteen States should have in the first instance, but it provided against any arbitrary distribution thereafter. "The actual enumeration"—that is the counting of the "numbers" for the purpose of apportionment—"shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States and within every subsequent term of ten years." The specific distribution made by the Constitution is to hold good only "until such enumeration shall be made." After that "numbers" alone shall determine.

It is hard to see how it could have been made plainer that the general census returns should be the sole basis of the apportionment. A careful analysis made by the Times shows that according to the latest census the population of the Northern States is 62.52 per cent. of the whole, while that of the Southern States is 37.48 per cent. The apportionment made by Mr. COX's bill is founded upon a House composed of 307 members. According to this the Northern States will have 62.54 per cent. of the members, and the Southern States will have 37.46 per cent. This geographical test not only is the one which the opponents of the bill are themselves inclined to make, but it is one which well illustrates the fairness in all respects of the ratio which results from the proposed membership. If "numbers" are taken as the guide no other ratio suggested will effect so nearly exact a distribution. Between the per cent. of population and the per cent. of members in the North and in the South there is a difference of only two one-hundredths of 1 per cent. In the circumstances arithmetic can do no better than this.

We say if "numbers" are taken as the guide; and what else can be taken? There are only two pretexts upon which the Cox bill can be opposed. One is that the late census is wrong. Superintendent Walker, the final official authority on the subject, says that it is right. But, assuming for the sake of argument that it is wrong, what has Congress to do with that fact when it comes to make an apportionment? Even if Congress had the power to revise the census this would not be the time to do it. When the business of apportionment is before it Congress is bound by the census as it is. It is bound to accept its "numbers" as conclusive, although every member believes them to be inaccurate—just as we are all bound by a decision of the Supreme Court, although we all feel sure that it is erroneous. Congress can look only at the "numbers" as ascertained by the latest "enumeration." If it rejects the late census and goes back to the census of 1870, or any other census, it disregards the Constitution.

The other pretext is that in the Southern States a free ballot is practically denied to many voters, and that representation should be restricted accordingly. Assuming that the charge is well founded and that Congress has power to correct the evil, this is not the time to do it. If the southern representation can be reduced constitutionally, and if it ought to be—facts which should be formally and regularly and officially ascertained—the reduction should be made in a deliberate way and by a separate measure. When Congress is making an apportionment it must proceed upon the facts which are officially before it; and neither a reduction of southern representation nor an occasion for such reduction is now among these facts. The only facts are that the census has reported certain "numbers," and that the proposed bill distributes Representatives as nearly as possible in exact conformity with these "numbers."

It is desirable that the new apportionment shall be made without delay, so that the State Legislatures now in session may divide their States into districts. But even if there were no such reason for expedition the case is not one to warrant obstructive opposition. The only possible motive to such a course is a supposed partisan advantage. It never "pays" a great party in a broad sense to yield to such motives. One of those political revolutions with which we are familiar might show the republicans when the next House of Representatives is chosen that they had lost more than they had gained, in a merely partisan sense, even if they should now carry their point. This morning measures for a settlement were adopted which should have been adopted before last night's filibustering began. It is to be hoped that the useless contest will not be continued. The republicans cannot afford to bring on an extra session.

Either a Free Vote at the Polls, or a Reduction of the Representation of Southern States in Congress.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. ANDERSON,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 26, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. ANDERSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The object of the bill under consideration is to fix the number of members who shall compose the House of Representatives from 1883 to 1893, and to "apportion" this number among the several States, that is, to divide the total of membership into parts, and to assign to each State its just proportion. Whatever aggregate may be decreed as the limit of membership, and whatever part of this aggregate shall be assigned to each State, can in no possible way be changed, as the bill stands, until after the census of 1890; so that the effect of the measure will be to distribute among the fifty million of people in the United States the precise share which each group may have in the deliberations of this body, and the exact power which each shall wield in the enactment of those laws that bind the whole nation and should penetrate every nook and crevice of its magnificent territory.

POWER OF CONGRESS.

There rests in this House a civic force quite as subtle and potent as is the lightning that sleeps in the clouds, photographs the mountain pine upon the agate, or shivers the oak. It can wrest from the poorest citizen a share of his hard-earned wages in the shape of taxes. It can create huge debts, expend moneys without check, plunge the nation into war, donate the public lands to corporations, wink at the extortions of bloodless monopolists, and laugh at the writhing victim of kuklux murderers; or, it can "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty" to each man, woman, and child in all its broad domain. Once this House could have lowered the nation's flag before a rebellion waged in order that human slavery should become the corner-stone of a free republic; it can to-day furl it before the golden blandishments of railroad and telegraph companies; or it can make the stars of that flag lustrous as the glowing eyes of a righteous God, and place those stripes as a monarch's scepter before the quivering body of the weakest freedman in the loneliest southern glade.

No man can tell what old issues will be revived in the next five Congresses, or what new ones will be pressed, nor what results will flow from the decisions reached. But whatever these may be, however beneficent or disastrous their effects, the bill now before us assigns to the several groups of the American people just the voice which each may have, and just the vote which each may cast in deciding any and all questions. By the side of such a measure all other matters, whether of tariff, of finance, or appropriations, dwarf themselves out of view.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN APPORTIONING THE MEMBERSHIP OF THE HOUSE AND APPORTIONING REPRESENTATIVES.

There are two distinct points presented by this bill: First, determining the number of members who shall compose the House of Representatives; and second, apportioning this number among the several States.

While these propositions are closely related, yet they are wholly dissimilar. It is true that if you declare that each State shall have a given number of Representatives, you practically decide what the total membership of the House shall be. But this latter fact is an effect of the first fact as a cause. Yet the committee have exactly reversed this process. They have chosen to make the proper cause the effect, and the proper effect the cause. They present this bill, and require us first to vote upon the total number of members who shall compose the House; and after they have trapped us into fixing that number, they will then drive us between the walls of arithmetical proportions to assign the number of Representatives to each State. It is a trick; just such a trick as has been often played by cunning leaders in this and other Congresses.

And what is more, it is a process neither warranted by the language nor the example of the Constitution. If there is anything in the world that democratic statesmen claim to revere it is the Constitution. They are "strict constructionists" of the strictest sect of the Pharisees—except when the annual river and harbor burglary is to be perpetrated. They seize with avidity upon every opportunity to parade their intense affection for the exact letter of the Constitution, going even to the extent of opposing a bill to create a Department of Agriculture on the ground that such an act would be unconstitutional. And yet here comes this Census Committee, composed of eight democrats and three republicans, led by the brilliant and adroit gentleman from New York, Mr. Cox, with a bill which makes the only primary power granted by the Constitution, a merely secondary and unimportant matter; and which proposes that we shall exercise as a primary power a right nowhere conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. On the very first page of the Constitution are these words:

The House of Representatives shall be composed—

Of what? One hundred members, or 200, or any other number of members? Not at all, simply—of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.

And in the same section, after providing for an enumeration of the population, it designates the number of people who shall be entitled to a Representative, as follows:

The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every 30,000, [people,] but each State shall have at least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight, etc.

That is the language and that was the usage of the Constitution. I commend it to the careful consideration of strict constructionists. If a bill for the relief of an arctic expedition ought to be stopped as unconstitutional because the appropriation originated in the Senate instead of in the House, then certainly the declaration that this House shall be composed of two hundred and ninety-three, three hundred and eleven, or any other number of members, is an unwarranted exercise of power. The only power conferred by the Constitution is to apportion Representatives, not the membership of this House. The strictly proper mode of exercising this power is that of deciding the number of people of the United States who shall be entitled to a Representative, and to let the total membership of the House follow as a logical sequence.

ATTEMPT TO FLANK THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that this may seem to be a wire-drawn criticism, but it leads naturally to a more important objection; and it is quite possible that the committee have put the bill in its present shape for the exact purpose of concealing that objection. The enactment that this House shall consist of any precise number of members works both ways. The membership cannot legally exceed that number unless provision therefor be made in the bill; and, on the other hand, it cannot legally be less than that number. But this bill distinctly provides that "whenever a new State is admitted to the Union, the Representative or Representatives assigned to it shall be added to the number." Hence, the only point in fixing the number of members of the House is clearly that of preventing any reduction below the specified number. Just this, and this only, so far as I can see, is the object to be gained; and any one who reads section 2 of the fourteenth amendment in the light of the current history of elections in several Southern States, will instantly see how important it is that the democratic party should have all the fortifications possible behind which to resist the execution of that amendment. In the glare of this history I can readily understand the joy with which a democratic committee has seized upon a few precedents in framing this bill, and can see that a point which was of no importance in our past legislative actions may prove to be of vital importance in future legislative proceedings.

CONGRESS HAS POWER TO REDUCE THE REPRESENTATION OF STATES IN WHICH ELECTIONS ARE NOT FREE.

Now, I am not one of the two hundred and eighty lawyers in this House; but there are a good many millions of persons in the United States besides lawyers who can understand the English language, and as one of the latter I desire to state certain reasons for the belief that, under the Constitution, Congress has the power to reduce the representation on this floor of any State in which the freedom of elections is denied or abridged, either by the official action of the State itself, or by the action of individuals within its jurisdiction.

If Congress possesses this power, then it certainly is bound to ascertain whether any circumstances exist anywhere which demand the exercise of that power; and if such demand exists, then the possession of the power carries with it the duty of promptly punishing offenders; and that is the chief reason, and a vital reason, why I oppose fixing the membership of this House at any specified number, in contradistinction from the act of fixing the number of people who shall be entitled to one Representative.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL MODE OF APPORTIONING BEFORE THE WAR.

It is clear that apportioning Representatives among the several States is a wholly distinct thing from fixing the number of members who shall compose this House, and I quote the power granted to Congress:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, (apprentices,) and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons, (slaves.)—Constitution, article 1, section 2.

It is a significant fact that the States are not here spoken of in the sense of governments or corporate agents, but merely as the geographical districts in which certain people of the United States happen to reside. There is a clear distinction between the two things. By the word State may be meant (1) a geographical district, or (2) the people residing in that district, or (3) the local government through which these people make and execute certain local laws only binding upon themselves. When we speak of the old thirteen States we sometimes mean the people in them, but often the corporate governments representing those people. When men speak of State sovereignty they usually mean that power which is exercised by a State government as the organ of its people. This section does not use the word "State" in that sense, but merely in the sense of people residing in a geographical district, because the language is: "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, which (numbers, not of State governments, but of people) shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, the apprentices," etc.

The census was to be taken of the people, not of the States as governments. To the number of free persons was to be added the number of apprentices and untaxed Indians, and then a number equal to three-fifths of the slaves; and for every 30,000 persons so ascertained one Representative was to be allowed a seat in this House. State lines were viewed simply as a matter of convenience in taking the census. Persons were not regarded in the light of subjects to a State government, but as subjects of the United States Government alone. The total population of the United States was the primary fact to be ascertained, and not the populations of the States. This population of the United States Government, as distinct from that of State governments, was divided into groups of 30,000 each, and one Representative was assigned to each group. This and this alone was the principle and process of the Constitution. It is the only principle which can justly be practiced to-day.

THE NUMBER OF PEOPLE THE BASIS OF APPORTIONMENT.

What other theory than the one that the people are the basis of apportionment can be maintained, or would be submitted to in a Republic?

Scattered all over this land, from Maine to Texas, and from Virginia to Oregon, are 50,000,000 of free men, women, and children, equal in their right to life, liberty, protection and happiness. A few neighbors for economy and convenience agree to erect a school-house and hire a teacher, or to construct and maintain local roads, and so organize a township government. For the same reasons the people in several townships form a county government for the administration of justice. The people in several counties form a State government for the same reasons. And the people residing in all the territory subdivided into States form a national government. In every case the people, and they alone, are the real source of power. The township trustees are only agents, and can have no greater power than that of the people for whom they act. The county officers are not the people a bit more than the money they expend is their money. The State officers are not the people, but merely their agents. And the National Government has no power whatever except such as is furnished by the whole people of the United States. If a law be resisted it can only be enforced by the aggregate power of all of the persons in the United States, and when that limit is reached the extent of the power of the National Government is reached.

Now a Representative is merely an agent in the same sense as is a township or county or State officer, and in no different sense; and when, as now, the question arises as to how many Representatives there shall be, you necessarily run back to the questions—how many people are there in the United States? and, by what number of Representatives can the people's business be most conveniently transacted? After investigation you say that for every 150,000 or 160,000 people there should be one Representative. But the people are the foundation, or source; the Representative is merely their agent and spokesman. And whenever you fix on the ratio, then you must equitably apportion that ratio among all of the people in the United States as prescribed by the supreme and organic law which was adopted by all of the people, the Constitution. Upon no other principle than this can the theory of representation be sustained, and upon no other practice than that of allowing one Representative for groups of the same size and freedom in voting can our Government be justly conducted; because it is all of the people in the United States who are the ultimate parties represented on this floor, and they must be equally represented.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL MODE OF APPORTIONING SINCE THE WAR.

The late war laid an iron hand upon this section of the Constitution, just as it did upon many hearts and fortunes and many a sound body. Its first finger-mark appears in the Constitution as the thirteenth amendment:

ART. XIII. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

The first sentence of the fourteenth amendment has an equal bearing on this matter of apportionment:

ART. XIV, SEC. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

As we have seen, before the war the Constitution provided that the population of the United States, for purposes of representation in this House, should be ascertained by adding three-fifths of the number of slaves to the number of free persons. But the war by abolishing slavery and by making all persons, whether black or white, who were born or naturalized on its soil, citizens of the United States, formed a new basis of representation, and that is now the basis on which we must adjust representation. It makes no difference whether gentlemen like it or not, or whether they would prefer that this should be a "white man's government" alone. There were many things about the war which none of us liked, but to which all had to submit. Piling up an enormous national debt was one of them, which the North disliked. The South dislikes these two amendments. But they are facts, nevertheless; grim, resolute, forceful facts. This is not a white man's government, nor a black man's, nor that of the native born, nor of the naturalized; it is every American citizen's government, black man's just as much as white man's, and of the foreign born just as much as of the native born. This truth has been so burned into the Constitution by the fire of war that nothing but the equal heat of another war can burn it out. It never will be burnt out. It is there for all time to come, glowing with justice. And as long as it is there it is a fact which has got to be treated as a fact, and to be respected as a very red-hot fact. Any State or set of men who try to conceal it from sight will simply get burnt, and go into the howling-dervish line of business. That is exactly what ails the democratic party to-day, and is the reason why it is swearing from Maine to Oregon worse than the army in Flanders.

WHAT A STATE GOVERNMENT SHALL NOT DO TO CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Now, the next sentence in the first section of the fourteenth amendment is wholly distinct from the one quoted and which created a citizenship of the United States. It is:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

In this sentence the word "State" is clearly used to designate the corporate government which enacts and executes the local laws of the people within its boundaries. The first sentence declared certain persons to be citizens of the United States, and made these persons citizens of the States in which they may reside. The second declares something which the State governments shall not do to these persons; but it neither declares nor attempts to declare what the States shall do to them. It is a prohibition, a negation, and not at all an affirmative enactment.

There is nothing in this section which says that because a State government does not pass or enforce a law authorizing tissue ballots or red-shirt bulldozing, that therefore Congress is barred from preventing such frauds upon citizens of the United States and upon itself. The whole section is prohibitory as to the governments of the States, and in no way limits or bars affirmative legislation by Congress based upon the primal power of every nation to protect its citizens whether abroad or at home, whether from pirates at sea or highwaymen on its own soil. That is a duty, as well as a power, which inevitably and flashingly follows from the first sentence, namely, that all persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens thereof. And not only is this duty imposed upon Congress, but in the second section of the fourteenth amendment both the mode of executing the power and the penalty for a violation of the rights of citizens of the United States are plainly stated. It is as follows:

REDUCTION OF THE REPRESENTATION OF A STATE IN WHICH THE RIGHT TO VOTE IS ABRIDGED.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

This is not addressed to the State governments but to the Congress of the United States. It is not even primarily considering an abridgment of the rights of United States citizens. That is a secondary matter to its real aim. It does not concern itself primarily with the action of a State, but with an entirely different matter, namely, this very question of apportionment. And it is just such a revision of section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution as was necessitated by the abolition of slavery. The subject-matter and purpose of both sections are the same. The only difference between the first paragraphs of each is that while the Constitution before the war spoke of free persons, and of adding to their number that of apprentices and three-fifths of slaves, the Constitution since the war strikes out the word "free" before "persons," and says "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed." There you have the subject-matter and broad purpose of this second section of the fourteenth amendment.

DIFFERENT MODES OF ABRIDGING THE RIGHT TO VOTE.

But now follows, though as a secondary matter to the main subject, a vital enactment, namely, that when the right of a citizen of the United States to vote at any election, be it national or State, is denied or "in any way abridged," except for crime, the basis of representation shall be reduced in the proportion of such denial or abridgment.

Of course this denial or abridgment may be done in either of two ways. First, the people of a State, acting through their State government, may pass a law effecting such an abridgment. Second, the people of the State, not acting through their State government, but acting directly as a mob, may effect the same result. Congress has prohibited the first method in so many words.

And I claim that this amendment prohibits the second method by the insertion of the phrase "or in any way" abridge. It says that if the right to vote is denied or in any way abridged the representation shall be reduced accordingly. A State law is one way of abridging. A poll tax on men who cannot pay it is another way of abridging their suffrage. Putting so few polling places in a district that voters cannot reach them is another way. Receiving ballots from white voters at one window with rapidity, and taking ballots from colored voters at another window, challenging each voter and disputing over the answers of each so long that not one man in ten can have a chance to deposit his ballot, is another way. Stationing armed bands of democrats at the polls, overawing men who would otherwise vote a republican ticket, is another way of abridging suffrage. When a hundred athletic men, armed to the teeth, meeting at midnight in the black gloom of a forest, masking themselves, riding in column to the lonely cabin of a man whose soul, created after the image and in the likeness of the great-hearted God, happens to be incased in a black skin, drag him from the arms of his wife and the clutch of his little ones, and murder him in cold blood—a hundred to one—that is another way of abridging his right to vote and the suffrage of his race. Trying a freedman for debt, and by due process of law condemning him to penal labor, hiring out this convict labor to a ring, is another way. How many more ways there may be, or might be, is simply a matter of investigation. But the Constitution since the war declares that when the right to vote at any election is denied to the legal voters or in any way abridged, except for crime, the representation of that State shall be reduced accordingly.

THE SECOND SECTION OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT HITHERTO A DEAD LETTER.

That language is enough for me, and the honorable gentleman from New York has told us that "no practical application has been made of the constitutional clause or the law." For one, I propose that a practical application of it be made now. He says that "it has been hitherto a dead letter." Yes; and many a grave has been filled because it was a dead letter. So far as my vote will put life into that dead letter, will lead to an ascertainment of the exact facts in the case, to the punishment of the abridgers, to the prevention of future abridgments, to the execution of this hitherto dead letter by reducing the representation of States in which such abridgments have been made, it will be cast unflinchingly and to the end. And more than that, I am ready to vote, if the ends of justice can be reached in no other way, for a standing army that will place 30,000 men in every offending State east, west, north, and south, for fifty years if need be, in order to put and keep the life of simple justice, the spirit of liberty, the soul of pity for the weak and helpless ones, into this "hitherto dead letter."

That "hitherto" of trickery, of brute force, of heartless cruelty has got to give way to the "hereafter" of free speech, of a free press, of free schools, of free men casting free ballots and having them honestly counted exactly as cast. The "hitherto" of democracy marshaled by a solid South has got to give place to the "hereafter" of republicanism marshaled by a solid North, until that flag which protects the American citizen on any foreign soil, on every ocean, and against all nations will equally protect each of its own citizens, black or white, on every square yard of its own soil, South or North.

THE DEMOCRATIC DODGE OF SUBSTITUTING A LAW OF CONGRESS FOR THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The democratic party, with its usual inaccuracy or something else, has gotten into the habit of quoting section 6 of the apportionment act passed by Congress February 2, 1872, as if it were a transcript of this fourteenth amendment, and therefore a part of that supreme Constitution, which is infinitely above and beyond the reach of Congress. It is as follows:

That should any State, after the passage of this act, deny or abridge the right of any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, to vote at any election named in the amendments to the Constitution, article 14, section 2, except for participation in the rebellion or other crime, the number of Representatives apportioned in this act to such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.—Statutes at Large 17, page 29.

When the question is raised as to whether the right of citizens of the United States to vote is abridged in the Southern States, these democratic statesmen snuggle up to this law of Congress like a sick kitten to a hot brick, and try to make you believe that this statute is the same as the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

As I read it, there is not a word in section 2 of that amendment which limits the abridgment of voting to the action of a State as an organized government, in contradistinction from the action of people who live in its territory. It is easy to confound the two and to speak of the State government as if it were the inhabitants dwelling within its jurisdiction. It is not. It is simply the agent of the people. At the most there are but two or three hundred of these various agents, who together form the officers of the State or the State government, but they are only a part of the two or three millions of people who in a true sense are the State. And while the State government may not officially abridge the right of suffrage, yet people in that State may do exactly that thing. There is not the shadow of a doubt that persons in the Southern States have prevented white and colored men from voting the republican ticket, and that by tissue ballots, fraudulent counting, and other absolute crimes they have "abridged" hundreds of thousands of American citizens in the exercise of the highest civil right known on the globe. As we have seen, section 2 of the fourteenth amendment was addressed by the people of the United States to Congress, telling us how we should apportion Representatives; but section 6 of the law of 1872 was addressed by Congress to the State governments. The former can only be repealed by the people; the latter may be repealed by any Congress. The former is in full force to-day, and can no more be affected or vitiated by this House than can the Ten Commandments be affected by an act of Congress.

In my judgment, any Congress at any time may, under that amendment, reduce the representation of any State in which the right to vote is either denied or abridged by a State law, or denied or abridged by a mob. But if this opinion be incorrect, then I rest upon the first clause of section 1, and on the fundamental law of all nations, that the United States has a right to protect its citizens in the South as well as in Mexico; and at the proper time I shall offer the following amendment, which, if adopted, would leave no room for doubt on this point:

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE BILL.

Provided, That when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, whether by the action or non-action of a State government, or whether by the action of individuals or combinations of individuals, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State; and Congress shall have the right to make such reduction of representation at any time.

And this raises the question whether such circumstances exist as not only justify the proposal of this amendment, but demand both its adoption and execution as a measure of protection to the whole people of the United States in their representation on this floor? Are there any positive facts fully within the knowledge of this House which fairly indicate a reasonable probability that the rights of citizens of the United States to vote have been, or are being, denied or in any way abridged in the Southern States?

ONE-THIRD OF THE SOUTHERN VOTE ABRIDGED.

The population of the twenty-two Northern States is 30,865,390, and of the sixteen Southern States, 18,504,205. The total vote of the former, as presented the other day by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR,] was 6,539,143, and of the latter, 2,758,449. Hence, in the Northern States there was one vote cast for every 4.7 persons, but in the Southern States only one vote for every 6.7 persons—a difference of just about one-third. There must be some causes operating in the South that do not operate in the North, which have prevented one-third of the citizens of the United States in the South from voting. I am presenting the question on the broad plane of human nature, and discussing it as the result of those great forces of the heart which shape the actions of all men under similar conditions. Human nature in the South is not a whit different from human nature in the North. Neither State lines nor thermal lines check the aspirations of men to an equal voice in making the laws that bind them, and to an equal protection under those laws; or, if the brighter sun of the South exerts a greater influence upon the patriotism of its inhabitants than does that of the North, then, if we are to take the utterances of the past, this effect only makes them the more patriotic, and, therefore, the more vigilant in the exercise of that highest of civic rights, the right to vote. The fact is that the southern people as a whole have always paid more attention to politics than have the northern people as a whole. Why, then, have not that other third of the southern people voted, if they enjoyed the same facilities for voting and the same honesty in counting as the northern people? Put this story of unquestioned figures in another shape, in order to apprehend its full force.

If the North had voted on the ratio of the South, its six and a half millions (6,539,143) of votes would have been but four and a half millions, (4,606,774,) or nearly two millions less, (1,932,369.) On the other hand, if the South had voted on the ratio of the North, its two and three quarter millions (2,758,449) of votes would have been four millions, (3,937,064,) or more than a million greater, (1,178,615.) So that some causes, be they what they may, are affecting the human nature of citizens of the United States in the South which do not affect the human nature of citizens anywhere else in the United States; and what is more, these causes are powerful and active ones, sufficiently powerful to wipe out one-third of the southern vote; and, too, like the remarkable "coincidence" of the elder Mr. Weller, referred to by the gentleman from New York the other day, what is queer it always happens to be republican voters who are "upset." The solid South fulfilled the pledge given in the Cincinnati convention that it would be solidly for Hancock. There is no escape from the fact that the ratio of voters in the South is one-third less than that in the North, nor from the consequent fact that the solid South may have one-third more votes on this floor and in the election of President, than it might have if that silent third of its population had expressed its will at the polls.

That fact of the ratios is in my eyes what the blood on her hand was in the eyes of Lady Macbeth. Gentlemen may spring up to offer all the plausable explanations which ingenuity can suggest. They may rub it on the one side and rub it on the other side, and wash it in a very ocean of explanations. They may cry to it "out, damned spot!" but "it will not out!" After they have gotten through, that ratio of one to 6.7 in the South, and one to 4.7 everywhere else remains. And this silent one-third of the southern vote as an actual fact stalks before the House and before the people, just as vividly, as ghastly, as ghostly, after their explanations as before they began. This side of the Chamber is not called upon to say, "shake not thy gory locks at me, thou canst not say I did it!" It stares at that side of the Chamber, and will neither be laid nor hushed, nor will either a free people long endure or a just God long permit such a wholesale fraud upon American citizens be they white or black, "respectable" or unrespectable, men who wore the gray or the blue, F. F. V's or carpet-baggers.

INJUSTICE TO THE NORTH.

Because, wholly apart from any considerations of justice or any sympathy for the weak as against the strong, the North has a self-interest in this matter of representation sufficiently powerful to compel it to secure equal representation in this body and in the electoral college. As stated by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR,] if the membership of this House be fixed at 311 the South would have one Representative for every 23,376 voters, while the North would only have one for every 33,838 voters; that is, it would require one-third more votes in the North to elect a Congressman than in the South. But these Congressmen fix tariffs, settle financial questions, and expend the public moneys. For ten years to come the whole power of the House is to be wielded on the apportionment which shall be made. And the people of the North have not yet come to the conclusion that the South is one-third better than the North, either in brains, thrift, or property; or that the South has in the past shown one-third more devotion to the Constitution, the Union, and the flag, and therefore should have one-third greater power than the North in levying taxes, enacting laws, and electing Presidents.

As was said long ago, but on this same general subject, there is an irrepressible conflict between what is just and what is unjust, between what is observed as law in the North and what is not observed as law in the South. That conflict will thicken till it finds settlement on the organic principle of this Republic, namely, real equality of rights at the polls, in Congress, and before the courts. Gentlemen may cry "peace" to their heart's content, and ladle out democratic soothing sirup by the gallon; but long ago a sagacious student of human nature indicated the only way of obtaining mental peace, whether by one man or by a nation, when he stated the order to be "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." Joy is the effect of peace as a cause, and there is no peace except as the effect of righteousness as a cause. I commend the Bible to the democratic leaders.

COMPARISON OF THE RATIO OF POPULATION TO VOTERS IN KANSAS WITH THAT IN SOUTHERN STATES.

To show what a difference there is between the ratio of population to voters in my own State and in the Southern States I have prepared the following table, and believe it to be correct. Kansas had about one million people last June, (995,966,) and has over a million now. It cast 201,019 votes in November, and had, therefore, 4.9 persons for each vote. The ratio of the Southern States is as follows:

States.	Vote.	Population.	Number to each voter.
Kansas	201,019	995,966	4.9
Alabama	151,507	1,262,794	8.3
Arkansas	106,249	802,564	7.5
Delaware	29,233	146,654	5.0
Florida	51,618	267,351	5.1
Georgia	155,655	1,539,048	9.9
Kentucky	264,047	1,648,708	7.0
Louisiana	97,201	940,103	9.7
Maryland	173,039	934,632	5.4
Mississippi	117,078	1,131,592	10.5
Missouri	397,221	2,168,804	5.4
North Carolina	241,218	1,400,047	5.8
South Carolina	170,956	995,622	5.8
Tennessee	241,827	1,542,463	6.3
Texas	237,133	1,592,574	6.7
Virginia	211,754	1,512,806	7.1
West Virginia	112,713	618,443	5.5
Total of Southern States	2,758,449	18,504,205	6.7

SOMETHING ROTTEN SOMEWHERE.

While in Kansas 4.9 persons are represented by 1 vote, in these States 1 vote represents, as follows: In Delaware, 5; Florida, 5.1; Maryland, 5.4; Missouri, 5.4; West Virginia, 5.5; North Carolina, 5.8; South Carolina, 5.8; Tennessee, 6.3; Texas, 6.7; Kentucky, 7; Virginia, 7.1; Arkansas, 7.5; Alabama, 8.3; Louisiana, 9.7; Georgia, 9.9; Mississippi, 10.5.

With a vote of 201,019, Kansas is to have 6 Representatives by this bill. The vote of Alabama was less than that of Kansas by 49,512, and the bill gives that State two more Representatives. Arkansas, with about one-half of our vote, or 94,770 less, is to have 5 Representatives to our 6. Georgia, with a vote 45,364 less than Kansas, is to have 4 Representatives more than Kansas. Louisiana is to have the same number of Representatives as is Kansas, with a vote 103,818 less. Maryland has the same representation, but a smaller vote by 28,888. The vote of Mississippi is 83,941 less, and her representation one greater. South Carolina has the same representation, with 31,063 fewer votes. Virginia had only 10,735 more votes at the polls, but is to have 10 Congressmen to our 6. West Virginia is to have equal representation here, with 88,306 fewer votes at the polls.

There is no power on earth which can make me believe that this condition of things is right or just. There is something rotten somewhere, and it is not in Kansas; nor will I willingly consent that the people whom I represent on this floor shall be made to suffer year after year, and decade after decade, because of that rottenness somewhere. Under the Constitution we must make the apportionment on the basis of population, but, also under that Constitution, we have the power to punish any State or any set of people who abridge the right of suffrage, by reducing its representation; and I therefore suggest the remedy proposed in the amendment.

UNFAIRNESS OF "319."

One more point. Gentlemen are advocating a membership of 319, on the ground that it is exactly fair to the South and to the North, each having gained 13 members; by which they mean that the present proportions between the two sections are preserved. I have tried to show, and certainly believe, that the present proportions are not just, and I am not in favor of maintaining them for ten years to come. In my judgment, the North has heretofore been egregiously swindled, and I do not propose to keep up that swindle. At 293 members, as in the present House, Kansas will be entitled to 6 votes. At 319 she will only have 6, but she will have lost more than 8 per cent. (8.15) of her relative power. If the number be increased to 322, only an addition of 3 members over 319, Kansas will then be entitled to 7 Congressmen, and will not have lost any of her relative power. The three States which will have gained are, Iowa, at 320, Wisconsin, at 321, and Kansas, at 322, all of them States holding free elections and doing honest counting.

I confess to a vivid conviction that the republican majority in the next House will be more likely to deal fairly with the fourteenth amendment and with this apportionment question than can be expected from this democratic House. Personally I like you gentlemen very well, but as politicians I would not trust you a bit further than a boy can swing an elephant by the shadow of its tail; and am quite willing, unless we can have free debate and an opportunity to vote on amendments, that this bill should slumber sweetly in its little bed, even though several Legislatures should adjourn before it awakens into a law. Justice is worth more than dollars. Liberty, free elections, and honest counts are worth more to the people in every county of this nation than are the costs of extra sessions. And so far as the Legislatures are concerned, they can elect members of the Forty-eighth Congress on the present districting, and the additional ones to which they may be entitled "at large." There are infinitely greater questions at stake in this issue than such relatively paltry ones as these—fundamental questions of eternal justice under-running the whole Republic and affecting the interest of every voter and every township.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. E. H. GILLETTE.

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 1, 1881,

On the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. GILLETTE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The national greenback party is opposed to the refunding of the bonds about to mature, because there is no necessity for it. They can be paid, as we have repeatedly shown, more easily and almost as speedily as they can be refunded. We voted against this bill when it passed, and can never upon any pretext vote for the issue of a non-taxable interest-bearing bond. But the question now is upon amendments to this bill made in the Senate and others proposed here.

We vote for and against these various amendments upon their merits. The great issue presented by any funding bill, the only excuse for any such bill, is that the national banks may be perpetuated and allowed to control the money of the nation. The fifth section of this bill, designed to curtail their power to produce panic and disaster at pleasure, is the first proposition ever submitted by any committee of Congress which has met with their decided opposition. It has stirred up the lions in their dens, and now we hear them growl. Andrew Jackson said the banks cannot be relied upon to keep the circulating medium uniform in amount.

Our party has warned the country for years that the finances, the business, the dearest interests of the people, all rest upon a magazine penetrated with electric wires from 2,000 national banks, which can at pleasure fill the heavens with the sickening wrecks of American industries. We have demanded on every stump that this arrogant, insolent monopoly which proposes, like the old United States bank, to rule or ruin the Republic, shall be abolished forever, and have submitted many bills to this House for that purpose, every one of which has been suppressed by the committee to which it was referred.

When this bill was previously before us a member who was the mouth-piece of the banks warned us that if we passed it in form not satisfactory to them they would contract the currency $200,000,000 and produce a greater panic than the country had ever seen. They are displeased with the fifth section of the bill, and propose to make good that threat and wreak vengeance upon their unfortunate victims, the American people. Money, which is the vital air of commerce, is suddenly locked up in the United States Treasury. Fifteen to twenty millions of dollars have already been retired, panic and distress result. This is but the beginning. The Treasury is powerless to stay the storm if they proceed.

As the banks fiddle so the industries and business of the country must dance—it may be a triumphal march, it may be a funeral dirge—and this is the "great success," the "financial paradise" which the policy of John Sherman has fastened upon the country. Each day every business man in the land looks with breathless anxiety to read his fortune or his fate in the dispatches from New York, telling what the banks are doing.

History repeats itself. The same old question that confronted Andrew Jackson's administration confronts us, Shall the people rule, or abdicate in favor of the banks? Let this Samson be shorn of his locks! Snatch from these banks this Pandora's box of ills, which they empty at pleasure upon a defenseless people and convert a paradise of prosperity into a hell of bankruptcy and ruin.

Will this Congress adjourn forever and leave the country to the tender mercies of an institution that has well been likened to Victor Hugo's devil-fish? We ask for a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DE LA MATYR.]

Provided, That whenever any national banking association shall retire its circulation in whole or in part as provided by law, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be issued and placed in circulation in lawful manner a like amount of legal-tender Treasury notes in addition to those now in use as currency, and of the character and denominations now authorized; and no national banking association so diminishing its circulation, or which may have retired any portion of its circulating notes since the 18th of February, 1881, shall hereafter be permitted to increase the amount of its circulating notes.

This requires the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a greenback for every national-bank note retired, a greenback that will not hide at the wink of a banker, a greenback under the benign watchful eye of Congress. The United States Senate, frightened by the banks, has cowed and hurried to appease their ire by sending in its apologies for having dared to vote for this bill in the shape of a bill repealing $14,000,000 of taxes now collected by the Government annually from the banks. It remains to be seen whether the House of Representatives can be thus easily bulldozed. We are here to represent the people. Let us do it and protect them from the banks whose agents to-day swarm to the capital.

The republicans have filibustered against this fifth section for two days. They created these banks and have always yielded to their wishes, and you could no more separate the two organizations than you could separate the Siamese twins. Each depends for its existence upon the other. Each swears by the other. I appeal to the democratic party in this House to know whether they are willing to go out of power leaving the country in a panic because of the iniquitous national-bank act, passed by their political opponents, without raising a finger to protect the innocent victims of bank contraction. I ask whether the spirit of Jackson has died out of your organization so completely that you are willing the dearest interests of the people should be subject to the whims of national banks. If so you prove yourselves unworthy of the trusts the people have reposed in you.

You have to-day the grandest opportunity presented since Jackson's day to vindicate the sovereignty of the American people, and protect your constituents from an arrogant, insolent monopoly, and you squarely refuse to embrace it unless you will pass this amendment. You have stirred up the bankers by the fifth section to do their worst against the people, and now refuse to even consider a provision that would absolutely protect us against them. You have deliberately invited the fire of the enemy, and refuse to raise a breastwork or arm a volunteer for the common defense. Can you—dare you—invite panic; invite financial ruin to the country, and leave the Treasury helpless to protect the people with the people's money?

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. G. DE LA MATYR,

OF INDIANA;

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 1, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. DE LA MATYR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The great overshadowing issue which some of us have seen rising for years now holds the attention of Congress and of the people. That issue is, "Shall the national banking association continue to be the absolute dictator of the financial and business affairs of this country?"

That association, having full control of the republican party, of the eastern leaders of the democratic party, and of a large portion of the press, has commenced to rule with a rod of iron. To force Congress to legislate in its interests alone in refunding the debt soon coming due, it has greatly injured the business interests of the country. It has suddenly contracted the volume of currency some $17,000,000, and threatens to continue contraction even to the amount of $200,000,000 if its behests are not obeyed. The important fact on which this imperious conduct is inviting attention is that a selfish, irresponsible association created by the Government is invested with the power to bring financial disaster and business ruin whenever it will conduce to its own interests. Our main opposition to this association is the fact that it possesses this dangerous power.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] in his frantic speech, mournfully deploring that the hand of God is writing on the walls of our national temple the doom of the national banking system, charged in substance that we are in favor of the old State-bank system. He must be supremely ignorant of the views of the greenback party, or incapable of conceiving of a currency not issued by banks. Has he ever heard of the greenbacks which were issued by the Government directly into the channels of trade without the intervention of banks at all? We would no more trust State banks than national banks with the control of the volume of our medium of exchange. Issuing our currency and controlling its volume is a vital interest of the whole people. It is an act of sovereignty which it is madness to delegate to any corporation or set of corporations. Every financial crash which has swept with destruction the business interests of our country has resulted from fluctuations in the volume of currency caused by bankers. Figures on the books of the Treasury Department demonstrate the truth of this assertion.

The section of the bill now under consideration (the fifth) seeks to restrain the power of the national banks to suddenly contract the currency. Against that restraint the national banking association has brought to bear all its force. Many of the closing hours of this Congress have been wasted by filibustering on the part of republican leaders to prevent the imposing of that restraint—hours indispensable for the passing of important measures. It is also rumored that a prepared veto by the President awaits the bill, if this section, so obnoxious to the bankers, is not stricken out.

It is evident that the bankers dominate the Government as well as the "financial and business affairs of the country," and that no refunding measure which they do not dictate will be permitted to become law.

We have done our utmost to secure refunding in non-interest-bearing notes to be used as currency instead of the national-bank notes. We have demonstrated by figures taken from the books of the Treasury that while the $400,000,000 of greenbacks issued directly by the Government, and universally recognized as the best currency we have ever had, have cost only the expense of preparing, about three hundred and fifty million dollars of national-bank currency have cost, in double interest compounded, full $2,500,000,000. We have shown clearly that this immense cost is as the "small dust of the balance" compared with the injury to the prosperity of the country which has resulted and threatens to result from fluctuations in the volume of the medium of exchange, inseparable from the national banking system. As a last resort we have sought to have incorporated in this bill, for the purpose of preventing sudden and ruinous changes in the volume of the currency, the following proviso:

Provided, That whenever any national banking association shall retire its circulation in whole or in part as provided by law, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be issued and placed in circulation in lawful manner a like amount of legal-tender Treasury notes in addition to those now in use as currency, and of the character and denominations now authorized; and no national banking association so diminishing its circulation, or which may have retired any portion of its circulating notes since the 18th of February, 1881, shall hereafter be permitted to increase the amount of its circulating notes.

This proviso was ruled out on the plea that it would endanger the passage of the bill. A supplemental bill will be proposed as we are informed. We shall make the effort to have this proviso attached to it. And if the democratic leaders are willing it should be voted on, we shall be recognized for the purpose, and it will be attached; but we doubt whether they will permit.

No doubt the bankers will now prevail, but "the triumph of the wicked is short." The people are at last awaking to a consciousness of the tyranny enthroned over them, and no power can prevent this issue from becoming the main question in future political campaigns. It is henceforth irrepressible.

Land Grants in California.

SPEECH OF HON. A. E. STEVENSON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, March 3, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 531) to authorize the correction of boundaries of certain lands in San Mateo County, California.

Mr. STEVENSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: As a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims, I have to the best of my ability investigated the facts and law of this case. If I can have the attention of the House I will endeavor as briefly as possible to state the important facts bearing upon it, as well as the reasons upon which I base my conclusion that this bill should pass.

Upon the threshold of this discussion it will be necessary to recur to the history of the grant known as Cañada di Roimundo and the rights of its former occupants under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. By this treaty California was ceded by Mexico to the United States, the latter government expressly stipulating to respect all private rights in the ceded territory. California was admitted into the Union on the 9th day of September, 1850, the third section of the act providing for its admission being as follows:

That the State of California is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of said State, through their Legislature or otherwise, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within its limits, and shall pass no law and do no act whereby the title of the United States to, and right to dispose of, the same shall be impaired or questioned.

The real controversy in this case, Mr. Speaker, is betweeen the owners of Las Pulgas Rancho and those who claim to have been unjustly ejected from the Cañada di Roimundo, and who now seek relief by the legislation contemplated in the pending bill. Some knowledge of the history and boundaries of Las Pulgas Rancho is indispensable, then, to a correct understanding of this case.

The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was ratified May 30, 1848, thirteen years prior to which time the Mexican Government, through its proper officials, had granted to the Argualla heirs Las Pulgas Rancho and given them juridical possession thereof. This grant was made on the 27th day of November, 1835, by Jose Castro, political chief and governor of Alta California.

It will be remembered that for the purpose of executing in good faith the treaty above referred to and protecting the citizens of California under rights acquired while yet subjects of Mexico, the Congress of the United States by act of March 3, 1851, provided that all private claims should be presented to a board of land commissioners created by that act; and if the petition of claimant received favorable consideration by this board, then a survey of the land claimed was to be made by the surveyor-general, and upon his certificate of such survey being filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a patent was to issue to the claimant.

In pursuance of this act of Congress the Arguello heirs, in 1852, filed their petition with this board of land commissioners for a confirmation of their claim to Las Pulgas Rancho, claiming twelve leagues. The board, however, confirmed their claim as to four leagues only, rejecting it as to the residue. From this decision an appeal was unsuccessfully prosecuted by the heirs of Arguello to the district court of California, and subsequently to the Supreme Court of the United States, when the decision below was affirmed.

If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine 18 Howard, 539, they will find that the Supreme Court there declare the boundaries of Las Pulgas Rancho to be as follows:

Bounded on the south by arroyo or creek of San Francisquito; on the north by the creek of San Mateo; on the east esteros or waters of the bay of San Francisco, and on the west by the eastern borders of the valley known as the Cañada di Roimundo, said land being of the extent of four leagues in length and one in breadth, be the same more or less.

The decision last referred to, and which definitely established the boundaries of Las Pulgas Rancho, was rendered in 1855, and the survey made by a deputy surveyor of the United States during the following year. His field-notes and a map purporting to be a correct survey of Las Pulgas Rancho were returned into the General Land Office in December, 1856, whereupon the Commissioner issued a patent to the Arguello heirs at law and legal representatives for 35,240 acres, being the amount embraced in such survey. The patent, however, contained the provision:

That in virtue of the act of March 3, 1851, the confirmation of said claim and the patent should not affect the rights of third parties.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me call attention to an important fact in this connection. The survey upon which this patent issued was not in accordance with the original grant as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, to which I have referred. By that decision Las Pulgas was confined to the boundaries above given; but the survey upon which the patent issued included 17,490 acres in excess of the four leagues declared as above to be the limit of that grant. This mistake—to use no harsher term—in the survey fully appears by the testimony of the surveyor of the county of San Mateo.

It is, sir, by reason of this error in the survey by which 17,490 acres have been taken from the Cañada di Roimundo and the public domain and added to Las Pulgas Rancho, that this controversy has arisen. Before passing from this point, let it be distinctly borne in mind that the boundaries of the Arguello grant, or Las Pulgas Rancho, were clearly defined by the Supreme Court in the case to which I have referred, the western boundary being the Valley di Roimundo, the eastern the waters of the bay of San Francisco, and the breadth being one league.

I will now call attention to the other grant, the Cañada di Roimundo. This was made to Juan Coppinger, a Mexican, by Alvarado, then governor of California, on the 3d day of August, 1840. The western boundary of the latter grant was Las Pulgas Rancho. As was said by one of the counsel, in his argument before the committee reporting this bill:

But the grant to Coppinger was not surveyed and segregated from the adjoining public domain; therefore juridical possession could not be given by the Mexican authorities; and at the time of the acquisition of the country the grant was held by an inchoate or incomplete title.

Under his grant Coppinger took actual possession and exercised ownership over it up to and alongside of the league line, which was the eastern boundary of Las Pulgas. In 1843 he sold off portions of his grant to parties who went into possession, improved their land without objection or molestation upon the part of the owners of the Pulgas Rancho. His occupancy continued undisturbed as long as California remained subject to the Mexican Government. Now, sir, by the survey to which I have referred, a large portion of the Coppinger grant or Cañada di Roimundo was included in Las Pulgas Rancho and a patent issued therefor to the heirs at law and representatives of Arguello. Actions of ejectment were brought against the occupants, who, being unable to interpose a legal defense against the holders of the patent, were of course ousted. And this after many years of peaceable possession and heavy expenditures in the improvement of their land.

The representatives of Coppinger interposed no objection whatever to the decree fixing the boundaries of the Pulgas Rancho. They insist that that is the correct boundary; their complaint is against the survey by which 17,490 acres, to which they had no shadow of title, was given to the heirs and legal representatives of Arguello.

In accordance with the petition of the Coppinger heirs and grantees, the board of land commissioners held the grant to Coppinger of Cañada di Roimundo to be valid, which finding was confirmed by Hon. Ogden Hoffman, judge of the district court, on the 14th day of January, 1856, and a decree entered, as follows:

And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the claim of the appellees be confirmed to the tract of land known as Cañada di Roimundo, being the same now occupied by the appellees, and bounded and described as follows, namely: Bordering to the west on the Sierra Morena, to the east on the rancho de las Pulgas, to the south on the rancho of Maximo Martinez, and to the north on the Great Lagune.

Mr. Speaker, three important facts have now been established: First, by decree of the Supreme Court of the United States the boundaries of Las Pulgas Rancho are established, limiting that grant to four leagues; second, by decree of the district court of California the boundaries of the Cañada di Roimundo are fixed; third, the patent issued to the Arguello heirs under the erroneous survey was for 17,490 acres in excess of Las Pulgas Rancho.

Under the two decrees, prior to the survey, the league line was the recognized boundary line between the owners and occupants of Las Pulgas on the one side and of the Valley di Roimundo on the other.

But by that survey the Pulgas line was carried into the center of the Roimundo and the western border of the latter forced to the summit of the Sierra Morena Mountains.

It can hardly be insisted, sir, that the boundaries of Las Pulgas Rancho are still in doubt. In the opinion to which I have referred the court further say:

The western boundary line of Las Pulgas, as adjudged by the decree of this court, had two several points of description to fix its location—one uncertain and vague, the other admitting of mathematical certainty. The call of the Cañada Roimundo on the west is as vague as that for the Sierra Morena, a chain of mountains. But the breadth of one league from the estuary or bay was a certain and definite boundary on the east, and showed conclusively the precise location of the line. Las Pulgas could claim to extend but a league west, whether that reached to the hills on the east of the valley or not, and was entitled to have the league in breadth, whether it carried the western line over the hills or not.

Now, sir, the fact as I think being clearly established that by virtue of a patent issued upon a false survey and certificate the legal representatives of Coppinger have been ejected from lands which they had purchased in good faith and to which they were equitably entitled, the question arises whether they are by act or by laches debarred from asserting their right to these lands.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is insisted that these parties should seek their remedy in the courts and not through Congress. That this position is not well taken will readily appear by an examination of the decisions of the State and Federal courts.

The supreme court of California held in the case of Lesse against Clark (18 Cal., page 571–3) that the Government of the United States having submitted to the board of land commissioners to which I have referred the power "to ascertain and settle" private land claims in that State the parties are without remedy unless Congress shall interpose, the courts having no jurisdiction. In that case the court say:

But the patent has a still further operation and effect. It is not merely a deed of the United States, conveying whatever interest they may have had in the premises at the institution of the proceedings before the land commission. It is also a record of the Government, showing its action and judgment with respect to the title of the patentees at the date of the cession. By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo the United States in effect stipulated for the protection of the rights of property of the inhabitants of the ceded territory. Independent of treaty stipulations, the inhabitants were entitled to such protection by the law of nations. The obligation thus devolved upon the Government upon the acquisition of the country was political in its character, and to be executed in such manner as the Government might judge expedient. To execute this obligation necessarily required an inquiry into the nature and extent of the claims asserted to duty at the date of the treaty.

This inquiry involved something more than an investigation into the genuineness of the title papers of the patentees; it also involved an ascertainment of the quantity, location, and boundary of the property claimed. Thus, in the case of the United States vs. Fossatt, (21 Howard, 449,) Mr. Justice Campbell, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, said: "In affirming a claim to land under a Spanish or Mexican grant to be valid within the law of nations, the stipulations of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and the usages of those governments, we imply something more than that certain papers are genuine, legal, and translative of property. We affirm that ownership and possession of land of definite boundaries rightfully attach to the grantee." By the act of March 3, 1851, the Government provided the means for the ascertainment of the character and extent of the titles alleged to have existed previous to the cession. It established a tribunal before which all claims to land were to be investigated; prescribed rules for its action; required evidence to be presented respecting the claims; authorized appeals from the decisions of the tribunal, first to the district and then to the Supreme Court, and appointed officers to survey and measure off the land when the validity of the claims had been finally affirmed.

Informed by the proceedings thus had before its tribunals and officers, the Government regulated its conduct, and to the successful claimant issued its patent. This instrument, as we have stated, is the record of the Government upon the title of the patentee to the land described therein, declaring the validity of that title, and that it rightfully attaches to the land. Upon all the matters of fact and law essential to authorize its issuance, it imports absolute verity; and it can only be vacated and set aside by direct proceedings instituted by the Government, or by parties acting in the name and by the authority of the Government. Until thus vacated it is conclusive, not only as between the patentee and the Government, but between parties claiming in privity with either by title subsequent.

This language cannot be misunderstood. To carry into effect the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the board of land commissioners was created. The patents issued under these surveys import absolute verity. If wrongfully issued, and relief is invoked, it must be through the legislative, not the judicial branch of the Government. It is so held by the highest tribunal of California.

The remedy must be found in the political, not in the judicial department of the Government. It was so decided by Mr. Justice Field, on the circuit in California in 1876, in the case of the United States against Flint:

The United States, therefore, took California bound by the established principles of public law, and by express stipulation of the treaty, to protect all private rights of property of the inhabitants. The obligation rested for its fulfillment in the good faith of the Government, and required legislative action. It could, therefore, only be discharged in such manner, and at such times, and upon such conditions, as Congress might in its discretion direct. In its discharge, such action was required as would enable the inhabitants to assert and maintain their rights to their property in the courts of the country, as fully and absolutely as though their titles were derived directly from the United States. Where the titles were imperfect, and such was the condition of nearly all the titles held in the country, further action by way of confirmation or release from the new government was essential. With respect to all such titles, and indeed with respect to all matters dependent upon executory engagement of the Government, the ordinary courts of the United States, whether of law or equity, were equally powerless; they were without jurisdiction, and utterly incompetent to deal with them.

As to the alleged error in the survey of the claim, it need only be observed that the whole subject of surveys upon confirmed grants, except as provided by the act of 1860, which did not embrace this case, was under the control of the land department, and was not subject to the supervision of the courts. Whether the survey conforms to the claim confirmed or varies from it, is a matter with which the courts have nothing to do; that belongs to a department whose action is not the subject of review by the judiciary in any case, however erroneous. The courts can only examine into the correctness of a survey when, in a controversy between parties, it is alleged that the survey made infringes upon the prior rights of one of them, and can then look into it only so far as may be necessary to protect such rights. They cannot order a new survey, or change that already made.

The power to make or to give practical effect to treaty stipulations was vested by the Constitution exclusively in the political departments of the Government. The jurisdiction of the courts when it existed was extraordinary and by special act of Congress. This was clearly stated by Judge Hoffman in one of the cases to which I have referred. It was a case where the Government of the United States had filed a bill to cancel a patent on the ground of a fraudulent survey. He said:

The treaty is a contract made by the nation acting through the political branch of its government. Its execution is confided to that branch of the government alone. And until it has provided the means and ordained the mode of its execution, no court has the authority to decide what cases fall within its provisions, or what titles the United States is bound to respect.

A fortiori must the ordinary courts be without jurisdiction, when the political power has confided the whole subject to special tribunals, whose final decree it has declared shall be conclusive.

If the House will bear with me a moment longer, Mr. Speaker, I will refer to another decision, which seems conclusive as to the right of the parties who bring this bill to obtain relief against this erroneous survey, in the Federal courts. A suit was instituted in the United States circuit court in California in 1860 by the Government against one Spulredor to correct a survey made by virtue of a confirmation by the board of land commissioners. The court below found that an error had been made in the survey, and decreed that certain corrections should be made by a new survey. An appeal was prosecuted to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the decision was reversed, the court using the following language:

The action of the surveyor in this respect was not in terms made subject to the control of the board or court; it was only made returnable to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington, who was invested, by the previous legislation of Congress, with a general supervision over the acts of all subordinate officers charged with making surveys.

* * * * * * *

The decree of the district court, revising the action of the surveyor-general and correcting his survey, must, therefore, be reversed, and the court directed to dismiss the proceedings for want of jurisdiction. If the survey does not conform to the decree of the board, the remedy must be sought from the Commissioner of the General Land Office before the patent issues, and not in the district court.—1 Wallace, 104.

Reversed for the want of jurisdiction. Will some opponent of this bill explain now what remedy these heirs at law and grantees of Coppinger have in the courts, either State or Federal? Will he explain specifically to this House when and how "they have had their day in court?"

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker; this case presents the following clearly ascertained facts:

First. A valid grant was made by the Mexican authorities of Las Pulgas Rancho to the heirs of Arguello in 1835, the grant containing four leagues.

Second. A valid grant by said authorities was made to Juan Coppinger, in 1840, of Cañada di Roimundo, under which he held undisputed possession until his death, in 1846.

Third. By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo the Government of the United States was bound to recognize and respect all Mexican grants and titles in California.

Fourth. The board of land commissioners, created by act of Congress in 1851 for the purpose of ascertaining and settling these titles, confirmed the title of the Coppinger heirs to the Cañada di Roimundo; and of the Arguello heirs to Las Pulgas Rancho, rejecting the claim of the latter heirs to eight leagues, but fixing the western boundary of said rancho at one league from the estuaries of the bay of San Francisco.

Fifth. The decree of the board of land commissioners was in each case, in all things, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Sixth. There was an error in the survey made of Las Pulgas Rancho, by which a patent issued to the Arguello heirs for 17,490 acres in excess of their grant. This survey stretched the western line of said rancho into the center of Roimundo Valley.

Seventh. Under this patent actions of ejectment were successfully prosecuted in the district court of California against the Coppinger heirs and grantee, and they were in 1861 ejected from lands which they had purchased in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and upon which they had expended large sums; lands which they and their grantors had held in peaceable possession under the Governments of Mexico and the United States successively for near twenty years.

These, sir, are the incontrovertible facts; now as to the law. By the decisions of the State and Federal courts to which I have referred, the remedy against an erroneous survey or the wrongful issuing of a patent in cases arising under this treaty must be found in the legislative department of the Government. Under the act of 1851, creating the board of land commissioners, the courts have no jurisdiction to correct these errors; the relief can be administered only by Congress.

Mr. Speaker, it is under this state of facts and the law arising from them that the legal representatives of Juan Coppinger bring their bill before this House and ask relief at our hands. To the end that they may be permitted to assert their rights to the homes from which they have been wrongfully ejected, they ask that the survey of which I have spoken be corrected so as to conform to the original grant, as declared by the Supreme Court. Sir, to defeat this bill would be simply a denial of justice—a denial of justice, too, by a Government bound by the highest considerations of honor, as well as treaty stipulation, to protect the rights of the humblest citizen upon this broad domain.

Maryland and Delaware Ship-Canal.

SPEECH OF HON. ELI J. HENKLE,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 23, 1881,

In favor of constructing a ship-canal connecting the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays by way of the Sassafras River.

Mr. HENKLE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Having been the first to present before Congress a bill providing for the construction of a ship-canal connecting the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, which should ultimately become a free water-way, and of capacity sufficient for the passage of vessels of the largest size, and having by this means aroused the attention of Congress and the country, more than ever before, to a just appreciation of the great advantages that would result to the commerce of the country by thus providing a direct outlet from the port of Baltimore to the ocean, I deem it proper that I should place upon record, as briefly and clearly as circumstances will permit, the arguments in favor of the work, and especially the considerations that have influenced me in the advocacy of the Sassafras in preference to all other routes for the location of this work—a work destined to become one of great national as well as inestimable local importance.

The long, circuitous, and oftentimes dangerous route by which vessels trading from Baltimore to northern and foreign ports via the capes of Virginia reach their destination, has proven a serious hinderance to the development of our foreign and domestic trade, and men of intelligence and enterprise have for many years past recognized the necessity of a more direct outlet to the sea. It has been considered a subject of national rather than of local importance. In the national commercial convention held in Baltimore City in 1871, composed of gentlemen from every part of the country, of great intelligence and possessing great practical knowledge, the subject of this canal was fully considered. The result was the adoption, by a unanimous vote, of a preamble and resolution which stated that the building of the canal "is of national importance, and is especially of importance to the West, the South, the Southwest, and Northwest, by lessening the distance to European ports and to New England for the export of cereals and provisions, tobacco, cotton, and all other products, and for all importations to meet the requirements for the consumption of those vast regions."

The attention of gentlemen of capital was directed about the same period to this promising field for investment, and in consequence application was made in 1872 to the Maryland Legislature and a charter granted incorporating "The Maryland and Delaware Ship Canal Company." The incorporators were Horace B. Tibbetts, George Vickers, C. Bainbridge Smith, Thales A. Linthicum, James T. Earle, Philip W. Downs, E. L. F. Hardcastle, Levin Wolford, John W. Davis, Julian J. Alexander, and James T. Briscoe—all save one citizens of the State of Maryland. They were authorized to locate and construct a ship-canal across the eastern shore peninsula of the State, by such route as they might deem most desirable, and to charge not exceeding ten cents per ton toll for vessels passing through it, and the charter was made perpetual. The following year, 1873, the Legislature of Delaware chartered the same company, granting them the right to pass through her territory, and conferring upon them similar powers and privileges.

It was the purpose of the gentlemen engaged in this enterprise to construct the canal with their own means, as a remunerative investment for their capital, and without any idea of asking Government aid of any kind; and but for the financial crash of 1873, which bankrupted so many men of ample fortune, the work would now be completed and in successful operation. The advantages of such a work of internal improvement and its promise of remuneration as a private enterprise are forcibly set forth in the following letter from Hon. Reverdy Johnson, our late minister to the Court of Saint James, addressed to the president of the company:

BALTIMORE, November 16, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR: Your two letters of the 5th of October and the 8th of November, 1874, were duly received. I am not surprised to learn that the project of the ship-canal to connect the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays is being favorably considered in Europe. No enterprise of which I am aware promises to be more advantageous to a large portion of the United States than such a canal.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, with its various connections, including its road to Chicago, brings Baltimore, as a shipping port, much nearer to the South, the Southwest, and the Northwest, and of course diminishes the distance to the sea. The effects of the canal will be to make the passage from Baltimore to the ocean fully two hundred and twenty-five miles less than it is at present, and to avoid what at times is a dangerous voyage around the capes. Greatly as Baltimore and Maryland will be profited by such a work, the profit to the sections referred to will be as great, if not greater. And the advantage to the General Government during peace will be largely promoted, and on the occurrence of war the result will be yet more beneficial. Fleets might find their way from one bay to the other with perfect safety, and with so much speed as to be able to meet any enemy that might appear in either bay.

The engineers who have surveyed the route for the larger canal of one hundred feet in width and twenty-five feet in depth, without locks, are, I understand, clearly of opinion that the improvement is entirely practicable.

Your company was chartered by Maryland April 1, 1872, and by Delaware March 26, 1873, and both charters are perpetual. By these grants the company is authorized to construct a ship-canal without locks, and the company, I am told, has wisely decided that the canal shall be one hundred feet in width and twenty-five feet in depth. This will enable ships of the largest class readily to pass from bay to bay, and with assured safety. Not only will the route to Europe from Baltimore be diminished in distance two hundred and twenty-five miles, but the effect upon the carrying trade to the eastern and northern cities will be most beneficial.

It is no exaggeration to say that it will increase such trade, as far as transportation is concerned, at least one-third. That is to say, whereas, by the present route, vessels now engaged in it can make only two voyages, they will be able, by means of the canal, within the same period, to make three. The trade of Baltimore with the West, with the appliances of transportation the city at present has through the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, has already greatly increased. For instance, the trade in grain alone: in 1871 there was brought here 3,000,000 bushels, and in 1873, 7,510,057. And it is estimated that the quantity will be increased during the coming year to 20,000,000. And all the other productions of the West, I believe, during the same period, have increased in the same proportion. It may therefore be considered as certain that when your canal is completed the increase will be still greater, because the effect will be to render the transportation to the Eastern and Northern States and to the ocean not only shorter in distance and in time, but consequently to reduce the cost to the producer.

In the commercial convention held in this city, in 1871, composed of gentlemen, from every part of our country, of great intelligence, and possessing great practical knowledge, the subject of this canal was fully considered. The result was the adoption, by a unanimous vote, of a preamble and resolution, which stated that the building of the canal "is of national importance, and is especially of importance to the West, the South, the Southwest, and Northwest, by lessening the distance to European ports, and to New England, for the export of cereals and provisions, tobacco, cotton, and all other products, and for all importations to meet the requirements for the consumption of those vast regions."

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad also esteems the work of great importance. In the last annual report to the stockholders, the matter is thus referred to:

"The construction of such a canal will reduce the distance between Baltimore and New York, and the ports of New England, and all European ports nearly two hundred miles for steamships and all large vessels. As Baltimore has become the entrepot of vast business from the South and from the great West, the economies of transportation, which can be effected by this important reduction of distance, will inure so largely to the interests of the consumers and producers of immense regions that the enterprise is palpably of national importance."

It cannot, therefore, be doubted that, should it become necessary, the enlightened spirit and wisdom which has made the road itself one truly national will be further illustrated by their appropriating something out of their immense resources to assist in the construction of the canal; nor can it be doubted that the capitalists of our city and all our people will also assist. And if Congress is, as it cannot be questioned it will be, governed by the interests of almost the entire country and by the reasons which so persuasively invoke the aid of the General Government, that such aid will be rendered. And, in my judgment, it is equally certain that if your company issues bonds for whatever amount may be necessary to insure the completion of the work, bearing an interest of 6 per cent., they will readily find purchasers among the capitalists of Europe and of this country. The stock, too, cannot fail to be profitable. This will be evident to any one who reflects upon the immense trade which will flow through the canal from either end, subject to the tolls authorized by the charter. The company, therefore, may look with confidence to the early construction of the canal, and to the profit which will inure to the stockholders, as well as to the great advantages which will be conferred upon the General Government and upon the country at large.

I remain, with much regard, your obedient servant,

REVERDY JOHNSON.

HORACE B. TEBBETTS, Esq., President, &c., New York.

The reasons so forciby expressed by this distinguished statesman in favor of the work are fourfold stronger to-day than at the time he wrote. The increase of the foreign and domestic trade of Baltimore City within the past ten years has far exceeded any period in her former history, and few if any cities on the continent can show such rapid advancement. A brief statement of one of the leading items will convince any one that Baltimore is now on the highway to commercial prosperity and that a brilliant future awaits her. Her receipts of corn and wheat in 1865 were 4,823,816 bushels. In 1879, 57,796,322, an increase of more than twelve times in fourteen years.

In 1865 she exported 161,636 bushels, and in 1879 she exported 53,480,341, or more than three hundred and thirty times as much. These vast millions of bushels of corn and wheat were the products of the fertile fields of the great West and Northwest, sent here for export to a foreign market, and show the direct interest that all that section of our country has in increasing the facilities for exportation and cheapening its cost.

In 1879 there were 3,753 vessels cleared and arrived at Baltimore from foreign ports, and of these five hundred and sixty-six were ocean steamers. I have no official statement of the coastwise trade in 1879, but in 1878 there were 2,491 vessels entered and cleared for points on our coast north of Delaware Bay. These figures aggregate a foreign and coastwise trade, embracing the coast north of Delaware Bay only, giving employment to 6,244 vessels, and a tonnage of over four million of tons annually. These figures are from official sources, principally the records of the custom-house in Baltimore City.

All of this immense trade would pass through the canal, and thereby save two hundred miles on each trip, or about 10 per cent. in time and expense to foreign ports and 50 per cent. to points on the coast. This saving in time, distance, and expense in addition to the geographical advantages Baltimore possesses would make her by large odds the nearest seaboard city to all the West, Northwest, and Southwest, and bring benefits inestimable to all that section.

A glance at the map will show our relations to the great trade cen-

BALTIMORE
SASSAFRAS ROUTE
129¾ Miles
Cost. 8 Millions.
S. E. GREEN ROUTE
DOVER
DELAWARE BAY
CENTREVILLE LINE
QUEENSTOWN ROUTE
QUEENSTOWN
SKIPTON
WYE RIVER ROUTE
MILFORD
Cape May
Choptank Riv.
MILTON
LEWES
Cape Henlopen
CHOPTANK ROUTE
148¾ Miles
Cost 16 Millions.
SEAFORD
SECY CREEK ROUTE
FERRY CR. ROUTE
CAMBRIDGE
WALNUT LANDING
Nanticoke Riv.
Pocomoke River
CHESAPEAKE BAY
ROUTE BY WAY OF CAPES 325 MILES
ATLANTIC OCEAN

ters of the West and Northwest. Chicago is one hundred and fifty miles nearer to Baltimore than New York, Saint Louis is two hundred and ten, Louisville is two hundred and forty-six, Cincinnati is two hundred and forty, and Pittsburgh is one hundred and four miles nearer, and all other western points in like proportion. Our railroad connections extend like a network through all these vast sections and make them easy of access. In consequence of these facts the inevitable laws of trade must prevail to seek the shortest and cheapest route and make Baltimore the great export city of the continent. These startling facts, so briefly stated, and very many others that might be enumerated, have recently directed the attention of the enterprising men of the country to the coming greatness of our metropolis and settled the question of the necessity of opening up a more direct outlet to the sea by a canal connecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays. That such a work should be constructed is now admitted on all hands, both in and out of Congress. The most essential questions to be settled now are, where shall it be located and how shall it be built?

The question as to the best route for the location of the work has of late been freely discussed, and a wide difference of opinion has been expressed upon this point. The thorough and accurate surveys and estimates made by Colonel Craighill, under the direction of the Secretary of War and by authority of Congress, embraced all the various routes suggested as feasible, and have shown that one of two routes, the Sassafras or the Choptank, must be taken, the others not affording equal facilities and far exceeding them in cost.

It is to the discussion of this question that I call special attention, as conflicting interests have led to the widest differences between the advocates of these respective routes.

The great object sought by the opening of such a canal is the saving of time and distance; when we save time and distance we save expense, and the saving of expense is in direct proportion to the saving of time. Time is the great factor in the competitions of trade. Other things being equal, then, the route by which the most time is saved will prove of the greatest advantage to trade. But if the route by which the greatest saving of time is secured be also the route that costs the least to build, then it seems to me there can be no question that that route should be selected.

Now, the surveys and estimates above referred to show the following figures:

Items.	Sassafras route.	Choptank route.
Length in miles	129.25	149.81
Length of canal or proper excavation above low water	16.20	37.67
Cost in millions of dollars	8	16½
Relative time of transit in hours, at ten miles per hour in open water, seven in dredged channel and five in canal proper	15 1/10	19 1/20
Saving in time in hours	18 1/10	13¾
Saving in distance in miles	195¼	175

Distance from Baltimore, by way of the capes, to a common point at sea, three hundred and twenty-four miles.

Thus it appears that the Sassafras is twenty miles shorter than the Choptank route, that in time required for vessels to pass through it to a common point at sea it is more than four hours shorter, and that the cost would be but eight millions, while the Choptank would cost over sixteen million dollars, or twice as much. Surely, with all these advantages in favor of one route, some insurmountable obstacles should be shown before adopting the longer and more costly one in preference.

There are those, however, who have insisted upon the Choptank route notwithstanding its greater cost and length. The Board of Trade of Baltimore City and the representatives of certain railroad corporations have appeared before the Senate committee and advocated the longer and more expensive route. The Corn and Flour Exchange, however, have urged upon the Senate committee the great importance of a canal, but refrained from expressing any preference as to route. It is natural and to be expected that rich corporations enjoying a monopoly of the carrying trade between certain points would oppose the opening of any rival route by which this trade might be divided and its cost cheapened. A canal by way of the Sassafras River would open up a short, cheap, and convenient water-way for the transportation of freights between Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York. Water transportation is cheaper than by rail. Freights between these points would be greatly reduced and the profits to the railroad correspondingly diminished. Hence the opposition of these railroad corporations and their advocacy of a circuitous route by which this competition would be rendered impossible. It would be one hundred and thirty miles further from Baltimore to Philadelphia by way of the Choptank than by the Sassafras route. Why the merchants composing the Board of Trade should take this position is unaccountable upon any theory except the overpowering, dazzling influence of these great corporations—certainly they did not always occupy this position. In 1878 they addressed the following memorial to Congress, asking the General Government to assist the Maryland and Delaware Ship Canal Company in the construction of the work, which they had already located upon the Sassafras route. The signatures of this memorial will show that it was signed by the leading commercial firms and business men of the city:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, citizens of Maryland, and members of the Commercial and Financial Exchanges of the city of Baltimore, respectfully represent: That the States of Maryland and Delaware, for the purpose of expediting the exchange of commodities between the United States and foreign countries, as well as between the States of the Union, have chartered the Maryland and Delaware Ship Canal Company.

The object of the company is to construct across the narrow peninsula of Maryland and Delaware a ship-canal, connecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, without locks and fed by the tides. The vast importance of such a canal to the commercial interests of the whole country was recognized and pointedly asserted by unanimous resolution of the national commercial convention, which assembled in this city in 1871, as follows: That such a canal "is of national importance, and is especially of importance to the West, the South, the Southwest and the Northwest by lessening the distance to European ports and to New England, for the export of cereals and provisions, tobacco, cotton, and all other products, and for all importations to meet the requirements for the consumption of these vast regions."

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, in its annual report of President Garrett to the stockholders in 1874, emphatically asserted that "the construction of such a canal will reduce the distance between Baltimore and New York, and the ports of New England, and all European ports, nearly two hundred miles for steamships and all large vessels. As Baltimore has become the entrepot of vast business from the South and from the great West, the economies of transportation, which can be effected by this important reduction of distance will inure so largely to the interest of the consumers and producers of immense regions that the enterprise is palpably of national importance."

Your memorialists are advised that surveys already made demonstrate the actual savings to transportation would be one-tenth in time to European ports and two hundred and twenty-five miles in distance between Baltimore and all northern and European ports. Such a canal, while avoiding the dangerous voyage round the capes of Virginia, and, as shown above, profiting to a very large extent the commerce of the whole country, would, in case of war with any nation, become of great value as a means of national defense, providing a safe retreat for merchantmen, and enabling the concentration of fleets for the defense of threatened points on the Atlantic coast. The interior line which such a canal would open, would become of great importance in the defense of Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and the New England cities, by enabling the quick concentration of squadrons for the defense of either city.

The commerce of Baltimore within the past decade has so rapidly increased in volume and value as to become worthy of the fostering hand of the National Government—the increase of her grain trade alone with the great West has, during the period from 1871 to 1878, been from 3,000,000 bushels to 29,500,000 bushels. While, therefore, the commercial interests of Baltimore may be greatly promoted by the construction of such a canal, its importance to the productive interests of the great sections of the country demand that the cost of its construction should not be thrown entirely upon the resources of individuals and of the corporation of Baltimore, but that the Congress of the United States, as expressed in the language of the late Reverdy Johnson, "governed by the interest of almost the entire country, and by the reasons which so persuasively invoke the aid of the General Government," will render some aid to this improvement.

Your memorialists therefore pray that the proper committees of your honorable Houses may be directed to inquire into the commercial and national importance of this canal, and report such aid and assistance as may be found proper, and your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

A. Brown & Sons,	Seevers & Anderson,
R. Garrett & Sons,	Merritt, Gasaway & Co.,
W. Fisher & Sons,	R. B. Byard,
Ferdinand C. Latrobe,	Brown, Graves & Co.,
James Knox & Co.,	R. M. Powell,
Spence, Montague & Co.,	M. Abrams,
Chas. A. Gambrill & Co.,	Robt. Tyson & Co.,
Gilmore, Mariott & Co.,	George I. Appold,
John S. Williams & Bro.,	George Small,
W. E. Woodyear & Co.,	A. Schumacher & Co.,
Barker & Guathmey,	J. I. Middleton & Co.,
Thos. J. Dail & Co.,	George E. Bowdoin & Co.,
Wilson, Palmer & Co.,	Mordecai & Co.,
John W. Ross & Co.,	W. B. McAtee,
James Warden & Co.,	Morton, Bull & Co.,
Birckhead & Reeves,	Henry Duvall & Co.,
Milmine, Bodman & Co.,	J. Hooper & Co.,
Thos. W. Levering & Son,	W. H. Michael & Sons,
Tyson & Brother,	Tucker, Smith & Co.,
C. W. Slagle & Co.,	Stephen Bonsal,
Gill & Fisher,	E. Levering & Co.,
B. B. Baker & Co.,	Tate, Muller & Co.,
H. McCoy & Co.,	Humrichouse, Baylies & Co.,
Meixsell & Co.,	Hiram Woods,
W. G. Atkinson,	Geo. W. Porter,
Wylie, Smith & Co.,	D. H. Miller & Sons,
Hull, Mathews & Co.,	Henry S. Taylor,
E. D. Bigelow & Co.,	Jno. H. B. Latrobe,
James J. Corner & Co.,	J. V. F. Finley,
B. Brooke,	Isaac R. Beam,
Nyce & Co.,	J. Howard,
Kennard & Oudesbuys,	Hopkins & Janney,
	And 500 other firms.

About the same period the Maryland Legislature addressed the following joint resolutions to Congress, passed with but one dissenting voice in either house, and he the president of the Board of Pilots in Baltimore City, who perhaps thought the profits of his pursuit would be diminished by the construction of a shorter and safer outlet to the ocean:

Joint resolutions of the General Assembly of Maryland.

Whereas the States of Maryland and Delaware heretofore chartered the Maryland and Delaware Ship Canal Company, for the purpose of constructing a ship-canal across the peninsula of Maryland and Delaware, connecting the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, and opening a direct route to sea for vessels trading at the ports of Baltimore and the upper part of the Chesapeake Bay, thereby shortening the distance from Baltimore to European ports, and New York and New England seaboard cities, two hundred and twenty-five miles, and avoiding the dangerous and tedious route doubling Cape Charles, and by said charter said company is authorized to charge a rate of toll not exceeding twenty cents per ton; and

Whereas this General Assembly approves the wisdom and foresight of the said General Assemblies of Maryland and Delaware, which granted said charter, and deem the speedy construction and opening of said canal of paramount importance to the growing commerce of Baltimore and the great agricultural sections of the Southwest, the West, and the Northwest, which find their nearest and natural outlet at Baltimore City; and

Whereas the said canal would afford the cheapest and most effectual means of defending the cities of Washington, Baltimore, and Annapolis on the south side, and Philadelphia, Chester, Wilmington, New York, and the New England seaports, on the north side, in case of war, by enabling the naval forces of the United States freely and speedily to pass from bay to bay, and on interior lines to pass up the Atlantic coast for the defense of threatened points, and would also enable merchant shipping to retreat from one bay to the other in case of danger from a hostile fleet; and

Whereas the Federal Government is charged with the public defense, and it is its duty to adopt the most complete modes of rendering the capital of the United States and the great seaboard cities impregnable, and the interests heretofore mentioned are of national and the construction of said canal of international importance; and

Whereas private individuals are about to take upon themselves the construction of this great work, and are seeking to obtain the necessary means to insure its successful completion: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the Representatives and Senators from Maryland in the Congress of the United States are hereby requested to urge upon the Congress of the United States to grant unto the said the Maryland and Delaware Ship Canal Company such aid as may be necessary to insure the completion of said canal in consideration that the said company will permit the vessels of the United States Navy, or its transports, at all times to pass through the said canal, when completed, free of all tolls and charge.

And be it resolved, That the governor of Maryland be, and he is hereby, requested without delay to transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of the said Representatives and Senators from Maryland.

FETTER S. HOBLITZELL,
Speaker of the House of Delegates.
EDWARD LLOYD,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

M. Y. KIDD, Chief Clerk.

This memorial also asked Government assistance to the above-named ship-canal company, whose route was by the Sassafras River. It will thus be seen that until within a comparatively recent period the almost unanimous sentiment of the people of the city and State was in favor of a canal by the shortest and cheapest route, namely, the Sassafras route. No convulsion of nature has changed the physical features of the country since the date of these memorials. The advantages and disadvantages of these respective routes are the same to-day as in 1878; yet soon after the presentation of the bill which I had the honor first to offer in the Forty-fifth Congress several of the gentlemen who signed or voted for the above appeals to Congress, and others associated with them, secured from the General Assembly of Maryland a charter for a ship-canal to be located on the Choptank route, with authority to charge the same tolls provided in the charter of the original company; and since the procurement of the Choptank charter a determined war has been waged against a canal by any other route. I shall not discuss the motives that may have instigated these gentlemen to pursue the course they have; but after having presented fairly and impartially the facts regarding the two routes, I will be content to leave the decision of their merits to the judgment of every intelligent reader, simply appealing to every reader to think and judge for himself, and not be governed in his decision by the ipse dixit of others. I am aware that a formidable opposition has recently shown itself to the views that I hold upon this subject; but no array of imposing names or groundless assertions shall divert me from my matured convictions made, I think, after full reflection and a thorough investigation.

If the Choptank route possesses half the amazing advantages now claimed, it is passing strange that not even its most enthusiastic advocate has ever had the courage to present a bill in Congress providing for its construction, or shown a willingness to invest a single dollar of his own money in the work. The parties showing the most zeal upon that side of the question have contented themselves with opposing a canal by the Sassafras rather than pressing the work by any other route, and seem to be quite content that Baltimore shall go without any canal rather than have it by way of Sassafras River.

On the 24th day of May, 1878, I first introduced in the House of Representatives "A bill granting Government aid toward the construction of a ship-canal connecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, and securing to the Government the free use of said canal for all time to come." This bill was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, of which the late Hon. Gustave Schleicher, of Texas, was chairman. It received prompt and full consideration at the hands of this gentleman and his committee, and a favorable report was ordered to be made to the House. The press of business attending the closing hours of the session prevented its introduction, and the whole subject went over to the Forty-sixth Congress. On the 21st day of May, 1879, I again introduced a similar bill. It was referred by the then chairman, Hon. GEORGE C. CABELL, of Virginia, to a sub-committee for consideration, of which Hon. WILLIAM KIMMEL, of Baltimore, was chairman; it being doubtless considered best to refer a subject so vitally affecting the interests of Baltimore to one of her own Representatives, at whose hands it was presumed it would receive a prompt as well as a full investigation.

The bill was held by the chairman of this sub-committee for nearly a year before any meeting was called. It was introduced May, 1879, and it was not until April, 1880, that I succeeded in inducing him to call together his committee for the consideration of this subject so vital to the commercial interests of the city he in part represented. A hearing was at last granted, and the subject fully discussed in all its bearings. Colonel KIMMEL took strong ground against the bill, advocating the Choptank as being the better route, and that it should be constructed entirely at Government expense and free from the beginning. My bill provided that the Government should indorse the interest coupons on four millions of the bonds of the Maryland and Delaware Ship Canal Company, that being the half of its estimated cost, the company being prepared to furnish the balance. To protect the Government against any possible loss, it was provided in the bill that the Government should have a first mortgage upon the entire work and all its revenues, the free use of the canal for Government vessels for all time to come, and to have the right reserved to assume its ownership at any time and make it absolutely free by paying to the company its cost only, without interest, and providing further that the work should be constructed under the supervision and direction of United States engineers detailed for the purpose, and furthermore that no coupon should be indorsed and the Government assume no responsibility for a single dollar until the work should have been completed according to the provisions of the bill, namely, twenty-six feet deep at mean low tide and one hundred feet wide at the bottom, and so certified by Government engineers to be detailed by the Secretary of War for the purpose.

The committee were divided as between the support of my bill and an unwillingness to grant any sort of aid to any such work. Colonel KIMMEL strenuously urged a free canal at Government expense and by the Choptank. While not agreeing with him as to the best route, I freely conceded that a canal free from the first and built by congressional appropriation was the most desirable for Baltimore and commerce generally. I proposed to support with all the earnestness of my nature a direct appropriation for the whole work, if the committee could be induced to agree to and recommend it; but not a single member was found, except Colonel KIMMEL, who was in favor of such a proposition. In my opinion our great need is a canal, free from the first, if possible; if not, still a canal, and with the right reserved to make it free at any time hereafter. If once constructed, its value and importance will soon be recognized by the whole country, and its freedom will come inevitably and in the near future. Colonel KIMMEL was himself a member of the Committee on Railways and Canals of the House of Representatives, before whom this question was fully discussed, and, though not a single member agreed with him, he seemed to assume that he had gained a signal victory, not by securing his own professed object, but by preventing a favorable report upon a route that he did not advocate, and thus delaying the consummation of a work in which his constituents as much as any others in the State were deeply interested.

It is conceded by all that the Sassafras is the shortest in distance and time and also the cheapest by half, the difference in cost being $8,000,000. But objections are urged against it, and claimed to be so serious in their nature as to make the construction of a canal by this route unadvisable and to justify rather the expenditure of double the amount to build it elsewhere. It is charged as a serious objection to the Sassafras route, and one from which the Choptank is claimed to be comparatively exempt, that, being further north and the water fresh, it is more liable to freeze. Tables of statistics are published in the engineer's report to show that, taking the average of twenty years, the Sassafras would be obstructed by ice twelve days a year more than the Choptank. This estimate is based partly upon a table furnished by the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company; the rest from sources not given.

I desire to speak very plainly upon this point, as very many wild and groundless assertions have been made regarding it in newspapers, in reports, and before committees. It is simply and plainly absurd to argue that the more northern route would be closed to navigation by ice twice as long as the other.

One witness in his testimony before the House Committee, claiming to be both engineer and general expert, asserted that the Sassafras River is closed by ice on an average sixty days in the year more than the Choptank. It is scarcely necessary to state that this evidence did no harm as no one believed it; neither river being closed as much as sixty days in succession once in ten years. It is not a fair argument to claim that the Sassafras would be closed by ice as long as the present Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. That canal is a canal with locks, having one ten-mile level filled with fresh water pumped in by artificial means, while the Sassafras Canal would be an open waterway, extending from bay to bay, without locks and with the tidal currents of salt water running in alternate directions all the time. When it is high tide in the Deleware it is low tide in the Chesapeake, and when high in the Chesapeake it is low in the Delaware. On flood tide in the Delaware the water is very salt, so these currents passing through the canal would very greatly retard freezing, and render it much less likely to be obstructed by ice than is the present canal with locks and stagnant fresh water. Moreover, when the commerce of our city shall be turned through this new channel, vessels will be passing to and fro every hour of the day and night, and this constant agitation of the waters will also greatly retard freezing.

The testimony of all sailors and steamboat captains who have traded in the waters of the upper bay for the past thirty or forty years is decided on the point that this route would be kept open to navigation at all times as easily as the port of Baltimore, the water being more salt and the tidal currents stronger. After all that has been so extravagantly asserted on this point, the fact is that there is less than one degree difference in latitude between these routes and only four degrees difference between the freezing point of fresh and salt water. Allowing, then, for the sake of the argument, what is not the fact, that the Sassafras is altogether fresh water and the Choptank salt, you would have a difference in temperature of only five degrees. Surely this could make no such difference as to justify an additional expenditure of $8,000,000 and a loss of from four to five hours' time on every trip for every vessel trading to and from the port of Baltimore the whole year round. Four thousand is a low estimate of the number of sea-going vessels that would pass through the canal when opened. A loss of four hours for each trip (and it would average much more) would make 16,000 hours lost annually by taking the Choptank rather than the Sassafras route. Estimating this time at $5 per hour, a low estimate for vessels averaging over one thousand tons burden, and you have $80,000 lost annually to the commerce of the country by taking the longer rather than the shorter route. The navigation can be kept absolutely open at all times for one-fourth of that amount. This loss of time and money would, moreover, increase annually as trade increases. It would be a poor economy, then, that would adopt the more circuitous and more expensive route. The interest on the eight millions additional cost, at 4 per cent., would be $320,000, enough to support all the ice-boats that ever were or ever will be required in Maryland waters.

Another objection urged against the Sassafras route is, that vessels passing up the bay to the mouth of the river would encounter serious obstacles from the floating ice from the Susquehanna when it breaks up in the spring, while in passing down the bay toward the mouth of the Choptank they would move in the direction of the floating ice and not be injured or obstructed in their passage. This argument would be worth more if all vessels were going out only. But it happens to be true that just about as many come in as go out. Those coming in from the Choptank would have to encounter this drift-ice, while those coming in from the Sassafras would run with the current. So one argument balances the other exactly and this objection amounts to nothing. In this connection I would state it as a fact known to all who are familiar with the navigation of the Chesapeake Bay that the greatest obstacles from drift-ice in the bay are almost always found in the mouth of the Patapsco River, and extending down the western shore to Sandy Point. The gorge is worse in the mouth of the Patapsco, and would be encountered alike on either route.

If one were to give credit to half the exaggerated statements made regarding the impassable barriers and floating fields of ice that linger long in the lap of spring upon the waters of the Sassafras and the upper bay, he would be persuaded that it was really an arctic region and not in the temperate zone, as geography has placed it, and the Choptank River, its entrance and tributaries a region of perennial spring-time. The fact is that the difference between these routes, as regards ice obstructions, is too insignificant to give either route any material advantage over the other. The breaking up and running of the drift-ice continue only a few days at most, and only in extra severe winters to such a degree as to hinder or seriously obstruct navigation.

The past has been an unusually severe winter, and no opportunity has been lost to keep before the minds of the public the fact that the upper bay and Sassafras were closed to navigation for a time. The following extracts from the Baltimore American will show, I think, that other waters have had troubles of a similar character. On the 25th of January this item appeared:

The ice and the ice-boats.—At last the river and harbor is practically free from the ice which has been such a clog to commerce for the past month. The stiff nor'west winds of the past few days have had the effect of driving nearly all the drift-ice out into the bay. The ice-boat Maryland went down yesterday morning, and returned, having found no ice to break. While Baltimore is released, however, some of the small towns down the bay are in a lamentable condition of blockade, and many of the creeks and rivers are blocked up, imprisoning large fleets of oyster pungies and smaller vessels. Mayor Latrobe yesterday received a letter from H. M. Murray, of West River, asking that the ice-boat be sent down to relieve the vessels frozen up there and to break up the ice. The mayor referred the matter to the harbor and river relief commission, which decided to send the ice-boat Maryland down this morning. The keeper of the light-house on the Choptank River reports a great deal of ice in the mouth of the river, and that the river is completely blocked, the ice piling up in enormous fields. A pile and a couple of braces were carried away from his light-house by the ice.

And on the 26th January this item:

The River, Harbor, and Canal.—The river and harbor yesterday was as placid and as clear of ice as it has ever been. The ice-boat Maryland went down yesterday to the relief of the vessels frozen up in West River, where the ice is reported to be very thick. The steamer John S. Shriver, of the Ericsson line, returned yesterday from Philadelphia, inland route through the canal. The boats of this line have been impeded by the ice in the canal, and an effort was made last week to clear it. The steamer John Shriver was put in front, and with the Richard Whilldin and the Elizabeth pushing behind, they succeeded in breaking the track through to Philadelphia. It is reported that the ice in some places was eleven inches thick, and the powerful steamers even with their snow-plows had a hard time breaking through. The canal is now open. Captain F. J. Higginson, inspector of the fifth light-house district, sent the tender Heliotrope yesterday to the relief of the light-house in Choptank River, which was abandoned by the keeper during the terrific ice-run. She will remove all Government property, should there be any probability of the light-house going to pieces.

These items show that even when the present canal was open to navigation serious obstructions existed at points farther south. The light-house in the Choptank River was threatened with destruction, and the keeper fled for his life, and the Sharp's Island light-house, at the mouth of the Choptank River, was so utterly wrecked by the fearful ice-gorge as to require an appropriation of $35,000 by Congress for its reconstruction. These facts conclusively show that even at the mouth of the Choptank the obstacles to navigation were more serious than in any other part of the bay. In his testimony before the Senate committee, Major Hutton, who had charge of the surveys under Colonel Craighill, testified that the main channel in the upper bay is changeable on account of the washings from the Susquehanna River, rendering its navigation difficult and uncertain for vessels of deep draught, and that in consequence of these washings continually filling up the channel the cost of maintaining a sufficient depth of water would be very great, if possible at all, and a serious objection to the route. I have been utterly unable to ascertain why Major Hutton should make such an assertion, or the facts upon which it is based. Captains Colmary and Cundiff, both experienced steamboat captains, who have spent more than thirty years in the navigation of the waters of the upper bay and its tributaries, and neither of them having any interest in the question, have testified positively that the main or eastern channel of the bay is just where it was thirty years ago and has never changed nor is it likely to change. They further testify that there is ample depth of water in this channel, and that it has not perceptibly diminished within their experience.

In order to obtain the most reliable information upon this important point, I addressed a note to Colonel Carlisle P. Patterson, Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, and the following is his answer:

UNITED STATES COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY OFFICE,
Washington, January 3, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I have duly received your letter of December 29, making inquiries in reference to the main channel of the Chesapeake Bay above Swan Point.

In answer to your first question, "If the main channel in the Chesapeake Bay above Swan Point is liable from any cause to change its location?" I beg to state that there is no liability to any such change.

To your second inquiry, "Whether any material changes in its location have occurred since the first survey by this Survey in 1854?" I have to reply that, to the knowledge of this office, no such changes have taken place.

In reply to your third inquiry, "To what extent the depth of water in said channel has diminished?" I have to say that we have never made a resurvey of this part of the bay, and I am therefore unable to answer this question directly. As the Susquehanna empties its floods into the bay immediately above the portion of the channel referred to, it is to be presumed that there has been a slight diminution in depth. But this, however, can only be slight, as the large flats at the mouth of the river and on each side of the head of the bay serve as "catches" for the silt and light mud of the river, and thus but a very small portion of this material would reach and settle in the channel. With respect to the small side streams, only an extremely small amount of their "mud" can reach the main channel of the bay.

I regret not being able to give a more satisfactory answer to this last inquiry, but our appropriations have been too small to permit resurveys to be made in many places where they are urgently demanded.

Yours, respectfully,

C. B. PATTERSON,
Superintendent.

Hon. E. J. HENKLE, House of Representatives.

The Coast-Survey charts show at no point less than three and a half fathoms of water, and I have a letter from Hon. John H. Cooper, president of the Board of Pilots of Baltimore City, to the same effect. The general depth of water in the Eastern channel is from four to six fathoms, and off Howell's Point, at the mouth of the Sassafras, there is seven fathoms or forty-two feet. It is idle to urge insufficiency in depth of water as a serious difficulty in the way of adopting this route. The lumps or knobs where the depth may be slightly less than required are but few and of slight extent, and the difference between the cost of the routes would pay forty times over the cost of maintaining an ample depth at all times.

Another objection, and that one urged by Colonel Craighill, to the upper route is the expense and difficulty of maintaining a sufficient depth of water in Brewerton channel, or that part of the bay extending from the beginning of Craighill channel to the main channel up the eastern side of the bay, known as the Eastern channel, a distance of about three miles. I think I am perfectly safe in asserting that nine-tenths of all the vessels now trading to the port of Baltimore, or that are likely to trade there, can pass with perfect safety through Brewerton channel now, though it has been abandoned for several years past since the opening of the Craighill channel, which gave a more direct route down the bay. Compared with the expense of constructing and maintaining the other route, the cost of keeping open these three miles would be a mere bagatelle. Moreover, should a vessel occasionally be of such draught as to be unable to pass out by this channel, it is not over half an hour longer for her to take the Craighill channel until she enters the Eastern channel, and thence up the bay. Forty various reasons have been urged in opposition to this shorter and cheaper route. They all sink into insignificance when balanced against the immensely greater cost of the Choptank route.

It has been claimed among other things that the Choptank would be the better in case of war with other maritime powers. There cannot be much in this argument, string it out as you may. In case of war it would be a great advantage to be able to transfer war vessels and others readily from one bay to the other without making the circuitous voyage around the capes, risking an attack and capture by the enemy. It would be much farther for a vessel to pass from Philadelphia to Baltimore by the Choptank than by the Sassafras—one hundred and thirty miles further. This is certainly an item worth consideration. A war vessel could pass from the defense of one city to the defense of the other in less than half the time by the upper route that would be required by the lower or more southern one. Again, a hostile fleet might lie in the mouth of Delaware Bay and prevent our vessels from passing down to the entrance of the Choptank Canal, near Cape Henlopen. At the exit of the Sassafras route on the Delaware an earthwork or other means of defense would command the whole width of the river and protect vessels in their passage from one bay to the other.

In this respect, then, as well as in others, the northern route has the decided advantage. But we are not likely to need a canal by either route as a means of protection in war. It is as a means of advancing commerce that this work is chiefly important, and the route that accomplishes that end the best is the best. The Maryland and Delaware Ship Canal Company, when embarking in the enterprise as an investment to pay best upon the capital employed, engaged the services of eminent engineers and directed them to investigate the merits of all the practicable routes on the peninsula and determine for them the one most likely to answer their ends; that was, to secure the greatest amount of trade by offering the greatest advantages. It would have been the height of folly for them to locate and construct a canal at a cost of large sums of money where serious obstacles would prevent the trade from using it.

The strongest possible argument that can be urged in favor of the Sassafras route is the fact that parties intending to construct a canal with their own means and as an investment adopted this route as the one most likely to pay. It could not pay unless it was such a work as would accommodate the trade. Without trade no tolls could be collected and no profits realized. Without exception all these engineers selected this as the best of all routes.

The late Benjamin C. Latrobe, esq., one of the most distinguished engineers of his day, in this or any country, in his report to the company says:

It gives me pleasure to express my entire approval of the location of the canal, which reflects great credit upon the skill of General Brown, who explained clearly his reasons for selecting the ground chosen, and which are well exhibited in the well-executed maps and profiles above referred to. My view of the route confirmed my previous impressions as to its superiority in directness and economy of construction over other lines to connect the two bays; and as we returned to Baltimore, via Chester River, I was still further persuaded that the Sassafras route would prove not only the cheapest to construct, but also the most favorable in its approaches at both sides of the peninsula. The comparative straightness of the Sassafras River and its good depth of water up to Georgetown Bridge, and even somewhat higher, makes the approach upon the Chesapeake side peculiarly favorable, while on the Delaware shore the canal would debouch at Liston's Point, not far below the mouth of Blackbird Creek, where there is less obstruction from sandbars to the entry of ships than at any other point above or below for a long distance. This last is a feature of much importance, as the comparative boldness of the water will obviate the necessity of long and expensive jetties.

The general conformation of the country on this route is most favorable for such a work. The headwaters of the Sassafras on one side and Blackbird Creek upon the other leave an intervening space of but six or eight miles, and the highest part but seventy feet, and that for a very short distance. At no point is the peninsula so nearly bisected as here. It is the route that nature has marked out for this great work, and here in the end it must go.

The advantages that a canal upon the Sassafras route would afford by opening up an outlet directly to the sea for the water-ways of Pennsylvania and connecting with the Erie Canal and the Ohio River have already attracted the attention of the far-sighted statesmen and engineers of that great State.

The following highly interesting and important letter was furnished several years ago by Hon. Simon Cameron to the Senate Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, of which Senator WINDOM was chairman, and is published in their report. I invite the attention of every intelligent reader to a careful perusal of this communication. It is full of interesting and valuable information and has an important bearing upon this question:

Letter from Colonel James Worrall, civil engineer, of Pennsylvania, to Hon. Simon Cameron, United States Senator, in advocacy of the routes through Pennsylvania.

To Senator WINDOM: I indorse to you, for consideration of the Committee on Transportation over which you preside, the inclosed opinions of Colonel Worrall, civil engineer, of Pennsylvania. He has devoted years of study to the subject, and has brought to bear, in this examination, professional culture and practical experience.

Very respectfully, &c.,

SIMON CAMERON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 10, 1873.

HARRISBURGH, PA., November 25, 1873.

MY DEAR SIR: The subject of great water communications seems as yet to have inspired no very active interest in Pennsylvania. Yet I question much whether there is a State in the Union which has better claims for notice in that particular at the hands of the General Government.

This you may remember I mentioned to you on one occasion last winter, when you agreed with me, fully informed as you were as a citizen of the interior of the State in this very important matter.

I took the liberty of addressing Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM, chairman of the Senate committee having this subject under consideration, who was kind enough to reply to me, stating that my representations would receive attention at the hands of the committee.

I now, however, knowing the interest you take in all subjects of benefit to the great State you so well represent in the Senate, will endeavor to make to you a statement laying down the claims of Pennsylvania in such a manner as that I hope they can be easily understood.

One of the duties of the Committee on Transportation Routes is to find where a great line or great lines of water communication should be located.

Thanks to the most favorable physical geography of our great State, a grand system of such lines might be constructed across her territory, and for cheapness and shortness I question whether any other lines could surpass them.

The Erie Canal will, no doubt, attract the attention of the committee as one of the most important water avenues that can be constructed, joining the East and the West.

The first of the great Pennsylvania lines that I shall mention to you will use a portion of that canal at its western end, and reach the sea equally soon in time and distance; that is to say, in a distance of about five hundred miles, in round numbers, from Buffalo.

It must be premised, however, that before the Pennsylvania system could be brought into play, the desire of Baltimore would have to be gratified by the construction of a ship-canal through the Delaware peninsula, using, probably, the Sassafras River, and creating a port on the estuary of the Delaware.

That canal constructed, its sea-port would become the sea-port of the Pennsylvania system, and that sea-port would, by the line I propose, be probably not one mile further from Buffalo than the port of New York is by way of the Erie Canal at this moment.

One hundred and fifty miles from Buffalo, on the line of the Erie Canal, at a place called Montezuma, the Seneca Lake invites the passing produce to turn aside and move along its waters, thus reaching the upper north branch of the Susquehanna at Elmira, and from thence following the north branch and the main stem of the Susquehanna, finally reach the Chesapeake Bay, from whence it finds the sea at the Baltimore sea-port on the Delaware Bay.

The distance, as has been stated, is not a mile longer—indeed it is most probably shorter—than the distance by the way of Albany to New York. There is a delay caused by lockage operating against this proposed route. But apply the advanced science of engineering to its construction, and there will be found no other adverse discrepancy. The extra lockage would not exceed ten or twelve hours in delay, and those hours would be made up by the insurance of safety, considering the dangers of towing on the Hudson River, and the aid of later engineering experience. The elevation to be overcome will be about three hundred and fifty feet above Lake Erie, or say eight hundred and ninety-five feet above the level of the sea. There is no want of water; and as for the country through which the canal is to pass, it is not surpassed on this continent, perhaps not in the world.

Canal communication on a small scale has existed for the whole distance, except for the twenty miles or so proposed to be made through the peninsula, and a five or six hundred ton canal is as easily made and supplied with water for the whole way as on the line of the Erie Canal to Albany.

The connection even from Oswego, on Lake Ontario, by this line to the ocean, though somewhat longer, (about thirty-three miles,) might well rival the old route.

At Oswego, at Rochester, at Syracuse the committee no doubt heard representations in favor of the Erie Canal made by prominent citizens.

Every word that recommends the New York system is equally applicable to this; and were this thoroughly examined by competent engineers of the present day; were its advantages ascertained; were the canal constructed under the science of engineering, with its improved experience up to the present time, I question much whether the line would not prove itself, as a national undertaking, superior in many respects to the Erie Canal.

Of course nothing can be done without a careful survey. The prima facie characteristics of this line call for such a survey at the hands of the General Government, certainly before choice be made of the Erie Canal as the best possible work that can be created between the termini.

Thus Pennsylvania puts forth her claim in comparison with that of New York, as regards a connection between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario and the seaboard.

Let us now look at what she has to present in regard to the Ohio Valley and the Atlantic.

A connection between the Ohio and New York City by water would be so much longer than such connection through any of the other competing States that it can scarcely be entered in the way of competition.

It is questionable whether there is any such connection at all practicable except by way of the great lakes, and such a connection would be 50 per cent. at least longer than any other.

Pennsylvania, then, is left in competition with Maryland and Virginia alone, the connection with the sea through the more southern States being so far removed as to be independent of rivalry.

The seaboard may be reached from the Ohio by three different routes, commencing at Pittsburgh.

The first ascends the Allegheny River to the mouth of the Kiskiminetas, and thence by the Conemaugh reaches the Alleghany Mountains, through which a tunnel would connect the eastern and western waters, and the valley of the Juniata would be used to reach the Susquehanna, and thence the sea at our new sea-port on Delaware Bay, a distance of something over four hundred miles, say at the utmost four hundred and twenty-five miles. A canal has existed on this whole line except through the summit of the mountain, which was overcome by a portage railway.

The second ascends the Allegheny River still further, and by the Red Bank (already surveyed and pronounced practicable by competent engineering authority) or by the Clarion (as yet not thoroughly examined) reaches the summit of the mountain, through which, by a tunnel, it would connect the upper waters of the west branch of the Susquehanna and thence reach the sea by this great water-course and terminate at the same port. This last, by the longest route chosen, would not exceed four hundred and fifty miles in length.

The third line ascends the Monongahela, and, following its tributaries to the Alleghany Mountains, by a tunnel connects with the waters of the Potomac, and by the route of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal debouches at Washington.

Its length to Washington City would be about three hundred and fifty miles; but it must be remembered that Washington is, by tide and bay navigation, about one hundred and sixty miles from Hampton Roads, and until a shipment reaches that point it has not attained the open ocean, which it may be said to have reached when it shall have arrived from the West at our port on the Delaware Bay. So the route to the sea by the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal may be called some sixty miles longer, at the least, than the longest of the other routes.

The topographical difficulties of the Chesapeake and Ohio route are no whit easier than those of the Kiskiminetas line. The summits are not more than fifty miles apart, and the elevation is essentially the same, say about two thousand feet above the level of the sea. The tunnels would both be long—in the neighborhood of four miles—and water is not more difficult to procure at the one than at the other. In short, they have both been pronounced practicable by the highest engineering authority and opinion, which was invited by the United States Government.

The west-branch route has an elevation less than 1,200 feet above the level of the sea, and the tunneling on that route would not be so expensive as on the two others.

A survey of these routes I have not any doubt would decide in favor of either of the Pennsylvania lines as against the Maryland line, and all we ask is that a careful scientific examination of the whole ground be made a condition-precedent of any choice.

A route more nearly approaching successful rivalry with ours is the route of the James River and Kanawha Canal. This, if I remember rightly, would not much exceed ours in distance to Norfolk, but I believe the physical, or, as I have called them, topographical difficulties would far exceed those of Pennsylvania.

There is a long tunnel spoken of, and an uncertainty as to water not met with in Pennsylvania.

I may mention incidentally that the James River and Kanawha Canal commences at or near the mouth of the Kanawha on the Ohio, ascends to the Alleghany Mountains, (in the vicinity of Greenbrier White Sulphur Springs,) which, crossing by a tunnel, it connects with the headwaters of the James River and debouches at Richmond, Virginia. It will have its warm advocates before the committee, so I need not say any more about it.

If the Government entertains any idea of making or assisting to make a great water-transportation route to the seaboard, let Pennsylvania not be forgotten; that is all that is asked for her. The State is so fortunately situated that all the greatest railway lines, and I believe all the greatest canal lines, must cross her territory if the most favorable physical geography for their construction be taken into the account.

With regard to the more southern routes, I mean more southerly than the Virginia route, that they are of very great importance is not to be gainsaid. Routes to the sea from the great southern branches of the Ohio are of paramount importance. But they must, nevertheless, be considered local in comparison with the great northern and middle routes, routes, that is, having for their seaport no point south of Norfolk.

In the first place, the coast navigation of the United States on the Atlantic side south of Hampton Roads and of the Virginia capes is unsafe. It is so dangerous as to compel a charge at the hands of underwriters largely in excess of the percentage of insurance submitted to, I believe, anywhere else in the world. So that a first-class water communication would have an undesirable terminus, if striking the ocean anywhere below the entrance to Chesapeake Bay. As local works, however, there can be no doubt of the success of the great Georgia and Alabama canals. The prospective production of that country is simply incalculable. So soon as the political asperities subside in those States, and the people of our whole country can feel as thoroughly protected in person and property there as they do in the North and in the West, an access of industrial movement and prosperity will be inaugurated in that region which even in the most active and stirring portions of the North and West will never have been exceeded. It needs but the mere nervous excitement occasioned by the civil war to subside to be succeeded by an at present inconceivable activity.

Then the vast, physical, material, and economical advantages of those States will be availed of, and canals and railways will build themselves. The Coosa will be joined to the Tennessee and "wild Altamaha" will cease to "murmur in its woe."

But still the southern seaboard will remain dangerous, and the time may come when goods from the interior bound for that coast will take a channel improved inside the sand-spits, as they are called, and, protected by them from the dangers of Cape Lookout and Cape Fear, whose names alone suggest disaster, reach one of the most capacious harbors in the world at Norfolk, and thence move out upon the open ocean.

The coast is admirably adapted for such a navigation, one of the safest and cheapest possible. A sloop navigation, accommodating vessels of nine or ten feet draught, extends now along the shore for hundreds of miles, requiring very little improvement to make it continuous from Norfolk to Florida.

A canal across the Floridian peninsula would extend that navigation to the Gulf States, when the outside navigation would be abandoned and its dangers be avoided.

These are things to be looked to in contemplating the prospective commerce of this great country; and when they shall be accomplished what a commanding position will be that of Norfolk, undoubtedly the most important sea-port on this great continent!

I trust I have not been betrayed into writing too long a letter, but if I have, the importance of the subject must be my excuse.

Other States have stood up for the great work that might be constructed within their borders. The committee of the Senate has been heard of north, south, east, and west of us—and if their attention has not been attracted to Pennsylvania, it is no doubt because Pennsylvania has not pressed her claims.

Would it not then be surprising if Pennsylvania should at last be discovered to possess greater advantages for the location of these great works than any other State in the Union—seeing that her citizens have seen this national committee assemble and meet at various parts of the United States, listen to discussions of the propriety of building works elsewhere, and let the time pass over without a word in favor of their own territory?

I trust that the crude and hurried suggestions contained in this paper may have the effect to draw the attention of the committee to our unparalleled advantages.

I know that the paper cannot be placed in better hands than yours, so many years of whose life have been devoted to the practical service of your native State, and the nation at large. I know that you will not neglect the claims of the old Keystone of the Federal Union.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES WORRALL,
Civil Engineer.

Hon. SIMON CAMERON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

In meeting the objections that have been urged against the Sassafras route in its physical features let it not be inferred that none apply to the rival route. In addition to the greater distance and enormous cost of the Choptank route there is one great difficulty that to the minds of sailors appears insurmountable. Much has been said both true and untrue regarding the approaches to the Sassafras route, but no reference has been made to the difficulties of approach to the ther route where it opens into the ocean near Cape Henlopen. This is a stormy, dangerous coast, and shipwrecks without number and loss of life and property have occurred there. On account of its dangerous character the Government many years ago at great expense built the breakwater for the protection of vessels encountering the fearful storms that prevail upon this coast. The necessity for such a breakwater is sufficient proof of the dangerous character of the coast. The mouth of a Choptank canal would look directly out into the ocean and be subject to the fearful storms that prevail there. It is to be extended near four miles from the shore before a sufficient depth of water is reached. A dredged channel-way is to be kept open and of sufficient depth notwithstanding the fact that one storm may fill it up and obliterate its very existence. Sea-walls or fenders of some kind are to be built out this long distance to deep water. How can these protecting structures be kept there? What will it cost to build them strong enough to resist the storms? Upon the ocean shore during a storm the billows break upon the shore with an irresistible force. They carry everything before them. How can they be maintained here without immense cost? And if maintained, what seaman would attempt to guide his vessel into this narrow inlet in the midst of a storm. Should he fail to make the entrance he is hopelessly lost. If vessels are stranded every year upon this coast in attempting to enter the wide mouth of Delaware Bay, with plenty of room to so direct their course as to take the best advantage of wind and storm, how many will be wrecked annually in attempting to make this narrow entrance? The breakwater cannot afford protection to prevent disasters here. Vessels are wrecked even under its protecting walls.

Life-saving stations have been established along this coast in order that assistance may be near at hand for the relief of crews of vessels annually lost on this shore. In the last report a demand is made for the establishment of five more stations on this coast, the present number being too few to supply the necessities of the service. In the report for 1879 it is said:

The establishment of a station is highly desirable at Lewes, Delaware. The breakwater at this place forms a harbor of refuge, making which many vessels suffer disaster. In a single gale in the spring of 1877 six vessels sank at their moorings in this dangerous locality.

If six vessels were lost in one gale trying to get behind the breakwater, how could they get safely into the canal?

March 31, 1879, several vessels near the pier at Lewes, Delaware, were in difficulty, the sea being heavy and the wind very strong. The keeper of station No. 1, fifth district, came to the scene on horseback and remained all day on the watch. One schooner drove ashore, and the station surf-boat went out and brought the captain to land. A large schooner was in considerable danger from her stern battering against the pier, and the keeper made some lines fast to the pier in order to keep her free. Several vessels in the harbor were injured, and two or three had to go to sea with their pilots, the pilot-boats being unable to go out to take the pilots off.

Seventeen vessels have been stranded in the vicinity of Cape Henlopen since 1874, (see Life-Saving Service report for 1879,) and fourteen in or near the breakwater, and ten at or near Lewes, Delaware, in the same time, (see same report.) These are startling facts, and should cause the advocates of such a route to pause and think of the terrible consequences of making such a mistake as to locate the outlets of the canal here when the outlet of the Sassafras line is at all times a safe harbor. The above-named objections must prove fatal to the southern route.

In the face of the terrible death-roll above cited from authentic sources gentlemen will hardly persist in their attempt to divert this work from its natural site to one fraught with such dangers. An appropriation has been made by Congress for a further survey of these routes, and especially of the approaches to them. Let me respectfully suggest to whomsoever may have the work in charge the absolute necessity of investigating most thoroughly the approaches to the Choptank route on the Delaware side.

With regard to how and by whom this canal shall be built, I desire in conclusion to state that I am as zealously in favor of a canal free from the onset as any one can be. I would exhaust every effort in this direction first. If, however, it should be found impossible to induce Congress to make a sufficient appropriation to build the work entire, then let us endeavor to get such assistance as is indicated in the bill I first introduced, reserving to the Government the right to assume its ownership at any time hereafter by paying its cost only and making it entirely free for all. When once built, the country will soon be led to estimate its national importance, and little difficulty, in my opinion, would be experienced in inducing Congress to make the work the property of all the people for the benefit of the commerce of the whole country.

Letter of Richard Randolph, esq., civil engineer.

DEAR SIR: From the conversations I have had with prominent citizens of Baltimore who have been induced to lend their names to the movement for frustrating the efforts now being made to obtain a ship-canal between the Chesapeake and Delaware, I have become convinced that the great majority of them are entirely ignorant of the facts in the case. Their only ground of action is the assumption that Colonel Craighill has pronounced in favor of the sixteen-million canal. How they have reached that conclusion I cannot understand, for it cannot be gathered either from his report or from his statements before the House committee. In the report he has simply stated the facts as gathered by his assistants; and in alluding to the northern route he has only called attention to the difficulty of ascending the bay during those rare and short periods of ice freshets in the Susquehanna, when the assistance of ice-boats is unavailable, and to the greater liability of sedimentary deposits in a channel crossing the general currents than one in line with them.

But these citizens seem to be under the impression that the region of the Sassafras River is in a high northern latitude, where for a considerable part of the year ice prevails such as the Polaris had to encounter, and that the Susquehanna is constantly sending down torrents loaded with it. They also imagine that the Choptank and Nanticoke Rivers are in a warm southern climate, where the water does not freeze. But an examination of the facts will show that the Choptank route, only forty minutes of latitude, about forty-five miles, further south, is, from peculiar causes, more liable to be obstructed by ice than the more northern one. But first it will be shown that the adoption of the southern route will aggravate the consequences of the assumed ice obstruction to a remarkable degree by the greatly increased obstruction of another but no less harmful character. I refer to the resistance to progress and loss of time incident to the canal itself.

The twenty-four years of ice observations recorded in the Craighill report show that on the present Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, twelve miles north of the Sassafras River, which is ten feet deep and confined between two lift-locks sixteen feet above tide, and kept filled with fresh water by pumping, there have been twenty-three and a half days per annum lost to navigation on account of ice. On the Chester River, near its mouth, a large salt-water estuary twenty-five miles south of this canal, twenty-four days per annum have been lost on the same account. On the Choptank River, twenty-five miles further south, another large salt-water estuary, having the same conditions as the former, ten and a half days per annum were lost from ice.

Having overlooked the fact that the Choptank route depends upon fifteen miles of a far inland fresh-water river connecting its two canals, and which has about the same depth as the present canal above described; also that, according to the observations of the United States Signal Service, the thermometer during freezing weather stands at about the same degree in this locality as in the region of the Sassafras River; its advocates have taken this record of ten and a half days' loss on the Choptank, so inconsistent with that on the Chester River, as a criterion for the proposed Choptank route. They have also taken the record of the shallow and confined Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, so different from the conditions of the proposed Sassafras Canal, as a criteron for that. Granting for the present these unwarrantable assumptions, it will be shown that they propose to remedy this assumed loss of twenty-three and a half days per annum by adopting a route which increases this loss of time to what is equivalent to ninety-seven days per annum. In making this comparison, I use as a basis one voyage in every day in the year available on each route by a vessel that would accomplish it on the outside route in thirty-three and a quarter hours, as fixed by Colonel Craighill. The comparison is the same with any number of voyages when applied alike to both. The figures are all from the Craighill report:

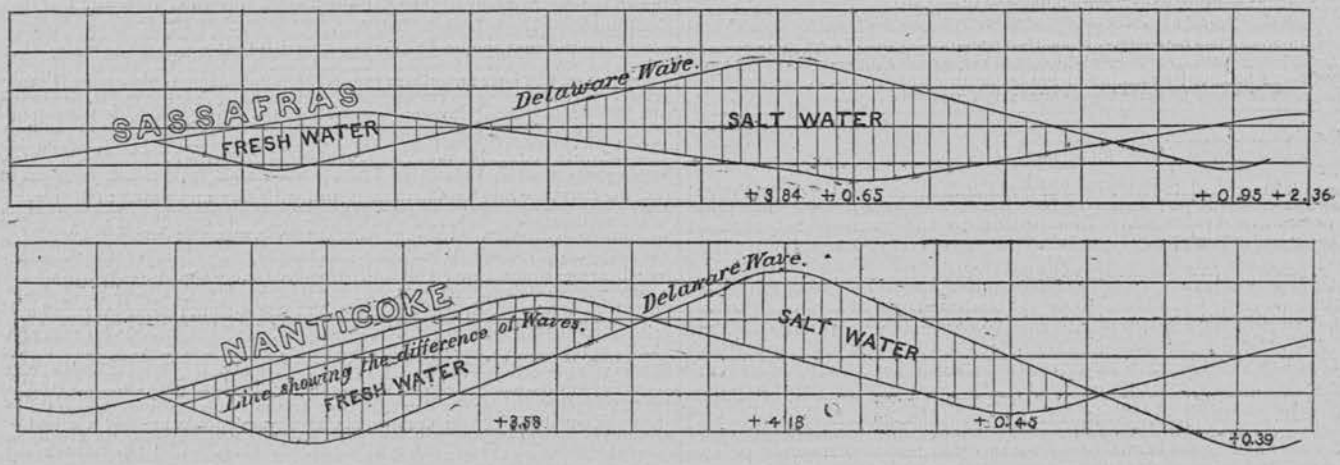
Hours required for the outside route	33.25
Hours required for the Sassafras route	15.10
Hours saved by the Sassafras route	18.15
Days in the year	365.00
Days in the year lost on the Sassafras route	23.50
Days in the year available on the Sassafras route	341.50
Hours multiplied by available days	18.15
Hours saved during the year on the Sassafras route	6198
Hours required for the outside route	33.25
Hours required for the Choptank route	19.50
Hours saved by the Choptank route	13.75
Days in the year	365.00
Days in the year lost on the Choptank route	10.50
Days in the year available on the Choptank route	354.50
Hours multiplied by available days	13.75
Hours saved during the year on the Choptank route	4874

In order to bring these two routes on a par with respect to the saving of time only it will be necessary to assume a loss of ninety-seven days on the Sassafras route, which is more than the three winter months. Thus:

Days in the year	365
Days assumed to be lost on the Sassafras route	97
Days available on the Sassafras route	268
Hours multiplied by available days	18.15
Hours saved during the year	4874

which is the same as that accomplished on the Choptank route.

This comparison goes upon the assumption that the commerce is as active during the winter months; whereas it is much less active, a circumstance more favorable to the route assumed to be more impeded by ice.



Another delusion is that as soon as the Choptank route is open it will consist entirely of salt water, and that salt water, like alcohol, requires an extraordinary degree of cold to freeze it. But the fact is that the saltest water of the sea only requires a temperature of 28° of Fahrenheit, being only four degrees lower than the freezing point of fresh water. The conditions of depth and motion have a greater influence on the freezing of water than its degree of saltness. That of motion, it will be shown, attends the Sassafras route to a greater degree than the Choptank, as well as the benefits which may result from a superior degree of saltness.

In the Craighill report will be found four sets of observations of the tides. Two of these, at Georgetown and at Blackbird Creek on the Delaware, being the two ends of the proposed Sassafras Canal, give the elevations of high and low tide, which refer to the same datum line at each point. Two others, one at Seaford on the Nanticoke River and the other at Lewes on the Delaware, being near the two ends of the twenty-four-mile canal connecting those waters, give similar elevations above a common datum line. By taking the algebraic sum of these elevations of high and low tide and by dividing by the number of observations in each case the average of the elevations are obtained, as follows:

	Feet.
Sassafras River, mean high water above datum	2.36
Delaware Bay, mean low water above datum	0.95
Superior height of Sassafras River	1.41
Delaware Bay, mean high water above datum	3.84
Sassafras River, mean low water above datum	0.65
Superior height of Delaware Bay	3.19
Nanticoke River, mean high water above datum	3.58
Delaware Bay, mean low water below datum	0.39
Superior height of Nanticoke River	3.97
Delaware Bay, mean high water above datum	4.18
Nanticoke River, mean low water above datum	0.45
Superior height of Delaware Bay	3.73

These figures show plainly in which direction the flow of the water will preponderate. But in order to ascertain the duration of the flow and its average velocity in each case, I have drawn a diagram representing the outline of the opposite tidal waves superimposed upon each other with the phases in their proper position on the horizontal scale of hours and the perpendicular scale of feet. The form of the Delaware wave is that determined by the United States Coast Survey; the lower one being six and one-quarter hours on each slope, and the upper one being six hours on the rise and six and one-half hours on the fall. The phases of those on the Chesapeake side are placed as near to their proper position in relation to those of their respective opposites as can be determined from the imperfect time observations of the report. This places the culminating points one hour apart on the Sassafras route and three hours apart on the Choptank. Any error, however, in this respect will but little affect the comparative result. By drawing a line which would include between it and either wave line the square root of all the perpendiculars in feet between the superior limit of one wave and the inferior limit of the opposite wave, in the case of the Sassafras Canal, and the square roots of two-thirds of these perpendiculars in the case of the canal between the Nanticoke and the Delaware, which is one-half longer, the comparative duration, velocity, and direction of the flow could be graphically represented, conveying the information through the eye. It will be seen that the flow of salt water from the Delaware toward the Sassafras River is of four and one-half hours longer duration, and with a generally superior head of one and two-thirds foot than the flow of fresh water from the Sassafras toward the Delaware. And that the flow of fresh water from the Nanticoke River toward the Delaware Bay is of one-half hour longer duration, and with a generally superior head of one-fourth of a foot than the flow of salt water from the Delaware towards the Nanticoke. An accurate calculation of the velocities and the duration of these forward and back movements determines that the salt water will reach the Sassafras River in thirty-nine and two-thirds hours, and that the fresh water of the Nanticoke River will reach the Delaware in five hundred and seventy-four and one-fourth hours, about twenty-four days. In the same way the tidal wave of the Nanticoke at Walnut Landing, the lower end of this river section of the Choptank route, slightly prevails over the salt water of the Choptank River.

By a coincidence of figures the mean velocity in feet per second of these canals is determined by a very simple formula. Thus: the sectional area is 3,614 square feet, and the velocity of one second's accumulation of gravitation is 32.22 feet per second. The perimeter of contact is 193.75 feet, and the coefficient of friction is .00752. The product of the two first divided by the product of the two last is the length of the Sassafras Canal in feet, 80,000. Therefore the square root of the elevation of one end above the other is the mean velocity in feet per second. And in the case of the other canal, which is one-half longer, 120,000 feet, the square root of two-thirds of the elevation is the velocity. So that in ordinary tides, such as those of the observations in the Craighill report, the maximum velocity in the Sassafras Canal would be 1.2 mile per hour, while in the Nanticoke and Delaware Canal it would be 1.1 mile per hour. This supposes that high and low tide, in both cases, may exactly coincide. According to the diagram the water will run from the Delaware toward the Sassafras for eight and a half hours at the rate of 4,352 feet per hour, and in the contrary direction for four hours at the rate of 2,952 feet per hour. From the Nanticoke toward the Delaware it will run for six and a half hours at the rate of 3,773 feet per hour, and in the contrary direction six hours at the rate of 3,553 feet per hour.

When the tide is out the fresh water of the Delaware River may extend past the mouth of the proposed Sassafras Canal; and being lighter than the salt water and borne upon the surface, may pervade shallow places along the shore. But when the tide rises the sea-water flows in along the deep channels and forces the fresh water back as far as New Castle, twenty miles above. The salt water then overflows the marshes along Blackbird Creek, which is demonstrated by the distinctive character of the vegetation. When the deep channel of the proposed canal at this point is made to extend to the deep water of the bay, it will flow almost entirely with salt water at every rise of the tide.

The salting of the Nanticoke Canal can only be accomplished by means of the costly contrivance of a tide-lock at each end. But the process would be too slow to have any appreciable effect upon the Nanticoke River, while the detention to vessels in warping through the gates and waiting for the enormous locks to fill and empty would greatly neutralize the saving of time for which the canal is intended.

Since a mean velocity of one and one-half miles an hour on the Nanticoke Canal and two miles an hour on the Sassafras, such as might be occasioned by a cyclone like that of 1878 mentioned in the report, is the utmost to which the canals are liable, velocities which could do no injury to them during the short period of their prevalence, the regulation of tidal currents would not be a necessity justifying the great cost of these obstructions. As vessels would be constantly going in both directions, what slight impediment these currents would offer to one would be compensated for an assistance to another, and ordinarily the same vessel would receive this compensation before passing through the canals. They are liable to these contingencies in all channels. But the delay and trouble of maneuvering through the locks would countervail every advantage they could offer. The tide-locks of the present Chesapeake and Delaware Canal are useful because there is an artificial lift of sixteen feet to overcome by means of pumping; and these locks render available the lift which nature affords as an auxiliary.

If the tide-locks provided for in the estimates of the Craighill report are superfluous, as much cannot be said for the provision that has been made to enable a vessel to enter at the Delaware end of the Choptank route. Here they have to make the entrance immediately from the ocean at a point three and three-fourths miles from the shore, for the dredged channel connecting it with the deep water of the bay is of that length. The case is similar to the entrance of the Suez Canal from the Mediterranean, and will require similar jetties, strong enough to resist the force of the raging billows and wide enough to enable a vessel to enter with certainty under the stress of weather, and with the whole space having the full depth of the channel. The inlet of the Sassafras Canal is at a point where the bay has contracted to the dimensions of a river, and is of itself a harbor with the deep water less than a mile from the shore, where the cost of the entrance works would be but a trifle as compared to the ocean entrance of the other.

It was stated by an engineer before the Senate committee that the fourteen miles of Sassafras Canal would be more costly to maintain than the thirty-seven miles of canal on the Choptank route; and he gave as a reason for the opinion the fact that for a distance of about two miles the depth of the excavation was between fifty and eighty feet above tide; whereas on the other line the maximum depth was between forty and fifty feet, which, however, extended over eight miles. That is to say, after the excavations have been made, with their permanent and natural slope, the effects of the weather upon the slope higher up than fifty feet along this distance of two miles, raised the cost of maintenance above that of the route having twenty-three and one-half miles more of canal, and with its fifteen miles of inland water course—all requiring a corresponding number of railroad and wagon road bridges with their capacious draws and with two and one-fourth times the extent of surface of excavation slopes above the water. But this proposition needs no comment; its absurdity is self-evident. Every laborer on public works knows that the expense of maintaining excavations depends first upon the nature of the material and the accidental circumstances attending it, and, these conditions being the same, it is in proportion to the extent of surface exposed to the action of the elements, without regard to altitude.

So far from the elevation at this point on the Sassafras being a disadvantage beyond the extent of excavation incident to it, it can be shown to be attended with important advantages; for it is a topographical feature which concentrates the travel by railroad and highway along a common route, where a single bridge can serve the greater portion of it, and where the elevation is sufficient to allow a large number of small craft to pass under the bridge without opening the draw. At present, two railroads diverge at a short distance north of the canal on this summit; one of them follows the ridge and runs south; the other, after crossing the canal, runs nearly parallel with it towards the Chesapeake Bay. This divergence could at a small expense be transferred to the southern side of the canal, so that one bridge could serve both. But in the southern part of the peninsula, on the Choptank line, there is no such determining feature in the topography; and there are now three railroads, at wide intervals, crossing the canal line, with probably others in the future. The provision and maintenance of bridges along this line of fifty-two miles is an item of great importance, both on account of expense and the risk of obstruction.

A member of the Board of Trade, an ancient mariner, stated to the Senate Committee that the channel of the Delaware Bay, between the outlets of the two proposed canals, was very crooked and difficult. If he has derived this conviction from his own experience in navigating those waters, he certainly has ignored the sailing directions of the United States Coast Survey, and has had no faith in the chart furnished by their complete and systematic hydrographic labors; for this indicates a channel of ample width and depth on a straight line for nearly the entire distance. As the maritime world has for so many years successfully relied upon these charts, it will require more testimony than this to bring them into disrepute. If in the future any obstruction should occur in this channel, the presence of Philadelphia, Chester, and Wilmington, which depend upon it, is ample guarantee of its prompt removal. Their influence in the National Legislature, as well as their own enterprise and wealth, will as certainly maintain unimpaired this highway as will that of Baltimore the water approaches to that city.

If the object of the advocates of the Choptank route is the spending of more money in the neighborhood, I could suggest a location for their wished-for extra twenty-three and one-half miles of canal, which might be urged with some degree of plausibility. With this view I will make a statement of the features of the two routes, being balanced by adding to the lesser an extra amount of dredging in Chesapeake Bay and the extra length of canal; thus:

Routes.	Miles.	Routes.	Miles.
Choptank River, dredging	2.27	Sassafras River, dredging	16.38
Ferry Creek, dredging	1.51	Delaware Bay, dredging	.95
Nanticoke River, dredging	14.77	Chesapeake, (extra,) dredging	5.00
Delaware Bay, dredging	3.78
Total	22.33	Total	22.33
West of Nanticoke Canal	13.44	Sassafras Canal	14.22
East of Nanticoke Canal	16.66	Extra canal	23.45
Low grounds of Broadkill Canal	7.57
Total	37.67	Total	37.67

Now, if instead of cutting this extra twenty-three and one-half miles of canal across the high grounds of the peninsula, it be excavated in a straight line from the end of the five miles in the bay below the mouth of the Sassafras River to Locust Point in the city of Baltimore, which is exactly the same distance, there would be a saving of ten miles of distance over the present Sassafras route, instead of losing twenty-one miles as is done by the Choptank route. It would also be comparatively free from the drifting ice during the Susquehanna floods. But being excavated through very low ground and chiefly through shallow water and water of considerable depth, there would be a large balance of the extra eight million left unexpended, for which my ingenuity fails to find any plausible employment.

If the liberality of the Government may be extended to the appropriation of even one million more than is necessary to construct this water-way connecting the channels of the two bays upon the most expeditious route, I would suggest that it be expended in cutting a channel twenty-seven feet in depth in one straight line from North Point to Howell's Point, where the estimated work of the Sassafras route begins, and for securing the same depth over the short distance required in Delaware Bay. This channel would pass immediately to the west of Poole's Island light, and would coincide with the general direction of the tidal currents of the bay and be beyond the influence of the sedimentary deposits of the lesser tributaries on the western shore. By taking the depth of the water along this line, as indicated upon the charts of the Coast Survey, and applying the prices that have been used in the Craighill estimates to the quantities thus ascertained, it will be found that the cost will be less than $1,000,000 including the work in Delaware Bay.

Colonel Craighill speaks of the necessity of maintaining a channel directly across the natural set of the currents of the Chesapeake in order to render available the more northern route, and with this assumed necessity in his mind applies to the route the expression of "a very formidable objection." He refers to the abandoned portion of the Brewerton channel, three miles in length, beyond the diverging point of the new channel. The maintaining of the depth in this three miles of channel is the formidable feature. It would have been an interesting paragraph of the report if there had been given an estimate of the quantity of annual deposit in this old channel, as well as that in the new one for the same distance from the point of divergence. Some idea could then be had of the comparative cost of maintaining the one which sets across the currents of the bay and the other which sets across the currents of Patapsco River, and the difference set opposite to the $8,500,000.

But why should the commerce which may ply north of the Patapsco River be confined to the necessity of this channel, when that plying south of it, and which formerly was confined to the old channel, refused any longer to recognize it as a necessity? Colonel Craighill himself was called upon to remove this necessity, and he accomplished it in the most scientific manner by opening the new channel which bears his name. It is only necessary to exercise the same skill that was displayed on that occasion to confer a similar favor upon the commerce that would ply north of the Patapsco River. A straight line of exactly the same length as the new Craighill channel, five miles, and diverging from the Brewerton channel at the same point, and placed exactly parallel to the main channel of the bay on the eastern side, and with the long streak of deep water on the western side, leads to twenty-six feet depth of water and into the main channel beyond. A new channel upon this line would be as much with the set of the currents of the bay as the Craighill channel, and would be less likely to be affected by the currents of the Patapsco River. Another objection which Colonel Craighill seems to urge as formidable to the northern route is that "during the periods of fast and running ice" it would be impracticable to navigate the bay in that direction. But he evidently intended to apply this strong expression, not to the route, but to the voyage which it might be desirable to make during the two or three days of those years in which ice freshets occur. He certainly could not consider it a formidable circumstance that upon such rare occasions a vessel should either wait a few days until the ice-drift had subsided, or take the old route by the Virginia capes, which has been followed advantageously for the last century and a half. Nor would he, in favor of such solitary cases, sacrifice the great interests of the general commerce which is involved in the loss of four and a half hours on every voyage for every day in every year. Attention should also be called to the fact that these same currents bearing ice which flow past the Patapsco River, and offering such resistance to vessels attempting to ascend the bay, also resist those vessels seeking the port of Baltimore from below coming by way of the Choptank route, which, if they had come by way of the Sassafras route, would have had these currents in their favor.

It must not be forgotten that the old route by the Virginia capes is ever open and available in the event of any obstruction to the canal or its approaches, and that such fact can be signaled from the light-house at Cape Henlopen to an arriving vessel in time for it to continue on that course without loss of time.

The facilitating of the passage between Baltimore and the ocean will not be the only object gained by the construction of the canal. There now exists an extensive system of internal water routes of transportation to the East, North, and West, of which the Delaware River and the Delaware and Raritan Canal form a part, and which is being extended every day. When the Cape Cod Canal is completed a barge or canal-boat may go with safety from Baltimore to Boston, Lake Champlain, or Lake Erie. While the location of the Sassafras Canal affords the greatest facilities for the ocean commerce, it at the same time occupies the most advantageous position for this line of internal transportation. For this purpose the Choptank route would be entirely unavailable on account of the great loss of distance proceeding to and from Baltimore and the dangerous navigation at the mouth of the Delaware Bay for such unseaworthy craft from any quarter.

Colonel Craighill has lately been urging the construction of defensive works for the protection of Baltimore and other important points reached from the sea. It seems to me that this spirit should make him the strongest advocate of locating the ship-canal where it would in the highest degree contribute to the refuge and escape of merchant vessels navigating either bay in time of war, and to the protection of those cities and towns extending along tide-water from Baltimore to Trenton, by affording the utmost facility and security to the maneuvers of all descriptions of naval craft engaged in their defense from the attacks of a foreign enemy. By the construction of the Sassafras Canal this whole line, which embraces so many and such immense interests to the country at large, with its teeming population and busy factories of every description, where terminate two of the greatest railroad systems of the continent, with its depots for the coal, iron, petroleum, timber, grain, and provisions upon which the country depends, is brought under one base of defensive naval operations. And the artery which would then connect the two bays will be secure behind approaches from the sea, where they can be fortified so as to defy the efforts of an enemy to ascend them.

The Choptank advocates would locate this canal where no vessel could escape from the Delaware into the Chesapeake without going first nearly to the ocean, where a hostile cruiser may lie in wait far beyond the range of any land batteries that might be established, and where the enemy would have the best chance of obstructing or commanding it. So on the Chesapeake side, an enemy may rove for twenty miles above or below the mouth of the Choptank River and remain four or five miles from either shore. If a ship or gun-boat lying opposite to Baltimore, or anywhere in the Delaware River, should find it necessary to change these positions, it could not be accomplished by the Choptank route without moving over one hundred miles more of distance than what would be required by way of the Sassafras Canal.

It has been urged on behalf of the Choptank route that all these advantages should yield to the theory that a naval force defending Philadelphia would always be stationed at the mouth of the Delaware Bay, and that it might become important to proceed thence to the Potomac River for the defense of Washington City. But the maintaining of this position implies favorable weather and a superior force in the open sea to the enemy at this point, which could never be depended upon. If the theory is correct that the mouth of the Delaware is the proper station for the defense of Philadelphia, then for a stronger reason the mouth of the Chesapeake is the proper station for the defense of Baltimore and Washington, for that would also cover Norfolk and Richmond. Now, a junction between two forces so located could be best accomplished by taking a straight line in the open sea parallel with the coast, where vessels could move with the utmost freedom. The canal has no application whatever to these circumstances. It is only in the event of having to retire before the enemy from the open sea and assuming a defensive position that the canal becomes an auxiliary to naval operations; and then it is wanted where it can be used and held secure.

But let this extreme case be admitted, and suppose a man-of-war standing off Delaware Bay being summoned to the Potomac for the defense of Washington, which is already defended by sixty miles of narrow and crooked channel, commanded by bluffs on either side within very short range. The actual distance from this point to the mouth of the Potomac by way of the proposed Sassafras Canal is fifty miles longer than that between the same points by way of the Choptank route, but the difference in the time required for the trip would be only two and two-thirds hours, taking the adopted basis of ten miles per hour in open water, seven miles in dredged channels, and five miles in canals; for the extent of the dredging being equal in both cases, the 7.34 hours equivalent to the greater distance of 73.47 miles in open water, is reduced by 4.69 hours, equivalent to the greater distance of 23.47 miles of canal. But the important feature in the employment of these canals during war is not so much a small margin of time involved as the certainty of having this route open in the rear, available from all points on both bays, a consideration which hardly admits of a comparison between the two. Besides, the assistance in the supposed case is much more likely to be called to Baltimore, for its capture would be of more importance to the enemy, and it could not be so well fortified against him. The possession of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad would require that any assistance from the north and east going overland to Washington by railway should make the detour by way of Harrisburgh and Hagerstown, involving a loss of one hundred and twenty miles.

Mr. Keyser, the representative of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, when before the Senate committee, gave as his principal objection to the Sassafras route the uncertainty of the amount of dredging that might be required from time to time in the future to maintain the depth of the bay channel above the Patapsco River. When uncertainty lies between a trifling and an overwhelming expenditure the large risk is a sufficient ground of disquietude; but when the uncertainty lies between two expenditures both confined within narrow limits, it is no more a ground of apprehension and objection than the certainty of the maximum. The sedimentary deposits referred to, brought down by the Susquehanna River and other tributaries of the Chesapeake Bay, have been going on for several centuries, and still there is twenty-six feet depth of water at the mouth of the Sassafras River. It is likely that there may exist some record of hydrographic observations of the last century in these regions which would throw some light upon the rate of deposit along the channels of the bay and remove some of this uncertainty. And if this information is obtained after the canal is finished it should be equally satisfactory to those who make this objection to it, since it is certain that the maximum is but a trifle compared to the excessive outlay and current expenditure proposed to avoid it.

From considering these small uncertainties it is well to turn to the large certainties which would attend the execution of the Choptank project, such as the following:

The excess of first cost, amounting to $8,500,000, with all excess for maintaining and managing the more extensive works;

The loss of 24¼ per cent. of the saving of time and expense to the general commerce by steamers which would be accomplished by constructing the canal on the Sassafras route, and that involved in twenty-one miles of sailing distance for other vessels and thirty-eight miles extra towage on the Choptank canals and the small stream connecting them;

The loss of the exceedingly important function which the canal should perform in defensive naval and commercial operations during war;

The loss of that commerce plying upon the internal system of water transportation in connection with the Delaware and Hudson Rivers;

The loss of credit for intelligence and economy.

When Commodore Ammen opposes his scheme for an interocean canal to the truly scientific plan of De Lesseps, he can plead in its behalf its greatly inferior cost. But in the case of the Choptank project they have combined the inefficiency and insecurity of the Nicaragua Canal with the boldness of expenditure for that at Panama.

RD. RANDOLPH, Civil Engineer.

Hon. E. J. HENKLE.

United States Militia.

SPEECH OF HON. R. M. A. HAWK,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 28, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 5638) to provide for reorganizing, arming, and disciplining the militia.

Mr. HAWK said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I find upon a somewhat thorough investigation of the subject that much has been said of interest to the country on organizing the militia, and, while I realize that there is not much probability of the question engaging the attention of this Congress, I have deemed it my duty as a member of the Committee on the Militia to devote some time to considering the various plans that have been submitted to Congress in past sessions for forming the mass of the people into some kind of military organization for the common defense.

FOREIGN MILITIA SYSTEM.

In order to obtain a still wider view of the question I have to some extent examined the systems of reserve forces or militia that prevail in some of the leading nations of Europe.

The English system will be found to be most thoroughly and thoughtfully presented in a work by Charles M. Clode, entitled The Military Forces of the Crown. The militia in England was organized for the purpose of assisting the civil powers to preserve the peace and enforce the laws of the realm, and when called out for such duty was known as the "civil guard." The volunteer corps is now, however, the principal reliance of England for home defense, and much attention is given to perfecting its organization and efficiency.

The Austrian and Russian systems are fully detailed in two publications issued by the British War Office, The Armed Strength of Austria, by Captain W. S. Cooke, and The Armed Strength of Russia, translated from the German. In both those countries the organization of the militia is so interlocked with that of the regular army that it is ready at all times to be mobilized under command of regular officers. For the purpose of maintaining the organization of the Austrian militia, which is designated the "landwehr" of the Empire, the country is divided into districts, each of which is placed in charge of an officer of the regular army.

A concise account of the military organizations of the leading nations of the world will be found in a report on the Armies of Europe and Asia, made by General Upton to the War Department.

It is, however, unnecessary to the purposes I now have in view for me to give a full account of foreign militia systems, and I merely suggest attention to them for the reason that they may furnish some useful hints for the details of our own organization. The main features of any system we adopt must be as essentially different from those of foreign powers as our theory and form of government differs from theirs.

THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.

In forming the Federal Constitution there was great difference of opinion between those who favored leaving the control of the militia wholly with the States and those who desired to vest it absolutely in the Federal Government. I have compiled copious extracts from the debates and proceedings of the Federal convention on the question of organizing the militia, and as they form the basis on which we must proceed in interpreting the power accorded to Congress over the militia I append them to my remarks. (See Appendix A.) For the purpose of more directly calling attention to the different opinions that were expressed by the members of the convention I quote a few of the most important:

Mr. MASON introduced the subject of regulating the militia. He thought such a power necessary to be given to the General Government.

Mr. ELLSWORTH was for going as far in submitting the militia to the General Government as might be necessary, but thought the motion of Mr. Mason went too far.

Mr. DICKINSON's opinion was that the States never would nor ought to give up all authority over the militia. He proposed to restrain the general power to one-fourth part at a time, which by rotation would discipline the whole militia.

Mr. MADISON thought the regulation of the militia naturally pertained to the authority charged with the public defense. It did not seem in its nature to be divisible between different authorities. If the States would trust the General Government with power over the public treasure, they would from the same consideration of necessity grant to it the direction of the public force. Those who had a full view of the public situation would from a sense of the danger guard against it. The States would not be separately impressed with the general situation, nor have a due confidence in the concurrent exertions of each other.

Mr. ELLSWORTH considered the idea of a select militia as impracticable; and if it were not it would be followed by ruinous declension of the great body of the militia. The States would never submit to the same militia laws. Three or four shillings as a penalty will enforce obedience better in New England than forty lashes in some other places.

Mr. SHERMAN took notice that the States might want their militia for defense against invasions and insurrections, and for enforcing obedience to their laws. They will not give up this point. In giving up that of taxation they retained a concurrent power of raising money for their own use.

Mr. GERRY thought this the last point to be surrendered. If it be agreed to by the convention, the plan will have as black a mark as was set on Cain. He had no such confidence in the General Government as some gentlemen possessed, and believed it would be found that the States have not.

It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, from these quotations that the points of difference between the framers of the Federal Constitution were precisely the same that now arise in discussing the interpretation of the clauses of the Constitution prescribing the relative powers of the General Government and the States over the militia.

In article 1, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States, among other powers delegated to Congress, we find the following clauses:

(15.) To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

(16.) To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the apportionment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

There is no necessity for my dilating at any great length upon these clauses of the Constitution. So much has been written by able and learned authorities upon the powers of Congress and the States with reference to the organization of the militia that reference can be had to any of the leading text-books upon the subject. I will say, however, that upon but two occasions before our great civil war was it found necessary for the powers of the General Government to be used in "calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

The first was in 1794, at the time of the Pennsylvania insurrection, and the other in the case of the war with Great Britain in 1812 and 1814.

The militia has sometimes been called upon for the purpose of repelling raids by Indians upon white settlements, but the local militia were usually found sufficient for the purposes of protection against these incursions.

In the late war of the rebellion the volunteer militia of the States was called out by President Lincoln for the purpose of suppressing insurrection. With these exceptions, I believe, never in the history of the country has this arm of the military force been called upon under the authority conferred by these clauses of the Constitution.

It will be seen under clause 16 that Congress has power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, but may only govern such portion as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving always to the States respectively the appointment of officers, which latter power has been exercised fully by them, and has been jealously guarded by their chief executives.

Although the militia of the States only become national militia after they have reported at the rendezvous to which they have been ordered by the President, and the States reserve the right of training their militia, Congress is given the power of prescribing the discipline according to which the States shall train them. The evident purpose of this power is to insure a uniform method, system, and efficiency, so that the militia may be of service when called to act together for the common defense.

The only other reference to the militia in the Constitution is the second amendment, which provides as follows:

A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

It has been regarded by many as a principle in our form of government that a standing army is dangerous to the liberties of the people, and so important was an expression of this opinion deemed that it was thought proper to incorporate it in the fundamental law of the Republic.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF PRESIDENTS.

I find upon investigation that the attention of Congress has been called to the organization of the militia in twenty-eight of the annual messages of the Presidents from 1789 to 1843, namely, by President Washington, in seven of his annual messages; by President Jefferson in five; by President Madison in six; by President Monroe in three, by President Jackson in three; by President Van Buren in two, and by President Tyler in two. All of these Chief Magistrates concurred in expressing the opinion that the existing militia law is very defective, and in urging upon Congress a thorough revision of it. Their views are certainly worthy of our attention in considering the subject, and I therefore append them to my remarks for the purpose of reference. (See Appendix B.)

ACTION OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

That a revision of the militia laws is not in the interest of the General Government alone, but is also desired by the States, is sufficiently indicated by the fact that the Legislatures of nearly all the States have at various times passed resolutions urging Congress to take action. Such of these resolutions as I find entered in the journals of Congress I append in my remarks. (See Appendix C.)

ACTION OF CONGRESS.

Beginning with the Congress immediately following the enactment of the existing law, there has been an almost constant agitation of the necessity of revising the organization of the militia, but the diversity of opinion has hitherto been so great that Congress appears never to have been able to agree upon a substitute. I have compiled a brief abstract of the very voluminous debates of Congress on the subject, and append them to my remarks, to indicate the leading expressions of opinion that have been given. (See Appendix D.)

In 1826 the Secretary of War, (Hon. James Barbour,) under authority of Congress, appointed a board of Army and militia officers to consider the subject of reorganizing the militia. He also addressed a circular letter to the executives of all the States and to leading men throughout the country, asking for their opinions and suggestions on the subject. The board was composed of Winfield Scott, major-general, United States Army; T. Cadwallader, major-general, Pennsylvania militia; William H. Sumner, adjutant-general of Massachusetts; Beverly Daniels, adjutant-general of North Carolina; Abraham Eustis, lieutenant-colonel, United States Army; Zachary Taylor, lieutenant-colonel, United States Army; E. Cutter, lieutenant-colonel, United States Army, and Charles J. Nourse, United States Army. The report of this board and the replies received by the Secretary of War to his circular-letter are of such interest and have such a bearing on a proper investigation of the subject that I have compiled copious extracts and append them to my remarks. (See Appendix E.)

A knowledge of the various plans for the reorganization of the militia that have from time to time engaged the attention of Congress is so essential in tracing the history of the development of the subject, and so necessary to a proper understanding of the plan now proposed, that I have compiled brief outlines of the principal plans that have been submitted since the organization of the Government, and append them to my remarks for the information of those interested. (See Appendix F.)

The reports made to Congress on the subject by its own committees and by the War Department are so numerous and voluminous that I can only append a few of the extracts that I have compiled from them. (See Appendix G.)

PERSONAL VIEWS.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that I have thus far expressed no opinions of my own upon the organization of the militia or the necessity for its reorganization. I have confined myself to an historical sketch of the subject, and to presenting a compilation of the material I have gathered in my investigation of it, trusting that they may be of use to the House and to the country in future consideration of the questions involved.

It is indeed a difficult problem to determine where the powers reserved by the States end and those delegated to Congress begin. Nor is it an easy task to determine whether it is better to allow the States sole control of their militia, or whether, to provide for the common defense, it is better that the Federal Government should assume control of it to the full extent that it may be conceded the Constitution will allow.

My own opinion is that we must depend upon the regular Army as a last resort for the enforcement of Federal laws and upon the patriotism of the people for defense against invasion and the suppression of internal disorders. State laws must be construed largely by State courts and executed by State officers. Federal laws must be construed by United States courts and executed by officers of the General Government. The last resort of the Chief Executive of the nation in enforcing the laws which he is sworn to uphold and defend is the Army. The great power to which the executive of the States can appeal for immediate use is the militia. We must admit that the people to some extent occupy a dual position; one demanding allegiance to the State in the execution of State laws and the protection of State interests; the other a higher and broader allegiance to the Federal Government for the execution of Federal laws when such laws are to be executed for the protection, maintenance, and defense of Federal authority.

I am not, however, prepared to discuss now the constitutional or legal bearings of these propositions, nor is it necessary to the purposes I now have in view. The bill before us as a substitute for the existing militia law does not, as I understand it, propose any change in the relative authority of the State and Federal governments over the militia, and we may therefore limit the discussion on it to its practical features. In order that the question may be properly understood, I will first submit an outline of the existing law and the proposed law, which I extract from the report of the Committee on the Militia on the pending bill:

DETAILS OF PRESENT LAW.

Sections 1625, 1626, 1627, for the enrollment of the militia, are provided for in section 1 of proposed bill.

Section 1628, requiring every citizen to arm and equip himself, is obsolete.

Section 1629, giving list of persons exempt from militia duty, is unnecessary, as proposed bill provides solely for a volunteer militia. If reserve militia is ever called into service it could only be by act of Congress, and that would specify the persons to be exempt from the call.

Sections 1630, 1631, 1632, giving in detail the organization of the militia, are provided for by the general provision in section 4 of proposed bill, that their organization shall conform as closely as practicable to that prescribed for the regular Army.

Section 1633, requiring officers to provide colors and music, is obsolete.

Section 1634, that there be an adjutant-general in each State, is provided for in section 11 of proposed bill.

Section 1635, prescribing what reports officers of the militia shall make, is omitted in proposed bill, as a matter more proper to be regulated by the States.

Section 1636, requiring an annual report to be made by the adjutant-general of each State, is provided for in section 11 of proposed bill.

Section 1637, that system of discipline and field exercise shall be the same as in the regular Army, is retained with verbal alterations as section 5 of proposed bill.

Section 1638, regulating seniority of commissioned officers of same rank, is retained as section 22 of proposed bill, with verbal alterations making it applicable only when militia is in the service of the United States.

Section 1639, that militia wounded in service shall be cared for at public expense, is provided for in general provisions of section 19 of proposed bill.

Section 1640, prescribing duties of brigade inspectors, is obsolete. Provision for inspection of the militia is made in section 14 of proposed bill.

Section 1641, recognizing special privileges accorded by any of the States to existing organizations, is retained as section 6 of proposed bill.

Section 1642, authorizing President to order militia into service of the United States, is provided for in section 19 of proposed bill, and, in accordance with the theory of the bill, limited to the active or volunteer militia.

Section 1643, that the President, in calling out the militia, shall apportion it among the States, is omitted in proposed bill.

Section 1644, that militia in service shall be governed same as regular Army, is provided for in general provisions of section 19 of proposed bill.

Sections 1645, 1646, 1647, prescribing how militia shall be organized when called into service, are provided for in section 4 of proposed bill.

Section 1648, that in calling out militia the President shall specify length of time, which shall not exceed nine months, is provided for in section 19 of proposed bill.

Section 1649, penalty for disobeying order calling into service, is provided for in section 20 of proposed bill, changing penalty to that prescribed for desertion.

Section 1651, prescribing when pay shall commence, is superfluous, and is omitted in proposed bill.

Section 1652, allowing one day's pay for every twenty miles travel, is retained as section 21 of proposed bill, changing it to fifty miles.

Section 1653, regulating allowance for forage and use of horses in service, is changed and provided for in section 23 of proposed bill.

Section 1654, to regulate liability for expense of marching militia to place of rendezvous when called into service, is superfluous, and is omitted in proposed bill.

Section 1655, allowing militia called into service on western frontier extra rations, is obsolete.

Section 1656, that pensions shall be allowed to widows and children of militiamen, is provided for in the general provisions of section 19 of proposed bill.

Section 1657, allowing pensions to volunteers and militia who were disabled in service against Florida Indians, is obsolete, and belongs to the general pension laws.

Sections 1658, 1659, 1660, that courts-martial for the trial of militia shall be composed of militia officers only, and providing for the collection of fines imposed, are omitted in proposed bill as applicable only when the militia are in the service of the United States, and it is provided that when in service they shall be governed by the rules and regulations of the Army.

Section 1661 makes a permanent appropriation of $200,000 a year to provide arms and equipments for the militia. Sections 6 and 7 of the proposed bill abolish this system and provide that the active militia shall be fully armed and equipped, and leave it in the hands of Congress to make annual appropriations for that purpose.

DETAILS OF PROPOSED LAW.

Section 1 provides that all citizens between eighteen and forty-five years of age shall be enrolled in the militia. This is existing law.

Section 2 divides the militia into two classes—the active and inactive. The purpose of this division is to recognize the volunteer militia of the States as the militia de facto. As this is the key of the proposed change in the militia system, we shall consider it more in detail further in this report.

Section 3 provides that the active militia shall consist of the militia organized under the laws of the respective States. As the term of enlistment in the volunteer militia varies under the militia laws of different States, it is deemed desirable to add the proviso that to entitle them to arms and equipments the enlistment shall not be for a less period than three years. In order to prevent any question that might arise if the term of enlistment of a militiaman should expire while he is in the service of the United States, a further proviso is added that his enlistment shall contain a condition to cover that contingency.

Section 4 provides that the organization of the active militia shall conform as closely as practicable to that of the regular Army.

Section 5 is a clause similar to existing law to provide that same system of drill and tactics shall be used by the active militia as is prescribed for the regular Army.

Section 6 is a transcript of clause in existing law to provide for recognizing as a portion of the active militia any privileged volunteer organizations that exist in the States.

Section 7 specifies the kinds and amounts of arms, equipments, uniforms, and camp equipage that shall be furnished by the General Government to the active militia, and is an important feature in the proposed change in the militia system, as it substitutes these specifications for the existing permanent appropriation of $200,000 a year for this purpose. As the States have already in possession arms and equipments heretofore issued, and as many of the States have largely overdrawn their accounts in the annual allotment of the permanent appropriation, a provision is added to this clause to release the States from any liability for their overdrawn accounts, and to require them to account for the property now in possession as a part of the allowance made by this act. As the bill provides that the active militia shall be armed and equipped by the General Government, it is required of the States, to entitle them to the benefits of the act, that they shall comply with the provisions deemed necessary to make it efficient and available whenever its services may be required by the General Government. But in order that immaterial departures from the requirements of the law, or failure under excusable circumstances to comply with them, may not be construed to the prejudice of the militia, a discretionary power is left with the Secretary of War to authorize the issue, if he deems it advisable.

Section 8 provides that the Secretary of War shall include in his annual estimate the amount of money required to carry out the provisions of the bill, and places the whole matter of supplying the militia in charge of the Ordnance Department, under his direction.

Sections 9 and 10 provide for accountability by the States for property issued to them, and supplies one of the manifest deficiencies of the existing law, which makes no provisions on the subject.

Sections 11 and 12 provide for annual returns to be made, in order that Congress may be fully advised of the condition and needs of the militia, and the Executive at all times in possession of necessary information as to its availability for service.

Section 13 prescribes and limits the use of the service uniform by the active militia.

Section 14 provides that to entitle them to be provided for by the General Government, the active militia shall assemble in camps of instruction annually, and be annually inspected. These provisions are most important, as it is only through their agency that the militia can be brought to that state of efficiency that would justify the Government in the expenditure necessary to maintain it.

Section 15 provides that officers of the regular Army shall be present at the annual inspection of the militia, to make observations as to their efficiency and to examine the condition of the public property in their possession. The section carefully guards against any exercise of unconstitutional authority in the premises, and is not only deemed essential but is also earnestly desired by the militia.

Sections 16 and 17 have for their object the encouragement of rifle practice, and for such competition between the militia, the regular Army, and the Navy, as must result in great benefit to each. This subject is now so well understood, and has become a matter of so much national pride, that argument in favor of it is unnecessary.

Section 18 provides that officers of the regular Army may be detailed to serve as adjutants in the active militia. This provision is earnestly desired by the militia, and as it can be complied with without expense to the Government, and when availed of must result in such great benefit to the militia, it is deemed a wise provision. In large cities in which regiments of active militia exist as "live organizations" the administrative business of the regiment is so great that it is almost impossible to find officers who can spare the time from their daily avocations to discharge it. There is not only no compulsion in the provisions of the section, but careful provision to the contrary. It is obvious that supernumerary and unemployed officers of the regular Army, who have been educated in their profession at the public expense, cannot be better employed than in assisting the efforts of the militia to attain efficiency whenever the militia request it.

Sections 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23 make the necessary provisions for authorizing the President to order the active militia into the service of the United States, and for governing them while in the service. These provisions do not differ materially from existing law, except that they are better arranged and more concise, and are made applicable to the active militia only.

Section 24 provides that the reserve militia shall only be called into service by act of Congress. No contingency could arise in which it would be proper to call out the unarmed, unorganized, and untrained mass of the population without some legislation by Congress to provide specially for it.

Section 25 provides for the appointment of a board of officers to prepare a system of rules and regulations for the discipline of the militia, to select a uniform, and to determine the kind and amount of ammunition and camp equipage that shall be allowed to the militia.

Section 26 makes an appropriation for the ensuing fiscal year. As the bill repeals existing appropriation, unless an appropriation is made in the bill the militia would be without any supplies whatever during the year intervening before the regular estimates of the Secretary of War would be appropriated for.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN EXISTING LAW AND PROPOSED LAW.

From the foregoing statements of details, it is apparent that the leading features of difference between existing law and proposed law are as follows:

First. To substitute the existing volunteer militia for the compulsory system of the present law, that applies to the whole body of the people, and which has become so inapplicable as to be utterly disregarded.

Second. To make such provisions as will aid and encourage the formation of volunteer organizations, remove the disparity in their numbers and discipline that exists between different States, and promote their efficiency to a common standard that will make them available for all the purposes for which a militia is needed.

Third. To abolish the present system of a permanent appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia, and substitute provisions prescribing with what arms and equipments the militia shall be furnished, and on what conditions—leaving it in the discretion of Congress to regulate the annual appropriations for that purpose.

The main feature of the bill is that it does not create or organize a new force, or propose any change in the relations established by long custom between the militia of the States and the Federal Government.

From the sketch I have given of the history of the militia law it will have been seen that as soon as the defects of the law were apparent plans were proposed to remedy them, but that during a long series of years the diversity of opinion on the subject was so great that no plan could be agreed upon. From being inoperative the militia law finally became impracticable, and fell into complete disuse and disregard. The country increased so rapidly in population that it was found absurd and unnecessary to enforce militia duty from the whole body of the people, and that a sufficient proportion of the population were willing to do such duty voluntarily as to furnish all the force desirable. The States gradually disregarded the Federal law and devoted their efforts to fostering a volunteer militia, until now these volunteer troops are all that are generally known as "the militia."

There exists now in the different States about one hundred and twenty-five thousand volunteer militia. There is great disparity, both as to numbers and efficiency, between the different States. Some of them, from their geographical situation or local causes, require a larger militia force than others. The bill before us in nowise interferes with the States on this point; each may have as large or as small a militia as desired by itself; the bill simply fixes the maximum number that the United States will supply with arms. Whatever differences may exist between the States in the number of militia maintained by each, there can be no question that all should be similarly organized and equally efficient. The bill before us is less coersive in that respect than the existing law, inasmuch as it proposes to promote efficiency by encouragement, by allowing the militia tents and camp equipage in order that they may have the benefit of annual camps of instruction, and by making the supply of arms, equipments, and camp equipage by the United States, dependent on the States providing to keep this militia up to a proper standard of efficiency.

So far as the theory of the bill is concerned, I do not find many objections to it; as to its details, I conceive that at this time it would be superfluous to discuss them, or for me to say more than that at the proper time I should probably make objections to some and suggest modifications of others.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I am satisfied that our obsolete militia law should be replaced by other provisions more suitable to the existing condition of the country, I am not one of those that believe the national defense can with safety be intrusted solely to the militia; and I believe that any scheme for their organization and discipline should have in view a very different purpose. For the service of the Federal Government they should be considered simply as the force on which to rely during the first moments of danger to guard the nation until its regular forces can be collected and volunteer armies organized. This is unquestionably an important function, but it is a limited one.

Discovered in the war of 1812, carried into practice with most brilliant results in the Mexican war, it was demonstrated on a scale of enormous magnitude in the late war of the rebellion that the people of this country can be quickly organized and transformed into efficient soldiers. With an efficient regular army of sufficient numbers as a nucleus, it is evident to my mind that the future great armies of the Republic will be volunteer soldiers. What we need is a system of military education that will provide officers at the disposal of the Federal Government to organize and officer armies when it is necessary to create them.

Much has been said against military schools such as we have at West Point; but my opinion is, based upon a somewhat careful investigation of the organization of the military forces of the civilized nations of the world, that there is no more economical plan for the public defense than to provide a liberal number of educated officers to be held in reserve until their services are needed. These officers, after graduating from military schools, could be allowed to enter upon the ordinary avocations of life, and held to service on a retired list at nominal pay, or, in consideration of their having been educated at public expense, be bound to respond to any call for their services when Congress or the Executive might deem the public safety or interest to require them.

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS.

I have not considered it necessary at this time either to specially advocate or criticise the pending bill. I believe that the proposed bill is better than existing law, but I desire a full discussion of the whole subject before final action. Urgent appeals have been made to Congress to renew its efforts to solve the militia problem; and, believing that the question must soon be given the attention it demands, I have deemed it sufficient at present to submit the material I have gathered in my own investigation, in the hope that it may be of service to an intelligent consideration of the subject in the future.

In thus presenting my thoughts I have endeavored to avoid a partisan view of the subject, and to give due consideration both to the rights of the States and the powers of the Federal Government. I conceive the questions embraced to be far above party considerations, as I believe them to involve the dignity, welfare, and future safety of our common country, considerations which I indulge the hope are equally dear to men of all parties and all sections.

APPENDIX A.

Proceedings of the Federal convention, Saturday, August 18, 1787.

Mr. MASON introduced the subject of regulating the militia. He thought such a power necessary to be given to the General Government. He hoped there would be no standing army in time of peace, unless it might be for a few garrisons. The militia ought, therefore, to be more effectually prepared for the public defense. Thirteen States will never concur in any one system if the discipline of the militia be left in their hands. If they will not give up the power over the whole, they probably will over a part as a select militia. He moved, as an addition to the propositions just referred to the committee of detail, and to be referred in like manner, "a power to regulate the militia."

Mr. MASON moved, as an additional power, "to make laws for the regulation and discipline of the militia of the several States, reserving to the States the appointment of the officers." He considered uniformity as necessary in the regulation of the militia throughout the Union.

General PINCKNEY mentioned a case during the war in which a dissimilarity in the militia of different States had produced the most serious mischiefs. Uniformity was essential. The States would never keep up a proper discipline of the militia.

Mr. ELLSWORTH was for going as far in submitting the militia to the General Government as might be necessary; but thought the motion of Mr. Mason went too far. "He moved that the militia should have the same arms and exercise, and be under rules established by the General Government when in actual service of the United States; and when States neglect to provide regulations for militia, it should be regulated and established by the Legislature of the United States." The whole authority over the militia ought by no means to be taken away from the States, whose consequence would pine away to nothing after such a sacrifice of power. He thought the general authority could not sufficiently pervade the Union for such a purpose, nor could it accommodate itself to the local genius of the people. It must be vain to ask the States to give the militia out of their hands.

Mr. SHERMAN seconds the motion.

Mr. DICKINSON. We are come now to a most important matter—that of the sword. His opinion was that the States never could nor ought to give up all authority over the militia. He proposes to restrain the general power to one-fourth part at a time, which by rotation would discipline the whole militia.

Mr. BUTLER urged the necessity of submitting the whole militia to the general authority, which had the care of the general defense.

Mr. MASON had suggested the idea of a select militia. He was led to think that would be, in fact, as much as the General Government could advantageously be charged with. He was afraid of creating insuperable objections to the plan. He withdrew his original motion and moved a power "to make laws for regulating and disciplining the militia, not exceeding one-tenth part in any one year, and reserving the appointment of officers to the States."

General PINCKNEY renewed Mr. Mason's original motion. For a part to be under the General and a part under the State governments would be an incurable evil. He saw no room for such distrust of the General Government.

Mr. LANGDON seconds General Pinckney's renewal. He saw no more reason to be afraid of the General Government than of the State government. He was more apprehensive of the confusion of the different authorities on this subject than of either.

Mr. MADISON thought the regulation of the militia naturally appertaining to the authority charged with the public defense. It did not seem in its nature to be divisible between two distinct authorities. If the States would trust the General Government with a power over the public treasure they would, from the same consideration of necessity, grant it the direction of the public force. Those who had a full view of the public situation would, from a sense of the danger, guard against it. The States would not be separately impressed with the general situation, nor have the due confidence in the concurrent exertions of each other.

Mr. ELLSWORTH considered the idea of a select militia as impracticable; and if it were not, it would be followed by a ruinous declension of the great body of the militia. The States would never submit to the same militia laws. Three or four shillings as a penalty will enforce obedience better in New England than forty lashes in some other places.

Mr. PINCKNEY thought the power such an one as could not be abused, and that the States would see the necessity of surrendering it. He had, however, but a scanty faith in militia. There must be also a real military force. This alone can effectually answer the purpose. The United States had been making an experiment without it, and we see the consequence in their rapid approaches to anarchy.

Mr. SHERMAN took notice that the States might want their militia for defense against invasions and insurrections, and for enforcing obedience to their laws. They will not give up this point. In giving up that of taxation they retain a concurrent power of raising money for their own use.

Mr. GERRY thought this the last point remaining to be surrendered. If it be agreed to by the convention, the plan will have as black a mark as was set on Cain. He had no such confidence in the General Government as some gentlemen possessed, and believed that it would be found that the States have not.

Colonel MASON thought there was great weight in the remarks of Mr. Sherman, and moved an exception to his motion "of such part of the militia as might be required by the States for their own use."

Mr. READ doubted the propriety of leaving the appointment of the militia officers to the States. In some States they are elected by the Legislatures; in others by the people themselves. He thought at least an appointment by the State executives ought to be insisted on.

On the question for committing to the grand committee last appointed the latter motion of Colonel Mason and the original one renewed by General Pinckney—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia—ay, 8; Connecticut, New Jersey—no, 2; Maryland, divided.—319.

Adjourned.

TUESDAY, August 21, 1787.

Governor LIVINGSTON, from the committee of eleven, to whom were referred the propositions respecting the debts of the several States, and also the militia, entered on the 18th instant, delivered the following report:

"To make laws for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by the United States."

THURSDAY, August 23, 1787.

The report of the committee of eleven, made the 21st of August, being taken up, and the following clause being under consideration, to wit: "To make laws for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such parts of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed"—

Mr. SHERMAN moved to strike out the last member, "and authority of training," &c. He thought it unnecessary. The States will have this authority, of course, if not given up.

Mr. ELLSWORTH doubted the propriety of striking out the sentence. The reason assigned applies as well to the other reservation of the appointment to offices. He remarked, at the same time, that the term discipline was of vast extent, and might be so expounded as to include all power on the subject.

Mr. KING, by way of explanation, said that by organizing, the committee meant proportioning the officers and men; by arming, specifying the kind, size, and caliber of arms; and by disciplining, prescribing the manual exercise, evolutions, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN withdrew his motion.

Mr. GERRY. This power in the United States, as explained, is making the States drill-sergeants. He had as lief let the citizens of Massachusetts be disarmed as to take the command from the States and subject them to the General Legislature. It would be regarded as a system of despotism.

Mr. MASON observed that "arming" as explained did not extend to furnishing arms, nor the term "disciplining" to penalties and courts-martial for enforcing them.

Mr. KING added to his former explanation that arming meant not only to provide for uniformity of arms, but included the authority to regulate the modes of furnishing, either by the militia themselves, the State governments, or the National Treasury; that laws for disciplining must involve penalties and everything necessary for enforcing penalties.

Mr. DAYTON moved to postpone the paragraph, in order to take up the following proposition: To establish a uniform and general system of discipline for the militia of these States, and to make laws for organizing, arming, disciplining, and governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and all authority over the militia not herein given to the General Government.

On the question to postpone in favor of this proposition, it passed in the negative—New Jersey, Maryland, Georgia—ay, 3; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina—no, 8.

Mr. ELLSWORTH and Mr. SHERMAN moved to postpone the second clause in favor of the following: to establish an uniformity of arms, exercise, and organization of the militia, and to provide for the government of them when called into the service of the United States. The object of this proposition was to refer the plan for the militia to the General Government, but to leave the execution of it to the State governments.

Mr. LANGDON said he could not understand the jealousy expressed by some gentlemen. The General and State governments were not enemies to each other, but different institutions for the good of the people of America. As one of the people, he could say the National Government is mine. In transferring power from one to the other, I only take out of my left hand what it cannot so well use, and put it into my right hand where it can be better used.

Mr. GERRY thought it was rather taking out of the right hand and putting it into the left. Will any man say that liberty will be as safe in the hands of eighty or a hundred men taken from the whole continent as in the hands of two or three hundred taken from a single State?

Mr. DAYTON was against so absolute a uniformity. In some States there ought to be a greater proportion of cavalry than in others. In some places rifles would be most proper, and in others muskets, &c,

General PINCKNEY preferred the clause reported by the committee extending the meaning of it to the case of fines, &c.

Mr. MADISON. The primary object is to secure an effectual discipline of the militia. This will no more be done if left to the States separately, than the requisitions have been hitherto paid by them. The States neglect their militia now, and the more they are consolidated into one nation the less each will rely on its own interior provisions for its safety, and the less prepare its militia for that purpose; in like manner as the militia of a State would have been still more neglected than it has been if each county had been independently charged with the care of its militia. The discipline of the militia is evidently a national concern, and ought to be provided for in the National Constitution.

Mr. L. MARTIN was confident that the States would never give up the power over the militia; and that if they were to do so the militia would be less attended to by the General than by the State government.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked what danger there could be that the militia could be brought into the field and made to commit suicide on themselves. This is a power that cannot, from its nature, be abused; unless indeed the whole mass should be corrupted. He was for trammeling the General Government whenever there was danger, but here there could be none. He urged this as an essential point; observing that the militia were everywhere neglected by the State Legislatures, the members of which courted popularity too much to enforce a proper discipline. Leaving the appointment of officers to the States protects the people against every apprehension that could produce murmur.

On the question of Mr. Ellsworth's motion—Connecticut, ay; the other ten States, no.

A motion was then made to recommit the second clause; which was negatived.

On the question to agree to the first part of the clause, namely, "to make laws for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States," New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia—ay, 9. Connecticut, Maryland—no, 2.

Mr. MADISON moved to amend the next part of the clause so as to read, "reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers under the rank of general officers.

Mr. SHERMAN considered this as absolutely inadmissible. He said that if the people should be so far asleep as to allow the most influential officers of the militia to be appointed by the General Government, every man of discernment would rouse them by sounding the alarm to them.

Mr. GERRY. Let us at once destroy the State government, have an Executive for life or hereditary, and a proper Senate; and then there would be some consistency in giving full powers to the General Government. But as the States are not to be abolished, he wondered at the attempts that were made to give powers inconsistent with their existence. He warned the convention against pushing the experiment too far. Some people will support a plan of rigorous government at every risk. Others of a more democratic cast will oppose it with equal determination, and a civil war may be produced by the conflict.

Mr. MADISON. As the greatest danger is that of disunion of the States, it is necessary to guard against it by sufficient powers to the common Government; and as the greatest danger to liberty is from large standing armies, it is best to prevent them by an effectual provision for a good militia.

On the question to agree to Mr. Madison's motion, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Georgia—ay, 3; Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina—no, 8.

On the question to agree to the "reserving to the States the appointment of the officers," it was agreed to nem. con.

On the question on the clause "and authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by the United States—

New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina—ay, 7; Delaware, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia—no, 4.

APPENDIX B.

Along with this object I am induced to suggest another, with the national importance and necessity of which I am deeply impressed. I mean some uniform and effective system for the militia of the United States. It is unnecessary to offer arguments in recommendation of a measure on which the honor, safety, and well-being of our country so evidently and so essentially depend.—President Washington's Annual Message, 1789.

Among the many interesting objects which will engage your attention, that of providing for the common defense will meet particular regard. To be prepared for war is one of the most effective means of preserving peace. A free people ought not only to be armed, but disciplined; to which end a uniform and well-digested plan is requisite.—President Washington's Annual Message, 1790.

The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every other nation abounds. There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war.—President Washington's Annual Message, 1793.

It ought not to be forgotten that the militia laws have exhibited such striking defects as could not have been supplied but by the zeal of our citizens. Besides the extraordinary expense and waste, which are not the least of the defects, every appeal to those laws is attended with a doubt of its success.

The devising and establishing of a well-regulated militia would be a genuine source of legislative honor and a perfect title to public gratitude. I therefore entertain a hope that the present session will not pass without carrying to its full energy the power of organizing and disciplining the militia, and thus providing, in the language of the Constitution, for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.—President Washington's Annual Message, 1794.

It will merit inquiry what imperfections in the existing plan further experience may have unfolded. The subject is of so much moment, in my estimation, as to excite a constant solicitude that the consideration of it may be renewed till the greatest attainable perfection shall be accomplished. Time is wearing away some advantages for forwarding the object, while none better deserves the persevering attention of the public councils.—President Washington's Annual Message, 1795.

My solicitude to see the militia of the United States placed on an efficient establishment has been so often and so ardently expressed that I shall but barely recall the subject to your view on the present occasion.—President Washington's Annual Message, 1796.

With the same view, and as a measure which even in a time of universal peace ought not to be neglected, I recommend to your consideration a revision of the laws for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, to render that natural and safe defense of the country efficacious.—President Washington's Annual Message, 1797.

Uncertain as we must ever be of the particular point in our circumference where an enemy may choose to invade us, the only force which can be ready at every point and competent to oppose them is the body of neighboring citizens as formed into a militia. On these collected from the parts most convenient, in numbers proportioned to the invading force, it is best to rely, not only to meet the first attack, but, if it threatens to be permanent, to maintain the defense until regulars may be engaged to relieve them. These considerations render it important that we should at every session continue to amend the defects which from time to time show themselves in the laws for regulating the militia until they are sufficiently perfect; nor should we now or at any time separate until we can say we have done everything for the militia which we could do were an enemy at our door.—President Jefferson, Annual Message, 1801.

Considering that our regular troops are employed for local purposes, and that the militia is our general reliance for great and sudden emergencies, you will doubtless think this institution worthy of a review and give it those improvements of which you find it susceptible.—President Jefferson's Annual Message, 1802.

No circumstance has arisen since your last session which calls for any augmentation of our regular military force. Should any improvement occur in the militia system that will be always seasonable.—President Jefferson's Annual Message, 1804.

In the mean time you will consider whether it would not be expedient, for a state of peace as well as of war, so to organize or class the militia as would enable us, on a sudden emergency, to call for the services of the younger portions, unincumbered with the old and those having families. Upward of three hundred thousand able-bodied men, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-six years, which the last census shows we may count within our limits, will furnish a competent number for offense or defense in any point where these may be wanted, and will give time for raising regular forces after the necessity of them shall become certain, and the reducing to the early period of life all its active service cannot but be desirable to our younger citizens of the present as well as future times, inasmuch as it engages to them in more advanced age a quiet and undisturbed repose in the bosom of their families. I cannot, then, but earnestly recommend to your early consideration the expediency of so modifying our militia system as by a separation of the more active part from that which is less so we may draw from it when necessary an efficient corps fit for real and active service, and to be called to it in regular rotation.—President Jefferson's Annual Message, 1805.

For a people who are free and who mean to remain so, a well-organized and armed militia is their best security. It is therefore incumbent on us, at every meeting, to revise the condition of the militia, and to ask ourselves if it is prepared to repel a powerful enemy at every point of our territories exposed to invasion? Some of the States have paid a laudable attention to this object, but every degree of neglect is to be found among others. Congress alone having the power to produce a uniform state of preparation in this great organ of defense, the interests which they so deeply feel in their own and their country's security, will present this as among the most important objects of their deliberations.—President Jefferson's Annual Message, 1808.

Whatever may be the course of your deliberations on the subject of our military establishments, I should fail in my duty in not recommending to your serious attention the importance of giving to our militia, the great bulwark of our security and resource of our power, an organization the best adapted to eventual situations for which the United States ought to be prepared.—President Madison's Annual Message, 1809.

These preparations for arming the militia having thus far provided for one of the objects contemplated by the power vested in Congress with respect to that great bulwark of the public safety, it is for their consideration whether further provisions are not requisite for the other contemplated objects of organization and discipline. To give to this great mass of physical and moral force the efficiency which it merits and is capable of receiving, it is indispensable that they should be instructed and practiced in the rules by which they are to be governed. Toward an accomplishment of this important work, I recommend for the consideration of Congress the expediency of instituting a system which shall, in the first instance, call into the field at the public expense and for a given time certain portions of the commissioned and non-commissioned officers. The instruction and discipline thus acquired would gradually diffuse through the entire body of the militia that practical knowledge and promptitude for active service, which are the great ends to be pursued.—President Madison's Annual Message, 1810.

The militia being always to be regarded as the great bulwark of defense and security for free States, and the Constitution having wisely committed to the national authority a use of that force as the best provision against an unsafe military establishment as well as a resource peculiarly adapted to a country having the extent and the exposure of the United States I recommend to Congress a revision of the militia laws for the purpose of securing more effectually the services of all detachments called into the employment and placed under the Government of the United States.—President Madison's Annual Message, 1813.

I earnestly renew, at the same time, a recommendation of such changes in the system of the militia as, by classing and disciplining for the most prompt and active service the portions most capable of it, will give to that great resource for the public safety all the requisite energy and efficiency.—President Madison's Annual Message, 1814.

And I cannot press too much on the attention of Congress such a classification and organization of the militia, as will most effectually render it the safeguard of a free State. If experience has shown in the recent splendid achievements of militia the value of this resource for the public defense, it has shown also the importance of that skill in the use of arms, and that familiarity with the essential rules of discipline, which cannot be expected from the regulations now in force. With this subject is intimately connected the necessity of accommodating the laws in every respect to the great object of enabling the political authority of the Union to employ, promptly and effectually, the physical power of the Union, in cases designated by the Constitution.—President Madison's Annual Message, 1815.

As a subject of the highest importance to the national welfare, I must again earnestly recommend to the consideration of Congress a reorganization of the militia on a plan which will form it into classes, according to the periods of life more or less adapted to military services. An efficient militia is authorized and contemplated by the Constitution, and required by the spirit and safety of free government. The present organization of our militia is universally regarded as less efficient than it ought to be made; and no organization can be better calculated to give to it its due force than a classification which will assign the foremost place in the defense of the country to that portion of its citizens, whose activity and animation best enable them to rally to its standard. Besides the consideration, that a time of peace is the time when the change can be made with the most convenience and equity, it will now be aided by the experience of a recent war, in which the militia bore so interesting a part.—President Madison's Annual Message, 1816.

An improvement in the organization and discipline of the militia is one of the great objects which claims the unremitted attention of Congress.—President Monroe's Annual Message, 1817.

I have to add, that, in proportion as our regular force is small, should the instruction and discipline of the militia, the great resource on which we rely, be pushed to the utmost extent that circumstances will admit.—President Monroe's Annual Message, 1822.

As the defense and even the liberties of the country must depend in times of imminent danger on the militia, it is of the highest importance that it be well organized, armed, and disciplined, throughout the Union.—President Monroe's Annual Message, 1823.

But it is obvious that the militia system is imperfect. Much time is lost, much unnecessary expense incurred, and much public property wasted under the present arrangement. Little useful knowledge is gained by the muster and drill as now established, and the whole subject evidently requires a thorough examination. Whether a plan of classification remedying these defects and providing for a system of instruction might not be adopted, is submitted to the consideration of Congress. The Constitution has vested in the General Government an independent authority upon the subject of the militia, which renders its action essential to the establishment or improvement of the system, and I recommend the matter to your consideration, in the conviction that the state of this important arm of the public defense requires your attention.—President Jackson's Annual Message, 1832.

Occurrences to which we as well as all other nations are liable, both in our internal and external relations, point to the necessity of an efficient organization of the militia. I am again induced by the importance of the subject to bring it to your attention. To suppress domestic violence, and to repel foreign invasion, should these calamities overtake us, we must rely, in the first instance, upon the great body of the community whose will has instituted and whose power must support the Government. A large standing military force is not consonant to the spirit of our institutions, nor to the feelings of our countrymen, and the lessons of former days, and those also of our own times, show the danger as well as the enormous expense of these permanent and extensive military organizations. That just medium which avoids an inadequate preparation on one hand, and the danger and expense of a large force on the other, is what our constituents have a right to expect from their Government. This object can be attained only by the maintenance of a small military force, and by such an organization of the physical strength of the country as may bring this power into operation whenever its services are required. A classification of the population offers the most obvious means of effecting this organization. Such a division may be made as will be just to all, by transferring each, at a proper period of life, from one class to another, and by calling first for the services of that class, whether for instruction or action, which from age is qualified for the duty, and may be called to perform it with least injury to themselves or to the public. Should the danger ever become so imminent as to require additional force, the other classes in succession would be ready for the call, and if in addition to this organization voluntary associations were encouraged, and inducements held out for their formation, our militia would be in a state of efficient service. Now, when we are at peace, is the proper time to adjust and establish a practical system. The object is certainly worth the experiment, and worth the expense. No one appreciating the blessings of a republican government can object to his share of the burden which such a plan may impose. Indeed, a moderate portion of the national funds could scarcely be better applied, than in carrying into effect and continuing such an arrangement, and in giving the necessary elementary instruction. We are happily at peace with all the world. A sincere desire to continue so, and a fixed determination to give no just cause of offense to other nations, furnish, unfortunately, no certain grounds of expectation that this relation will be uninterrupted. With this determination to give no offense, is associated a resolution equally decided, tamely to submit to none. The armor and the attitude of defense afford the best security against those collisions which the ambition or interest, or some other passion of nations not more justifiable, is liable to produce. In many countries it is considered unsafe to put arms into the hands of the people, and to instruct them in the elements of military knowledge. That fear can have no place here, when it is recollected that the people are the sovereign power. Our Government was instituted and supported by the ballot, not by the musket. Whatever changes await it, still greater changes must be made in our social institutions, before our political system can yield to physical force. In every respect, therefore, in which I can view this subject, I am impressed with the importance of a prompt and efficient organization of the militia.—President Jackson's Annual Message, 1835.

In this connection it is also proper to remind you that the defects in our present militia system are every day rendered more apparent. The duty of making further provision by law for organizing, arming, and disciplining this arm of defense has been so repeatedly presented to Congress, by myself and my predecessors, that I deem it sufficient on this occasion to refer to the last annual message, and to former Executive communications in which the subject has been discussed.—President Jackson's Annual Message, 1836.

In periods of danger and alarm we must rely principally upon a well-organized militia; and some general arrangement that will render this description of force more efficient has long been a subject of anxious solicitude. It was recommended to the First Congress by General Washington, and has been since frequently brought to your notice, and recently its importance strongly urged by my immediate predecessor. The provision in the Constitution that renders it necessary to adopt a uniform system of organization for the militia throughout the United States presents an insurmountable obstacle to an efficient arrangement by the classification heretofore proposed, and I invite your attention to the plan which will be submitted by the Secretary of War for the organization of volunteer corps and the instruction of militia officers as more simple and practicable, if not equally advantageous, as a general arrangement of the whole militia of the United States.—President Van Buren's Annual Message, 1837.

And, as connecting itself intimately with this subject, I cannot recommend too strongly to your consideration the plan submitted by that officer for the organization of the militia of the United States.—President Van Buren's Annual Message, 1839.

Our chief reliance must be placed on the militia. They constitute the great body of national guards, and, inspired by an ardent love of country, will be found ready at all times and at all seasons to repair with alacrity to its defense. It will be regarded by Congress, I doubt not, at a suitable time as one of its highest duties to attend to their complete organization and discipline.—President Tyler's Annual Message, 1841.

In all cases of emergency the reliance of the country is properly placed in the militia of the several States; and it may well deserve the consideration of Congress, whether a new and more perfect organization might not be introduced, looking mainly to the volunteer companies of the Union for the present and of easy application to the great body of the militia in time of war.—President Tyler's Annual Message, 1843.

APPENDIX C.

Action of State Legislatures. Kentucky—Presented in 1812.

Resolved by the General Assembly for the State of Kentucky. That, * * * experience having shown that the present system has great defects, producing much inconvenience without many of those benefits which a better management would insure; and the Legislature of this State being impressed with a belief that an adequate remedy for the evil rests in the hands of the General Government alone, which has a constitutional power to provide for the organization, arming, and disciplining our national force, this Legislature, in behalf of their constituents, with every deference to the wisdom of those whose power and duty it is to act finally on the subject, will proceed to suggest their ideas on some of the inconveniences which attend the present militia system, together with the mode in which they might be obviated, with a view of their being submitted to the competent authority.

Massachusetts—Presented in 1831.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the Senators of the Commonwealth in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and the Representatives requested, to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law for the more perfect organization of the militia of the several States.

Vermont—Presented in 1832.

Resolved, (the governor and council concurring therein,) That the Senators of this State in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and the Representatives be requested, to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law for the more perfect organization of the militia of the several States.

Connecticut—Presented in 1832.

At a General Assembly of the State of Connecticut holden at Hartford, in said State, on the first Wednesday of May, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one:

Resolved by this Assembly, That the Senators of this State in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and the Representatives requested, to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law for the more perfect organization of the militia of the several States.

Maine—Presented in 1832.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their exertions, both by their votes and their influence, to procure the passage of a law providing for a more perfect and uniform organization of the militia of the several States of the Union, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States.

New Hampshire—Presented in 1833.

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives in General Court convened, That the organization of the militia of the United States, being a matter intrusted by the Constitution to the General Government, requires its attention, and can be only efficiently and satisfactorily done by the Government.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be, and are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their exertions to secure the passage of a law providing for a more perfect and uniform organization of the militia of the several States of the Union.

New York—Presented in 1833.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their exertions to procure such amendments of the act of Congress organizing the militia as shall relieve the people, as far as practicable, from the burden of the system, without impairing its efficiency.

North Carolina—Presented in 1834.

Mr. Graham presented resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, requesting "Congress to adopt the necessary measures to render the militia discipline of the United States less burdensome in its character and more efficient in its organization."

Rhode Island—Presented in 1834.

Mr. Pearce presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, soliciting the passage of a law to provide for a more perfect, uniform, and efficient organization of the militia, and to relieve the people from the burden of the present system.

Indiana—Presented in 1835.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their best exertions to procure the passage of a law, the provisions of which shall limit the enrollment of the militia to the able-bodied, free white male citizens of the United States between the ages of twenty-one and forty years, and provide for the more speedy arming and better disciplining of the militia of the several States by the General Government, with such other provisions as Congress in their wisdom may think proper to adopt in order to render the militia system more efficient and less burdensome.

APPENDIX D.

Extracts from debates in the House of Representatives, in First Congress, 1790.

Mr. FITZSIMONS suggested whether it would be the most eligible mode to subject all the citizens from eighteen to forty-five years of age, without exception, to turn out as soldiers. A much smaller number would, in his opinion, answer all the purposes of a militia. He thought the active militia might be compressed within a much smaller number, to be proportioned to the citizens of each State.

Mr. BOUDINOT said the idea now suggested was in the committee, and they could not agree upon any other mode than that proposed in the bill. He very much disapproved the idea of making a soldier of every man between eighteen and forty-five years of age. There is a manifest impropriety in the measure; and he wished some gentleman would propose an alteration.

Mr. SHERMAN said it appeared to him that by the Constitution the United States were to be put to no expense about the militia, except when called into actual service. The clause is not so explicit as might have been wished.

Mr. VINING said: What is the whole bill but dictating; a law that affects every individual touches the whole community. With respect to the constitutionality of the measure there can be no doubt. Every grant of power to Congress necessarily implies a conveyance of every incidental power requisite to carry the grant into effect.

Mr. BLOODWORTH said that, in his opinion, the House had entered too much into the minutiæ of the business, and in great measure were about depriving the States of the power granted them by the Constitution. The General Government ought only to organize the militia and direct the mode of discipline. The militia, he observed, was only under the direction of the General Government when called out in the actual service of the United States; different States had the appointment of the officers and the right of training them; but owing to the many particulars attended to in the bill, he could see but little room left to the States for the exercise of their power.

Mr. LIVERMORE said: The States have an exclusive right to regulate the times of training the militia; and Congress has no right to say that the citizens shall or shall not be liable to a legal arrest on such occasions.

Mr. BOUDINOT admitted that there was some weight in Mr. Livermore's objections; but at the same time observed that the principle once admitted, that Congress has a power to carry that idea into effect must follow.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, adverting to the Constitution, said that it was plain Congress are to provide for arming and disciplining the militia; but who are the militia? Such men, he presumed, as are declared so to be by the laws of the particular State.

In Second Congress, 1792.

Mr. LIVERMORE made some general remarks on the terms used in the Constitution to designate the power of Congress in respect to the militia. He contended that they were the most vague and indefinite that could possibly have been adopted. It is the militia of the several States that Congress have power to organize, and provide a mode of discipline for. It is not a militia to be formed or created—it already exists. He therefore thought it best to leave it to the respective States to make their own militia laws.

Mr. BARNWELL observed that the consequence of the gentleman's proposition would be a total want of uniformity in the militia, and a clashing from different militia systems. That it was in vain to expect an effective militia, except Congress should exercise the power so expressly delegated to them in this respect.

Mr. BOUDINOT observed that from the experience Congress has had in the preceding sessions of the difficulties attending this subject, he was fully of opinion that a plan of conciliation alone would ever procure a passage through the Legislature for a militia bill. He adverted to the powers of Congress on this subject and to those reserved to the States; to the latter was expressly reserved the power of appointing the officers, and if they refuse to do it, there is no power in Congress to compel them. He therefore accorded with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Sturgis] in opinion, that the law which Congress shall pass must be very simple in its construction, and refer to as few objects as possible.

Mr. HILLHOUSE controverted the sentiments advanced by Mr. Boudinot. He said the natural inference was that Congress possesses no power at all in the case; for if what that gentleman advances is true no provision that Congress can possibly make will be of the least avail. He contended that Congress, by virtue of the powers vested in them, are empowered to organize the militia, to say what descriptions, ages, &c., the militia shall consist of, to form them into companies, corps, regiments, &c., and that when this is done the States are to appoint the officers, for previous to such an organization the States cannot exercise the power of appointing the officers.

Mr. SEDGWICK laid it down as a principle, which he presumed would not be disputed by any one, that a complete and uncontrolled power over the militia was deposited in the national and State governments. The only question was, which was to delegate the distribution of those powers? To the former it was expressly delegated to provide "for the organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia." These words, when applied to the subject, were as full and comprehensive, perhaps, as any in our language. The question before the committee was, could penalties be imposed if they should become necessary to carry into effect those powers? The maxim was undoubtedly true, that when a general power was granted all the usual and known means necessary and proper to carry it into effect were granted also. If, then, the imposition of penalties were the usual and known means to effectuate "the organizing, arming, and disciplining of the militia," it would follow of irresistible consequence that they might be employed for that purpose if not prevented by the powers reserved to the States.

To the States it was reserved to appoint officers, and to train the militia according to the "discipline prescribed by Congress." A reservation controlling a general grant should receive a strict construction. "Training" he believed a word more limited and less comprehensive than "disciplining," which he considered as comprehending all the means necessary to be employed to constitute the character of a soldier. "Training" comprehended only a part of those means. It would to his mind seem absurd, and almost contradictory, that when there was committed to their Government the protection and defense of each individual, and of the whole community, when their Government itself was founded on principles which cherished a militia to the exclusion of a standing force wherever it could be done, when the Government, for those important purposes, was directed to provide for "organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia," it would seem absurd and contradictory to say penalties could not be imposed by law. It would be in the same sentence to grant and to deny; for he would run the hazard to affirm that without penalties no effectual provision could be made for "organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia."

It was not, he believed, difficult to conjecture by what means this distribution of powers between the national and State governments has crept into the Constitution. It would have seemed incongruous to have denied to Congress a complete control over the militia. But having conceded this power in the words which had been so often repeated, a laudable jealousy would naturally have excited an apprehension that at some future time the militia might be neglected to afford a pretense for standing armies. This jealousy could in no other way have been so well quieted as by authorizing the States, who would discern and guard against the intended encroachments by "training" to keep alive the spirit of the militia. On this supposition the constitutional distribution of powers in this instance was consistent, and dictated by rational reflection.

Mr. TRACY read the clause of the Constitution, and said, it was clear that all the power respecting the militia was, by the first part of the sentence, deposited in Congress; but a special reservation was afterward made to the States to appoint officers—this was explicit; and what more was reserved for the States to train the militia pursuant to the discipline prescribed by Congress? This, he said, could give them no power of training, but exact obedience to the rules given them by Congress; that is, Congress will take every necessary step to organize, arm, and discipline the militia, (except officering.)

In ordinary cases a certain specified portion of power was by the Constitution given to Congress, and all not specified was of course reserved by the States; but in this case the tables were turned—all the power was vested in Congress by the first part of the sentence and a specified portion reserved to the States, which ought to be strictly construed so as to give the several States no constructive power to defeat anything Congress should do upon the subject, or prevent uniform and general laws from operating by the interference of local and State regulations.

In Fourth Congress, 1796.

Mr. HENDERSON said it appeared to him that the General Government had no power to call out people to train them for military service; he rather thought it ought to be left with the different States to call out their own citizens for military discipline.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said he believed the Government of the United States had nothing to do with the militia in the several sovereign States. This was his opinion, and it was the opinion of the people at large; however, of nine-tenths of them. The Constitution is express upon this subject; it says that when the militia is called into actual service it shall be under the direction of the General Government, but until that takes place the several States shall have command over their own children—their own families.

Mr. HARPER said: Did gentlemen pretend to say the present system is good? It could not be presumed. We had the evidence of the President of the United States, who has in three several communications made to this House told us it wanted legislative attention. He called for the evidence of every military man in this House and in the United States to prove the truth.

They were told that these volunteer corps have equipped themselves at a very great expense; this he knew, but he rather thought that all who composed the safeguard of our nation should be equipped at the national expense. At present, the defense of the nation fell upon a few who were more rich or more patriotic than others.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said a well-regulated militia must be acknowledged as the best support in a free republic, and as every man must be interested in carrying into effect such a system, it became us to pay every possible attention to this very important subject. He thought the present system very exceptionable.

In Tenth Congress, 1808.

Mr. M. CLAY said he would endeavor to bring forward the best testimony that could be had to prove that the present system was defective, and he hoped he should be able to do it. I will commence with the adoption of the Constitution under which we are now acting. We find that President Washington always kept this subject in the view of the National Legislature. This shows that there was something in his opinion to do; it was not his business to tell us what it was, but ours to find out. If gentlemen will take up the presidential communications from the commencement of the Government, they will find that the subject has been uniformly recommended by each successive President of the United States to the present time. I state this as a strong evidence that in their opinion a change was wanting somewhere. Next to this I will call your attention to the communications made from the State executives to their Legislatures. We find also that the State Legislatures almost every year and in every session have had the subject under their consideration, and turned it over one way or the other. This proves that there is in their opinion some defect. We must now remedy that defect if we can; it behooves us to do so; and if I shall be fortunate enough to point out the propriety and mode of making this alteration, I shall have done my duty. We will go further back than the adoption of the Constitution; we do not recollect the whole body of the militia ever to have been brought into action to such effect as our strength of numbers would have warranted, if the militia had been properly organized; there was a defect somewhere, which should be remedied without going either to one extreme or another.

In Twelfth Congress, 1812.

Mr. TALMADGE said: It appears that all the military force of our country is divided into classes, the Army and the militia; the former is exclusively under the control of the General Government, and the latter is the great military bulwark of the States respectively. So cautious were the sages who framed the Constitution of the peculiar and appropriate rights of the States, that they have given to the President of the United States no control over the militia only when called out by authority of the Government, and for the three express purposes defined in the Constitution. These and these only, I contend, form the grounds or reasons on which the service of the militia may be required by the General Government.

With this plain exposition of the Constitution, I will pass on to the second proposition, and inquire how far the powers vested in the General Government have been carried into execution. After various attempts had been made, and elaborate systems had been proposed and rejected, on the 8th day of May, 1792, Congress passed a law "more effectually to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States."

By a careful examination of this law it will be perceived that in all its provisions the constitutional limits have not been transcended, but that the prominent features of this law consist of provisions to enroll or embody, to arm and accouter, to arrange and organize, to officer under State authorities, and to discipline or train the militia according to the system provided by Congress. It is not unworthy of remark that by the provisions of this law it was made the duty of the militia to arm and clothe themselves at their own expense, and the quality and description of their arms were particularly designated.

On the 2d of March, 1803, another law was passed, supplementary to the foregoing, in which additional duties were required of the Adjutant-General. A quartermaster's department was established, and every militiaman enjoined to be completely furnished with arms, accouterments, and ammunition, agreeably to the requisitions of the aforesaid act.

On the 22d of April, 1808, an additional law was enacted, authorizing an annual appropriation of $200,000 to purchase arms and military equipments, which were to be distributed to the several States and Territories, in proportion to their effective militia, under such rules and regulations as the Legislatures should respectively prescribe by law. From the most careful examination I have been able to give this subject, I believe the foregoing laws comprehend all the regulations which have been made relative to the militia of the several States and Territories. Other laws have been passed relating to drafts from the militia which have no bearing upon this question.

Mr. RHEA said: By the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution power is given to Congress "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia." The words expressing the delegated power are not "to organize, arm, and discipline the militia." Had these active words been used, the power given would have been immediate and direct; Congress then would, in a consolidating point of view, have been the sole agent. But this power was guarded against, and the words "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia" were used—words which do evidently relate to an agent other than Congress.

We contend that the militia are regulated by the laws of the respective States, excepting the mere rules of discipline, which Congress may prescribe for that part of the militia that may be employed in the service of the United States. Here it appears that although the first part of the clause gives power to Congress to provide for disciplining the militia, that part is limited and explained by the latter part of the clause, by which authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress is reserved to the States. The power, then, to provide for disciplining the militia given to Congress means no more than to prescribe the discipline, and to the States respectively is reserved the power of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

In Fifteenth Congress, 1819.

Mr. SIMKINS said: There is one feature in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Basset) which I would wish to see introduced, if it can be constitutionally done, into the bill now before the House. It is that part which contemplates the encampment, disciplining, and training of a certain class of the militia for a certain number of days in each year, and at the expense of the United States. It is denied by some that the Constitution gives this power. Although I am unskilled in construing this instrument, yet I can hardly believe that the Constitution which gives us the power of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and governing them while in the United States service, could have been intended to deprive us of the power, a concurrent power with the States, so do discipline or train them as to make them fit for duty. However, without entering minutely into the constitutional question, I conjure Congress to go as far toward the great object proposed as may be clearly consistent with the Constitution. If we cannot make a system, even approaching to perfection, let us do all we can. Let us not legislate upon many other things, and leave untouched our greatest duty. Let us not follow the shadow, utterly disregardful of the substance.

In Seventeenth Congress, 1823.

Mr. CANNON said: It was a subject that heretofore has not been thought unworthy of the attention of the greatest and most distinguished statesmen of our country. It had been pressed with great zeal and ability on the attention of the First Congress of the United States, by him who had passed through the difficulties and encountered the dangers of the Revolution; who had powerfully aided in the establishment of our independence; who was called to the highest office in the gift of the people, and who has been justly indeed called the Father of his Country. It was Washington, who in the early period of our Government thought this a subject of the highest importance. He felt and expressed to Congress during his administration a constant solicitude to see the militia of the United States placed on an efficient establishment, as did also Mr. Jefferson during his administration. He repeatedly urged on the consideration of Congress the improvement of this great force, and expressed his reliance on them for national defense; and Mr. Madison throughout the whole of his administration had also urged upon the consideration of Congress, with great force and unexampled zeal, the necessity of arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia; and after the close of the late war, with all the experience it had afforded, he expressed his entire confidence in this great means of national defense for the preservation of the principles of our Constitution.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Ohio, said to him it appeared very extraordinary to discover so great an indifference to a subject apparently so interesting and important. Every argument which could be adduced in support of a standing army in time of peace would apply with equal force to promote the discipline of the militia of the country. Yet, he said, gentlemen became extremely alarmed at the idea of appropriating $500,000 toward disciplining the militia of the United States. For his part he would as readily appropriate a portion of the funds of this Government to that object as he would for the Army, the Navy, or fortifications.

In Twenty-fourth Congress, 1836.

Mr. GILLETT said: This act was passed when our population was limited in number and at a time when the Indians were hanging upon our extensive frontier with hostile feelings. The country has undergone a change; but no corresponding change has been made in our law regulating the subject, although it has long been desired, and without it the system must sink. It now receives, for the want of proper legislative attention, much of public contempt.

The Constitution of the United States, in prescribing the duties of the President, says:

"He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient."

Under the direction given in this clause of the Constitution, the subject of the more efficient and proper organization of the militia has been recommended by the different Presidents, in all thirty-two different times, commencing with General Washington's inaugural address.

The present organization was adapted to the times at which it was produced. The number of persons liable to perform duty under it at that time cannot now be ascertained; but judging from the amount of population then and now, it may be fairly estimated at about two hundred and fifty thousand. This militia force was then considered amply sufficient to protect our extended and varied frontiers under the most adverse circumstances. The country has changed; but there is no modification of the system.

If these words do not authorize the Government to expend money, then he would inquire by what authority does Congress purchase and distribute books of instruction for militia officers, and upon what authority rests the act of the 23d of April, 1808, appropriating $200,000 annually for the purpose of "providing arms and military equipments for the whole body of the militia?"

In Thirty-sixth Congress, 1860.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM said: Mr. Speaker, it stands a part, though a forgotten part of the Constitution of the United States that "a well-regulated militia is necessary to the security of a free State."

We have in these respects virtually abdicated our power over the subject. Sir, I do not ask or expect Congress to take action in either of these particulars. The States themselves have been compelled by your negligence to provide for them by their own legislation; and it is better, perhaps, that the subject should remain where it now is, in their hands, Congress having so totally abandoned all attention to it that the very title "militia" has disappeared for years from the index to your Statutes at Large. Indeed, if any one will venture now to introduce the subject here, or speak the name, constitutional as it is, he is in great danger of being made the object of ridicule by valiant gentlemen inside of this House and out of it, who, but for "vile guns and villainous saltpeter," would have been soldiers themselves.

But some of the States have introduced the system which they are slowly perfecting; and within the past eight years Great Britain has followed their example, of volunteers, enlisted of their own accord, for a term of years. These, sir, will, in time, become the national guard of America. They are deserving of the utmost encouragement. But it is not right that Congress should abdicate its entire power, or rather its entire duty, in regard to this subject. It is not just that the States which already have been compelled by your negligence to take upon themselves the burden of organizing and disciplining the militia, and the heavy cost attending it, should be required also to provide arms out of their own treasuries. It is still more grossly unjust to demand that the individual volunteers, who are always young men, and usually workingmen of limited means, and who incur large expense in procuring uniforms, as also loss of wages and of time while upon duty, should furnish arms and equipments for themselves.

Sir, Congress has been utterly derelict in its duty and in every particular in regard to the militia; and by your neglect you have forced the States to organize and discipline, and now at last to appropriate money out of their own treasuries for the purchase of arms.

APPENDIX E.

Extracts from the annual report of the Secretary of War, 1826.

If there be any one maxim in our political creed which challenges universal approbation, it is that a well-organized militia is the natural depository of our protection against foreign invasion or intestine violence. This maxim has been consecrated by the bill of rights of all the States; and yet the opinion is universal that the present organization is both defective and onerous.

Important changes in the present system are indispensable to make the militia any way equal to the standard assigned it by the wishes of the patriot. To the end that every source from which information might be collected should be approached, I addressed a circular letter to the governor of every State and Territory, and to many citizens distinguished alike by their intelligence and experience, asking for information upon this interesting subject. By so doing I hoped to become possessed of the information which might lead to a result that would reconcile as far as practicable the various circumstances, moral and physical, belonging to so extensive a field, and thereby conciliate the public sentiment to such changes as the wisdom of Congress might think proper to adopt. Communications in reply to this letter have been received, some of which shed much light on this difficult, delicate, and highly national object. These communications were laid before the board, who, uniting their own experience and intelligence with the information thus imparted, it was hoped might find itself in a condition to point out the defects of the existing system, and the probable remedies.

They were directed to report to me the result of their reflections, which they accordingly did; and their report, marked "I," with the answers to my letters, is herewith submitted. The systems of tactics for cavalry, and of instruction for artillery, have been digested, and are in the hands of a copyist, and will be communicated in a few days.

JAMES BARBOUR.

Extracts from the circular letter of the Secretary of War, July 11, 1826.

SIR: Among the political maxims which the experience of the people of the United States has adopted as unquestionable, there is no one more universally subscribed to than that a well-organized and well-disciplined militia is the natural defense of a free people. Uniting most sincerely, in common with my fellow-citizens, in this opinion, I am anxious to see a system adopted by the National Legislature which will realize the hopes of us all in reference to this great arm of national defense.

By a resolution of Congress at their last session, I am enjoined to cause to be prepared a complete system of cavalry tactics, and also a system of exercise and instruction of field artillery, including maneuvers for light or horse artillery for the use of the militia of the United States, to be reported for consideration or adoption by Congress at its next session.

The wisdom of this measure is made manifest by the objects, which are twofold: First, the establishment of the best system, and secondly, that it shall be uniform. The importance of the last is scarcely inferior to the first, for who can well appreciate the inconveniences resulting from different systems in the same army, the militia differing among themselves as also with the regular Army, with which they may be called to act. And yet it is, I believe, too true that but little uniformity prevails. If practicable, this defect must be removed.

I am duly sensible how difficult it is to establish a uniform system. The difference of condition, physical and moral, in the different States, and the preferences which each has for that which from time they have been accustomed to, present serious obstacles to a homogeneous system throughout all the States, yet I would fain hope not insurmountable.

All our national institutions and much of our legislation are founded in that mutual spirit of deference and forbearance which has so signally distinguished the people of these States, and therefore one may indulge the hope that in an object of such vital importance as a well-regulated militia minor objections will be sacrificed to the attainment of so great a good.

To enable me to execute the duty assigned me by Congress it is most desirable that I should acquire all the information within my reach.

Although the training of the militia is confided to the States, it is important that their regulations in this particular should be known at this Department, and it will be attended with good effects that the system of each should be known by all the States.

JAMES BARBOUR.

Extracts from replies to the circular letter of the Secretary of War in 1826.

I think the volunteer militia most efficient.—Richard Harwood, adjutant-general of Maryland.

The volunteer militia is composed of better men, commanded by officers better qualified to command, and on all occasions when calls upon the militia for active service have been made were found to be the most prompt in turning out and the most efficient in the field. I would therefore suggest the propriety of organizing the volunteer militia into a separate corps, forming no connection with the regular militia.

It is conceived hardly practicable to hold the militia in any permanent organization of importance to the country without the aid of funds judiciously directed. The fallacy of relying on the States for the voluntary application of their pecuniary means to this object has been too clearly shown from the experience of the past to be looked to in future as a source of dependence. The States entertaining and acting upon different views in relation to this subject, growing no doubt out of a difference in situation and circumstances, will in effect be productive of results equally different. While some may be liberal, others will be sparing, and probably a greater number will afford no support at all. Consequently the degrees of discipline of their respective militia will be found as various as their means of support. As the militia compose a part of the force to be employed in the general defense of the country, it would seem expedient that the General Government who direct their operations in war should in peace dispense the means necessary for their preparation, affording to all equal advantages, that when called into the same service the militia of one State might not be degraded by the superiority of another nor the discipline embarrassed in their operations by the want of it in others.—Beverly Daniels, adjutant-general of North Carolina.

In devising a system for "organizing, arming, disciplining the militia" it is necessary, in my opinion, to establish definite ideas of what is intended or desired from a militia system and to consider how far changes can be introduced without impairing the energy which now exists on the one hand or converting the militia into a regular army on the other, requiring a great expenditure for its support.—Oliver Wolcott, governor of Connecticut.

I have no hesitation in saying that the volunteer corps are much the most efficient. In point of discipline many of them are but little inferior to regular troops; in the event of a call for their services they would be more prompt in turning out than the regular militia, and at once ready for the field, whereas it would take some time to collect and organize a detachment of militia.—Gerard C. Brandon, governor of Mississippi.

As to the question whether regular or volunteer militia are most efficient, it is one on which a diversity of opinion prevails. As a means of defense, volunteer corps claim some advantage, but at the same time they are not devoid of inconvenience. They are generally uniformed and somewhat better disciplined than regular militia, and of course would be more efficient than an equal number of the latter. Yet it appears to me that it would be an assumption to lay it down as a principle that they are more efficient than the regular militia. Their association being voluntary, cannot be relied on for permanency; their strength and character are liable to frequent changes; they may even dissolve themselves at the time of utmost need. Being generally favored by certain privileges and exemptions, they sometimes arrogate to themselves immunities which tend to prejudice the service, and the invidious superiority which they are apt to claim over the regular militia may have the effect to alienate others from the ready performance of ordinary militia duty.—H. Johnson, governor of Louisiana.

It must be very gratifying to every citizen of our country to observe that Congress is directing its attention to the improvement of our military institutions. Upon a well-organized and well-disciplined militia we must chiefly depend for the defense of our rights and the preservation of our liberties, and I think it will scarcely be doubted that "the militia may be trained to a degree of energy equal to every military exigency of the United States." To Congress is delegated the power of organizing and disciplining the militia, and it is very desirable that in exercising the constitutional power a system should be adopted which shall be uniform, suited to the genius of our Government, and yet efficient enough to bring into full exercise, when required, their great arm of national defense. It will doubtless at first be difficult to mature a system which is uniform, and yet which can at once be carried into full operation in all the States, but not so much so as it was to apply the principles of the Federal Government to the confederacy of States. In the latter case, the differences of condition, both physical and moral, in the different States are prejudices in favor of long-established usages and customs, though, urged by an active and persevering opposition, did not present an insurmountable obstacle, nor prevent the adoption of an entire new system of government. Even as the limits of our jurisdiction become more extended, and embrace a greater scope of local differences and prejudices, the easier it seems to be to apply the principles of our Constitution to the well-being of the States, each of which, new as well as old, without surrendering any of the rights incident to the State sovereignties, cheerfully submits to all the regulations of the General Government; and in the formation of their own constitutions, and in the enactment of many of their laws are guided by the general principles of the Federal Constitution, and accommodate themselves to the laws enacted by Congress under the provisions of that instrument. Somewhat like this I hope may be the effect of a system established for the organization, training, and disciplining our militia. So long as Government maintains an army, perhaps no better basis for system of organization and discipline for the militia, which is intended to be uniform, can be adopted than those general principles which are found to be most conducive to the efficiency and discipline of the regular troops. This system is kept in constant exercise, although to a limited extent in time of peace; and the general policy of the establishment, as well as the drill and discipline of the troops, are constantly presented to the citizen soldiers as examples for imitation.—Joseph Sewall, judge advocate fourth division Maine militia.

The volunteer militia are generally the most efficient. Some of the corps are scientifically trained by frequent drillings, and are always fitted for immediate service; and the rest of them may be considered so, under proper instruction, in a few weeks. I have never seen in the common militia of any of the States in time of peace any evidences of fit training for efficient service.

In case of war it will seldom be necessary to resort to the drafted militia, as volunteers will generally be formed ready for any service that may be required, and new corps will be rendered after a few weeks' training nearly as good as the old.

I consider the attempts usually made to train the common militia by calling them together on one or two days in the year as worse than useless.—T. Cadwalader, major-general First Div. Penna. Militia.

A militia system is desirable in the United States, not for the purpose of encouraging a martial spirit in time of peace, but to provide means of necessary defense in the event of war. Arrangements are therefore to be made which will not materially interfere with the pacific policy of the Republic, and yet will so adapt its resources to its possible necessities, that they may afford the most effectual aid in time of need.—J. R. Ingersoll.

In reference to your third query, there cannot be a doubt that while the gratification of novelty has its influence, the volunteer corps will be better armed, equipped, and more frequently trained than the ordinary militia; and if this initial spirit could be kept in activity under one system of instruction, aided by a desire to improve that will here and there be found in every corps, volunteers would be the best means of assembling and training the citizens of the country.

I will close these remarks by alluding to some further causes which have retarded improvement in the organization of the militia, and suggest some means of melioration. The formation and training of our militia was based upon a monarchical system, and it cannot therefore be surprising that such an organization should be adopted by men who were born and educated under a monarchy; nor is it a cause of wonder that the sons should follow the traditionary ideas of their fathers on a subject which had been but imperfectly treated.—J. G. Swift.

When the militia law of 1792 was passed, which required all the able-bodied free white male citizens, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, to be enrolled, our independence as a nation had but lately been acknowledged and our constitution of government just established; the British held military posts within our limits on the western frontiers, the Spanish possessed Louisiana and the Floridas on the southern, and commanded the keys of the Mississippi; the Indians were powerful and hostile on our northwestern borders; the stability of our forms of government and civil institutions were threatened by rebellious subjects at home, and our strength and resources as a nation were unknown to the European powers. We were without a navy and fortifications, and the Army even was insufficient for the protection of the Indian frontiers.

Under these circumstances, the provisions for the enrollment of almost the whole of the able-bodied population of the country was justifiable and necessary for our security. But so entirely different is now our condition that one-half of the present numbers, if properly drilled, is fully sufficient to meet any emergencies which may be expected to arise. If it should, however, at any time, be found otherwise, Congress can as easily provide for additional enrollments for the militia as it can for the raising additional regiments for the Army.—William H. Sumner.

The opinion that a well-organized and a well-disciplined militia is the natural defense of a free people is entitled to the character given to it by the Secretary, that of a "maxim," but surely the "experience" of the people of the United States will not authorize the conclusion, because a "well-disciplined militia," comprehending the entire mass of able-bodied men, never had, and, I do not hesitate to say, never will have, an existence in our country. Whoever reads General Washington's official letters to Congress in the first years of the revolutionary war, will see that a reliance on the militia and the short enlistment of regulars brought our officers to the brink of ruin. But it will be said that the militia was not then "well disciplined." True; and I repeat that it never will be, and while the system shall embrace the whole body, I add, that it never can be well disciplined.

In our large cities and towns there are already select corps of militia, well trained and fit for service. In the largest cities these corps are regiments and battalions, and in others companies. In every State in the Union such corps should be formed, proportioned to their population; and the entire amount of these corps should be equal to three or four times the number composing the standing Army. At present they consist of volunteers, but they are volunteers partly because young men seem to have a natural fondness of military exercises, but chiefly, I am inclined to think, because they prefer incurring those expenses of time and money to training in the common militia. If, therefore, the worse than useless project of training the whole body of the militia be abandoned, some encouragement will be requisite to induce even young men to engage for only two years in such select corps. Their arms should be furnished from the public arsenals, and a fixed sum allowed for procuring neat uniforms to sit easy upon them, and not daubed with gold or silver lace, or plumed with feathers two feet high.—Timothy Pickering.

Extracts from the report of the board of officers, convened by the Secretary of War in 1826, to consider the defects of the militia system.

The primary defect of the militia system at this time, it is believed, will be found in the excess in numbers which the law proposes to hold to service, an objection that did not apply to the period of 1792, the date of the still existing law on this subject. In 1792 it might well have been supposed necessary to enroll and organize into corps of militia all the able-bodied white male citizens of the United States, (certain classes and persons excepted,) between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years; but in the thirty-four years which have since elapsed, our general population, and consequently the male citizens between those ages, have been trebled, while, it is believed, the dangers of foreign aggression are now much diminished. The other occasions under the Constitution, namely, resistance to the laws and insurrections, to meet which the militia were also intended, are supposed not more likely to occur in future than might have been apprehended in 1792; and yet at that period a third of the present militia force (and about three-fourths of the male citizens then capable of bearing arms) was supposed amply sufficient for all the purposes within the contemplation of the Constitution.

It would seem, therefore, from the foregoing views that the United States now hold to a nominal service a growing militia force already considerably larger than any probable, it may almost be said possible, emergency would require.

It is generally acknowledged that the defects of the present system of organization of our militia render its service precarious, insufficient for the defense of the country, and very expensive and inconvenient to the mass of our citizens, as well as to the Government. This fact is confirmed by the testimony of Washington, and all our experience during the two great wars in which the Republic has been engaged. But this important subject involves so many political and constitutional considerations that a new system can only be the result of long experience and repeated trials, and when completed, it is to the wisdom of the people and of its proper organs, the Senate and Congress of the United States and Legislatures of the several States whose respective rights and independence are so deeply concerned, that it must finally be referred. All that we can do, and that our duty as American citizens and soldiers seems to require of us, is to investigate the most prominent defects of the actual one, and suggest such remedies as, in our private opinions, appear not to interfere with those rights either of States or citizens. The most prominent defects of our militia are the want of uniformity in their organization and system of instruction. We believe that on these points the necessity of a reform is so generally felt, there would be no objection, first to a law, by which its companies, battalions, and squadrons, in every State should be formed on the same model as those of the United States Army, with whom they must so frequently co-operate; second to the adoption in every State of uniform courses of instruction for the elementary training of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, and their maneuvers and service in the field, (shorter and more simple but based on the same principles as those of that Army.)

The only part of our militia whose services can be relied on at present are those volunteer companies who arm, equip, and train themselves, and over whose organization, regulations, and instructions the Government has little control and no inspection.

We believe that the mass of its artillery and cavalry now consists of such companies, and however meritorious their zeal, it is highly desirable that they should be organized on a more permanent and regular footing, so as to give to the Executive at all times some certain information of the means of defense really existing in the country, a greater dependence on their support, and the means of organizing them when required.

It is recommended that there be enrolled and organized in each State, from the whole mass of able-bodied white male citizens resident therein who are or shall be above the age of twenty-one years, and always taking the youngest above that age, at the rate of one brigade of militia, organized as herein proposed, for every member of the House of Representatives of the United States to which the State may be entitled.

For the instruction of officers, it is recommended that each State appoint as many camps of instruction as there may be divisions of militia organized in the State; or if there be no divisions in the State, then a camp for its brigade.

At such periods as the respective States may appoint, it is recommended that all the officers of each division, or, in a State that has no division, all the officers of the brigade, surgeons and assistant surgeons in both cases excepted, be assembled at the camp appointed, as above, and there be held assembled and encamped ten successive days in each year, under the immediate command of the senior officer actually present of the division or brigade. The military instruction, both theoretical and practical, to be conducted at each camp by a competent instructor, under the superintendence and direction of the commanding officer of the camp; the practical part at a rate of not less than six hours a day for the ten days' encampment, and in order the better to introduce uniformity of practice under the systems of instruction which may have been established by Congress for the different arms, as cavalry, artillery, and infantry, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, on applications made by the executives of the several States, to provide competent instructors, and as far as practicable by selections from the officers of the Army or graduates of the United States Military Academy: Provided, That the number of instructors so detailed or employed by the Secretary of War shall not exceed one for each camp of instruction, as above.

It is recommended that there be allowed and paid by the United States to each officer who shall be encamped, as above, —— per day for each day that he may be encamped, not exceeding ten in the same year, and to each officer at the rate of —— cents per mile for every mile he may necessarily travel once from his home to his camp and once back in the same year.

We believe that such a system would be neither impracticable nor irreconcilable with our existing social and constitutional institutions, provided the following rocks and shoals were avoided in framing it: First. It should give no new or extraordinary power to the General Government. Second. It should not interfere with the present rights and privileges of the States and people. Third. The mode of raising and training the militia, and the service to which it is destined, should interfere as little as possible with the private avocations of the mass of our citizens, and require as little as possible of their time, consistently with giving it any efficiency. Fourth. And in framing it, we should remember that its real force, as well as that of any military body, consists not so much in its numbers as in its good organization, activity, and readiness to take the field, and especially in the qualifications of its officers.

But to give that active readiness to our militia and afford the Government the facility of claiming its services without any great sacrifice of private interest, it is evident that it should be divided into two great classes—the active and secondary; the former selected in the number required by our wants among the young and unmarried, and organized for ready service in the field into corps of infantry, cavalry, and artillery in every State, (this class only should be subject to the calls of Government;) the latter comprising the mass of the settled population, elderly men and fathers of families, who should never be summoned to arms, but at the call of their own State authorities, and in the defense of their own homes, neighborhood, families, and property in case of actual invasion.

We are aware that every proposal of this nature (though several of our ablest statesmen have advocated it) has been met by charges of laying the foundations of a system of conscription and attempting to enlarge the powers of the General Government at the expense of those of the States and privileges of the people. But by a due adherence to the rules just laid down we hope to demonstrate that all the advantages of this new system may be procured without giving any new powers to the Government, without infringing on a single right of State or citizen, and so as to render the service of the militia much lighter, as well as more effective, instead of making it weigh heavier upon them. It is true that its establishment will require a perfect understanding, correspondence, and concert between the General and State governments, but we trust that on a subject of such national and vital importance those authorities, both elected by the people for the general benefit, would find no difficulty in coming to a compromise.

In concluding these observations on the most prominent defects of our present militia and the best mode in which they may be remedied, the improvements which we suggest amount to—first, adopting for it a uniform system of instruction; second, organizing all its corps on the model of the regular Army; third, dividing them into active and sedentary, the former composed of the unmarried youths, and obliged to serve six or eight years, (remaining alone subject to the calls of Government;) fourth, forming its artillery and cavalry of volunteer companies; fifth, dividing and organizing it into divisions, brigades, and regiments by military districts, according to the system of defense of the country, leaving to the General Government the power of fixing the quota of each district and to the States that of raising and officering them; sixth, subjecting these officers to pass through every grade and submit to the examination of competent boards before they can be promoted; seventh, organizing a regular staff in each district, and obliging it to report to the General Government, and to that of their own States, the numbers, discipline, and armament of its active militia; eighth, declaring it in permanent service in time of war, and allowing of no term of duty shorter than a campaign.

We pretend not by these alterations to create a new and complete system; we are aware that many points relative to their discipline and service in peace and war will remain to be settled, and can only recommend as a general rule that all regulations on these subjects be framed as closely as possible on the model of those of the United States Army. But we trust and believe that their result will be to render our militia more competent to every purpose of national defense than it can be in its present state. We would thus enter on a career of improvement, and time and experience would soon bring the whole system to as much perfection as is attainable by any militia force whose civil and domestic avocations must ever prevent it from applying all their time and attention to military objects.

WINFIELD SCOTT,
Major-General and President of the Board.
T. CADWALADER,
Major-General First Division Pennsylvania Militia.
WM. H. SUMNER,
Adjutant-General of Massachusetts.
BEVERLY DANIELS,
Adjutant-General of North Carolina.
ABRAHAM EUSTIS,
Lieutenant-Colonel Fourth Artillery.
Z. TAYLOR,
Lieutenant-Colonel United States Army.
E. CUTTER,
Lieutenant-Colonel Third Infantry.
CHAS. J. NOURSE,
United States Army.

APPENDIX F.

Outline of principal plans proposed from 1790 to 1880 for organization of militia.

Plan proposed by Secretary of War Knox, 1790.—To enroll all able-bodied citizens between the ages of eighteen and sixty and divide them into three classes, the advanced corps to include those between eighteen and twenty-one years of age, the main corps those between twenty-one and forty-five years of age, and the reserve corps those between forty-five and sixty years of age.

The advanced corps to be armed, equipped, and uniformed at expense of the United States, and to serve thirty days in each year in camps of instruction. The United States to supply camp equipage and subsistence.

The main corps to be required to drill four days in each year.

Existing law, passed in 1792.—Every able-bodied citizen between eighteen and forty-five years of age to be enrolled in the militia and to provide themselves with arms, ammunition, and knapsacks.

Plan proposed by committee of House of Representatives in 1795.—To enroll all able-bodied citizens between twenty and forty years of age, and divide them into two classes, the select corps to include those between twenty and twenty-five years of age, the reserve corps those between twenty-five and forty years of age.

The select corps to be furnished with arms, equipments, and uniforms at expense of the United States, and required to serve in camps of instruction annually.

Plan proposed by Secretary of War Graham in 1816.—To enroll all able-bodied citizens between eighteen and forty-five years of age, and divide them into three classes, the minor class to include those between eighteen and twenty-one years of age; the junior class those between twenty-one and thirty-one years of age; the senior class those between thirty-one and forty-five years of age.

The minor and junior class to serve in camps of instruction each year, and be furnished with camp equipage and subsistence by the United States.

Plan proposed by General Harrison from committee of the House of Representatives, in 1817.—To enroll all able-bodied citizens between eighteen and forty-five years of age, and divide them into three classes. The minor class to include those between eighteen and twenty-one years of age; the junior class those between twenty-one and thirty-one years of age; the senior class between thirty-one and forty-five years of age.

Officers and sergeants to assemble annually in camps of instruction, during which time to be paid by the United States one-half the rate of pay allowed in active service, and to be furnished with camp equipages and subsistence.

Plan proposed by board of officers in 1826.—To enroll as many brigades of militia in each State as the State has Representatives in Congress. The enrollment to begin with persons twenty-one years of age and continue upward until number required be enrolled.

Officers to be assembled in camp of instruction ten days in each year, and to receive pay and mileage from the United States.

Officers of the Army to be detailed as instructors, and the office of adjutant-general of the militia to be created.

Plan proposed by committee of the House of Representatives in 1830.—To enroll all able-bodied citizens between twenty-one and forty years of age and divide them into two classes. The junior class to include those between twenty-one and thirty years of age, the senior class those between thirty and forty years of age.

Officers and sergeants to assemble in camps of instruction annually and to receive pay and mileage from the United States.

To create office of superintendent of militia affairs.

Plan proposed by Secretary of War Poinsett in 1840.—To enroll all able-bodied citizens between twenty-one and forty-five years of age.

An active militia to be formed of a fixed quota from each State, and in case quota of any State is not filled by volunteers the deficiency to be made up by draft on enrolled militia.

Term of service in the active militia to be four years, one-fourth going out of service annually and their places to be filled by volunteers or conscripts.

The reserve militia to consist of the graduates from the active militia, who are to serve four years in it and thereafter be exempt from military duty.

The President to call the active militia into the service of the United States each year and put them into camps of instruction subject to same regulations and entitled to same pay, rations, and clothing, as militia in active service.

The office of adjutant-general of the militia to be created.

Plan proposed by committee of the Senate in 1866.—To enroll all able-bodied citizens between twenty and forty years of age and divide them into two classes, the active militia and the inactive militia.

The active militia to be formed by volunteers and to consist of as many regiments in each State as number of Representatives to which State is entitled in Congress. To be furnished with arms, equipments, tents, and camp equipage, and be paid by the United States $2 for each day's attendance on drills.

A bureau of militia to be attached to the War Department.

Plan proposed by committee of House of Representatives in 1866.—To enroll all able-bodied citizens between eighteen and forty-five years of age and divide them into two classes, the active militia and the inactive militia.

The active militia to consist of one regiment to every two Representatives to which State is entitled in Congress, and the minimum number of men in each regiment to be constantly maintained either by volunteers or by conscription. To be furnished with arms, equipments, tents, and camp equipage, and be paid by the United States $2 for each day's attendance on drills.

A bureau of militia to be attached to the War Department.

Plan proposed by committee of the House of Representatives in 1880.—To enroll all able-bodied citizens between eighteen and forty-five years of age and divide them into two classes, the active militia and the inactive militia.

The active militia to consist of the volunteer militia already organized or that may hereafter be organized under the laws of the respective States.

The United States to furnish arms, equipments, camp equipage, and a service uniform to the active militia, to an amount not exceeding in any one State for seven hundred men to each Representative the State is allowed in Congress, and on condition that the State provides for and requires its active militia to serve in camps of instruction five days in each year, and to drill at least once in each month, and also provides and requires a rifle-range for the use of its militia.

APPENDIX G.

Extract from report of committee of House of Representatives, second session, Twentieth Congress, (1829.)

To carry into successful effect the grant of constitutional power which authorizes Congress to provide for disciplining the militia, the committee propose to hold out inducements to the several States and Territories of the Union to authorize and require by legislative enactments of the Legislatures of the States and Territories, respectively, an annual convocation of commissioned and non-commissioned officers and musicians, to be encamped in their respective States and Territories a specified length of time, for the purpose of being trained by proper instructors, with a view to prepare them to impart military knowledge and instruction to the militia under their command, when training them under the direction of the Legislatures of their respective States and Territories.

Uniformity of practice and of action among the several corps of which an army is formed, so universally acknowledged by military men to be essential to effective military operations, can be attained alone by a strict observance and diligent practice of the same system of tactics. The committee are therefore of opinion that in all militia exercises and trainings an implicit observance and practice of the system of tactics prescribed by Congress for the use of the militia of the United States should be imperatively required. In the course of experiments made upon the interesting and important subject submitted for the consideration of this committee a disastrous and withering parsimony seems to have characterized the action of the National Legislature.

Extracts from a letter from General E. P. Gains, 1829.

The many valuable officers and soldiers that have at different times made their way through volunteer companies and battalions to stations of great utility and distinction in the public service during the revolutionary and late war demonstrate the propriety of some permanent and encouraging provision being made by law for this description of force. Every volunteer company, found upon inspection well instructed in the various duties of the arm which it may have chosen, should receive the inspector-general's certificate to that effect, and thereupon be entitled to a complete suit of uniform clothing, with such small-arms and equipments from the United States as may be suited to the arm of service to which such company may belong.

In rendering my testimony in favor of this description of force, I take this occasion to repeat what I have more than once stated, that some of the most efficient companies and battalions and one of the best instructed brigades I have seen in service during the late war consisted of volunteers.

The number of men to be instructed in the manner which I have suggested should be sufficient when in co-operation with the regular Army to meet and check the first onset of an invading foe, for much must always depend on the enemy's first reception. If checked, he often receives a panic which will enfeeble him while it redoubles our strength and enterprise.

But to the statesman who may view the expense as an insuperable objection, let me submit an inquiry to which the public records at Washington must render a conclusive solution: What was the actual expense of the late war on land prior to the 1st of May, 1814? What part of this expense is justly attributed to our want of preparation and instruction? A moiety, at least, to that expense must, I apprehend, be the melancholy answer.

EDMUND P. GAINS,
Brevet Major-General United States Army.

Extracts from the annual report of the Secretary of War in 1835.

The defective organization of the militia is universally acknowledged. But little practical utility results from the administration of the present system, and if this great element of national defense is worth preservation and improvement, it is time the whole subject should be examined, and that a plan suited to the exigencies of the country should be adopted. I am unwilling to believe that there are such inherent difficulties in this subject as to render it impracticable, or even very difficult, to organize this great force, so peculiarly adapted to our institutions, and in such a manner as to render it active and efficient in those junctures when the country may be called on to exert its powers. I presume few would be found to advocate the maintenance of a standing military force adequate to all the purposes of peace and war. When, therefore, these exigencies arise, from which no nation can expect exemption, and which call for an extension of our physical means, we must resort to an increase of the Army to the embodying of the militia. It is obvious, from the extent of the country, that we can never keep at all the exposed points such a permanent force as circumstances may occasionally require. The natural, and in fact the necessary, dependence must be upon the militia; and if it be unorganized, we shall be found without the means to repel a foreign enemy or to repress internal disturbances, should these evils occur. To depend upon organizing a system when the exigency arises is to reject all the lessons of experience and to procrastinate for examination what should then be the subject of action. Besides, a permanent plan of organization should be devised in a time of leisure and peace, so that it may be introduced and thoroughly known before the force provided by it is required to be exerted. It should as much as possible be ingrafted upon the habits of the country, and become a part of our institutions. The basis of an efficient organization of the militia must be a selection, for instruction and service, of that part of the population best qualified for these duties.

Nearly fifty years have elapsed since the adoption of the present Constitution. During all that time no essential change has been made in our militia system, and it has gradually declined in utility and efficiency and in public confidence, and there is reason to fear its entire abandonment unless it undergoes important modifications. In this long interval the value of the system seems to have been appreciated by all the Presidents of the United States, as well as those who, from the habits of their lives, could best estimate its value by their personal observation, as by those whose opinions may have been well formed from the course of events having relation to this matter; and in their annual communications, commencing with the inaugural address of General Washington, this subject has been continually pressed upon the attention of Congress. For the purpose of showing its importance in the opinion of these eminent citizens, I have caused their communications to be examined, and find that the subject has been presented to the Legislature and the nation no less than thirty-one times in their official recommendations. I indulge the hope that the present state of public affairs may lead to a re-examination of the system and such changes as may render it permanently useful.

LEWIS CASS.

Extracts from a letter of the Secretary of War, 1840.

Satisfied that an efficient force cannot be created by drilling the officers alone, as well as of the impracticability of rendering the whole mass of the militia available at the same time for the defense of the country; and convinced, from the experience of our past wars, that it is necessary to organize and discipline a select body of citizen-soldiers who, in a moment of danger, will know their stations and their duties when assembled there, I have prepared the plan, the details of which are herewith submitted, agreeably to the resolution of the House.

J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War.

Extracts from the report of Colonel Roberts to the Secretary of War on the reorganization of the militia of the United States, communicated to first session Thirty-sixth Congress, 1860.

The framers of the Constitution were not men who used unmeaning words, and when they spoke in the name of the people of the United States and said, in order to provide for the common defense and to promote the general welfare, "we ordain and establish this Constitution," they gave significance and point to the language: "The Congress shall have power to organize and discipline the militia." It would be unjust to those men to impute weakness to their plan, or its failure to their want of wisdom and foresight. They invested Congress with potential powers to construct a model militia complete, to secure the States against factions and the country against dangers from abroad. They could do no more. The model army of the world can be created under the plan as devised by these men. It admits of a system unenfeebled by division, by requiring it to be uniform in all the States, and of power to protect them against "domestic violence and invasion," and so "armed, organized, and disciplined as to provide for the common defense and general welfare." The history of this country the past three-fourths of a century, in which the militia has contributed the smallest differential of its progress, prosperity, or glory in arms, is conclusive that Congress has not rightly interpreted its obligation to the militia and has failed to construct this arm as devised by the wisdom of our fathers and planned by that convention that framed the Republic. It is not an exaggeration to repeat here that the existing militia laws of Congress are obsolete in idea and inoperative in reality.

New laws and a new organization are, then, a present necessity. The progress of the country and the world's progression, that have brought danger close to our doors and remote powers to the nearness of neighbors, swell the magnitude of this necessity and the imminency of the danger.

My plan is, that Congress shall divide the militia of the States into two classes—the voluntary and the involuntary.

B. T. ROBERTS,
Brevet Lieut. Col. U. S. Army.

Funding Bill—Veto of the President.

SPEECH OF HON. E. G. LAPHAM,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, March 3, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt, and the veto message of the President.

Mr. LAPHAM said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I propose at this time to offer a few remarks in relation to the bill to facilitate the refunding of the national debt, and the message of the President returning it to this House with his objections to its becoming a law.

The bill as first reported by the Committee on Ways and Means was as follows:

A bill to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all existing provisions of law authorizing the refunding of the national debt shall apply to any bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum which may hereafter become redeemable: Provided, That in lieu of the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the acts amendatory thereto, and the certificates authorized by the act of February 26, 1879, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt," the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds in the amount of not exceeding $500,000,000, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, redeemable, at the pleasure of the United States, after twenty years, and payable forty years from the date of issue, and also notes in the amount of $200,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, redeemable, at the pleasure of the United States, after two years, and payable in ten years from the date of issue; but not more than $40,000,000 of said notes shall be redeemed in any one fiscal year, and the particular notes to be redeemed from time to time shall be determined by lot, under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe. The bonds and notes shall be, in all other respects, of like character and subject to the same provisions as the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and acts amendatory thereto: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize an increase of the public debt.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in the process of refunding the national debt, to exchange, at not less than par, any of the bonds or notes herein authorized for any of the bonds of the United States outstanding and uncalled bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum; and on the bonds so redeemed the Secretary of the Treasury may allow to the holders the difference between the interest on such bonds from the date of exchange to the time of their maturity, and the interest for a like period on the bonds or notes issued; but none of the provisions of this act shall apply to the redemption or exchange of any of the bonds issued to the Pacific railway companies; and the bonds so received and exchanged in pursuance of the provisions of this act shall be canceled and destroyed.

SEC. 3. Authority to issue bonds and notes to the amount necessary to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby granted.

SEC. 4. The act approved February 26, 1879, authorizing the issue of certificates of deposit is hereby amended so as to continue and limit the amount of certificates to be issued to $50,000,000 to be outstanding at any one time, and fixing the rate of interest to be allowed thereon at 3½ per cent. per annum for one year, after which interest shall cease; and the said certificates shall be convertible, at the option of the holders, when presented in sums of $50 or multiples thereof, into the coupon or registered bonds authorized by this act; and whenever any of the said certificates shall be converted into bonds, the same shall be canceled and destroyed; but the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, issue new certificates in place of those so converted up to the limit of $50,000,000 until the aggregate amount of the bonds authorized by this act and of the said certificates combined then outstanding shall equal the amount of bonds hereby authorized. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to form combinations by which to procure said certificates of deposit authorized under this act, for purposes of sale to others, or for acting as agents of others; and any person so offending shall be liable, on conviction, to be fined $1,000 or imprisoned not to exceed one year. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make suitable regulations in compliance with this act, providing that the expense for the disposing of the certificates and bonds authorized to be issued shall not exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent.: Provided, That said certificates shall not be sold or converted at less than par.

SEC. 5. From and after the 1st day of July, 1880, the 3½ per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation.

SEC. 6. That this act shall be known as "the funding act of 1880;" and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

If the committee reporting it had been content to ask and advocate its passage as thus proposed, I do not believe it would have encountered any serious opposition. It was not a question calculated to excite partisan feelings or prejudices. All, or nearly all, the members of this House admit the policy and necessity of proper legislation to provide for funding that portion of the public debt which is to mature during the current year, at the option of the Government, and all agree that it can and ought to be funded at a much lower rate of interest than its bears at present. In view of the successful negotiation of the 4 per cent. obligations already provided for, it was reasonable to suppose that a still lower rate would yet enable the Government to negotiate bonds and certificates at par, and the rate of 3½ per cent. was regarded as a safe one to adopt in order to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to displace the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds soon to mature. In regard to the four percents it should not be forgotten that they were placed on the market at a period of inactivity and commercial depression; when capital was lying idle, watching and waiting for safe and permanent investment. Yet it required great effort and the aid of syndicates to successfully negotiate the 4 per cent. loan. With the complete revival of business and confidence consequent on the resumption of specie payments, and the active demand for capital in business transactions, a loan of 3½ per cent. could hardly be expected to meet with much more favor than that with which the four percents were received.

The committee, however, have chosen to change their recommendation from 3½ to 3 per cent., and thereupon the opponents of national banks on this floor have "let slip the dogs of war" until by one amendment after another the original proposal can hardly be recognized by its early advocates. The title should now be, "A bill to compel national banks to go into liquidation." The contest at last has ripened into one of almost strict partisanship. My late honorable colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, near the close of the debate, in eloquent and fervent words, almost yielded to the efforts made by others to stir up strife between the people and the national banks.

Mr. Speaker, there was a period when he and I were colaborers in a struggle between the people on the one hand and a great moneyed corporation on the other. It was the contest in respect to the recharter of the Bank of the United States, a single corporation with a central board of directors having the whole control of the currency of the country. It had invaded the domain of politics. It had undertaken to make and unmake Presidents. It had sought to break down and to build up administrations. It had allied itself to a great political party. To accomplish these ends it could expand or contract its circulation at pleasure. To borrow the language of Colonel Benton, who was the opponent of such a bank and the champion of the people, "all depended upon the will of the supreme central directory who, sitting on their tripods and waving their tridents over the moneyed ocean, could raise and depress the golden waves at pleasure." In another period of the debate, Mr. Benton said:

> The bank is in the field, a combatant, and a fearful and tremendous one, in the presidential election. If she succeeds there is an end of American liberty, an end of the Republic. The forms of election may be permitted for a while. The president of the bank and the President of the United States will be cousins in the royal sense of the word. They will elect each other. They will elect their successors.

In that struggle the antagonism between the bank and the people was a natural and inevitable one. There is no occasion for such strife now. The present system of national banks, while giving all the facilities claimed for the bills of the Bank of the United States—a currency which circulates freely and at par everywhere—obviates all the objections made against the existence of that institution.

The system is free to all. It is not a central, or northern, or southern, or eastern, or western system; it is everywhere. Capitalists, business men, men of all shades of politics and men of no politics are interested in such banks. The opponents of the republican party in the late contest placed in nomination for the Vice-Presidency a gentleman largely interested in such a bank, and it is contrary to good "English" for them to be dealing in anathemas against the system at this time. This measure for refunding the national debt, like that for the resumption of specie payments, seems to have encountered all the obstacles which the democratic party could place in its pathway. Each alike have been encumbered with every provision which ingenuity could suggest to thwart and strangle the peaceable and successful operation of the measure. All good men, it seems to me, must regret the measure has encountered these obstacles.

If the bill as first proposed had been adhered to, it would have passed both Houses without a struggle. The process of refunding would have been easy. The obligations would have been floated without the aid of syndicates, and not a ripple upon the surface would have been caused by the transition from a higher to a lower rate of interest on the obligations of the Government. As it is, our commercial calm has been for a time broken; confidence in the stability of our financial system was seriously shaken; some of the national banks were, as they thought, compelled in self-defense to retire portions of their circulation, and if the bill had become a law no imagination is fertile enough to calculate or fully conceive the evil consequences which must have followed.

The veto of the President presented the objections to this partisan measure so cogently and clearly that its advocates did not deem it discreet to apply to it the test provided by the Constitution, and it lies upon the table by an almost strict party vote never to be acted on again.

If by this failure to pass a fair and proper funding bill ten or twelve millions of dollars shall be lost to the Government and people, at whose door will the fault be laid? There can be but one answer to this question. The party which from its entrance into this House in a majority in the Forty-fourth Congress to the present time has, by pretenses of economy and a saving of taxation to the people, crippled every branch of the public service, refused adequate appropriations for needed objects, and at times neglected or refused to make any appropriation for carrying on the ordinary operations of the Government, will be held responsible for the failure.

The people of this country are not to be blinded to the true character of the shams by which such neglect and refusal are sought to be covered from their sight. Already the leading and national organ of the democracy in this city (the Post) has pronounced its judgment upon such practices in much better language than any I could employ. I quote from its leaded editorial:

> This journal believes in economy. It is opposed to waste and extravagance, and desires careful use of public funds. But we do not hold that true economy consists in cutting down expenditures and keeping them down, regardless of every other consideration. Economy and stinginess are not synonymous terms. A miserly saving of public or private funds may be the worst extravagance.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, we are nearing a period when better counsels will prevail, when a judicious funding bill can and will be enacted into a law, when all necessary appropriations will be promptly made for the purposes provided by law and when no one will longer boast that he has helped to "starve the Government" while the Treasury is groaning under the load of accumulated millions lying unused in its vaults.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN G. CARLISLE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 1, 1881.

The House having under consideration the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt—

Mr. CARLISLE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The fifth section of this bill has been so much misconstrued or so much misrepresented in various parts of the country that I consider it my duty, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, to say something in explanation of its provisions. It is not my purpose to enter upon an argument in support of the section except so far as the argument may be necessary to explain the principles upon which it was framed, and to state fully its purpose and effect. It contains four separate and distinct provisions, all relating, however, to the same general subject, and all calculated, in my opinion, to aid materially in the successful inauguration and maintenance of the financial policy advocated by those of us who believe that the outstanding 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of the United States should be funded at the minimum rate of interest paid by other first-class nations, and that the national banks should be required to assist in accomplishing this result. In the first place, it provides, as amended in the Senate, that from and after the 1st day of July next the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the bill, and no others, shall be receivable as security for the circulating notes of the national banks and as security for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with such banks.

This is certainly a very plain and simple provision, and it seems to me that it requires much more ingenuity to pervert its true meaning than it does to ascertain it; and yet for a while a persistent attempt was made to convince the public that if this provision should be adopted all national banks having 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds on deposit to secure their circulation and public deposits would be compelled after the date named to withdraw them and substitute bonds bearing 3 per cent. or go into liquidation. It is almost impossible to make an argument against such a construction as this; nor is it necessary to attempt it, as it is now conceded, I believe, everywhere that there was not a shadow of foundation for it. It was one of the devices adopted by interested parties to alarm the banks and to precipitate a resort by them to the exercise of that dangerous power of contraction conferred upon them by the act of 1874; and in connection with other statements equally groundless it actually produced a rapid withdrawal of circulation, which for a few days threatened disaster and ruin to all the business interests of the people.

Sir, this is not the first effort that has been made in Congress to compel these creatures and agencies of the Government to assist it in reducing the interest charge upon the people, and if it shall fail now it will not be the first demonstration of their power over the financial legislation of the country. It is a humiliating confession for the representatives of the people to make, but it is true nevertheless, that ten years ago, when these institutions were fewer in number than they are to-day, when their organization was less perfect and when their combined capital was not so great, they had power enough to defeat in this House a provision which was designed by the present Secretary of the Treasury to compel them to aid in funding a large part of the public debt at 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. On the 2d day of February, 1870, Mr. Sherman, as chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate, reported back to that body, as a substitute for a bill previously introduced by Mr. Sumner, a bill which after some amendments was finally passed and is now known as the funding act of July 14, 1870. The bill as reported by Mr. Sherman provided for the issue and sale of $400,000,000 of bonds bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent., $400,000,000 bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent., and $400,000,000 bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent.; and in order to create a certain market for a large part of these securities it contained in its eighth section the following provisions, which I beg leave to submit for the consideration of gentlemen who have denounced what they have been pleased to call the "forced loan" feature in the measure now before us. The eighth section of Mr. Sherman's bill was as follows:

And be it further enacted, That on and after the 1st day of October, 1870, registered bonds of any denomination not less than $1,000, issued under the provisions of this act, and no other, shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for notes issued to national-banking associations for circulation under an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864; and all national-banking associations organized under said act, or any amendment thereof, are hereby required to deposit bonds issued by this act, as security for their circulating notes, within one year from the passage of this act, in default of which their right to issue notes for circulation shall be forfeited; and the Treasurer and the Comptroller of the Currency shall be authorized and required to take such measures as may be necessary to call in and destroy their outstanding circulation, and to return the bonds held as security therefor to the association by which they were deposited in sums of not less than $1,000: Provided, That any such association now in existence may, upon giving thirty days' notice to the Comptroller of the Currency, by resolution of its board of directors, deposit legal-tender notes with the Treasurer of the United States to the amount of its outstanding circulation and take up the bonds pledged for its redemption: And provided further, That no more than one-third of the bonds deposited by any bank as such security shall be of either of the classes of bonds hereby authorized on which the maximum rate of interest is fixed at 4½ or 5 per cent. per annum.

The next section provided that the circulating notes which any banking association might receive from the Comptroller of the Currency should not exceed 80 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited instead of 90 per cent., as they may now obtain under the law.

It will be observed that the section just read is much more severe in its requirements than anything contained in this bill. It proposed to compel national banks not only to deposit the new bonds and no others as security for circulation after a certain date, but it went further and declared that their right to issue notes for circulation should be absolutely forfeited unless they should within one year withdraw all the old bonds they then had on deposit and substitute the new ones in their places. This was a sweeping and radical provision, which went to the full extent of asserting the absolute power of Congress to legislate according to its own conception of the public interests concerning the character of the bonds that should be deposited or permitted to remain on deposit as security for the circulating notes of these corporations. That such power exists in Congress has been asserted again and again by some of the most eminent men in the country, and by none more frequently or emphatically than Mr. Sherman himself. On the 28th day of February, 1870, he made a speech in support of the substitute reported by him, in the course of which he said:

Mr. President, the three remaining sections of this bill apply to the national banks. That is much too great a theme for me to enter upon at this stage of the debate; but I will explain in a very few words the theory of those sections. The national banks are mere creatures of law. They hold their existence at the pleasure of Congress. We may to-morrow, if it promotes the public interests, withdraw their authority. The franchise has been valuable to them. We think it right they should aid us in funding the public debt. They hold of our securities $346,000,000. Nearly all of these bear 6 per cent. interest in coin. We will not deprive them of any of them; we will not take from them the property they enjoy; we will not deny them even the payment of 6 per cent. gold interest as long as they are the owners of these bonds. But they hold the franchise of issuing paper money guaranteed by the United States, and which constitutes the circulation of our country; and we say that, enjoying this franchise, we now stipulate with them for the reduction of interest on the bonds they hold. The provisions of this bill are not arbitrary; they are not harsh; they do not take from the national banks any right which they enjoy except one confessedly at our pleasure. If they are not content to enjoy their franchise on the terms proposed they can retire.

As to new banks which may be organized under the free-banking section, it is easier for them to engage in banking under this bill than under the old law, because they can go to the Treasury and buy bonds at par in currency and upon these receive circulating notes, and a corresponding amount of legal tenders is then canceled. The new banks may issue in circulating notes four-fifths of the amount of their bonds under the terms and conditions of the banking act, while if they are now required to go into the money market to buy bonds with which to start new banks they would be compelled to pay a premium of from 10 to 20 per cent. for the existing bonds, and then could only issue 90 per cent. of the amount of the principal of the bonds.

Afterward a motion was made to strike out the eighth section of the bill, and the question was presented directly to the Senate, disconnected from all other issues involved, whether it would or would not require the banks to take the bonds or forfeit their right to issue notes, and on that proposition the vote was as follows:

YEAS—16.

Anthony,	Conkling,	Howard,	Pomeroy,
Brownlow,	Corbett,	Howe,	Ramsey,
Buckingham,	Ferry,	McDonald,	Scott,
Cameron,	Hamlin,	Morrill of Vt.,	Wilson.

NAYS—32.

Bayard,	Harlan,	Pratt,	Sumner,
Boreman,	Harris,	Revels,	Thayer,
Casserly,	Howell,	Rice,	Thurman,
Chandler,	Johnson,	Ross,	Tipton,
Cole,	Kellogg,	Schurz,	Trumbull,
Drake,	McCreery,	Sherman,	Warner,
Fowler,	Osborn,	Stewart,	Willey,
Gilbert,	Pool,	Stockton,	Williams.

The section was thus retained in the bill by a vote of 32 against 16, and it so remained until the bill was passed in that body by the following vote:

YEAS—33.

Anthony,	Harlan,	Pratt,	Sumner,
Chandler,	Harris,	Ramsey,	Thayer,
Cole,	Howard,	Revels,	Tipton,
Conkling,	Howell,	Rice,	Warner,
Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Sawyer,	Williams,
Fenton,	Morrill of Vt.,	Schurz,	Wilson.
Ferry,	Morton,	Scott,
Fowler,	Osborn,	Sherman,
Gilbert,	Pomeroy,	Stewart,

NAYS—10.

Bayard,	Casserly,	McDonald,	Thurman.
Boreman,	Corbett,	McCreery,
Buckingham,	Sprague,	Stockton,

On the 10th day of March, 1870, while the motion to strike out the compulsory section was pending and under discussion, Mr. Sherman said:

What do we give them in exchange? We give them upon purchasing these bonds the right to issue four-fifths of them in money, and we give them the monopoly of that right. We are about to withdraw from circulation the greenbacks of the country. We are about to retire and cancel our notes by the provisions of this act. We are about to give them the monopoly of the circulation of this country, the sole and exclusive privilege of issuing paper money. We have destroyed the State banks. And now what do we require in return? That they shall join us in reducing the burdens of the public debt; that they shall bear some little of their share of the loss of income which every holder of the public securities must suffer.

Sir, national banks would be very unwise indeed to make issue on this question. If any man here is a friend of the national-bank system, I can claim to be. I was here at its cradle, introduced the original banking bill and advocated it, and also introduced the amendment to it, conducted it, and saw it passed. But if I believed now that the banks of the United States were unwilling to aid us in reducing the rate of interest on the public debt to the extent of the limited sacrifices they are called upon by this bill to make, I should certainly change very much my opinion of them and of the whole system. I do not believe there is any practical difficulty in the way. Nor do they lose by it if five percents are worth par in gold. What do they lose by taking one-third of these bonds at 5 per cent., another third at 4½ per cent., and another third at 4 per cent.? They possibly lose one-half of 1 per cent. of the interest on the bonds; that is all. But before this scheme can succeed at all it must be on the basis that 5 per cent. bonds are worth at least par in gold. We require them, when we surrender to them the privilege of issuing all the paper money of this country, to reduce the rate of interest on their bonds one-half of 1 per cent. on the average. Is that a hardship? I think not.

In the course of the same discussion, Mr. Chandler, of Michigan, said:

No one denies that Congress has the right to alter, amend, or repeal, if it sees fit, the general banking law. Under that proviso, we may say to the national banks, "You must deposit 4 per cent. bonds, and we will issue circulation upon none others;" and here permit me to say that I am in favor of making the provision absolutely compulsory that no circulating notes shall be issued except upon 4 per cent. bonds. The banks receive a valuable franchise—I am talking as a banker, for I have been one for a great many years—the banks have a valuable franchise, for which they can afford to pay, and for which they should be compelled to pay; and 2 per cent. is not too much to make them pay for that franchise. Hence I am in favor of making it compulsory upon all national banks in the United States to deposit 4 per cent. bonds, and none others, for the circulating notes; but I do not propose to go with my friend from Massachusetts and repudiate to compel them to do that thing.

To this Mr. Sumner responded, and stated his method of compelling the banks to take the new bonds, and the House will see that it was, if possible, more severe than that proposed by Mr. Sherman and the Finance Committee. He said:

I am very glad that my friend from Michigan and myself concur so completely in the object to be sought. It is to compel the banks to deposit bonds at a low rate of interest. That is what we both desire. Now, the Senator has one way of arriving at this result, and I another. The way proposed in the bill originally introduced by me is as follows: "And if any national bank shall not furnish to the Treasurer of the United States the new bonds as required by this act within three months after having been notified by the Secretary of the Treasury of his readiness to deliver such bonds"—mark, they have three months' notice; is not this enough? three months within which to make the change—"it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, so long as such delinquency exists, to retain from the interest as it may become due and payable, on the bonds belonging to such delinquent banks on deposit with him as security for circulating notes, so much of such interest as shall be in excess of 4 per cent. per annum on the amount of such bonds, which excess shall be placed to the credit of the sinking fund of the United States; and all claims thereto on the part of the delinquent banks shall cease and determine on that date."

The object of this proposition is precisely the object declared by my friend, the Senator from Michigan, who has such experience as a banker. I am glad that he unites with me on this occasion

Mr. CHANDLER. I do heartily.

Mr. SUMNER. So much the better. Now, I am perfectly willing to accept his way or mode of doing it. I care not how it is done, provided it is done. I offered what seemed to me a prudent, expedient, and just mode; and, though my friend has used a very hard term with regard to it, he will permit me to say that I do think my proposition, notwithstanding all he has said and the hard name he has employed, is certainly as good as his. It is one way of reaching what we both desire, and there is no more repudiation in one than in the other. Do you ask how it is justified? Obviously, plainly; the original bank act reserves to Congress plenary power to amend, to change, to modify the system in any respect, even to terminating the bank; and here is complete jurisdiction over the agencies of the bank, and especially over those bonds which are lodged in the Treasury as security for the bank. On this ground I place the proposition which I have made; it is the same ground, as I understand it, on which the Senator from Ohio places the equivalent proposition which he has reported from his committee. If one is repudiation, then is the other repudiation. But I insist that neither is repudiation. Each in its way is an expedient, a device, or, adopting terms well known in the law, the "means" for reaching a certain end.

These extracts are sufficient to show that the policy indicated in the first clause of the fifth section of the pending bill is not now presented to the country for the first time, and that the right and duty of Congress to adopt it when in its judgment the interests of the Government and people require it have been asserted and maintained, not only by men of eminent ability as lawyers and large experience in financial affairs, but by a majority of two to one in the Senate when the very first attempt was made to fund our enormous public debt at a reduced rate of interest. It was then insisted—and properly insisted in my opinion—that those institutions which, in the language of Mr. Sherman, had, prior to 1870, "made on the average from 15 to 20 per cent. annually upon the franchise derived from the United States," should be required to contribute their just proportion to the general welfare by receiving and using as a basis for their circulation public securities bearing at least as low a rate of interest as the Government proposed to allow the savings-banks and the trustees and guardians of dependent widows and orphans throughout the country. But, sir, the national banks resisted the reasonable demands of the Government then as they are resisting them now, and the result was that the eighth section of Mr. Sherman's bill was defeated in this House. A committee of conference was appointed, and in lieu of that section it reported the following:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the Treasurer of the United States shall receive no other than registered bonds issued under the provisions of this act as security for the circulating notes of national-banking associations issued under the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, or any act supplementary or amendatory thereof.

This report was signed by Hon. Robert C. Schenck and Hon. Samuel Hooper on the part of the House, and by Hon. John Sherman, Hon. Charles Sumner, and Hon. Garrett Davis on the part of the Senate. The section in this form—requiring the banks to deposit the new bonds from and after the passage of the act, and not giving them time, as the fifth section of this bill does—received the votes of eighty-eight members of this House, and among them were the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] and two gentlemen from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY and Mr. O'NEILL,] all of whom are still members of this body, and all of whom, except one, [Mr. KELLEY,] are now opposing this feature of the bill. The conference report, however, was not agreed to here, and the Senate was compelled at last to recede from its position and allow the bill to become a law without the eighth section or any equivalent provision. When this result became inevitable, by reason of the active and determined opposition of the national banks, Mr. Sherman, who had been from the beginning an earnest and consistent advocate of the justice and policy of the compulsory clause, announced the fact to the Senate in a speech which I commend to the serious consideration of gentlemen who are opposing this clause of the fifth section. After stating that there was "a very unreasonable and unnecessary clamor raised by the banks against that provision," he said:

I wish now to record my deliberate judgment that in this conclusion to which we have been compelled to arrive by the action of the House we are doing the national banks a great injury, which will impair their influence and power among the people, and that the opposition of the national banks to this provision which would have required them to aid in the funding of the public debt will tend more to weaken and destroy them than anything that has transpired since their organization. I do not see how we can go before the people of the United States and ask them to lend us gold at par for our bonds, when we refuse to require agencies of our own creation to take them; when we even refuse to require new banks not yet organized to take these new bonds, and when we refuse to require old banks, which have made on the average from 15 to 20 per cent. annually upon the franchise derived from the United States, to aid us to this extent in funding the national debt.

But, sir, the vote of the House shows the power of the national banks. It is so great, at least in the House, that in order to secure a funding bill we have been compelled to abandon all provisions in regard to the national banks; but I give notice that in the future I for one shall be prepared at all times to require the national banks to take that class of bonds which we propose in this bill, and I have no doubt this will be the result. But for the present, in deference to the wishes of the House, we have withdrawn the section in regard to national banks.

Now, sir, for the second time since the organization of these institutions the representatives of the people find themselves compelled in the discharge of their public duties to encounter the almost united opposition of more than two thousand corporations of their own creation—opposition to a financial policy already approved by both branches of the legislative department—and thus we are again confronted with the naked question whether Congress or the banks shall finally determine what that policy shall be. What was the primary purpose of the Government in establishing this system in the first instance? If any gentleman entertains a doubt upon this subject, let him read the reports in which Mr. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury, suggested and recommended the passage of the original national-bank act, and he will be convinced that the principal purpose of that eminent financier was to create a certain demand and reliable market for Government securities. Considered with reference to that purpose, it was unquestionably a wise stroke of financial policy, and it justly won for its author the highest encomiums from ministers of finance in all parts of the world. In fact the constitutional power of Congress to create these corporations cannot be maintained except upon the ground that they were to constitute, when organized, agencies of the Government for certain public purposes.

Since the celebrated judgment of Chief-Justice Marshall in the case of the United States Bank, no one has ventured to affirm that Congress possesses power under the Constitution to create corporations for the transaction of purely private business or for the sole benefit of private individuals. In order to come within the scope of congressional power they must be created as means or instrumentalities for the execution of some principal power delegated by the Constitution. They must be public agencies and not mere private associations. The language of the court in the case alluded to is so clear and comprehensive that it is impossible to mistake its meaning. It defines with the utmost precision the foundation and extent of the power in question, and in so doing necessarily excludes from its operation all cases not coming within the terms of the definition itself. The court said:

The power of creating a corporation, though appertaining to sovereignty, is not like the power of making war, or levying taxes, or of regulating commerce, a great substantive and independent power, which cannot be implied as incidental to other powers or used as a means of executing them. It is never the end for which other powers are exercised, but a means by which other objects are accomplished. * * * The power of creating a corporation is never used for its own sake but for the purpose of effecting something else. No sufficient reason is, therefore, perceived why it may not pass as incidental to those powers which are expressly given, if it be a direct mode of executing them.

And again the court said:

We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

In another place the court, speaking of this same power, said:

Had it been intended to grant this power as one which would be distinct and independent, to be exercised in any case whatever, it would have found a place among the enumerated powers of the Government. But being considered merely as a means to be employed only for the purpose of carrying into execution the given powers, there could be no motive for particularly mentioning it.

Congress did not create these banking associations, or have the power to create them, merely for the private emolument of their stockholders, but it established them as agencies of the Government to cooperate with it and assist it in conducting its financial operations. Whatever private gain or profit may accrue to those who see proper to engage in the business of banking under the system is incidental only to the main purpose of the law; or, in other words, the prospect of such gain was the inducement which public policy indicated should be offered in order to make the experiment a success and secure a market for the Government loans.

Having the express power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, it might well be argued that a national-banking system could be created under the authority of congressional legislation as a necessary and proper means to accomplish that object; but this obviously implies that there must be absolute and continued governmental control over the means employed, for otherwise the instrument would become the master, or at least independent of the authority for whose use it was created. If, therefore, there had been no express reservation of the right to alter, amend, or repeal the national-banking law, such right would have necessarily resulted from the nature and objects of the legislation. Its existence would have been just as clear in such a case as in the case of a public office created by statute for the more convenient or effective execution of a State or Federal power. There is no difference in this respect between a public agency and a public office.

There are no elements of a contract in such legislation, and therefore the extent to which the Government will or ought to go in the exercise of its power of supervision and control is always a question of policy and not a question of power. Now, however, we are told, in effect, that the Government ought no longer to use the national banks for one of the purposes, the principal purpose, of their creation; that to require them to deposit 3 per cent. bonds, after a certain date, to secure the circulating notes which the United States furnishes and guarantees would be an act of bad faith; and that it would so diminish the profits realized upon their circulation as to compel them to withdraw it, and thus inflict great injury upon the country by a contraction of the currency. It has not been very long since the policy of contraction was a favorite one with some who now protest most strongly against it, but having pursued it until it nearly crushed the life out of every legitimate industry in the land, they appear at last to confess, in an indirect way, that it was a mistake. I agree with them that a large contraction of the currency, especially if it be sudden and unexpected, amounts to a public calamity, and I shall endeavor before concluding to show that one of the main purposes of the fifth section of this bill is to make such contraction impossible in the future.

I will not discuss the question of good faith with the banks or their advocates; it is not involved in this proposed legislation, and cannot be introduced in the debate except upon the utterly inadmissible theory that the Government and people of the United States are bound by some sort of compact to furnish these institutions as long as they exist with bonds bearing the same rate of interest as those now outstanding. They now hold and have on deposit $206,486,050 in bonds bearing interest at the rate of 5 and 6 per cent. and by the express terms of the laws under which they were created the Government has a right to redeem and cancel every one of them at the end of the current fiscal year. It has an undoubted right to redeem and destroy them without issuing any bonds whatever to take their places, and it would not be an act of bad faith to do so. But it has not the means to do this, and, therefore, it proposes to issue and sell bonds bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and with the proceeds of these sales it proposes to pay the $206,486,050 held by the banks as well as the $465,000,000 held by other people. If this can be accomplished—and many of the best business men and ablest financiers in the country believe it can be—there will be an annual saving to the people of more than $14,000,000 in interest on the public debt, to say nothing of the reduction which would almost certainly take place in the commercial rate of interest all over the country. If anybody has a right to complain of the funding of the public debt at 3 per cent.—which I deny—it is certainly not the banks who want to issue circulation upon the bonds, but the widows and orphans and other beneficiaries of trust estates whose entire income consists of the interest received upon the securities in which the principal is required to be invested.

When a private individual, not engaged in the business of banking, purchases, either for himself or as guardian, executor or trustee, 3 per cent. United States bonds to the amount of $100,000, the whole annual income derived from them is $3,000; but if a national bank purchases the same amount and description of bonds, and deposits them with the Treasurer as a basis for its circulation, it receives the same amount, $3,000, annually as interest on the bonds, and besides the Government immediately returns to it $90,000 of guaranteed notes, of which $85,500 can be loaned out to the people for its own exclusive benefit at such rates of interest as it will command in the market. It is thus enabled to receive out of the public Treasury $3,000 annually as interest on its bonds, and if the commercial rate of interest be 6 per cent. it receives an additional $5,130 as interest on the $85,500 loaned out. From this last amount, however, there should be deducted the sum of $900, being the 1 per cent. tax on circulation, and $81, the estimated average annual amount of redemption expenses, so that the bank in fact receives the net sum of $7,149 annually, as against $3,000 received by the private individual on precisely the same investment.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us inquire briefly whether any injustice will be done to the national banks, or any hardship will be imposed upon them, by the provision in the fifth section that after July next none but the 3 per cent. bonds shall be receivable as security for circulating notes and public deposits. And especially let us inquire whether on that account their profits on circulation will be so diminished as to compel them, or even justify them, in withdrawing their notes and contracting the currency. If the funding contemplated by this bill shall be successfully accomplished, there will be hereafter no Government securities outstanding except the four-and-a-half percents, the four percents, and the three percents which we now propose to authorize, and the banks if they issue circulation at all, must do so upon one or the other of these classes of bonds. It is susceptible of mathematical demonstration that they can issue circulation more profitably upon a 3 per cent. bond at par than they can upon either a 4½ per cent. or a 4 per cent., even at the prices for which they are at present selling in the money market; and it is conceded by every one whose opinion is at all worthy of consideration, that if a 3 per cent. shall be issued and sold at par the prices of the other two classes will advance to such a figure as will make them yield to the investor about the same rate of interest on his actual outlay.

In other words, it is an acknowledged law in such cases that the various classes of Government securities bearing different rates of interest, but being equal in other respects, will find a common level in the markets where they are bought and sold. According to this law, when a 3 per cent. bond is selling at par our outstanding four percents ought to sell for at least 118.19; but let us suppose that the 4 per cent. bond is worth in the market only 114, as it now is, and still, according to the method of computation adopted by the Comptroller of the Currency in his official reports and in his statement made to the Finance Committee of the Senate during the present session, there is more profit in taking out circulation on a 3 per cent. bond than on a four. Take, for illustration, two banks having exactly the same capital, say $114,000, which is the amount now required to purchase $100,000 in United States 4 per cent. bonds, and the account of profits on circulation in each case will stand as follows:

Bank depositing 4 per cent. bonds.

Interest on $100,000 United States bonds at 4 per cent.			$4,000
Circulation issued on bonds		$90,000
Deduct premium on bonds	$14,000
Deduct reserve	4,500
		18,500
Loanable capital		71,500
Interest on $71,500 at 6 per cent.			4,290
Total interest received			8,290
Deduct 1 per cent. tax		$900
Deduct cost of redemption		81
			981
Net receipts			7,309
Capital loaned direct, $100,000, at 6 per cent.			6,000
Difference in favor of circulation			1,309

Bank depositing 3 per cent. bonds.

Interest on $100,000 United States bonds at 3 per cent.			$3,000
Circulation issued on bonds		$90,000
Add capital not invested in bonds		14,000
Total		104,000
Deduct reserve		4,500
Loanable capital		99,500
Interest on $99,500 at 6 per cent.			5,970
Total interest received			8,970
Deduct 1 per cent. tax		$900
Deduct cost of redemption		81
			981
Net receipts			7,989
Loaned direct, $100,000, at 6 per cent.			6,000
Difference in favor of circulation			1,989

or $680 in favor of a 3 per cent. bond.

This calculation takes no account of the fact that the bank which purchases the 4 per cent. bonds really loses the $14,000 paid in premiums, as the Government at the maturity of the obligation pays the holder only $100,000 for that which cost in the market $114,000. These figures show conclusively that we propose to do the national banks no injustice whatever when we demand that they shall aid the United States in the negotiation of this new loan by taking a part of it themselves and making it the basis of the circulating notes issued and guaranteed by the Government. The issue of a 3 per cent. bond which can be purchased at par will undoubtedly be largely beneficial to those banks which have a limited capital, as they cannot afford to pay heavy premiums, and thus lock up their means and lose the interest. If they can procure $90,000 of circulation by the expenditure of $100,000 for bonds, it is evident, even to one not versed in the mysteries of banking, that it is much more profitable for them to do so than to procure the same amount of circulation by the expenditure of $114,000. In one case the bank will have only $10,000 invested for which it receives no circulation, and in the other it will have $24,000.

But it is unnecessary to dwell longer on this view of the subject, because although there has been much complaint in general terms against the alleged injustice of this part of the bill, no one, so far as I know, has ever ventured to dispute the accuracy of these figures. During the last eleven years, from March 1, 1870, to September 1, 1880, including the whole period of financial distress in this country, the average annual earnings of all the national banks in the United States, numbering 1,481 at the beginning of that period and 2,072 at its close, amounted to 8.4 per cent. upon their entire capital and surplus. At the date last mentioned their capital was $454,215,062, and their accumulated cash surplus was $120,145,649. This surplus represents net accumulated gains over and above all taxes, expenses, and dividends. During the same period of eleven years they have declared dividends to the amount of $479,448,181; that is, their dividends alone have exceeded the whole amount of their capital at the end of the period, and in addition they have set apart since their organization and now hold, as just stated, $120,145,649 as a surplus fund to be divided among their stockholders whenever they see proper to close up their business.

When we remember that these remarkable results have been accomplished, notwithstanding the general paralysis of business which prevailed during five years of this period, we can appreciate in some measure at least the immense value of the franchise which the Government has conferred upon these institutions, and in return for which it now asks them not to make any substantial sacrifice, but simply to assist it in the negotiation of a loan at 3 per cent. in order that the people who have patiently borne such heavy burdens in the past may be relieved hereafter from an annual interest charge of over fourteen million dollars. Sir, they cannot afford to reject this reasonable demand, and he will be a most unwise and dangerous friend of the national banking system who by his vote or otherwise places the beneficiaries of that system in an attitude of defiance to the will of Congress and the people on this subject.

Upon that part of the section which prohibits bonds on which interest has ceased from remaining on deposit as security for circulation or public deposits but little need be said. The law now requires the deposit of registered interest-bearing bonds, but it contains no provision compelling their withdrawal when interest has ceased. Such a provision is necessary and proper even if no funding bill should be passed, but it is especially so as a part of the plan to substitute the new 3 per cent. bonds in lieu of the fives and sixes proposed to be redeemed. The law now in force requires each national banking association to report to the Comptroller of the Currency at least five times each year its resources and liabilities, and within ten days after each declaration of a dividend it is required to report the amount declared and the amount of net earnings in excess of the dividend; and it is provided that for each day's delay in making these reports the bank shall incur a penalty of $100, to be deducted out of the interest accruing on the bonds deposited to secure circulation. A penalty of $200, to be deducted from the interest due on the bonds, is also imposed upon the bank for a failure to report twice a year the amount of its notes in circulation, the average amount of its deposits, and the average amount of its capital not invested in United States bonds; and the Treasurer is authorized by law to reserve out of the interest due the bank the amount of the tax on circulation and the tax on deposits and capital, which last year reached the sum of $7,591,770.43. Now, these statutory provisions, intended to secure the prompt payment of penalties and taxes, cannot be executed if bonds bearing no interest are permitted to remain on deposit.

But, as I have heretofore stated during this debate, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] the principal object of this clause is to prevent the banks from defeating that provision which requires them to deposit none but 3 per cent. bonds after the 1st day of next July as security for circulation. It is perfectly plain that if non-interest-bearing bonds may be continued on deposit after that date, any bank which chooses to do so may absolutely refuse to take a 3 per cent. bond and still enjoy all the privileges of circulation that it now has. It may simply decline to present its 5 and 6 per cent. bonds for redemption after they have been called by the Secretary of the Treasury and continue to leave them on deposit with the Treasurer; and by these means it will at once not only arrest the process of funding to the extent that it may hold outstanding bonds, but it will also contract the circulation for the time being by compelling the Department to keep on hand the money with which its bonds should have been redeemed. And this will be of no advantage to the Government or tax-payers in any respect, because in the case supposed a sufficient amount of bonds to realize the means required to redeem those held by the bank will be already sold, and of course will be outstanding and bearing interest, while the money received for them will be lying idle in the Treasury. I think we ought to so legislate in this bill as to make such a proceeding impossible, and thus put it beyond the power of any bank or combination of banks to defeat our purpose. Without this provision the Secretary of the Treasury may not be able to execute at once the power conferred upon him to use not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin belonging to the Government in purchasing or redeeming bonds, and he may be obstructed and embarrassed in his funding operations in many ways besides those already indicated.

The proposed repeal of the fourth section of the act of June 20, 1874, and the re-enactment of sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes are so intimately connected that the two propositions ought to be discussed together; and I will now proceed to consider them and answer as best I can the various criticisms that have been made upon them here and elsewhere.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who has just spoken has addressed himself, not to the amendment now before the House offered by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] but to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY.] In discussing that amendment he has taken the ground that the fifth section of this bill, by repealing the fourth section of the act of June 20, 1874, and re-enacting the sections just mentioned, will repeal the law under which a national-banking association which desires to close up its business can now deposit lawful money in the Treasury of the United States and withdraw its bonds, or at least that there is a rational doubt in the minds even of members of the legal profession as to whether or not it will have that effect.

Now, the law under which a national bank, proposing to close its business, is allowed, and indeed required, to deposit lawful money in the Treasury and withdraw its bonds, was passed on the 14th day of July, 1870, and will be found in the sixteenth volume of the Statutes at Large. It reads as follows:

> And every bank that may hereafter go into liquidation shall be required to deposit lawful money of the United States for its outstanding circulation, within six months from the date of the vote to go into liquidation. Whereupon the bonds pledged as security for such circulation shall be surrendered to the association making such deposit. And if any bank shall fail to make the deposit and take up the bonds for thirty days after the expiration of the time specified, the Comptroller of the Currency shall have power to sell the bonds pledged for the circulation of said bank at public auction, in New York City; and after providing for the redemption and cancellation of said circulation and the necessary expenses of the sale, to pay over any balance remaining from the proceeds to the bank or its legal representatives.

By the forty-second and forty-third sections of the original banking law, under which these national banking associations were organized, a bank which desired to close up its affairs and retire from business was not permitted to deposit lawful money and withdraw its bonds until the expiration of the full period of one year after the vote of its stockholders had been taken.

The law so remained for six years, or until July 14, 1870, when this act was passed, which provides, as just shown, that a bank which desires to thus close up its affairs shall—not may, but shall—within six months after the vote of two-thirds of its stockholders, deposit lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States and withdraw its bonds; and that in case it fails to do so within thirty days after the expiration of the six months, the Comptroller of the Currency shall advertise its bonds for sale in the city of New York, sell them in the public market, reserve enough of the proceeds to redeem the outstanding circulation of the bank, and pay the remainder over to the bank or its representative.

That is the law to-day, and it has stood on the statute-book ever since its enactment in full force and vigor side by side with sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes; and the re-enactment of those sections will not affect it in the slightest possible degree. But, sir, that part of those sections which provides that a national bank may withdraw its bonds by producing its own notes at the Treasury has never been repealed, either expressly or constructively. I have here the opinion of the Solicitor-General and the Attorney-General of the United States, in which it is held that the proviso to the fourth section of the act of June 20, 1874, repealed by construction, and by construction only, so much of sections 5159 and 5160 as required a national bank to keep on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States bonds to the amount of one-third of its capital stock actually paid in.

The conclusion of the Solicitor-General, which was indorsed and approved by the Attorney-General, is stated in these words:

> Upon the whole, I am of opinion that, taken with its context, section 4 of the act of 1874 is, for all purposes connected therewith, repugnant to section 5160 of the Revised Statutes, and all other previous legislation that requires national banks to have and maintain in the Treasury of the United States a bond deposit to the amount of one-third of their capital.

This is the whole extent of the repeal, according to the opinion of the highest law officers of the Government, and from the time when that opinion was written, April 30, 1880, down to the time when the discussion arose upon the pending bill, no man in the country, so far as I know, either inside or outside of the legal profession, has ever intimated that the act of 1874 repealed any other part of these provisions. It is scarcely necessary for me to say that the re-enacting clause now under consideration can have no legal effect whatever, except to revive that part of the sections which has been constructively repealed; and that part, as we have just seen, does not relate to the method of withdrawing bonds and retiring circulation, but only to the minimum amount of bonds which a bank may keep on deposit.

But it is said that this bill repeals all laws inconsistent with its provisions. So it does; but what provision in it is inconsistent with the act of July 14, 1870? No gentleman has ever attempted to show that it contains a single clause repugnant to that act, and, in my opinion, no gentleman can show it.

But there are honest apprehensions in the minds of gentlemen whose opinions upon this subject are entitled to respectful consideration, that this bill might deprive liquidating banks of the right to deposit lawful money and withdraw their bonds, as there are honest apprehensions in the minds of gentlemen upon some other questions involved in this proposition; and therefore I propose, as soon as the bill is disposed of, to seek the floor for the purpose of asking unanimous consent, and if that is refused, to move to suspend the rules and pass a supplemental bill which will remove all doubt as to its proper construction, and make it perfectly clear to the whole country that the author of this fifth section never intended to interfere with the right of a bank to deposit lawful money and withdraw its bonds whenever it may desire in good faith to retire from business.

Mr. PRICE. Why did you not put that in this bill?

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman from Maine has stated the reason why it could not come into this bill; and that is, that it would inevitably result in the defeat of the bill at this session of Congress.

Mr. CONGER. Would this other bill pass?

Mr. CARLISLE. If you and your friends will vote for it, it will pass.

Now, a few words upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan to strike out so much of section 5 as repeals section 4 of the act of June, 1874. As the law now stands, there are three ways in which a bank can retire its circulation and withdraw its bonds, to say nothing of the method by which a bank can close up its business. In the first place it may—mark you, not shall—under the sixteenth section of the original banking law which is now comprised in sections 5159 and 5160, withdraw its bonds by bringing in its own notes. In the second place it may, and in fact it must under the third section of the act of June 20, 1874, keep on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a reserve fund equal to 5 per cent. of the whole amount of its circulating notes, to be used in redeeming those notes at the redemption agency of the Treasury Department. That provision I do not propose to touch. Under that provision the whole national bank circulation of this country has been redeemed more than three times over in six years. From June 30, 1874, to July 1, 1880, there were redeemed at the Treasury Department national-bank notes to the amount of $1,022,776,157.76, of which $951,776,157.76 were redeemed under the third section of the act of 1874, which this bill does not affect in the least, and only $71,000,000 under the fourth section of that act.

In the single year 1877, as shown by the official reports, there were redeemed under that third section and might have been retired absolutely and permanently from circulation if the banks had so desired $242,885,375.14; and for the redemption of this enormous amount of circulating notes in a single year this 5 per cent. redemption fund was found amply sufficient. Do the banks want more than this? If they do, sir, I for one am not in favor of giving it to them. [Applause.] All that a bank need do to retire its circulation under the third section is to notify the Treasurer not to reissue its notes when they come in, but to cancel them and charge the amount against its reserve; and then if the bank will keep its reserve good as required by law, all its outstanding notes can be redeemed and retired within a reasonable time without any shock to the business of the country.

The fourth section of the act of June 20, 1874, was enacted for a special and temporary purpose, and has long since ceased to be necessary or useful in the legitimate operation of the national-banking system. A brief reference to the circumstances under which that law was passed will show its purpose, and a brief recital of subsequent transactions and events will show how it has been perverted and abused. At the time of its passage the national-bank circulation was limited by law to $354,000,000, and there was actually outstanding the sum of $349,894,182; but it was very unequally distributed among the various parts of the country. Upon the basis of population and wealth the New England States had about seventy million dollars more than their share, while in the South there was a deficiency of $51,000,000. Massachusetts had an excess of $38,000,000; Connecticut, $11,000,000; Rhode Island, $10,000,000; New York, $2,500,000, and Pennsylvania, $3,500,000. Virginia was deficient $4,000,000; Missouri, $9,000,000, and Georgia, $4,500,000. While the average ratio per capita was $9.18, Rhode Island had $61 per capita, Massachusetts had $41, and Connecticut $33; but the whole South had only $2.91 per capita; the Western States had $7.09, and the Pacific coast, $1.82.

An examination of the provisions of the act of June 20, 1874, will satisfy any intelligent mind that one of its principal objects, if not its main object, was to equalize the circulation of national-bank currency, and that the fourth section was designed to provide an easy and expeditious method of accomplishing that result. The title of the act is "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes." The second and third sections extended a large measure of relief to the national banks in the matter of their reserves by repealing so much of former statutes as required them to keep on hand a reserve fund equal to from 15 to 25 per cent. of the whole amount of their deposits and circulation, and by limiting this requirement to the amount of their deposits alone and substituting a 5 per cent. reserve or redemption fund on account of circulation. It is this 5 per cent. reserve or redemption fund, deposited in the Treasury, with which more than $242,000,000 of national-bank circulation was redeemed in 1877, as already stated. Under the third section, whenever the notes of a bank shall be presented for redemption, "assorted or unassorted," the Treasurer is bound to redeem them in United States legal-tender notes.

The act then provided for a redistribution of national-bank notes, and for the equalization of circulation by the withdrawal of $55,000,000 from the States having an excess of their proportion and its issue to those States having less than their share, and the fourth section was enacted to enable the banks having an excess to comply promptly with the requirements of the law. That section contains no provision whatever in relation to the reduction of capital, but it authorizes a bank which desires simply to retire its circulation, in whole or in part, to deposit lawful money with the Treasurer and withdraw its bonds, provided the amount of bonds on deposit to secure circulation shall not be reduced below $50,000. The first part of the section was merely cumulative, and did not repeal by construction or otherwise any part of the law previously in force. It authorized an additional method of reducing circulation and withdrawing bonds, and thus afforded increased facilities for a compliance with the requirements of the act; and it did nothing else. The proviso, however, as already shown, was afterward held to be inconsistent with that part of the original national-bank law which required a deposit of bonds equal in amount to one-third of the capital stock paid in, and to that extent, but no further, it was officially decided that the original law was constructively repealed.

Now, sir, the effect of that repeal was that a national bank with a capital stock of $3,000,000 or $5,000,000 need not keep on deposit with the Treasurer more than $50,000 in bonds, whereas under the original act such a bank would have been required to keep on deposit at least $1,000,000 in the one case and $1,666,666 in the other. This was a wide and dangerous departure from the conservative policy of the act by which the system was established, and it ought to be corrected. The repeal of the fourth section and the re-enactment of the old law on this subject, as proposed by this bill, will correct this mistake and require the national banks to deposit with the Treasurer about nine million dollars in bonds more than they now have in his office. Nearly all of them voluntarily organized under a law which required them to keep this deposit, and they transacted business and prospered under it for ten years. I do not believe that Congress ever intended to repeal it, or that it did repeal it according to any fair or judicial construction of the two statutes, but it has been held otherwise by the law officer of the Department, and his decision will very properly be respected and conformed to until there is further legislation or an authoritative determination of the question by the courts.

But, Mr. Speaker, by far the most dangerous feature yet introduced into the national-banking system is contained in that part of the fourth section of the act of June 20, 1874, which authorizes the banks at any time, and for any reason which they may choose to consider sufficient, to deposit lawful money with the Treasurer, contract the currency to that extent, and withdraw their bonds; and, sir, it is not going too far to say that until this feature is wholly eliminated or materially modified there can be no assurance of safety to any legitimate investment or business enterprise in this country. If there was ever a doubt as to the dangerous character of the power which this part of the law gives to the banks over the business and property of the people, the arbitrary and unjustifiable proceedings of the last week ought to dispel it forever. The power was conferred in the first instance, as I have said, for a special and temporary purpose, the equalization of the national-bank circulation, but when the resumption act of January 14, 1875, was passed, which removed all restrictions as to the amount of such currency and made the system entirely free, there was no longer any necessity for this clause, and it should have been instantly repealed. It is a standing menace against the prosperity of the country. Armed with this destructive weapon the banks may at any time, without a moment's notice or a shadow of provocation, strike down every industry and every commercial enterprise of the people.

The banks, or some of them at least, first began to pervert this section of the statute from its original purpose and abuse the power which it conferred upon them, by depositing lawful money and withdrawing their bonds from time to time, in order to speculate upon them in the market. They thus withdrew large amounts of their circulation and contracted the currency, not because the reduced demands of business made the outstanding volume of circulation unnecessary or unprofitable, but simply because they wanted to realize the high premiums on their bonds and speculate in the securities upon which the Government had already delivered to them 90 per cent. in notes. These notes would be left outstanding for the time being, but an equal amount of Treasury notes would, of course, be withdrawn from circulation, and held at the Department to redeem the bank-notes as they might come in. The Treasurer, in his last annual report, describes this process by reference to actual transactions in his office; and as his statement on this subject cannot be condensed without impairing its force, I give it in his own words. He says:

> Under the construction placed upon the law banks which have thus reduced their circulation have been permitted to increase it again as often and as largely as they chose, whether their legal-tender deposits were exhausted or not. Although the exact amount cannot be ascertained, it is safe to say that many millions of dollars of additional circulation have been issued under the general provisions of the national-currency act to banks which were still reducing their circulation under the act of June 20, 1874. The consequence has been that the new notes thus issued have to a large extent speedily been presented to the Treasury for redemption out of the legal-tender deposit. Banks which have applied in vain to the Treasurer for the surrender of their legal-tender deposits have accomplished the same object by obtaining new circulation. The cost of printing the new notes thus issued is borne by the United States, so that the Government, though not deriving the remotest benefit from the transaction, has been obliged to bear the whole expense of their issue and a part of the expense of their redemption simply to enable a bank to do by indirection what it was not permitted to do directly. In several instances banks have repeated the operation of reducing and increasing their circulation several times within a brief period, taking up their bonds and selling them, it would appear, whenever the premium constituted a sufficient inducement, and increasing their circulation again whenever bonds could be bought at better rates, the United States all the while redeeming their notes at its own expense or that of the other banks and issuing others, also at its own expense, whenever called upon by them.
>
> An example will better illustrate these operations. In January and February, 1875, a certain bank reduced its circulation from $308,490 to $45,000 by deposits of legal-tender notes. Between September 26, 1876, and May 26, 1877, and before that deposit was exhausted, it increased its circulation to $450,000. Between August 14 and September 10, 1877, it again reduced its circulation to $45,000. On September 19, 1877, nine days after completing the deposits for this reduction, it again began to take out additional circulation, although $402,550 of prior deposits remained in the Treasury, and by the 26th of that month its circulation had again been increased to $450,000. July 22, 1878, it, for the third time, reduced its circulation to $45,000, and in August and September, 1879, again increased it to $450,000, at which it now remains, the balance of its former legal-tender deposit then in the Treasury being $112,615. From January 13, 1875, to the date of this report, $778,275 of its notes have been redeemed, of which only $40,700 were redeemed at the expense of the bank, although during more than one-third of that period it had outstanding and was deriving the benefit from the full amount of circulation which its capital authorized. The only assessments which have been made on the bank for the expenses of redeeming its notes were $24.74 in 1875 and $4.39 in 1878. At one time there were in actual circulation $852,550 of its notes, although the highest amount ever borne on its books was $450,000.
>
> Other banks have reduced and forthwith increased their circulation to its former amount, with the avowed object of relieving themselves from the trouble and expense of redeeming their notes through the 5 per cent. redemption fund. For example, a bank deposited $145,000 in legal-tender notes for the reduction of its circulation on April 3, 1878, and on April 5, 1978, two days afterward, without having touched the bonds deposited as security, took out $45,000 of additional circulation. In like manner on July 11, 1879, it deposited $9,000 for the same purpose, and on the very same day, without disturbing its bonds, it took out $9,000 of additional circulation.
>
> It is plain that such transactions as these are not within the spirit of the act of June 20, 1874. That act authorizes the deposit of legal-tender notes by any national bank "desiring to withdraw its circulation, in whole or in part." A wish to surrender circulation, with the reserved intention of taking out more at once, or as soon as a fall in the price of bonds shall make the transaction profitable, is not, it is submitted, such a desire to withdraw circulation as the law contemplates. The reduction of circulation therein authorized is a bona fide reduction, based on a well-settled intention of the bank to curtail its note issues. It could neither have been intended nor expected that the law would become the means of enabling banks to operate in the securities of the Government deposited to secure the redemption of their notes, or to throw upon the United States, or the other banks of the country, the expense of redeeming their notes, while maintaining and enjoying the full circulation to which the law entitles them. Such a construction utterly perverts the original intention of the act. Instead of the volume of the circulation being regulated by the business needs of the country, it is governed by the price of United States bonds. The price of bonds may be such as to induce banks to surrender their circulation at the very time when there is a legitimate demand for more circulation. The profit to be derived from taking up and selling their bonds may be greater than that derivable from their circulation. Within the last year a large reduction of bank circulation has taken place in the face of an active demand for money, simply because a good profit could be made by withdrawing and selling the four percents deposited as security for circulation. Nearly twenty-five million dollars in 4 per cent. bonds were thus withdrawn during the last fiscal year. Banks can afford to forego the profit on their circulation for a few months, in order to realize more from the premium on their bonds. Such operations should not, in the Treasurer's opinion, be permitted.

In the examination of the Comptroller of the Currency before the Finance Committee of the Senate since the passage of this bill by the House, the fact was disclosed that the bank which so grossly abused its privileges under the law, by alternately withdrawing and depositing its bonds, was the First National of New York—an institution already notorious throughout the country on account of the character and magnitude of its transactions with the Treasury Department during the late refunding operations. No one will contend that this was a legitimate and proper method of conducting business under the national-banking system, and yet it can be resorted to every day by every bank in the United States as long as the fourth section of the act of June 20, 1874, remains unrepealed. It disturbs values, affects the money market, and subjects the Government to unnecessary expense merely to gratify a spirit of speculation and gain on the part of the managers of the bank, and it ought to be peremptorily forbidden in the future.

Under this section the banks have it in their power to contract the currency and produce financial distress, involving every interest in the country and embarrassing the operations of the Government itself, whenever they may think it will promote their special interests to do so. If they do not like proposed legislation in Congress or elsewhere; if they are opposed to the success of a particular political party; if they conclude that they ought to be exempt from all taxation, State and Federal; if they want additional privileges conferred upon them in respect to any matter connected with their business; in short, if their opinions and interests are not consulted in all cases whatsoever, they can resort at once to this tremendous power over the fortunes of the people and thus bring the timid to terms and rain all who refuse to accede to their demands. A plausible pretext can always be found or invented for the exercise of such a power as this, and powerful influences can always be brought to justify and sustain it.

The two Houses of Congress, representing the aggregate interests of fifty millions of people, have, after mature deliberation, passed a bill which the banks have chosen to consider obnoxious to them, and forthwith—within thirteen days—they have contracted the currency to the extent of $18,722,340 and precipitated a crisis which would have been disastrous to the country had it not been met by measures which they had no power to prevent. The prompt action of the Secretary of the Treasury in purchasing a large amount of bonds at the city of New York, and the course of the Canadian banks in throwing seven or eight million dollars of their loanable capital on the market, alone prevented a catastrophe from the effects of which we might not have entirely recovered for many years. When Secretary McCulloch, several years since, in pursuance of his contraction policy, began to retire and cancel legal-tender notes at the rate of $4,000,000 per month, it produced such consternation in business circles that Congress was forced to intervene at once and arrest the process by the passage of a joint resolution; but now we have seen nearly nineteen million dollars of circulation withdrawn in less than half a month, not by the Government, but by institutions in the management of which the Government has no voice, and still gentlemen here insist that the power under which this has been done, and under which it may at any time be repeated, shall not be taken away. Why, sir, the whole contraction of legal-tender Treasury notes under the provisions of the resumption act, from January 14, 1875, to May 31, 1878, when it was prohibited by law, was only $34,318,984, not twice as much in more than three years as the bank contraction has been in less than two weeks.

This experience warns us that we cannot safely permit this great power to remain in the hands of these institutions unchecked by legal restrictions. It is an engine of destruction standing in the very narrowest part of the way to permanent industrial and commercial prosperity in this country; for there can be no such prosperity anywhere in the midst of sudden and enormous contractions of the currency; nor will prudent and experienced business men embark in large and expensive enterprises when the power to make such contractions is held by private and interested parties who acknowledge no restraints except public sentiment and their own views of the public welfare. By law the volume of legal-tender notes is limited to $346,681,016, while under the policy of the Government nearly one hundred and fifty million dollars in gold and silver coin are permanently withheld from circulation and hoarded in the Treasury. Of the $454,000,000 gold coin in the country the Government and the banks held, on the 1st day of November last, $254,000,000, and the people only $200,000,000. The circulation of State banks is taxed out of existence; the coinage of silver is limited by statute to $4,000,000 per month; and so it appears that by statute or public policy every form of currency which the people can use in the transaction of their business is restricted, except national-bank notes. They alone are perfectly free from all restrictions, legal or otherwise, and upon them the people are compelled to rely under existing circumstances for the additional facilities of exchange necessary to enable them to carry on their growing industries and conduct their rapidly increasing commercial enterprises.

What a fatal policy it is, in view of these considerations, to retain on the statute-book as part of our currency system a law which subjects all these great interests to the arbitrary will or mistaken judgment of two thousand corporations. The present attempt to provide against a recurrence of the danger from which the country has just made its escape and to re-establish the original and conservative principle in the management of our currency may fail, but in the end the legislation now proposed, or something equivalent to it, will certainly be demanded by the public sentiment of the country; and in this belief I am content to abide the result of this long contest, whatever it may be.

The duty and power of Congress to regulate Railroad Monopolies—Their power and wealth dangerous to the Republic.

SPEECH OF HON. A. M. SCALES,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 1, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4748) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce.

Early and provident fear is the mother of safety.—Burke.

These corporations cannot commit treason, nor be outlawed, nor excommunicated, for they have no souls.—Coke.

Mr. SCALES said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States and with the Indian tribes. This is the clause in the Constitution relied on to sustain what is known as the Reagan amendment, which proposes to regulate interstate commerce. This amendment is a most important one, and, if it should become a law, is the first step, though not a long one, in the direction of regulating the wealthy and powerful railroad corporations of the country.

In considering this question our first duty is to determine whether such action on the part of Congress is within the scope of the Constitution. If not, then that settles the question. If it is, then we have only to consider how far we can promote the general interest and welfare of the people by any legislative action.

From the clause just quoted it will be seen that the power to regulate commerce is not only in Congress, but it is nowhere else in the three cases referred to, to wit: With foreign nations and among the States and with the Indian tribes.

Before the Constitution was established each State had the right to regulate her own commerce, not only with her own citizens within her own borders, but also with foreign nations, and among the States, and with the Indian tribes. This was found to work badly. It produced competition among them, and this competition produced jealousies and strife, and did much to interfere with domestic tranquillity. This the Constitution proposed to remedy; indeed, its great aim in part, as shown in the preamble to the Constitution, was to form a more perfect union and to secure domestic tranquillity. Whatever power then the States had was in the interest of union and tranquillity surrendered to the General Government. If they had the whole power then, the General Government has the whole power, unless there is some limitation in the Constitution itself; but there is a limitation, and that limitation serves to confirm this view. Congress has power to regulate commerce, except as contained in article 1, section 9, clauses 5 and 6. Read the two clauses together, and we have, Congress shall have the right to regulate commerce among the States, but no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from one State, and no preference shall be given by any regulations of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another. Nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another. This is the only exception, and of course leaves all other power to regulate commerce in the Houses of Congress. It is an exclusive power, and there is and can be no concurrent jurisdiction. Chief-Justice Marshall, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, says that "the power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum. A grant of the whole is inconsistent with the right of another to any part of it." The language of the Constitution is plain, simple, the grant full and complete; and, I suppose, will not be seriously contested, unless it is as to the extent of the power conferred.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

Having shown by the Constitution itself and the construction of Chief-Justice Marshall, as enunciated in Gibbons vs. Ogden, that the power has been conferred upon Congress, let us consider the extent of this power and what is meant by regulating commerce; to regulate means, according to Worcester, to adjust by rule, to direct, to guide, to conduct, to manage. By Webster it means about the same thing.

To regulate commerce, then, according to these definitions, is to lay down the rule by which it is to be carried on, to direct, to conduct, to manage, and control it. It is not a power to direct, manage, and control in a particular way, but a power to control and manage in every way the grantee may deem best not inconsistent with the purposes of the grant and not prohibited by the Constitution.

The authorities as presented by Paschal in his annotated constitution are so conclusive that no room is left for argument.

"To regulate." That is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed, (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 196; Story Const., sec. 1061.) The power is exclusive and bears no residuum, (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 209; Story Const., sec. 1072; Passenger Cases, 7 How., 283.) "This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, and may be exercised to its utmost extent and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 196.) "The power is a necessary one." (Federalist, Nos. 4, 7, 11, 22, 37; Gibbon vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 225.) It is necessary to the perpetuity of the Union. It is essential to domestic tranquillity and to the interest of commerce itself; it is vital to the progress and prosperity of the Federal Government. Without it there would be a law for every State, and each State would so regulate commerce as to suit its own peculiar interest without regard to the interest of others; these laws would possibly conflict with the laws of other States. The taxes would be unequal and the laws have no uniformity.

Such would have been the result of the power in the States, and hence it was surrendered; not a part but the whole; not concurrent jurisdictions but exclusive over the commerce with foreign nations, among the States and with the Indian tribes.

What is meant by commerce, is the next question to be considered, and fortunately for us here, as before, we are not left to grope in the dark. The authorities are so abundant and so imposing that they have only to be cited to produce conviction. And here, too, I gladly avail myself of the arrangement so admirably made by Paschal in his annotated constitution:

Commerce is traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 101, 207; United States vs. Holliday, 3 Wallace, 417; Story on the Constitution, 1061, note 2.)

Buying, selling, and exchanging is the essence of commerce. (3 Wall., 417.) It also includes navigation as well as traffic in its ordinary signification, and embraces ships and vessels as the instruments of intercourse and trade as well as the officers and seamen who navigate and control them. The power of Congress extends to all these subjects. (People vs. Brooks, 4 Denio, 469.) Again, commerce with foreign nations and among the several States can mean nothing more than intercourse with those nations and among those States for the purpose of trade, be the objects of trade what they may; and this intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several States or by a passage overland through the States when such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the States. (Corfield vs. Coryell, 4 Wash., Circuit Court, 388; Pennsylvania vs. Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Co., 18 How., 421; Columbus Insurance Co. vs. Peoria Bridge Co., 6 McLean, 70.)

Commerce includes navigation; and comprehends the control for that purpose, and to the extent necessary of all navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from a State other than those in which they lie. For this purpose they are the public property of the nation and subject to all the requisite legislation of Congress. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 191; Corfield vs. Coryell, 4 Wash., 378; Gilman vs. Philadelphia, 3 Wall., 724, 725.)

Wherever commerce among the States goes the power of the nation as represented in this court goes with it to protect and enforce its rights. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 191; Gilman vs. Philadelphia, 3 Wall., 725.)

The right to regulate includes the power to remove all obstructions and to provide for the punishment of offenses. It embraces the whole power which existed in the States before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and which have always existed in the Parliament in England. (Gibbons vs. Ogden; Corfield vs. Coryell; Gilman vs. Philadelphia.)

It is for Congress to determine when its full powers shall be brought into activity and as to the regulations and sanctions which shall be provided. (Gilman vs. Philadelphia, 3 Wall., 725; United States vs. Coombs, 12 Peters, 72; New York vs. Milne, 11 Peters, 102, 155.)

RIGHTS OF THE STATES.

The States retain all the rights they had before the adoption of the Constitution not surrendered to Congress. They still regulate the commerce within their own borders and between their own citizens. This they have not surrendered, but when the commerce is between one State and another or between several States or between the citizens of two or more States, then the power of Congress comes in. They retain the right of eminent domain over their own soil for all municipal purposes and they have alone the power to exercise it. The power to regulate their inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws, and to regulate their own internal commerce, to build bridges, &c., all belong to the State, but their powers must be so used as not to come in conflict with a power exercised by Congress and surrendered to it by the States, for having surrendered the power to the General Government they could not in good faith intend to retain and so use it as to cripple the power surrendered.

The States watch with ceaseless vigilance the powers exercised by the United States Government and guard their own reserved powers with a no less jealous eye, and I trust it may be always so. The preservation of the States and the perpetuity of the Union depend upon it. The Constitution is a monument of wisdom and skill. It was adapted to thirteen States when established and harmonized thirteen governments with one. One hundred years have passed, the thirteen States have become thirty-eight, and it as readily adjusts itself to thirty-eight as to thirteen, to 50,000,000 people as to 4,000,000. Whenever there are jars and collisions they come and must always come from a broken compact, a violated Constitution.

This is the great beauty and strength of our system. The powers of the States and the General Government are clearly defined, and each should remain in its appointed sphere, violating no known powers and employing no doubtful ones. Let the Constitution be fairly construed according to its intent and meaning, not too strictly nor yet too liberally, but fairly, and when so construed let the States and the General Government vie with each other in enforcing it, whether the power belongs to the State or to the Federal Government, and prohibiting it if denied to either. Then there will be no frictions, no jars, but each will move on in its own sphere, adding strength and power and glory to a Union which will thus be perpetuated to all time.

THE AMENDMENT UNDER CONSIDERATION.

This amendment declares, first, that these great corporations shall not charge one citizen on a continuous line more than another for the same service; second, they shall not charge more for a shorter distance than a longer one; third, they shall not allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form to one citizen over another. The amendment is modest, cautious, if not timid; it recognizes the fact that the action proposed is an experiment. It might well have claimed and exercised the power to regulate the freights and fare. In the interest of commerce its advocates might well claim all the power granted in the Constitution to Congress to regulate, control, and prescribe rules for the management and conduct of their trade; but the object of the bill is to protect the citizen and not to cripple the roads; hence we adopt the maxim festina lente. The regulations of such matters are usually left to a healthy competition, and this, in all other cases, has proved a sufficient corrective; but here there is no competition. The corporations will not brook competition. Competing lines time and again are built up in different localities, but they are no sooner built than they become the prey of strong corporations or more powerful combinations. The history of the whole question shows that competition cannot live, and that the power to regulate these corporations through it can never be available.

There is no check save in the law-making power. It would be best, and doubtless more agreeable if it could be so, to have them under their own voluntary regulations to perform all the duties and obligations they owe to the country and all its citizens; but if they will not, then the Government power must come in, and why not? They are the creatures of the State, born of their power and liberality; there are few, if any, in the United States that have not been built to a greater or less extent by contributions from the State or General Government. The citizens have been taxed to pay for them, in many cases most onerously; private property has been taken and condemned to their use; peculiar privileges have been given them, and for what? That they might become great highways of commerce, and as such build up the material wealth of the country. This was the great object of their creation. In the charters the States authorize the condemnation of private property, and in most cases make liberal contributions, and impose taxes upon the whole people to build them. This should not and could not be done except to promote the general good, and especially is this the case with many of our western roads. Immense grants of lands have been made to these corporations, so large and valuable that in many cases the roads have been built and paid for from this source, leaving a large balance in the hands of the company, which is added to their general wealth. These lands belonged to all the people of the United States, and could not be granted for a mere private purpose. It was to make a highway for all the citizens, and give them speedy and cheap transportation for their products.

The corporations themselves accept the charters with all the privileges and all the aid; they accept it, too, cum onere and with a full knowledge that it is to be dedicated to public uses, hence they cannot complain when the Government proposes so to regulate them as to require that in all their charges they would be reasonable, equal, and just to all citizens. Again, Congress can make no grant, consent to no charter to railroad corporations, except under the power given in the Constitution to regulate commerce. This power we have seen is full and complete, but only to secure such regulation as shall be for the public good.

PRIVATE PROPERTY DEDICATED TO PUBLIC USE.

Chief-Justice Waite, in the Grange cases, says:

The Government regulates the conduct of its citizens one toward another and the manner in which each shall use his own property when such regulation becomes necessary for the public good. In their exercise it has been customary in England from time immemorial and in this country from its first colonization, to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, innkeepers, &c., and in so doing to fix a maximum charge for services rendered, &c.

Again he says:

This was said by Lord Hale more than two hundred years ago: "Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When therefore one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he in effect grants to the public an interest in that use and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created." Again, "It is insisted, however, that the owner of the property is entitled to a reasonable compensation for its use, even though it be clothed with a public interest, and that what is reasonable is a judicial and not a legislative question—the practice has been otherwise. In countries where the common law prevails it has been customary from time immemorial for the legislature to declare what shall be reasonable compensation, or fix a maximum beyond which any charge made would be unreasonable."

A PUBLIC DUTY.

The rights of private property are sacred, but when private rights and property are charged in the act that creates them with a high public trust, that is also sacred, and all the power of government must be used to see the duty faithfully performed. This is not a power or a privilege to be used or not at the pleasure of the government, but when the public interest suffers in the person and property of the humblest and poorest of her citizens it becomes a high and solemn duty. It is said, and truly, that government is a social compact by which the whole people contract with each citizen and each citizen with the whole people that all shall be subject to certain laws for the common good. The citizen surrenders part of his natural rights to the government, contributes of his substance to its support, and defends it when in peril, and the government on its part guarantees to him protection in all his rights not surrendered. By the nature of the compact all, as far as the government can secure it, must share equally and justly in its privileges and burdens.

If a law is enacted which is unjust and unequal in its operation it must be repealed. If corporations chartered for the general good should impose unequal and unjust charges upon the citizens, or confer greater privileges upon some than upon others, or discriminate in favor of one city over another, then this must be remedied and the Government, whose charter has been thus violated, cannot evade the responsibility. The Government must stand by the compact, and cannot fail or refuse to grant a remedy without forfeiting the confidence of the people. Let it be seen and known of all men that there is no interest so small as to escape its care and no power created by it so great as to be beyond its control, and the people will love and sustain it.

PROMPT ACTION NECESSARY.

What is done must be done quickly. These corporations are daily growing in wealth, power, and influence.

At the close of the year 1878 the number of miles constructed in the United States by the railroad companies was 81,841, now it is 93,899 miles. The number of officers and employés of the roads as taken from the census of 1870 was 157,221, then they had only 52,914 miles of railroads. From 1870 to 1878 the increase of miles was over 50 per cent.; if the employés increased in the same ratio, the number of employés in 1878 would be over 200,000. Of these it may be safely estimated that nineteen-twentieths are voters. Add to them the number who are interested in the roads and not employés, and the number that would be influenced by the 200,000 employés and the number to be influenced by the power and wealth of the corporations, and the number of votes controlled directly or indirectly by them will not fall far short of 300,000; more votes than were polled in the presidential election of 1876 by all the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, and Rhode Island added together, and more votes than were polled by any one of the Southern States or by any one of the other States of the Union except New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri. The capital stock of all the roads amounts to $2,232,257,877; their funded debt $2,297,790,916, other debt, $182,248,556; total amount of stock and debt, $4,772,297,349. The cost of railroads and equipment, $4,166,331,924; their working expenses is $302,328,184; gross earnings, $490,103,351; net earnings, $187,575,167; dividends paid on stock, $53,629,368. These estimates are for the year 1878.

Their indebtedness exceeds the national debt by $123,452,390.

Their capital stock is more than one-seventh of the whole assessed value of the real and personal estate of the United States, and is one-fifteenth of their true value.

Their gross earnings exceed the receipts of the United States Government for 1879 over two hundred million dollars, and their working expenses exceed the total net ordinary expenses for same time $140,908,250, and the net earnings exceed the net ordinary expenses of the Government for 1879 $25,953,233, and would pay the national debt in twelve years. They have made a complete net-work of roads over the entire surface of the Union. They reach from Canada to the Gulf, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean; they penetrate every State. The rivers and mountains form no barrier to their skill and power; they bridge the one and tunnel the other.

The amount of freight paid in the year 1878 to these railroads was $365,466,061, and the amount paid by passengers for the same time was $124,637,290. The former is involuntary. Men must pay it to reach the markets, or suffer their produce to rot on the farms; and it is equivalent to a per capita tax upon the entire population of the United States of $7.30. The latter is to a great degree voluntary, and is equivalent to a tax per capita of $2.50; both together equal to a tax of $9.80 on every man, woman, and child in the United States. The power that made this $9.80 could just as well make it $25 per capita, and even beyond that sum. The people are entirely dependent upon them for transportation, and must pay what is demanded of them, limited only by the conscience of the corporations; and if the corporation has no conscience, as they have no soul, then there is no limitation upon the charges, except what may be necessary in their interest to induce the shipper to keep up the trade.

But there is a greater evil still to be remedied. Their charges are not equal, but bear much harder upon some than others. To illustrate this, Judge Black, Attorney-General under Mr. Buchanan, and one of the ablest and most distinguished that has ever occupied the position, says that the freight from New York to Salt Lake is $4, while all the way to San Francisco it is only $2.50.

Again he says of these corporations:

HOW MONOPOLIES RUIN BUSINESS MEN.

They boldly express their determination to charge as much as the traffic will bear; that is to say, they will take from the profits of every man's business as much as can be without compelling him to quit it. In the aggregate this amounts to the most enormous, oppressive, and unjust tax that ever was laid upon the industry of any people under the sun.

Nor is this all.

A grain dealer at Baltimore gets a reduction or drawback which is denied to others, and he makes a fortune for himself while he ruins his competitors by underselling them. A single mill at Rochester can stop the wheels of all the rest if its flour be carried at a rate much lower. By discrimination of this kind the profits of one coal-mine may be quadrupled, while another, with all its fixtures and machinery, is rendered worthless. Such wrongs as these are done not only in a few sporadic cases, but generally and habitually on a very large scale. Certain oil-men, whose refinery was on Long Island, got rebates amounting to $10,000,000 in eighteen months, and seventy-nine houses (I believe that is the number) engaged in the same business were broken up. The creditors of the Reading Railroad, having coal lands of their own, made discriminations between themselves and others which drove competition out of the field, gave them the monopoly of the Philadelphia market, and enabled them to charge for their coals as they charge for their freight—whatever they please. Thus producers, dealers, and consumers all suffer together.

All this wealth and power are said to be under the control of about ten men. They are absolute monarchs in their own dominions, and the whole is regulated by their dictation, nor do they stop there. They boldly issue their decrees that preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another; to one city over another; to one citizen over another. Congress and the State Legislatures, under the Constitution, have no right to do this. But this decemviri, indifferent alike to the powers of the States and to the powers of Congress, by whom their corporations are created, hesitate not to do what the powers that created them cannot do. They are worth, individually, from one to one hundred million dollars. These large amounts, by watering stock, by speculations, and other dealing in the stocks of these corporations, have been taken from the general wealth and locked up in individual hands.

They are combining all the railroads of the country in a war offensive and defensive against everybody and everything in their way. They have recently bought up and consolidated the telegraph lines, and thus, without competition, control this great business. They now seek to buy up the press of the country. One of them, as it is currently reported, has recently become the purchaser and owner of three of the ablest, most widely circulated, and most influential papers in the city of New York; and what they cannot buy outright they attempt to subsidize. Thus the press, which, when free, honest, and independent, is the strongest safeguard to liberty, is enslaved and corrupted, and when it speaks at all speaks the language of these corporations, and thus becomes tributary to their power and greatness.

But their power does not stop here. They control to a very large degree many of the national banks, and through them the currency of the country, contracting and expanding it at their pleasure. Under this power fortunes have been made and lost in a day, and men, women, and children in the enjoyment of all the comforts of life have in twenty-four hours been thrown out upon the cold world without raiment or food, ruined, helpless, and homeless. This power is felt, too, in the operations of the Government, and through it the price of bonds and the time of payment are dictated to suit themselves.

It is charged and believed that these ten men, the decemvir of America, control the elections, both national and State, to an extent that should alarm any lover of republican institutions. They organize and send forth to do their work the most powerful lobbies known to legislative bodies. It is charged and believed that they nominate and elect many of the Senators and Representatives in both State and Federal Government, and that legislation is often, alas, too often, but the echo of decrees issued from their own offices. It is charged and believed, and instances are cited without reserve, that they make and unmake many of the judges of our courts, who thus become mere clerks to register their decrees.

It is charged that they were implicated in the frauds of 1876 that placed in the White House one who had never been elected by the people; that they hold the balance of power between the two great portions of the country, and turn the scale as they choose, deciding who shall be the Chief Magistrate of the Union, and then dictating the members of his Cabinet. All of these things may not be true; some of them doubtless are untrue; but enough is true to show the power of the combination, and enough is true to show that if they have not been guilty in all respects as charged, they neither want the power or will to do it all when necessary to their purpose. Enough is true to prove how dangerous they may become in a republic like ours.

Enough is true to satisfy all that there should be a check upon such power, and that it will require all the patriotism, vigor, and power of Congress to do it. Nathaniel Macon, for many years a Senator from North Carolina, who was said by John Randolph to be the wisest man he ever knew, was much opposed to such corporations; he predicted their power and their danger. He said good roads and speedy transportation were great blessings, but liberty was a greater; that these corporations would grow in wealth and power and at last destroy the liberties of the people.

Few if any agreed with him then. He stood almost alone. Now no one can shut his eyes to the danger, and he who has no fear must be wanting in sensibility. Shall this power be checked? If so, let us pass this bill; it is the entering-wedge to split up these consolidations and destroy their power of injury to the people. It concedes to Congress the right to control their power, and to regulate it for the public good; it does little else, but that is much gained. It does not destroy nor cripple the usefulness of the roads. All this consolidation can be broken up and all this power surrendered without at all crippling their capacity as common carriers or their roads as great highways of commerce.

I appeal to the Representatives of the people here assembled. Shall this power be checked? Will Congress act, and act now? The country is deeply solicitous as to the reply. Are we bound hand and foot by this giant? Do we wear his collars? I will not believe it; but while we hesitate and dally I beg you to remember the difficulties are increasing. In a recent number of a brilliant illustrated newspaper this monopoly is most strikingly illustrated as a huge serpent with his tail already around the Dome of the Capitol. By degrees he is embracing within his deadly folds the press, the telegraph lines, and all the great business interests of the country, and, with head erect, open mouth, and forked tongue, he threatens the very genius of liberty herself who presides over the deliberations of the Capitol. I appeal to the Representatives to hear me; if they will not, then I appeal to the great tribunal of the people. This is the last resort, the last hope of the country. I will go before them. If they fail me, I will stand alone, if need be, now, henceforth, and through life, in unalterable antagonism to the men or corporations who thus threaten the prosperity and freedom of the Republic. But the people will not fail. They move slowly, but surely. They will, as they should, demand the proofs and wait until it comes; but when it does come they will strike a blow that will bring deliverance, and woe be to him in this contest who shall be found on the side of the monopoly. "The people never give up their liberties but under some delusion."

Court of Pensions.

SPEECH OF HON. A. J. HOSTETLER,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, March 3, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 5394) to organize a court of pensions.

Mr. HOSTETLER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill under consideration has been presented in this House for the purpose of curing supposed defects in the present law as it now exists. The objection to the law is, in my opinion, founded more on the statements made in the various reports of the Commissioner of Pensions and his persistent efforts to secure the passage of his pet scheme, the sixty-surgeons bill, than from a proper knowledge of the present law. And in my opinion, if he had made as great an effort to carry out the provisions of the present law as he has to get his pet measure through, there would not be the amount of general complaint that comes up from all over the country against the Commissioner of Pensions and a demand for his removal; and if these reports had been made purposely to prejudice the country against the soldier and the arrearage of pensions so justly his due, they could not have more effectually done so. It might well be considered whether or not the trouble about this whole question does not grow out of the manner in which the law is executed. Whether this is true or not, the impression is widely extended through the country that the fault is not in the law but in the manner of its execution.

But, sir, as there is complaint I propose to consider that question for a short time, and also whether it is just and equitable in its provisions.

During the late war there were two important factors necessary for the suppression of the rebellion, the one the volunteer soldiers, the other the capitalist. The former from purely patriotic motives left his wife and children, parents, brothers and sisters, and the comforts of home, and offered his services to the Government, and if need be his life a sacrifice upon the altar of his country, and this, too, without any demands of the soldier, and solely on such terms as might be adopted by the Government.

The Government, therefore, adopted rules and regulations upon which such volunteer service would be received. The first was that it would receive none but sound, able-bodied men, and in order that it might not be imposed upon it took the word of no volunteer, but appointed its most skillful surgeons to examine to their entire satisfaction all applicants, and received none except such as were, on such examination, found to be sound, able-bodied, and free from disease, and then from time to time determined what amount it would pay him for such service, and that, too, without consulting the soldier whether it would be satisfactory to him or not. In a word, he came to the necessities of the Government without demands.

The capitalists also came to the relief of the Government and offered it money to an amount necessary to meet its demands, provided the Government would pay them such rate per cent. interest as they demanded from time to time, which was always governed by the necessities of the Government. Thus, it will be observed, that the soldier voluntarily came to the relief of the Government to meet its wants and necessities, and trusted to its generosity, risking his life in its cause; not for the pay that the Government offered him, but from a higher and more patriotic motive, that of the preservation of the Union; in a word, he risked all in its cause; it was he that stood in the front and faced the enemy in deadly conflict; it was he that stood there a protection to all citizens of the Government in their property and the enforcement of the law.

The capitalists never offered to sacrifice their means for the suppression of the rebellion, but like sharp financiers, as they are, took advantage of the Government's necessities and drove the best bargain they could, and thus obtained Government 6 per cent. bonds at not exceeding forty to sixty cents to the dollar, the interest payable in coin; and under the contract these bonds were payable in greenbacks, the same money with which they were purchased. The capitalist was not satisfied to take the same money that he paid for the bonds, but denounced it as a dishonest dollar and demanded that the Government should pay him in coin, and succeeded in getting the contract changed making it payable in coin; still not satisfied, sought and obtained the demonetization of silver so as to make the debt payable in gold; still not satisfied, demanded the passage of the resumption act, thus making the purchasing power of the coin payment of his bond double. But this paper dollar that the bondholders denounced as a dishonest dollar was the dollar paid to the soldier for his services, and, as before stated, in such quantities as the Government saw proper to give him. Now, in view of the fact that the Government made all the terms, not only the amount it would pay the soldier, but more, that he should be a sound, able-bodied man. Sir, with these facts before us, is not the presumption clear and conclusive that the Government is estopped from setting up the plea that the soldier was not physically sound when he entered the service? And certainly no man who desires to do justice to the soldier will dare say that, when he came out of the war with the loss of limbs or suffering from wounds or any other disability incurred while in the service, he should not demand such compensation for such disability from year to year as would be equal to what he lacks from physical disability to enable him to perform the manual labors by which he gains a livelihood. This demand is but reasonable, and if granted would in no way place him on an equality in the treatment he would receive as compared with that of the capitalist who furnished the money. And, sir, when you talk of the millions you are paying the soldier, and justly paying him, remember that you have paid the bondholder billions, and will have to pay him billions more. Now, I do not complain of paying the bondholder every dollar that is justly his due, but I do claim that the Government has paid hundreds of millions to the bondholder that was no part of the original contract. Then why complain at doing an act of simple justice to the soldier, even though it costs more than you anticipated when from a sense of duty you agreed to pay him in proportion to the disability he incurred while in the service and from date of discharge or from date of disability.

This law is now denounced as a great wrong, and the soldier is insulted by the declaration of the Commissioner and his friends that from 10 to 15 per cent. of those receiving pensions have perjured themselves and perpetrated a fraud upon the Government; and an array of figures, as I believe unwarranted by the facts and startling in amount, are produced to prejudice the country against their just claims, and in my opinion to force a pet scheme through Congress—the sixty-surgeons bill. The Commissioner and his friends who are so blatant in their denunciations of the arrearage act have no word of condemnation for the greatest of all frauds ever perpetrated on the people of the United States, the acts changing the contract for the payment of the bonds in 1869, and the acts demonetizing the silver dollar, and the act known as the resumption act of 1875. All these acts were made in the interest of the bondholders and at the expense of the soldier and the people, the result of which came near bankrupting the country.

But, sir, to return; the Commissioner claims that he is powerless under the law to prevent fraud, and therefore insists on the passage of his sixty-surgeons bill, or traveling menagerie.

Sir, let us examine the facts as the law now exists and see what the powers of the Commissioner are under the present law:

SEC. 4744. The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail, from time to time, clerks in his office to investigate suspected attempts at fraud on the Government, through and by virtue of the provisions of the pension law, and to aid in prosecuting any person so offending, with such additional compensation as is customary in cases of special service; any person so detailed shall have the power to administer oaths and take affidavits in the course of any such investigation.

It will be seen from the foregoing section that the Commissioner is clothed with the unlimited power of detailing clerks from his office to investigate any and all cases of suspected fraud; and judging from the startling statement that he makes of the large per cent. of fraudulent claims that he has allowed, notwithstanding this provision of law, one would be led to the conclusion that he suspected all claims as attempts to defraud the Government.

But it is said that the evidence taken in behalf of the soldiers is ex parte, and so it is when taken by one of the Commissioner's special agents, as any member of this House knows who has had occasion to examine cases in which the evidence has been taken by special agents. And further, it is known that until recently—that is, since the change of the law at the extra session of the present Congress—that this evidence was taken without the knowledge of the soldier, and in many cases his enemies were the witnesses against him and testified under the shield of secrecy, and numbers of cases of soldiers have been dropped from the pension-rolls without their having any knowledge of who had testified against them, or what was the nature of the charges preferred. Sir, let us examine some other sections of this law.

SEC. 4771 provides as follows: In all cases of application for the payment of pensions to invalid pensioners to the 4th day of September of an odd year, the certificate of an examining surgeon * * * of the Army or Navy, stating the continuance of the disability for which the pension was originally granted, describing it, and the degree of such disability at the time of making the certificate, shall be required to accompany the vouchers, and a duplicate thereof shall be filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions; and if in a case of continued disability it shall be stated at a degree below that for which the pension was originally granted, or was last paid, the pensioner shall only be paid for the quarter then due at the rate stated in the certificate. But where the pension was originally granted for a disability in consequence of the loss of a limb, or other essential portion of the body, or for other cause which cannot, either in whole or in part, be removed, or when a disability is certified, by competent examining surgeons, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions, to have become permanent in a degree equal to the whole rate of pension, the above certificate shall not be necessary to entitle the pensioner to payment.

SEC. 4772. Nothing in the preceding section shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Pensions from requiring a more frequent examination, if, in his judgment, it is necessary.

This section, it will be seen, gives the Commissioner the power to make examinations more frequent or as often as he may think proper, so as to guard the public interest against fraud or improper payments of money.

SEC. 4774. The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to organize, at his discretion, boards of examining surgeons, not to exceed three members, and each member of a board thus organized who is actually present and makes, in connection with other members or member, an ordered or periodical examination, shall be entitled to the fee of $1, on receipt of a proper certificate of such examination by the Commissioner of Pensions.

It will be seen from this section that the Commissioner of Pensions is empowered to appoint at his discretion not a board, but boards of surgeons, it being discretionary with him as to what numbers.

SEC. 4775. Examining surgeons duly appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, and such other qualified surgeons as may be employed in the Pension Office, may be required by him from time to time, as he deems for the interest of the Government, to make special examinations of pensioners or applicants for pension, and such examinations shall have precedence over previous examinations, whether special or biennial; but when injustice is alleged to have been done by an examination so ordered, the Commissioner of Pensions may, at his discretion, select a board of three duly appointed examining surgeons, who shall meet at a place to be designated by him, and shall review such cases as may be ordered before them on appeal from any special examination, and the decision of such board shall be final on the question so submitted thereto, provided the Commissioner approve the same.

This section also authorizes the commissioners to send out examining surgeons, employed in the Pension Office, from time to time to make special examinations of pensioners or applicants for pensions, and he may in his discretion select a board to examine cases where injustice is alleged, and such examination shall be final, provided he approve the same. Here again all turns on the judgment or will of the Commissioner, without regard to how meritorious the case may be.

SEC. 4746. Every person who knowingly or willfully in any wise procures the making or presentation of any false or fraudulent affidavit concerning any claim for pension, or payment thereof, or pertaining to any other matter within the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Pensions, or who knowingly or willfully presents or causes to be presented at any pension agency any power of attorney or other paper required as a voucher in drawing a pension, which paper bears a date subsequent to that on which it was actually signed or executed, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both.

This section provides a penalty for the violation of the pension laws, and sections 4744, 4771, 4772, 4774, 4775, and 4777 provides the means by which the Commissioner can make examination of suspected frauds or of persons who are making application for pension, and these sections leave it discretionary with him how many special agents he will send out and how often he will have examinations made by these agents and surgeons of his own appointment. And in all these cases the final disposal of each case is left discretionary with him, so that they may be made to his entire satisfaction; for it seems that the mission of the law was, if possible, to please the Commissioner, for it certainly gives him unlimited power so far as ferreting out fraud or to make special examinations as long as he may suspect fraud, or, in the language of the law, to his discretion.

SEC. 4777. The Commissioner of Pensions is empowered to appoint, at his discretion, civil surgeons to make periodical examinations of pensioners which are or may be required by law, and to examine applicants for pensions, where he deems an examination by a surgeon appointed by him necessary.

An objection is urged against the appointment of civil surgeons who will have the authority to examine his neighbors and patrons, for the reason that his interest and sympathy would both be in the interest of the soldier. Sir, if this argument would be good then the same argument would be good against a judge who may be elected to preside on the bench and try cases in which his neighbors are arraigned, and it would still have greater force against a judge who owed his position to his partisan friends, and who, from a political stand-point, would be dependent on his partisan friends for re-election, and therefore should not be allowed to try any case wherein his partisan friends are a party to a suit pending in his court.

Another objection urged is that the fee received is too small to secure an honest and faithful examination by these surgeons; that is, they will make an honest and faithful examination in accordance with the law if they are paid a large fee, and a dishonest one if the fee is small. Certainly this is not very complimentary to these examining surgeons who are appointed all over the country; and certainly when it is publicly announced by the Commissioner that wholesale frauds exist all over the country, the inference would rest very heavily on these surgeons if these charges are true that these surgeons are of necessity a party to these frauds. But certainly it will not be very complimentary to the Commissioner when the country comes to know that these surgeons are all appointed by him. And, therefore, might not the charge rest against him for a want of proper care in making these appointments.

Now, sir, let us examine this question of the great increase of applications for pensions and see if the alarm sounded by the Commissioner in his report is warranted. I, therefore, adopt the following as part of my remarks on this subject:

TABLE I.—Number of pensions allowed and increased during the year, with their annual value, together with the yearly value of all pensions on the roll, and the amount paid for pensions during the year.

In the—	Pensions allowed and increased during the year.						Dropped from the roll.		Reduction in rate.		Whole number of pensioners on the roll June 30, 1880.	Yearly value of pensions as shown by the roll June 30, 1880.	Total amount paid for pensions during the year ending June 30, 1880.
	Original.		Increase.		Restoration.
	Number.	Yearly value.	Number.	Yearly value.	Number.	Yearly value.	Number.	Yearly value.	Number.	Yearly value.
Army:
Invalids	9,865	$696,666 18	8,917	$419,099 00	1,146	$57,265 00	2,949	$355,030 00	149	$8,065 68	133,212	$13,486,961 22	$20,524,839 46
Widows, &c	4,254	523,449 05	280	12,992 00	172	17,796 00	6,828	762,824 00	2,554	64,211 64	78,772	8,515,585 20	12,319,805 93
Navy:
Invalids	311	27,062 20	74	4,810 00	21	1,365 00	116	11,232 00	.....	.....	2,060	247,232 18	352,101 18
Widows, &c	201	27,252 00	15	540 00	2	312 00	105	13,689 00	48	1,368 00	1,870	318,880 00	400,670 79
War of 1812:
Survivors	284	27,264 00	.....	.....	34	3,264 00	1,801	177,896 00	.....	.....	10,138	973,248 00	790,710 39
Widows of, &c	4,630	444,480 00	.....	.....	2	192 00	1,076	103,296 00	.....	.....	24,750	2,376,000 00	2,658,058 14
Total	19,545	1,746,173 43	9,286	437,441 00	1,377	80,194 00	12,875	1,423,967 00	2,751	73,645 32	250,802	25,917,906 60	37,046,185 89

One hundred and ninety-one claims for bounty land and 29,662 claims for arrears of pensions were allowed during the year. Total amount paid during the year to new pensioners, upon first payments, is to—

Army invalids	$7,236,959 69
Army widows, &c	4,215,871 78
Navy invalids	159,159 41
Navy widows, &c	135,201 62
War of 1812, survivors	54,816 70
War of 1812, widows of, &c	666,182 10
	12,468,191 30

The above table will be found in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, page 17. It will be observed that 9,865 invalid pensioners were placed on the pension-rolls during the year 1880, with a total cost for their arrears of $7,236,959.69, or an average to each invalid pensioner of $733.59+. There were also placed upon the pension-rolls during the said year 4,254 widows and other heirs, to whom were paid as arrears $4,215,871.78, or an average to each of $991.03+.

On page 23 of the same report the Commissioner states that there were pending June 30, 1880, 236,066 original invalid claims. Multiplying this gross number by the average in each case allowed during the year 1880, namely, $733.59, the amount would be $173,175,656.94. On the same page (23) of said report the Commissioner states that there were pending June 30, 1880, 71,631 widows' and other heirs' claims. Multiplying this gross number by the average amount allowed each of this class of claimants during the year 1880, namely, $991.03, it amounts to $70,988,469.93. Adding these two amounts together, that is the invalid claims and the widows' and other heirs', there were pending 307,697, to which would be paid the sum of $244,164,126.87, or an average of $793.52+; this supposing that every one of the 307,697 were allowed. These figures were taken from Mr. Bentley's report, and thus show conclusively that in no event would they amount to more than the sum stated.

The Commissioner admits in his letter of January 20, 1881, to Secretary Schurz, by whom it was transmitted to the Hon. H. G. DAVIS, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that there should be deducted 30 per cent. on account of claims which will not be allowed. A more proper reduction would be to reduce at once this total of 307,697 by eliminating one-third, or 102,565+, as cases already rejected or abandoned and improperly in the files of "pending cases," he having consolidated the rejected files with the pending files, and reporting to Congress only two classes of claims, "admitted" and "pending;" and under the head of "pending" including all claims which have been rejected or abandoned during the whole period since the commencement of the war of 1861-'65. Mr. Bentley himself, in his report of 1878, admits eighty thousand of these as "rejected," "settled," "disposed of." They were once borne separately as "rejected," and are now falsely entered as "pending" or "live" cases.

A further additional reduction of 20 per cent. should be made from the 205,132 remaining cases, which will for various reasons be rejected in the future or abandoned, making 143,591 to be deducted from 307,697, leaving only 164,106 to be added to the rolls. Multiplying this 164,106 by the average above indicated, $793.52+, it would require but $130,221,393.12 as the total amount required to pay the arrears to all claimants who will be entitled to future benefits under the arrears law.

These figures are based upon the presumption that the pensions hereafter granted would be made at as high a grade as were those allowed during the year 1880.

The Commissioner of Pensions states in his testimony before the Select Committee of the House of Representatives, on page 11: "These and other like influences conspired to keep those having slight wounds and light diseases, and were in comfortable circumstances, from filing claims for pension. Some of them, too, did not think it worth while, feeling that a pension of two or four dollars a month would not amount to anything," &c. This fact, stated by the Commissioner, together with the additional fact that thousands of claims filed under the arrears law were from widows who remarried within one, two or three years, or soon after the death of the soldier; thus they would be entitled to but one, two, or three hundred dollars. The average to each would therefore be less than the average to each pensioner during the year 1880, during which period it was $793.52+.

Six hundred dollars is a liberal average for arrears to those who are to be hereafter added; that is, to the 164,106; but at this rate the total arrears would amount to but $98,463,600; but if the great number of 200,000 should be added to the roll, at this average it would amount to but $120,000,000, instead of $510,000,000, or thereabouts, as reported by the Commissioner of Pensions.

It has been reported by the Commissioner of Pensions and others that the yearly value of the roll would amount for many years to $50,000,000, or thereabouts. This is exceedingly erroneous. It will be found by referring to this same table that there were dropped from the rolls during the year 1880, 12,875 pensioners, with the yearly value of their pensions amounting to $1,423,967; that there were 2,751 pensioners reduced in rate to the amount of $73,645.32 per annum, making a total reduction in the yearly value of $1,497,612.32. It will also be found, by this same table, that there were 19,545 added to the roll during the year 1880, at a yearly value of $1,746,173.43; that there were 9,286 pensioners increased in rating to the yearly amount of $437,441, and that there were restored to the rolls 1,377 pensioners at a total cost of $80,194, making the total additional cost of the pension-roll, by the addition thereto of 19,545 pensioners, increasing the rates of 9,286, and restoring to the rolls 1,377—$2,263,808.43. Deducting from this additional cost the reduction before referred to, the yearly additional cost of the entire roll, notwithstanding that there have been 19,545 added thereto, is but $766,196.11, or an average additional cost of only $39.20+.

This table, therefore, demonstrates that after deducting the losses, it costs but $39.20+ of annual payments on the average to place a pensioner upon the roll. Applying this average to the probable additions to the pension-rolls, namely, 164,106, it will cost annually but $6,432,955.20; add to this the present yearly value of pensions as appears from this table, to wit, $25,917,906.60, it makes a total of $32,350,861.80. If the rolls be increased by the addition of a total number of 200,000, it would cost but $7,840,000 in addition to the present yearly value, making for the total 200,000 so added a gross yearly value of only $33,757,906.60, the highest amount that the yearly value of the pension-roll can ever reach under existing law, instead of $50,000,000, or thereabouts, reported by the Commissioner of Pensions.

It will be observed that in these figures no reduction has been made in the yearly value of the addition on account of the claims being from soldiers slightly wounded or diseased. The additions to the pension-roll will not average more than grade of one-half total—$4 per month or $48 per year. During the last year original invalids received on an average $70.62+.

The fact that those to be added to the rolls are for "slight wounds and light diseases," as appears from the testimony of Commissioner Bentley, (page 11, select committee House of Representatives,) will make the average rates lower than heretofore and prevent the yearly value of the pension-roll ever exceeding $32,500,000.

Number of pensions allowed and increased during the year, and number restored and dropped: original, 19,545; increase, 9,286; restored, 1,377; dropped from roll, 12,875; total, 43,083. It will be seen from the above table that the total number of original claims allowed during the past year are 19,545 and the force of clerks and employés are about five hundred. That would be a fraction over thirty-nine to each employé for the year, or three and one-third cases per month. But this may be claimed to be unfair, as it would not represent all the work of the office for that period; there we will give credit for all the items in the above table, and we find the following result: total number of original, increase, restored, died, dropped, 43,083. This number would be a fraction over eighty-six per each employé per year, or a fraction over eight and a half per month. But I am informed that during the month preceding the October election in Indiana last fall there were 4,000 cases of original pensions allowed in that State and in the State of New York. Will the Commissioner explain how this happened? Did he have these cases properly considered, or did he by extraordinary efforts and hard work manage to get this amount of labor performed at this particular time and at the particular places referred to, or was this large excess over the monthly average taken into the account by the Commissioner and charged up to the account of fraudulent claims allowed by him? And we would inquire if the whole force of his office was put to work solely in these two States, or was the work in the same proportion performed in the other States; and if so, how does it happen that the year's work makes 19,545 original claims allowed?

Court of Pensions.

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM R. MYERS,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 1, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 5394) to organize a court of pensions.

Mr. MYERS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am aware that it is late in the session for one to attempt to speak on any question, however important it may be, at any length. Yet I feel constrained to trespass somewhat on the good nature of the House for the reason that since the 12th of January, 1880, I have had the honor of serving on the select committee created by a resolution of this House for the purpose of examining and inquiring into the method and manner of the payment of pensions, arrears of pensions, bounty, and back pay, and to ascertain whether any irregularities exist in the payment of the same, and to investigate any subject of complaint that might be lodged against the existing management of the Pension Office.

In the discharge of the duty thus imposed upon me I have given much time, labor, and attention to the subject-matter indicated. Many witnesses have been examined, (all of whom, without a single exception, are republicans in politics,) both on the general conduct of the business of the Pension Office and in the details of the prosecution of claims.

The Commissioner of Pensions and his heads of divisions have appeared before the committee, and a number of gentlemen largely engaged in the prosecution of pension claims have been heard. The main questions before the committee were to ascertain the existing state of affairs in the Pension Office, and next, to consider what, if any, were necessary for the improvement of the conditions so found.

From the entire evidence before us I am clearly of the opinion that the administration of the Pension Office more than any other depends upon the personality of its chief; that it may be vigorous and active or weak and inefficient, according to the color and character of mind of the Commissioner; that it is more free from rigid law, more open to individual judgment, more liable to change with the changing mood of its head. The discretion vested in the Commissioner under existing laws is practically unbounded. The definitions and limitations prescribed by law are few, and scarcely trench in the least degree upon his freedom of decision and of action. The powers vested in him to execute his high functions are very large, and his means of enforcing such demands as he thinks proper to make are most thorough and effectual.

From these conceded facts of wide discretion and of abundant power to perform his duties there arises a special and very serious responsibility, that the duties with which he is charged shall be well performed, and it is natural and proper that he be held to unusual liability to censure if the great purposes of his office are not well carried out. Congress has always been very liberal to this bureau in granting promptly whatever seemed to be necessary for satisfactory results. It is an undisputed fact, conceded by all, that the administration of the office has not been satisfactory. The files of the Pensions Committees of both Houses are full of hundreds of cases rejected in the Pension Office and allowed on appeal to Congress. That these rejections have been made on insufficient grounds is shown by many reports in each House criticising and condemning the judgments and the course of reasoning adhered to in the Pension Office. That there has been great and unwarrantable delay in the settlement of just cases and the allowance of pensions is voiced from every part of the country, is proven by clear testimony before us, and has been repeatedly stated by the Commissioner himself in official reports. On two separate occasions he has practically admitted these facts, and in words which have too much significance not to be frequently repeated.

I herewith reproduce from Commissioner Bentley's letter to Hon. A. V. Rice, chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, dated January, 1878:

> The duties pertaining to the settlement of pension claims partake largely of a judicial nature. The officer who is charged with the duty of admitting or rejecting the claims must be convinced by the proof adduced either that the claim is just or that it is without merit, and the difficulty which is now experienced by the persons charged with the settlement of the claims which have accumulated and those which are now being filed is that they cannot bring themselves to believe the testimony which is offered.

In an address before the Grand Army of the Republic, at Philadelphia, Mr. Bentley says:

> And when it is remembered that the current receipt of new claims is not less than four hundred per day, a number much greater than the office is able to settle from day to day, the condition of the business of settling the pensions can only be described as wholly bad.

Thus, by all classes of testimony and by the official reports of the Commissioner himself, it must be taken as a conceded fact that very great and very vexatious delay has occurred under his administration.

Inasmuch as these delays act to the great prejudice of a class of persons deserving of the highest sympathy, and very frequently in the most extreme need of the relief sought, they are more pernicious and more to be regretted than if their burdens were cast upon a different class of people; and therefore there is a special demand upon the officers charged with these duties for great diligence, entire impartiality, and a just discrimination. The evidence adduced confirms me in the opinion that the administration of the Pension Office under Commissioner Bentley has not shown such diligence, impartiality, and just discrimination, and that the interests of those claiming pensions have been seriously injured by unreasonable delays in adjudication of cases by his reluctance to credit testimony filed by the applicant. Nor is this to be wondered at when it is considered that the Commissioner has apparently surrendered himself to the conviction that there exists a conspiracy of wonderful magnitude, embracing claimants, witnesses, examining surgeons, and all other persons interested in the procuring of pensions, to defraud the United States and to obtain money by fraud, falsehood, and perjury. I am bound to presume that this conviction is honest on his part, but it none the less unfits him for fair judicial determination of cases submitted to him.

It is evidently useless to furnish testimony to a judge who declares in advance that he cannot bring himself to believe the testimony offered; yet this is precisely the position which the Commissioner has deliberately assumed; this is the broad censure which he has cast upon the whole mass of claims pending and hereafter to be filed. He affects to believe that there does exist under present laws any meaning to distinguish truth from falsehood, and therefore confesses his own incapacity to perform his duties. He has for years sought to make Congress and the country believe that fraud in obtaining pensions was easy to commit, difficult to detect, and safe in results. He has repeatedly charged upon a large and most deserving class of citizens readiness to conspire for criminal purposes, swiftness to bear false witness, and a disposition to rob the public Treasury for private advantage.

That these charges are general and indiscriminate only makes the wrong more bitter and more difficult to right, and the cruelty of the charge is enhanced by the remembrance of the services and sufferings of those upon whom it is so recklessly made. There is no class of our people of whom such a charge is true; least of all is it true of soldiers of the Republic, their widows, and dependents.

When, therefore, Mr. Bentley asserts that 10 per cent. of the money paid out in pensions is paid upon false and fraudulent claims, he asserts what no cool, dispassionate man believes, and the fact that he makes the assertion is only evidence of his utter partiality and prejudice. His assertion, then, should have no weight as evidence on ground of legislation unless he proceeds to substantiate it by giving the data, the facts on which he rests so gross a charge. He has been repeatedly called upon for the elements of his calculations, and has not yet in any instance furnished to Congress or the public anything but his own simple and audacious guess-work, unsupported by anything which approaches to the dignity of evidence. On account, therefore, of the confessed prejudice so clearly exhibited, I do not consider that Mr. Bentley occupies the position of a fair and trustworthy witness, and I am not inclined to follow him any further than he shows reasonable grounds for me to follow. For some reason or other it appears that Mr. Bentley, because dissatisfied with the law which Congress gave him to administer, and instead of applying his energies and those of his subordinates to bring the best possible results out of the existing system, which has existed from the foundation of the Government, he seems to have devoted most of his time and energy to constructing other and wholly different systems of law and procedure in pension cases. This system has been pressed upon both Houses in some form or other since 1876.

One of the means to bring about the desired change evidently was to make the old system appear as bad as possible, and as the value of the system would very much depend upon the results produced in its administration, and as the administration of the Pension Office is almost at the uncontrolled discretion of the Commissioner, it was a very easy thing for him so to conduct his office that there should be just and universal complaint of the condition of affairs. Such unquestionably was the result. Whether it was intended or not, the fact remains indisputable. To all the just complaints made his answer was that "it was a vice inherent in the system of procedure." When pressed to know wherein the system was defective his reply was and is "that the evidence taken was secret and ex parte; that it admitted of, encouraged, and became the necessary parent of perjury and conspiracy; that the Pension Office had no means of cross-examination and detection, and thus was wholly at the mercy of the manufacturer of false testimony; and by the assumption of these things as facts he has vindicated his inability to bring himself to believe evidence, and his consequent unwillingness to allow claims upon evidence so tainted.

I cannot allow these statements and others of a like character made by Mr. Bentley to pass unanswered. In the first place, there is no office in the Government, in my opinion, so wholly untrammeled by legislation as the Pension Office. There is none which has now such unlimited discretion in the making and enforcing of rules and regulations in regard to the mode, character, and amount of testimony which may be required to prove a case. It is competent for the Commissioner to send as many times as he pleases for testimony. He is in no way bound to take the first, the second, or the third affidavit as final proof. He may require answers to any number of questions, repeated any number of times. He may sift, examine, and re-examine until he is satisfied. The original affidavits of the claimant and the affidavits of his witnesses are submitted to the severest and most crucial criticisms. They are compared with the existing records of muster-rolls, hospital records, and other entries made contemporaneous with the alleged muster in with the wound or disability and the contemporaneous treatment. The signature of claimant, if a soldier, and of his witnesses, officers or comrades, or regimental or other surgeons are compared as to genuineness with those on the record in the War Department, and they must fit exactly and precisely. To these records neither the claimant nor his attorneys have access, and the fraudulent claims which fit in all these requirements must be miraculous, unless, as in most instances that have occurred, it has been perpetrated by some clerk in the Pension Office having access to the records. In all these respects, then, the office has the advantages of cross-examination to a far greater extent than the mere answering of oral interrogatories. It is difficult to see how, with unintelligent officers to administer the law and with so many checks, unknown to the claimant, it can be possible to carry through a false and fraudulent case upon the original claim.

But it is said the evidence is "secret." In what sense the Commissioner means this to be understood I have no means of knowing. The application must be made before a known public officer, selected by the people themselves to fulfill an important public duty. It must be certified by him as all other public acts are certified; and, as a fact of general experience in the country at large, the entire neighborhood knows of every pension application which is made; it is a matter of notoriety and of talk among neighbors.

There is nothing in the present laws to forbid the Commissioner from designating any officer who can lawfully administer an oath, in any town or neighborhood, as the person before whom subsequent evidence shall be taken; there is nothing to prevent him from framing and requiring answers to ingenious questions, to be answered before such officer by any and every witness called and sworn in support of a claim. He has the power now, under sections 184, 185, and 186 of the Revised Statutes, to invoke the powers of the courts of the United States, when he thinks his case will warrant it. In short, there is scarcely any conceivable limit to his capacity to designate officers, to file cross-interrogatories, to require full, fair, complete, and exhaustive answers, and to enforce compliance with his orders.

When, in addition to all this, a sum of $40,000 annually is voted him for the purpose of employing and paying a detective force, when he is armed with all the powers of the courts of the United States, the one to detect and the other to punish frauds, it would seem that Congress had fully equipped him with all the necessary implements to ascertain the truth and punish falsehood. If he has not used these implements, if it be indeed true that he allows vast sums of money to be annually abstracted by fraud in support of which not one word of testimony has been elicited by the committee, then this officer is unworthy of his office, and on the ground of incapacity should, for the good of the country, be retired from his position. If, on the other hand, this fearful charge of wholesale and successful rascality is not sustained by fact, what condemnation can be too severe for so malign a slanderer upon a defenseless multitude of deserving and suffering people. Yet the records of his office show no convictions, or even prosecutions, at all proportionate, none that even suggest the possibility of so vast a wrong.

The real state of feeling in the Pension Office is most admirably stated by Senator BLAIR, who says: "The Pension Office is an organized suspicion." I am therefore forced to the conclusion that the acknowledged defects in the Pension Office are due to the administration of the office, and not inherent in the system itself. I believe from my examination that it is perfectly in the compass of an enlightened and impartial administrator of existing law to pass intelligently and fairly upon claims filed, to detect incongruities, to draw out the truth by examination, to sift the genuine from the false, to complete and allow in a reasonable time the honest cases and punish the dishonest ones; and all this without any serious changes in mode of testimony now familiar and well known. Such intelligent and impartial administration I think is due to the pensioner and the claimant; but it is in nowise to be expected from the present Commissioner, whose manifest bias and prejudice appears by his own statements and acts. Having given some prominence to Mr. Bentley's views as to the alleged defects in the present system, it will only be just to him to consider briefly his remedy.

This remedy as now urged by Mr. Bentley consists in the creation of a large number of new officers, two in each congressional district, one of whom shall be a briefless disciple of Blackstone, and the other a patientless follower of Esculapius—if we may gauge them by the personnel of the Pension Office as now constituted—who will have no more or greater power than can now be exercised under the direction of the Pension Office by any officer authorized to take evidence. They are to be surgeons and lawyers of alleged standing, and are to be paid by fees. Yet they will have no power to subpœna witnesses or to enforce. They have no judicial functions to perform; they are vested with no judicial authority. They are to listen to anybody who chooses to come and be sworn, and may ask questions in explanation of the statement made, but they cannot call other witnesses to contradict or impeach. They are simply commissioners to take testimony to be reported back to Washington to be examined and passed upon by the chiefs of division and their subordinates, all of whom are under the surveillance of the Commissioner of Pensions, and none of whom, according to the testimony adduced before the committee, ever read a book on the law of evidence or on any other branch of the law. These proposed officers will give no judgment; they will render no opinion.

No provision is made in the bill referred to for either claimants or witnesses who reside outside of the States or Territories where there are no congressional districts. No provision is made for cases of constant occurrence where the witnesses are scattered in different States; and if provision should be made, the delays and difficulties of transfer of papers would be endless.

The whole scheme is impracticable and absurd, and can produce but one result, the multiplication of unnecessary offices and the filing of large bills for traveling expenses and fees to be paid by the Government; the unnecessary increase of patronage without any diminution, but rather an increase, in the force of clerks in the Pension Office at Washington. Yet to sustain this wild scheme the Commissioner of Pensions has devoted his whole efforts and all the weight of his office. To sustain this he has entered into elaborate calculations based upon false foundations intended to influence Congress. He has overstated the amount and number of claims alive and pending by adding to them many thousands which he had previously in his official reports classed as "settled" and "disposed of." He has given widely varying and widely extravagant estimates of the sums due and to become due from the arrears-of-pensions act, all along from $25,000,000 to $710,000,000. He has given an official estimate of the life of a pensioner at twenty-two years, putting the wounded or invalid soldier at the rate of expectancy of life proper to men of ordinary sound health, and thus contradicting his own careful and reasonable estimate made in 1876, in which he placed the probable average duration of a pensioner's life at its true value of eight years. He has stated the average of arrears at about eleven hundred dollars, when his own carefully prepared tables show the average to be $800.

I cannot resist the conclusion that these strange statements, so visionary in amounts, so contradictory to his own records, must have been made with a purpose, and I cannot discover any other purpose than to create a belief in a state of things so fearful in magnitude, so enormous in peril, that Congress would blindly seize any scheme offered that would indicate relief. But inasmuch as it is certain that no such state of facts exists as is charged by Mr. Bentley; as it appears that with the present machinery, fairly and honestly used, with the dead matter eliminated out of the files, it is possible for an honest and intelligent Commissioner to clear up and settle within five years all the cases that ever ought to be allowed and to reject all that ought not to be allowed, I am clearly of the opinion that it is not wise to change the existing system, and that relief can best be had by the change of the Commissioner, whose course, in my judgment, has not been to the credit of the Government, to his own honor, or to the advantage of the honest beneficiaries of the pension laws.

As an illustration of the manner in which the question of frauds is treated by the Commissioner, I refer to the only definite or specific statement of facts called to the attention of the committee appointed by authority of the House of Representatives of the present Congress to inquire into the condition of his office during the repeated opportunities afforded him for that purpose.

In making his statements (see page 57 of printed testimony, and appendix thereto, page 40, March 3, 1880) he produced a table said to contain the history of five hundred cases, of which he said "the names of these fraudulent pensioners have been dropped from the roll since July 1, 1876, because they had been fraudulently placed there, the parties having no title whatever to a pension."

Again, referring to this same list of five hundred alleged fraudulent cases, on page 552, under date of February 17, 1881, he says "these were cases that were originally frauds, where the pensioners never had a right to have a pension." In view of these statements, charging in such unqualified terms that not one of these pensioners ever had a right to a pension, it becomes a matter of surprise to find upon an examination of the table presented that already two of these alleged fraudulent pensioners had been restored to the rolls, to wit: D. B. Rayner, certificate No. 114651, and Henry Wadsworth, certificate No. 132534, and that he now has under advisement one hundred and eighty applications for restoration from persons found on this list.

A further scrutiny of this table fails to show with any reasonable degree of probability that more than thirty-six of the whole number were fraudulent in their inception. A table of these cases is herewith submitted, showing the classes to which they belonged, the particular grounds alleged as the reason of their being dropped from the rolls, with the number under each head, and their condition when the table was made up:

Table of pensioners dropped from the rolls between July 1, 1876, and March 3, 1880, because, as alleged by the Commissioner of Pensions, "they have been fraudulently placed there, the parties having no title whatever to any pension."

Total number dropped	501
CLASSES OF PENSIONERS.
Late war:
Invalids	229
Widows, &c	266
War 1812:
Survivors	3
Widows	3
COLORED PENSIONERS.
Invalids	3
Widows, &c	18
CAUSES FOR WHICH PENSIONERS WERE DROPPED.
Disability existed prior to enlistment	186
Disability originated since service	45
Disability not incurred in line of duty or not due to the service	75
Non-dependence	149
Not related to soldier as claimed	25
Frauds, false personations, &c	11
Nearer relative than pensioner living	2
No disability	3
1812.—Not in the service	3
1812.—Married subsequent to February 17, 1815	2
PRESENT CONDITION OF CASES.
Still under consideration	180
Pensioners restored	2
Calls made and information furnished	120
No action had; since dropped	199

From an examination of this table it will be seen that twenty-five were dropped because not related to the soldier as claimed, and eleven by "reason of false personation of either the soldier himself or of surviving relatives." These two classes, numbering thirty-six all told, were probably fraudulent in their inception, and of them it may be no stretch of allegation to say that they "never had a right to have a pension."

But what shall be said of the one hundred and eighty-six of whom it is alleged that the disability existed prior to enlistment, and of the one hundred and forty-nine fathers and mothers of whom it is said they were not dependent upon the soldier, and of the forty-five in which it is said the disability originated after the soldier left the service, and of the seventy-five of whom it is said the disability was not incurred in line of duty? Are all these necessarily and of a certainty frauds? If so, why are one hundred and eighty applications from these various classes for restoration still held under advisement, and why is it that two similar applicants have already been successful? And the Commissioner himself says, speaking on the 17th of February, 1881, nearly one year after the table in question was prepared:

> There may be five or ten in the list that have been restored. (See page 552 of testimony.)

Why is the sweeping charge of fraud made against every one of these five hundred comparatively helpless people when the records of his office show that from two to ten of the number have been restored, and the claims of one hundred and eighty to restoration are now being considered, and in one hundred and twenty other cases calls for further evidence have been made, and others still continued to give them an opportunity of being restored? Either gross injustice and an irreparable wrong has been done to more than three hundred of these pensioners in proclaiming repeatedly to the world that they are fraudulent and that they had been fraudulently placed upon the rolls, because "having no title whatever to a pension," or the office is singularly disposed to waste its time in considering the question of their restoration. If all were known to be fraudulent when dropped from the rolls, why waste time and money in considering the propriety of restoring more than three hundred of them?

It seems that it would be difficult to make a more humiliating confession of imbecility or of recklessness than is exhibited in immediate connection with the official action had in dealing with these five hundred so-called frauds.

Included in this list of five hundred are three survivors of the war of 1812, who, it seems, are unable to prove their military service, and two widows of the war of 1812, unable to prove marriage to the soldier before February 17, 1815. What grounds do the cases of those aged people furnish for the publication of so grave a charge as that of fraud, either actual or implied? Who but a reckless official, lacking either in judgment or principle, or perhaps both, would think of holding up to the scorn of the world five aged and perhaps infirm old people as frauds, because one class has probably forgotten the organization in which they served their country sixty years before, and the other had outlived all the witnesses to their marriage? Such recklessness in private life is inexcusable, and in a public officer unpardonable. It is apparent that the object in magnifying the comparatively few frauds now existing among our pensioners and the applicants therefor is to create an impression in the public mind that an imperative necessity exists for a change in the method and machinery for examining and adjudicating claims for pension.

But a very little scrutiny into the detail of this table of five hundred so-called frauds demonstrates that if such a necessity ever did exist it has long since passed away, and that admitting every case contained in the table in question to be fraudulent, the legitimate and only conclusion to be drawn from it is that fewer frauds exist now than ever during the last twenty years, and that the number is diminishing rapidly every year.

To illustrate this a table is hereto annexed, showing in what year each of these alleged fradulent claims were filed, by which it will be seen that of the 500, or rather 501, as an actual count shows the latter to be the correct number, 393 were filed prior to the close of the year 1870, and that only 108 of the number were filed between 1871 and 1878, inclusive, and only 2 were filed in the year 1878, and not one of them in 1879 or later.

Table of pensioners dropped from the rolls between July 1, 1876, and March 3, 1880, and the number of such claims filed each year.

Year.	Number filed.
1862	5
1863	44
1864	20
1865	54
1866	65
1867	34
1868	41
1869	74
1870	52
Date of filing not stated, but from the number of the certificate must have been some time prior to 1870	4
		393
1871	27
1872	17
1873	19
1874	16
1875	13
1876	8
1877	6
1878	2
		108
Total		501

If, then, it appears that of the number found in this table 41, 74, and 52 were filed respectively in the years 1868, 1869, and 1870, and only 8, 6, and 2 in the years 1876, 1877, and 1878, what other conclusion can any reasonable mind arrive at than that the present period is as free from frauds among this most worthy and deserving class of our people as can be expected under any system that the present Commissioner of Pensions is likely to suggest or that the sagacity of Congress will enable it to adopt. No system will ever eradicate any existing fraud, nor prove a perfect preventive of all future wrong; but one that develops results as favorable as is exhibited by this alleged table of frauds, presented as an argument for changing the present methods, cannot wisely be thrown aside to make room for an experiment originating in the brain of an official before he had acquired six months' experience in administering the affairs of this most important and delicate branch of our Government.

Why change a system under the administration of which frauds have become merely nominal to experiment with a new one, the results of which can only be ascertained after years of trial, and at best promises no better results in the prevention of frauds and in other respects is open to fatal objections?

For some years past a practice has prevailed in the Pension Office of detailing employés of that office to investigate suspected attempts at fraud upon the Government in pension claims. The authority for this practice is derived from section 4744 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

> The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail, from time to time, clerks in his office to investigate suspected attempts at fraud on the Government through and by virtue of the provisions of the pension laws, and to aid in prosecuting any person so offending, with such additional compensation as is customary in cases of special service; and any person so detailed shall have the power to administer oaths and take affidavits in the course of any such investigation.

To enable the Commissioner of Pensions to exercise the authority thus conferred, it has been the custom of Congress of late years to make an annual appropriation of $40,000 for this specific object. The money thus appropriated for the use of the special-service branch of the Pension Office has for some time past been reduced to a perfect "slush" fund. In its expenditure the grossest and most flagrant abuses prevail. Clerks are sent to their homes during campaign seasons for the purpose of voting and rendering other political and party service. Pleasure tours during the summer months to fashionable places of resort are of frequent occurrence, on which occasions the wives of the detailed clerks accompany them. Personal profit and private business trips are frequently indulged in, and in every conceivable manner and under every imaginary pretext this fund, created by Congress for the detection of fraudulent pension claims, is used and perverted from its proper channel and made to serve the personal ends of those in authority in the Pension Bureau, until the fact has become notorious that more fraud is perpetrated upon the Government in the expenditure of this money than is detected or prevented by the whole force of special agents combined. Notoriously is this the fact in the case of the present chief of special agents, Tolbert Lanston, who for years past has fattened upon the spoils of his office and filched this fund under every guise of law for his own personal gain and profit, and has permitted his co-workers and pet favorites to do likewise.

To illustrate the wholesale and systematic manner in which the public Treasury is plundered by the men appointed to ferret out and punish fraud, I would invite attention to page 374 of the testimony taken by the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, which has particular reference to Tolbert Lanston, Commissioner Bentley's present chief of special agents:

> 3. During the same year, [1873,] while still chief of the special service division, he made a trip, upon which his wife accompanied him, to Watkins Glen; thence to Niagara Falls; thence to Lake Ontario, down the lake to the river Saint Lawrence; thence to Lake Champlain, down Lake Champlain to the Hudson River, returning to Washington by way of New York City, having stopped at Saratoga, for which trips he charged the special-service fund ten cents for each and every mile traveled, and $4 per day, and in addition thereto received a salary of $150 per month, and rendered no adequate service therefor.
>
> Copy of voucher covering the trip:
>
> JULY 28, 1873—AUGUST 15, 1873.

	Miles.
Washington to Buffalo	446
Buffalo to Ogdensburgh	314
Ogdensburgh to Saint Albans	118
Saint Albans to Enosburgh Falls	19
Enosburgh Falls to Berkshire	13
Enosburgh Falls to Saint Albans	19
Saint Albans to Washington, District of Columbia	598
White Hall, New York, to Rutland, Vermont	25
Rutland to Mendon	16
Mendon to Rutland	16
Rutland to country	9
Rutland to Sargentsville	18
Rutland to White Hall	25
Port Henry to Crown Point Centre	20
Port Henry to Crown Point Top	22
Total	1,680
At ten cents per mile	$168
Per diem, eighteen days, at $4 per day	72
Total	240

> In connection with this voucher attention is invited to the Evening Star of September 2 and 3, 1873, in which appears a letter written by Mr. Lanston, signed "Husband and wife," of which the following is an extract:
>
> NIAGARA, August 2, 1873.
>
> "All aboard, Baltimore to New York, (form 44,) via Ralston, Minnequa Springs, Watkins Glen, Seneca Lake, Clifton Springs, Niagara Falls, Lake Ontario to Ogdensburg; rail to Saint Albans and Burlington, Lake Champlain; steamer to Whitehall; rail to Saratoga, and day-line of steamers down the Hudson to New York City. Cost of trip $30.15. * * * With the exception of four hours' delay caused by rain on the 13th and 14th, reached home safely on the evening of the last named day, consuming eighteen days in the trip—replete with pleasure."
>
> It will be observed in the voucher covering this trip that no mention is made of Watkins Glen, Seneca Lake, Niagara Falls, and Saratoga, but in the letter published by Mr. Lanston, after his return, he clearly shows how he disposed of his time along the route, for which the service was made to pay ten cents per mile and $4 per day.
>
> Before starting out on this trip he procured one of Cook's Summer Excursion Books, and selected therefrom excursion route No. 44.
>
> He then went to the files of the office and drew therefrom cases to conform to the route. He paid, as he admits, $30.15 for his excursion ticket and charged the special service fund $240; in addition to which he received his salary of $150 per month.

This man Lanston was accused of using the funds of the special service for pleasure, private business, and personal profit, and in obedience to a subpœna appeared before the select committee, with a carefully prepared and elaborate defense of his official actions, but upon being closely questioned was forced to admit that there was profit in every one of his trips at the expense of the special-service fund; that he used this fund to defray his private traveling expenses to his home at Dayton, Ohio, when he went there to vote, and was in the habit of making annual summer excursion tours over fashionable routes of travel in company with his wife.

This same man further admitted to the committee that from January 1, 1873, to January 1, 1881, he investigated one hundred and twenty-six pension claims, in which he recovered $4,023.88; that he drew as per diem and mileage $3,336.28 from the special-service fund, and that it cost the Government the latter amount, less his salary of $1,800 per annum, to recover the former amount.

It will very readily be seen from this statement that the profit in such a transaction was on the side of the chief special agent and not on the part of the United States.

Summer evening carriage-drives, in company with his wife, around the suburbs of the national capital, at the expense of the special-service fund, is another source of amusement of this chief detecter of pension frauds.

Thousands of dollars of the public money are annually squandered by Pension Office officials in their onslaughts upon this fund in the manner indicated.

To further illustrate the abuses to which it is subjected and the personal ends to which it is used, I invite attention to page 465 of the testimony taken by the select committee, on which appears the following:

A short time since Mr. Christian Exel, a clerk in the Pension Bureau at Washington, went to Minnesota to investigate some ingenious frauds upon the Government. Now let us turn to the Saint Paul Pioneer-Press and see what progress Mr. Exel has made in his investigations. As his traveling expenses are all paid by the Government, it is interesting to study his progress in the grand work of bringing dishonesty to justice. Says the Pioneer-Press in an innocent local item: "Mr. Christian Exel, who formerly edited the Staats Zeitung, in Saint Paul, and who has been living in Washington for some years, has recently returned to Saint Paul for the purpose of looking over the ground to see if the proposed consolidation of the Staats Zeitung and the Volks Blatt, to be issued daily, will pay, with a view to taking stock in the concern." Not one solitary fraud is here mentioned except Mr. Exel himself; and unless he is greatly misrepresented, he is not only a fraud, but an outrageous fraud, and is himself the most proper subject for investigation in Minnesota. The worst of it is, Mr. Exel is far from being the only person in the employ of the Government who carries on his own business at the expense of poor, old, plundered Uncle Sam.

The Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Bentley, the man who has admitted that he cannot bring himself to believe the unsupported statement of a soldier under oath; the man who sees fraud in every honest pension claim and a perjurer in every disinterested witness; who has impregnated the very atmosphere of the Pension Office with his cry of fraud! fraud! also unites with his subordinates in the prostitution of this special fund by defraying his private traveling expenses out of it while junketing around the country during the summer months, under the pretext of inspecting pension agencies.

Whenever this scrupulously honest (?) official indulges in a summer excursion he incidentally drops in on the United States pension agent, located in the particular section of the country which he visits, or through which he passes, engages him in conversation for a brief period, and upon his return to Washington renders an account covering the trip for expenses incurred while "inspecting pension agencies," when it is an undisputed fact, well known to every person familiar with pension matters, that every particle of information contained in the office of a pension agency can be had from the duplicate records and vouchers on file in the Treasury Department at Washington.

But, Mr. Speaker, time will not permit me to dwell longer, though a tithe of the facts elicited before the committee have not been examined or alluded to.

In behalf of the scarred and veteran soldiers of the Republic, who abandoned the luxuries of home and stood in front of the enemies of the old flag until the last foe had surrendered, I ask that they may have common justice.

The pension laws as they now are have stood with but little modification since the foundation of the Government, and if administered by officers whose actions are actuated by the promptings of common justice, are the most liberal of any government on earth.

Pensions.

SPEECH OF HON. A. E. STEVENSON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, March 3, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 3283) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war.

Mr. STEVENSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill under consideration proposes to place on the pension-roll the names of the survivors of the Mexican war. It can be regarded only in the light of an act of tardy justice by a grateful nation to the men whose bravery gave us both victory and empire. Before any gentleman upon this floor shall cast his vote against this bill, it will be well for him to remember the services rendered by the men who ask this small pittance at our hands. It will be well for him to remember the extent and value of that grand domain which their valor achieved.

At the close of the war with Mexico, in 1848, there were but twenty-nine States in our Federal Union. By the treaty of peace with that republic we acquired a domain larger than our entire territorial area half a century ago. California, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, Wyoming, Arizona, and New Mexico, with their untold wealth, became a part of our national domain by the bravery of our volunteer soldiery.

It is even yet, Mr. Speaker, impossible fully to realize the value of our acquisition from Mexico. By it more than nine hundred thousand square miles were added to our territorial area. Out of that vast domain already have sprung California, Nevada, and Colorado, whose golden stars have been added to our constellation of States. How many others may be carved from the Territories of Wyoming, Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico before another decade shall have passed? As one of the results of our war with Mexico our domain was extended from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific. In the rich mining regions, among the mountain forests and along the fertile valley of the States and Territories I have mentioned, how many thousands of our people have found homes and fortunes?

For near a third of a century a constant stream of population from the older States and from Europe has poured into this vast western domain, until what was then a wilderness has become the abode of civilized man. It is no mere figure of speech to say that "the desert has been made to blossom as the rose." But sir, in the future, how many millions of our race will find habitations in that vast area embraced in our Mexican acquisition? It has been estimated that more than eighteen hundred millions of the precious metals have been taken from the mines of the territory acquired by our Government from Mexico. Not only has this sum been added to our material wealth, but this industry is but yet in its infancy. With new discoveries of treasure yet to be made, with resources yet to be developed, who can estimate the value of this acquisition? It was well said by the eloquent Senator from Indiana, Mr. VOORHEES:

Such a conquest of far-reaching boundaries, and of present and future wealth, power, and glory as was made by their arms has, perhaps, no parallel in human history. The ephemeral conquests of Alexander the Great, in the East, the subjugation of extensive portions of Europe by Cæsar, and afterward by Napoleon, the Norman conquest of England by William the Conqueror, none of these achievements were equal in their effects upon the progress of the world to those which were accomplished by the war between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. Speaker, the purchase of the Louisiana territory by President Jefferson, in 1803, is one of the marked events in our history. His fame would be secure if it rested upon that achievement alone. It opened up the world's highway to our commerce. No less important was the acquisition which has given us golden treasures inexhaustible, domain almost without limit, and made ours literally an ocean-bound Republic.

It is on behalf of the men who achieved these wonderful results, who gave us treasure and empire, who gave victory to our arms, that I make this appeal. Of their valor I need not speak. Their sacrifices and achievements, with the splendid results which have followed, are safely garnered up in history.

Near a third of a century has passed since the close of the Mexican war. Of the soldiers and sailors who rendered service in that struggle, less than eight thousand are now living. Their comrades, either in the shock of battle, wearied by the march through the burning sands or wasted by disease, have fallen.

On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread.

Many of the survivors are poor, some of them in actual want. The cost to the Government of placing the names of these survivors on the pension-roll, giving them at least a moiety of comfort for the residue of their lives, will be but little, certainly a pittance, when contrasted with the value of the services they so freely gave their country in its hour of peril.

Mr. Speaker, the Legislatures of more than one-half of the States of this Union have adopted resolutions urging upon Congress the passage of a bill similar to the one now pending. Among that number is the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. The voice of that great State should be heard upon this bill, for upon no page of history stands the record of heroism more illustrious than that of Shields, Baker, Bissell, Hardin, and their comrades upon the battle-fields of Mexico.

Colonel Bissell, while the incumbent of the chief executive office of the State he honored and loved, fell a victim to disease contracted in Mexico. John J. Hardin, "the bravest of the brave," died with Clay and McKee at Buena Vista, a field where, in the language of the gifted Prentiss, "were performed deeds of valor as great as at the Pass of Renscevalles, where fell the harnessed chivalry of Spain."

The statue of Edward D. Baker, illustrious no less as a statesman than as a soldier, has been found worthy of a place in this Capitol in that hall which has been aptly called the "Walhalla," the palace of the immortals. Shields, the hero of two wars, Senator from three States, can only be forgotten when great achievements die out from the memory of men.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has pursued a liberal policy toward the defenders of our Union in the late civil conflict. What has already been accomplished is but the earnest of a more substantial meed of justice to be awarded hereafter. I trust that neither this Congress nor any which may come after it will pursue other than the most generous policy toward the defenders of our Republic. To provide for them when disabled by wound or disease, and for their families when dependent, is a sacred duty, an obligation imperative upon the Government. It should be our policy so clearly defined that all men may read, that he who perils life in defense of this Government is henceforth under its guardian care.

I have, sir, upon more occasions than one urged upon this House the passage of the bill providing for the organization of a commission to the end that applicants for pensions may have an early disposition of their cases. This will prevent vexatious delay, delay which has become intolerable. I had the honor at the beginning of this session to introduce a bill for the equalization of the bounties of Union soldiers, which, I trust, may become a law before this Congress shall expire.

But, sir, while we are doing justice to the defenders of our Union in its late conflict, let us not forget the debt of gratitude we owe to the few survivors of that gallant little army whose prowess a third of a century ago gave glory to our arms and added an empire to our national domain.

Interstate Commerce.

SPEECH OF HON. E. B. FINLEY,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 1, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4748) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce.

Mr. FINLEY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the object and purpose of this legislation? Is it to regulate commerce among the States of this Union? Certainly not. What State is interfering, by legislation or otherwise, with the commerce of another State? What State has interdicted or obstructed the transportation of imports across its boundaries? None; for I concede had this been done Congress has plenary power under the Constitution to prevent and protect one State against the unwarrantable interference and obstruction of the imports of another. It is not claimed that this state of affairs exists; but it is proposed by this legislation for the General Government to assume control of and regulate the carrying trade of private corporations and private companies, corporations and companies that are exclusively the creatures of State legislation. A railroad company is as much the creature of State legislation as a bridge company, a manufacturing company, or any other corporation organized under the law of any State, and so far as the management, rate of speed, or other interstate matter goes, Congress has no more power to interfere than it would have in the case of a bridge, gas, or manufacturing company.

The gentleman from Texas admitted in his remarks submitted a few days since that Congress has no power over railroads as corporations. I quote his language. He said:

So far as the power of Congress over this subject goes it is derived from the clause of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States. It has to that extent the power to regulate commerce. That power carries with it no other powers over these corporations. The Congress have no power and this committee and this bill assume no power to operate on the railroads as railroads, or upon their franchises or corporate rights. And when the committee have been asked to remedy other evils, such as the watering of stock as a pretext of levying additional tribute upon the people, we have had to meet the friends of such propositions as that with the statement that we have no power, however much we sympathize with them, to take hold of these corporations and deal with them as such, but our powers are limited alone to the regulation of commerce among the States.

But the gentleman claims that Congress has the power to regulate the transportation of freight by railroad companies from one State to another, not by virtue of any power it may have over a railroad corporation as a corporation, for he concedes it has none, but, as he says, by virtue of that clause of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce among States.

Let me put his proposition in this form:

Q. Has Congress the power to prescribe to a railroad company as a railroad corporation what price it shall charge per mile for freight or passenger traffic?

A. Certainly not. Railroad companies being the creatures of State legislation are amenable to State laws alone in the construction and management of their roads, and however much we may sympathize with those who have suffered wrongs at the hands of railroad companies, we have no power to take hold of these corporations and deal with them as such.

Q. How, then, can Congress control this matter?

A. By virtue of the power to regulate commerce among States Congress may prescribe the rate of freights, or that a greater sum may not be charged one person than is charged another.

This is reasoning that seems to me somewhat paradoxical. Has Congress any power over corporations, companies, or individuals in the premises? I think not.

Congress in exercising its power under the Constitution to regulate commerce "among" the States deals with States as such and not with corporations within the States, nor with individuals as citizens of States. One State may not by legislation interdict or obstruct the transportation of imports over it to another State. Congress may by suitable legislation pursuant to its constitutional power to regulate commerce among the States provide against one State interferring with the commerce of another in this regard. I doubt whether the courts have gone further than to announce this principle in construing the power of Congress to regulate commerce "among" the States. That this view of the power of Congress in the premises was taken by the courts, I cite from the opinion of Mr. Justice Catron in what is known as the license cases, (5 Howard, 504–509.)

He says:

The power given to Congress is unrestricted and broad as the subject to which it relates. It extends to all lawful commerce with foreign nations and in the same terms to all lawful commerce "among the States," and "among" means between two only as well as among more than two. If it was otherwise then an intermediate State might interdict and obstruct the transportation of imports over it to a third State and thereby impair the general power.

It will be observed in the foregoing opinion the court speaks of foreign nations, not foreign corporations, and also of States, not corporations or individuals doing business within States. I cannot, therefore, from the opinion of the court, draw the conclusion, as does the gentleman from Texas, "that Congress has the exclusive power to pass laws providing for equality in rates of freight to be paid by different owners of property to be carried by railroads or other common carriers in commerce between different States or with foreign nations. This point is directly made by the Supreme Court in the case of Railroad Company vs. Richmond, decided October term, 1873, and reported in 19 Wallace, 584. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

The power to regulate commerce among the several States was vested in Congress in order to secure equality and freedom in commercial intercourse against discriminating State legislation. It was never intended that the power should be exercised so as to interfere with private contracts not designed at the time they were made to create impediments to such intercourse.

The gentleman from Texas in his remarks on this measure quoted from the opinion of the court in the Daniel Ball case, reported in 10 Wallace, 557, and relies upon that authority in sustaining his position. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the court in that case pronounced wholly upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce on navigable waters, and did not touch the point made in this case, to wit, the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce when carried on by land transportation.

The court expressly makes a distinction in the following language. The court say:

It is said that if the position here asserted be sustained there is no such thing as the domestic trade of a State; that Congress may take the entire control of the commerce of the country and extend its regulations to the railroads within a State on which grain or fruit is transported to a distant market.

We answer that the present case relates to transportation on the navigable waters of the United States, and we are not called upon to express an opinion upon the power of Congress over interstate commerce when carried on by land transportation.

Again, the gentleman cites as authority the State freight-tax case reported in 15 Wallace, 232–275. In that case the court goes no further than to speak of the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, in the sense that I construe that clause of the Constitution.

The court say:

A power to prevent embarrassing restrictions by any State was the thing desired.

If the main portion of the extensive claims for nearly unbridled authority are recognized, notwithstanding the strong reasons adduced against extravagant pretensions of this character, it can scarcely be doubted that there would be considerable difference in regard to the completeness of the application to different lines of an important new congressional law, analogous to the similar discrepancy which exists in the application of any State laws bearing on railway subjects, to the railway lines within the respective States. It does not seem to be seriously questioned in any important quarter that the principle should still be respected, that any rights particular railway companies have acquired by their charters shall be construed as a contract, which each of the States and the nation at large must respect.

It is entirely possible and quite probable that a stringent new interstate-commerce bill would contain provisions which some of the railway lines of the country would be theoretically bound to obey, because the charters or franchises they have heretofore obtained from the States they traverse are not sufficiently comprehensive to insure protection against such prospective new legislation, while other railway companies in the same States could find in their charters or other franchises, obtained at more propitious periods or under more favorable circumstances, a strong bulwark of defense against any obnoxious new law passed by Congress, just as they can now obtain such protection against obnoxious new laws passed by the States they traverse. If this supposition is correct, it would follow that an interstate-commerce bill, similar to that which the gentleman from Texas proposes, would be constitutional and enforceable as against some of the railway lines of the country, while it would neither be constitutional nor enforceable as against other railway lines; and such a state of affairs would make inextricable confusion and work great practical injustice to many of the existing railway corporations. It is of the utmost importance, if Congress concludes to enter upon a new field of regulating railway operations, that inequality in the bearing of any laws it may pass upon different companies should be avoided with the utmost care, and this necessity constitutes in itself a very strong reason for carefully abstaining from the exercise of any doubtful powers or of passing any congressional enactment applicable to railways which would be likely to be enforceable against one set of companies, while another set were relieved by their charters or franchises from the scope of its operations.

It is rather a curious fact that in the elaborate argument made by the gentleman from Texas in his report, dated February 26, 1878, to show the constitutionality of such legislation as he proposes, nearly all of his citations of authority and the main weight of his reasoning tends to prove that Congress has the right to exercise a power which in its nature would be nearly the reverse of the sort of power he wishes to exercise. In other words, he quotes various decisions, &c., to justify the conclusion that in case railway companies charge higher rates for transporting through freight from one of their boundary lines to another boundary line than the contemporaneous charge for local service, then Congress would have a right to pass a law prohibiting such discriminations against interstate movements. He can find plenty of authorities to strengthen such a position, and there are fair grounds for the inference that the clause in the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate commerce was intended to prevent any one State from using unfair methods to give to its own citizens commercial advantages from which the citizens of other States were debarred, but one of the main objects or tendencies of the gentleman's bill is to throw impediments in the way of interstate commercial movements.

This is the most rational interpretation that can be placed upon the clause of this bill, which prohibits railway companies from charging lower freights for a long distance than are charged for a relatively short distance, and one of the most vital elements of the entire anti-discrimination agitation which the gentleman represents is antagonism to the through cheap movements by which interstate commerce has been promoted to an extraordinary extent. The gist of the gentleman's argument is, that because Congress has the power to build up, it has therefore the power to tear down and destroy; and this conclusion is scarcely logical. His theory may be summed up in some such declaration as this: "I have proved that Congress has the power to prevent the railways of any State from charging higher rates for through freight than they charge for local business, therefore I claim the right to pass a bill which practically means that local rates shall be nearly or quite as low as those imposed on through freight." Perhaps this declaration is a trifle too broadly stated as against the gentleman from Texas, but it certainly describes his position with approximate fairness, and points out a very weak if not an untenable feature of his argument in favor of the constitutionality of such enactments as he advocates.

It is very doubtful whether the framers of the Constitution ever intended, when they gave Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States, that that body should ever enter upon such a delicate and complicated mission as the regulation of rates of transportation. In effect, this bill attempts this extraordinary task, and in that respect at least it enters upon a domain of legislation of which no man can see the end, but which is manifestly fruitful of disaster, corruption, the worst forms of centralization, and the establishment of restrictions and regulations that in many instances would expose many of the inhabitants of the United States to exceedingly vexatious annoyances and inconveniences.

Some years ago when General Lewis Cass was minister to Paris, he wrote an article for the Democratic Review, describing the extent to which centralization had been carried in France, and one of the illustrations he gave of the inconveniences attending this excessive centralization was, that a man could not start a new grist or flour mill in a remote rural district without due application and protracted delay in consequence of the obstructions to be encountered in running the gauntlet of a governmental department at Paris.

If all the freight movements of this country are to be so confined that no item in a schedule can be changed, as the gentleman proposes, for some considerable period after they are first announced, and if the lumbermen in our dense forests, the miners in our new gold and silver districts, the stock-raisers and cattle-dealers on our frontiers, and all the manufacturers, farmers, and merchants of the country must wait for each one of the innumerable transactions they are engaged in which hinge on prompt and speedy freight movements, or on desirable modifications of old freight schedules, or the action of some central authority at Washington, we will soon have such inconveniences as formerly attended the establishment of a new mill in France, duplicated in hundreds of thousands of forms, and we will have millions of American citizens rising up to curse the day when any such folly as the bill under consideration was ever countenanced by the representatives of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, one of the strongest objections to such legislation as is contemplated by the bill under consideration hinges on the fact that it proposes to apply, for the first time in the legislative history of the country, novel and important restrictions or regulations to one of the most vital interests of the United States, without preceding this legislation by the exhaustive inquiry into the subject acted upon and industries likely to be affected that prudence and justice demand.

It would require a great deal of space to describe minutely all the considerations bearing upon this point. An attempt will only be made here to briefly sketch a few of the most obvious, namely:

a. Such precipitate action is either contrary to the experience of other countries, or, in cases where rash steps have been taken, they have proved to be so injurious that popular sentiment quickly demanded a repeal of the statutes, which were speedily shown by experience to be inimical to the general welfare.

The result of protracted discussions and investigations in England of railway problems similar to those under consideration in this country was a settled conclusion that it would be exceedingly unwise to adopt meddlesome and restrictive legislation, and that the railway question had better be left to settle itself, except in matters of obvious and undoubted public importance; and that meanwhile a commission endowed with temporary authority and limited powers should exercise a supervision over railway affairs, which has proved to be slight and of such a character that it does little more than crystallize public sentiment in antagonism to any specially obnoxious proceeding on the part of railway companies.

The conclusion of protracted parliamentary discussions, followed by one of the most exhaustive examinations that a parliamentary commission could make of the entire workings of the English railway system, is stated as follows in the work published a few years ago by Charles Francis Adams, jr.:

The natural development of the railroad system as a system was recognized, and the folly of restrictive legislation demonstrated. A new policy was thus established, at the base of which was the principle of private ownership and management, which was to be left to work out its own destiny through that process of combination in which competing monopolies always result. The members of the committee saw perfectly clearly where their process of reasoning would bring them out. It could result only in a tacit assent to the growth of private corporations until they become so great that they must, soon or late, assume relations to the Government corresponding with the public nature of their functions. This was obvious enough. Meanwhile the committee also saw with equal clearness that this was a question of the future—perhaps of the remote future; a question which certainly had not yet presented itself, and which they had no disposition to precipitate. They accordingly fixed definitely the policy of Great Britain as an expectant one. The railroad system was to be left to develop itself in its own way, as a recognized monopoly, held to a strict public accountability as such. Whenever it should appear that it abused its privileges and power, then the time for action would have arrived. As yet this was not the case in any such degree as called for a decisive and far-reaching measure of reform. To better watch over it meanwhile, and to cause its members to work with less friction among themselves and with a more careful regard to the equal rights of private persons, an exceptional piece of governmental machinery was provided in the form of a board of commissioners. The powers of this tribunal were both judicial and executive in character and very broad. It was its duty not only to hear all complaints of private parties, but to intervene in cases of difficulty which might arise between the companies themselves. The board was in fact designed to insure to the community an easy and equitable interchange of traffic over its railroad lines, as well as to put a stop in so far as might be practicable to that unjust and vexatious system of discrimination which seems to be inseparable from all active railroad competition. Through this board the exceptional character of the railroad system was at last recognized. An attempt was made to deal with the anomaly as an anomaly. Meanwhile the most noticeable feature in the career of the board, which has now been in existence five years, is the very trifling call which seems to have been made upon it. So far as can be judged from its annual reports, the cases which come before it are neither numerous nor of great importance.

The experience of the States belonging to this Union that have passed specially restrictive laws bearing on railway operations may be summed up in the statement that such laws have either never been strictly enforced or quickly repealed; or, in the cases where they are still on the statute-books, and persistent attempts are made to enforce them, they cause great dissatisfaction and affect adversely many important interests.

The first Wisconsin and Minnesota laws were quickly repealed. The Missouri law restricting railway operations has inflicted great injury upon a number of the citizens and interests of that State, and similar injuries have been inflicted or are now threatened by laws of Georgia, Alabama, and other States.

A few of the many facts illustrating this statement are mentioned in the following extract from the Railway World of December 18, 1880:

ANTI-RAILWAY LEGISLATION IN THE WESTERN STATES.

The railroad commissioner of Wisconsin, Hon. A. J. Turner, in a recent reply to a letter of inquiry addressed to him by a citizen of Alabama, made several interesting statements relating to the practical operation of the Potter law and subsequent enactments intended to regulate railway operations in Wisconsin. Of the Potter law the writer states that while its constitutionality was being tested, and finally sustained, it "soon appeared that it was unjust in some of its minor features and impracticable in others," and that, in consequence of these discoveries, the original Potter law was repealed and a new law passed in 1876. Since the adoption of this enactment there has been little or no litigation relating to rates, and no formal complaint of extortions, but a number of complaints of discrimination have been made, nearly every one of which has been overruled on the ground that the words "for like service" in the existing statutes "defeats almost every complaint, for it so happens that service at different times and for different persons is very rarely 'like service.'" The Wisconsin commissioner also makes the following interesting suggestions:

"I have been much impressed with the views of Thomas P. Shinn, an experienced railroad man, as to tariffs, &c. He holds that a railroad company should be left free to adopt its own rates, but entire publicity should be given to those rates, by posting printed notices in every warehouse and station, and that the company should not permit any deviation in those charges, taking either more or less, until they had established and published a new tariff. He makes a very strong argument in support of his position."

At a recent meeting of the Farmers' Board of Trade of Minnesota an address was delivered by Hon. W. R. Marshall, the railway commissioner of that State, in which, after referring to a law passed for the regulation of railroad rates of transportation in 1871, which he said had proved to be a failure, and also referring to the law of 1874, which remained in force only one year, when it was repealed, he stated that the existing law was enacted and that "the rates at present charged by the railroads were less than those fixed by the law of 1871, which was found to be inoperative and was never enforced." He added that he believed that under its provisions "the railroads were endeavoring to deal fairly with the people," and, referring to a communication complaining of some of their charges, he declared that its statements were exaggerations, and that while "it might be true that there were seasons when the railroads were prosperous, it should not be forgotten that they also passed through periods of depression, which carried them into bankruptcy."

And also in the following extracts from same paper of January 1, 1881:

We find in current discussions of the restrictive legislation of various States frequent references to the injurious effects of inappropriate laws. For instance, the superintendent of one of the Alabama railroads, referring to the laws of that State, describes a provision that requires a certain relation between local and through rates which has had the effect of making the rates for short distances absurdly low, "while the rates between the two termini are so high as to bar the interchange of traffic between the two terminal cities."

In commenting on this and other provisions which do not confer substantial benefits upon any class, while they seriously injure various business interests, the writer forcibly says that "general laws do not cure specific evils. When the effort is made for them to do so they will surely demonstrate the truth of the simile of the cannon-ball that may hit the target at which it is set, but plays havoc in an unknown track beyond."

Many complaints are made of the laws now in force in Missouri as administered by the railway commissioners of that State. An attempt to regulate rates and to classify freight has worked so disastrously that the Saint Louis Railway Register declares that "the only success attained is the crushing out of the smaller roads and the driving of all railroad capital out of the State as far as new enterprises are concerned."

Another point recently made in connection with the discussion of this subject is, that none of the stringent State laws passed for the purpose of instituting drastic checks on railway operations and reducing charges have proved half as effective in accomplishing these objects as the various commercial and competitive influences which have secured for the interstate travel and traffic of the country a wonderful and unprecedented decrease in the average rate of charges for railway service, accompanied by a very marked increase in accommodations. In other words, the travel and traffic that has hitherto been subjected in the slighest degree to legislative control is now conducted, to an exceptional extent, in the manner best calculated to promote the interests of the passengers who wish to journey from one State into another, and of the transporters who wish to forward freight over long lines extending through various Commonwealths. One of the important reasons for this distinction may be found in the fact that in the absence of appropriate legislation for the regulation of interstate traffic many leading railway managers have united in various progressive efforts to devise and put in force such systems as were best calculated to meet successive emergencies, and to insure adequate provision for all the requirements of interstate traffic.

The nature of the labors performed by railroads renders it specially imprudent and hazardous to adopt any legislation that would seriously interfere with or retard their operations.

If a bill was seriously pressed in Congress which aimed at prescribing by law how much wheat, cotton, or corn should be raised, or what price should be demanded for any of the products of the country, or how any of the manufacturing or agricultural industries should be conducted, it would not require much argument to convince the representatives of the American people that before such a bill was passed, exhaustive inquiries should be made into the probable effects of its enforcement.

Reasons equally strong demand that similar inquiries should precede drastic railway legislation. To enforce this view it may be worth while to consider what a railway is and what it does, examining these matters from the stand-point of writers on political economy, inasmuch as great confusion has arisen from the supposition that instead of the railway being one of many working producers of the country, it actually or approximately was in antagonism to all the other producers. The fact that railways, abstractly considered, form a very important division of the army of producers, and belong to that class, (instead of being tax-gatherers,) is made tolerably clear in the following extract from the Railway World of June 5, 1880:

RAILWAYS NOT TAX-GATHERERS BUT PRODUCERS.

In an article on the railway problem, contributed to the April number of the National Quarterly Review by Simon Stern, he says that "it is high time that the people of this country should recognize the fact that freight charges are in the nature of taxes." This allegation has been so often made in various quarters that it has become one of the favorite weapons of the anti-railway agitators.

It is an essential element of a tax that it should be a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of the citizen by a government for public use. If the word is used in any other sense it can be applied to any expenditure with quite as much propriety as to freight charges, and when such a latitudinarian meaning is adopted the phrase ceases to have an offensive application or to possess any special pertinency whatever in connection with the discussion of the railway problem. There is another and still stronger reason why freight charges cannot in any proper sense be considered a tax in any odious acceptation of that term. It hinges on the fact that the railway in transporting freight performs one of the most useful and indispensable functions of production, and it would be as absurd to say that the money paid for wheat or cotton is a tax as to declare that the charge imposed for moving freight is a tax. This assertion is fully sustained by the highest authorities on political economy.

John Stuart Mill, in defining production, states that its requisites are "labor and appropriate natural objects;" that labor in the physical world "is always and solely employed in putting objects in motion; the properties of matter, the laws of nature do the rest. * * * This one operation of putting things into fit places, and being acted upon by their own internal forces and by those residing in other natural objects is all that man can do with matter. He only moves one thing to or from another. He moves a seed into the ground and the natural forces of vegetation produce in succession a root, a stem, leaves, flowers and fruit." Mr. Mill shows, by a number of illustrations, that transportation, of one kind or another, lies at the root of all production; and if you take away from men's labors that portion which consists in the movement of various inanimate objects from one point to another, there would be absolutely nothing productive left.

But it is not merely on these speculative theories that we cite Mill as an authority for the classification of railways as important agents of production, because, in a specific enumeration of the various classes of agents engaged in production, he distinctly enumerates transporters in the following extract:

"There is a very great amount of labor employed, not in bringing the product into existence, but in rendering it, when in existence, accessible to those for whose use it is intended. Many important classes of laborers find their sole employment in some function of this kind. There is, first, the whole class of carriers, by land or water, muleteers, wagoners, bargemen, sailors, wharfmen, coal-heavers, porters, railway establishments, and the like. Next, there are the constructors of all the implements of transport; ships, barges, carts, locomotives, &c., to which must be added roads, canals, and railways."

The American authors on political economy, although differing widely on many topics from the English writers, substantially agree with Mr. Mill in reference to the point under discussion.

Dr. William Elder, in "Questions of the Day, Economic and Social," published in 1871, says: "Change of form, including a change of properties and change of place, are both included in the word production. Ore or coal or lime delivered at the pit's mouth are produced. The ore and coal and lime being put through the furnace, iron, by change of form, is produced. The iron transported to a distant market is there, by change of place, produced. By the change of form utility is subserved; by the change of place use is effected."

Henry C. Carey, in his work on the principles of political economy published in 1837, also enunciates doctrines which distinctly rank transporters as producers. After saying that "to produce may therefore be defined to be to occasion an alteration in the condition of existing particles of matter, by which that matter may be rendered more useful or agreeable than in its present state," he proceeds to illustrate this doctrine by showing who can be classed as producers of tea grown in the interior of China, and subsequently consumed in New York or Liverpool, and he classes among these producers "the persons employed in its transportation," and "the master and sailors of the vessel by which it is transported" from the place where it is grown to the place where it is consumed.

The direct influence exercised by railways in stimulating production and in rendering available natural resources of immense magnitude is particularly noticeable in the United States. A very large proportion of the agricultural and mining districts of this country owe their very existence as important centers of production to the extension of railways. The system of land-grant railways has been organized on this theory with results of marked importance. They have hastened the occupation and cultivation of new lands, and there are to-day millions of citizens living on homesteads in the young Territories and States who would never have sought their present locations and never developed the latent resources of the soil they are now tilling if railways had not established the convenient existing systems of transportation. This process is continually progressing in conjunction with the analogous movement of steadily reducing the average rates for moving freight per ton per mile, as traffic accumulates and terminal facilities are improved, and each of these advancing strides has an immense influence in enlarging the effectiveness of the railway as one of the greatest of the coworkers in production.

The vast movement of agricultural produce from interior portions of this country to the seaboard and thence to foreign countries could never have assumed its present proportions without railway assistance; and in the absence of the opportunities for obtaining foreign markets which railway extensions have furnished, the most powerful of the incentives to a large proportion of the productive agricultural energy of the United States would not now exist.

In connection with the bulky metals and minerals, transportation forms as indispensable an agent of production as in the movement of agricultural staples over the long distances which usually intervene between the point of growth and the point of consumption.

Throughout the whole range of its labors as a freight carrier the true position of the railway is that of a prominent factor in the great work of production. Whatever theories may prevail on the subject this fact is always recognized when a railway is projected, and it is only forgotten or ignored when disputes spring up between various classes of producers relating to their respective shares of the sum derived from the consumer. These disputes must be settled as best they may on the merits of the questions involved in each particular discussion. What we complain of is the attempt of agitators who, like Stern, endeavor to misrepresent the nature of one of the important parties to these controversies by depicting the railway as a tax-gatherer, armed with omnipotent powers, and wielding them frequently in an arbitrary and oppressive manner, when in truth the railway is but one of a combination of producers, dependent, like its coadjutors, upon a variety of fluctuating circumstances for the amount of remuneration it receives for a given service.

If the fact that a railway is a producer, instead of an organization armed with such sweeping powers as States possess, was better understood there would probably be fewer nonsensical theories propagated in regard to the irregularities of railway charges. It is conceded that even in the matter of taxation as imposed by city, State, and national governments there is vast room for improvement, scarcely one detail being regulated in strict accordance with the requirements of good policy and absolute justice, so that if it were true that freight charges partook of the nature of taxes, and if they did not conform in all instances as strictly as is desirable to the dictates of equity, railway companies would only be committing an error analogous to that habitually practiced by the constituted authorities of this and other countries. But the railway is not a tax-gatherer; it is one of the producers; and as one of the producers it must share their fate in the matter of being dependent upon a variety of changing conditions for the remuneration it can receive for a particular service.

A portion of the business of the world is so regulated that in the absence of unexpected influences fluctuations in prices rarely occur; but in another very large portion of business, and in nearly all matters relating to the price of products, a multitude of causes are incessantly at work in raising or lowering prices. No American farmer knows to-day what price he will get for his next crop of wheat, cotton, or tobacco. No petroleum producer or coal miner can tell at what rate he may sell his coal or crude pretroleum a year hence, and if he is fully assured that there will not be the slightest difference in the cost of production, he will be loath to deprive himself of any of the benefits of a favorable change in market rates. The farmer and miner, knowing that they must suffer from excessively low prices at times when the supply greatly exceeds the demand, are always ready and eager to profit by an opposite condition of things, without reference to the cost of production

On this general subject of the charges for railway service, an article in the June number of the Bankers' Magazine states that the customers of the railways "pay as little as they can, and with an indifference which is absolute to the question whether what they pay is an adequate remuneration for the capital employed in building and maintaining the works of which they avail themselves. The rates of fares and freights upon the trunk railroads and upon all railroads are determined by competition, by the intelligent interests of the railroads themselves to establish rates which will not be so high as to reduce revenues, and by a variety of other considerations, of which the cost of the road is never one." This theory is at least partially correct, and its wide deviation from such procrustean rules for railway charges as the anti-railway agitators advocate is largely to be accounted for by the fact that the railway as one of the producers must share the vicissitudes to which they are subjected.

If railroads really are producers, (and this fact seems to be clearly established,) legislative interference with their operations which tends to retard, cripple, or diminish their labors is tantamount to waging war against the industries of the country, and such action is the crowning folly of any legislative body.

This line of thought suggests the propriety of considering the necessity of giving to railway companies enough liberty of action to insure reasonable profits for the purpose of enabling them to keep old properties in sufficiently good condition to accommodate the public, and stimulating such new construction as is desirable. Points bearing on this branch of the subject will be found in the following article from the Railway World of January 1, 1881:

While new railways are being constructed through many regions, the older lines have been making large expenditures for the purpose of improving terminal facilities and increasing their rolling-stock. During 1880 the elevator room at Chicago has been increased more than two millions of bushels. Preparations have been made for doubling the elevator capacity of Saint Louis, and important additions to the elevator capacity of Jersey City, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston have been completed or well advanced. An unusually strong disposition has been manifested to improve the railway system of the country with a degree of rapidity commensurate with the needs of a progressive people. To accomplish this great object hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended, not merely in constructing new lines of railway, but in purchasing a large number of new locomotives and cars, building depots, and providing in various ways for newly developed wants of important communities. Some of the greatest embarrassments of the year have arisen from the fact that rails, locomotives, and cars could not be procured as promptly as they were needed, mainly because many of the mills and shops of the country, which had been kept busily at work up to the panic of 1873, subsequently diminished their working capacity on account of inability to procure a sufficient number of orders to keep their establishments fully employed. The most serious complaint made against railway companies during the last few months is that their ability to move freight was not in all instances fully equal to the demand; and the communities that have experienced difficulties arising from this source keenly feel that nothing connected with the general management of railway affairs is of greater importance than the prompt and regular supply of needed facilities for transportation.

In the presence of such a well-defined want the stereotyped complaints against the railways sink into insignificance. Comparatively high charges or alleged discriminations would readily be tolerated if it was impossible to obtain without such toleration needful facilities for travel and transportation. This important fact has an obvious bearing upon current discussions of the railway problem. Whatever legislators may attempt, or however anxious they may be to protect their constituents from real or imaginary abuses, they should not forget that any steps which have a manifest tendency to check new construction in regions now destitute of railway lines, or to deprive the older companies of the means for increasing their facilities as rapidly as the wants of transporters are increased, inflict deplorable injuries upon many persons.

The prolonged agitation in many progressive communities, and in nearly all portions of the United States, of plans for obtaining the means necessary to construct new railways, which preceded the establishment of the extensive system now existing, foreshadows a corresponding necessity that has been plainly apparent during the year just closed. One of the highest missions of the railway is to meet increasing demands for transportation by a prompt increase of corresponding facilities, and when the means requisite for the accomplishment of that object cannot be obtained, either on account of adverse legislation, industrial or financial derangements, or other causes, very serious inconveniences are engendered. The theory that the mere grant of franchises to a railway company gives to the State the right to regulate, in an oppressive manner, all railway operations is evidently not well founded; but even if it were, serious attempts to exercise such arbitrary powers would, by injuring the financial condition and prospects of important companies, quickly deprive them of the power to render the best attainable service to the communities traversed by their lines.

To create a railway and maintain its efficiency it is not only necessary that it should possess the franchises commonly bestowed, but that every form of unjust interference with its operations which tends to diminish legitimate revenue and to discourage capitalists from investments in railway enterprises should be sedulously avoided. The people have scarcely less interest in the maintenance of the financial prosperity of the lines by which they are served than in the construction of the new railways which supplant common roads or water-ways. In this connection it should not be forgotten that it will generally be found that the ordinary financial and industrial stringencies are amply sufficient to keep railway profits within reasonable limits, even in the absence of absurd adverse legislation.

The relation between railway activity and public prosperity is so close that any step which militates against the former is apt to retard the latter. Several of the messages and documents sent to Congress by various branches of the Executive Departments during the last few years, and especially the reports on internal commerce, strongly indicate that the revival of American prosperity during the last few years is largely due to the cheap rates for carrying bulky produce over long routes that has made the exportation of vast quantities of our agricultural staples possible. Singularly enough, similar testimony to the magical effects of railways on a depressed and disheartened country is embraced in one of the most striking passages of the popular novel of the day—Beaconsfield's Endymion—as will be seen by the following extract from page 63 of the popular or cheap edition:

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

The condition of England at the meeting of Parliament in 1842 was not satisfactory. The depression of trade in the manufacturing districts seemed overwhelming and continued increasing during the whole of the year. A memorial from Stockport to the Queen in the spring represented that more than half the master spinners had failed, and that no less than three thousand dwelling-houses were untenanted. One-fifth of the population of Leeds were dependent on the poor-rates. The state of Sheffield was not less severe, and the blast-furnaces of Wolverhampton were extinguished. There were almost daily meetings at Liverpool, Manchester, and Leeds, to consider the great and increasing distress of the country, and to induce ministers to bring forward remedial measures; but as these were impossible, violence was soon substituted for passionate appeals to the fears or the humanity of the government. Vast bodies of the population assembled in Stalybridge and Ashton and Oldham, and marched into Manchester.

For a week the rioting was unchecked, but the government dispatched a strong military force to that city, and order was restored.

The state of affairs in Scotland was not more favorable. There were food riots in several of the Scotch towns, and in Glasgow the multitude assembled, and then commenced what they called a begging tour, but which was really a progress of not disguised intimidation. The economic crisis in Ireland was yet to come, but the whole of that country was absorbed in a harassing and dangerous agitation for the repeal of the union between the two countries.

Thus it will be seen that, though the new ministry were supported by a commanding majority in Parliament, and that, too, after a recent appeal to the country, they were not popular; it may be truly said they were even the reverse. The opposition, on the contrary, notwithstanding their discomfiture, and, on some subjects, their disgrace, were by no means disheartened, and believed that there were economical causes at work which must soon restore them to power.

The minister brought forward his revision of the tariff, which was denounced by the league as futile, and in which anathema the opposition soon found it convenient to agree. Had the minister included in his measure that "total and immediate repeal" of the existing corn laws which was preached by many as a panacea, the effect would have been probably much the same. No doubt a tariff may aggravate or may mitigate such a condition of commercial depression as periodically visits a state of society like that of England, but it does not produce it. It was produced in 1842, as it has been produced at the present time by an abuse of capital and credit, and by a degree of production which the wants of the world have not warranted.

And yet all this time there were certain influences at work in the great body of the nation, neither foreseen nor for some time recognized by statesmen and those great capitalists on whose opinion statesmen must depend, which were stirring, as it were, like the unconscious power of the forces of nature, and which were destined to baffle all the calculations of persons in authority and the leading spirits of all parties, strengthen a perplexed administration, confound a sanguine opposition, render all the rhetoric, statistics, and subscriptions of the Anti-Corn Law League fruitless and absolutely make the chartists forget the charter.

"My friends will not assist themselves by resisting the government measures," said Mr. Neuchatel, with his usual calm smile, half skeptical, half sympathetic. "The measures will do no good, but they will do no harm. There are no measures that will do any good at this moment. We do not want measures; what we want is a new channel."

That is exactly what was wanted. There was abundant capital in the country and a mass of unemployed labor. But the markets on which they had of late depended, the American especially, were overworked and overstocked, and in some instances were not only overstocked, but disturbed by war—as the Chinese, for example—and capital and labor wanted "a new channel."

The new channel came, and all the persons of authority, alike political and commercial, seemed quite surprised that it had arrived; but when a thing or a man are wanted they generally appear. One or two lines of railway, which had been long sleepily in formation, about this time were finished; and one or two lines of railway, which had been finished for some time and were unnoticed, announced dividends, and not contemptible ones. Suddenly there was a general feeling in the country that its capital should be invested in railways; that the whole surface of the land should be transformed and covered, as by a network, with these mighty means of communication. When the passions of the English, naturally an enthusiastic people, are excited on a subject of finance, their will, their determination, and resource are irresistible. This was signally proved in the present instance, for they never ceased subscribing their capital until the sum intrusted to this new form of investment reached an amount almost equal to the national debt; and this, too, in a very few years. The immediate effect on the condition of the country was absolutely prodigious. The value of land rose, all the blast-furnaces were relit; a stimulant was given to every branch of the home trade; the amount suddenly paid in wages exceeded that ever known in this country, and wages, too, at a high rate. Large portions of the laboring classes not only enjoyed comfort, but commanded luxury. All this of course soon acted on the revenue, and both customs and, especially, excise soon furnished an ample surplus.

If any additional reasons for postponing final action on this bill were needed, they would be at least partially supplied by the fact that the discussion of Mr. REAGAN'S bill before the House Committee on Commerce resulted in its defeat by that body, by a vote of 9 to 6, and in the presentation, at short notice, of so many objections to his bill that a fair consideration of these substantial grounds of antagonism would doubtless lead to its defeat by any impartial and thoroughly enlightened tribunal.

In this connection it must be remembered that there are a great variety of conflicting interests in the United States, some of which may be benefited and others injured by any new law of Congress that exercises an important influence on transportation movements. It would require much investigation to ascertain even the nature and magnitude of these jarring interests, without stopping to inquire what course Congress, in its attempt to do equal justice to all and to avoid injury to any, should take, before a drastic interstate-commerce bill is passed.

If, for instance, the bill under consideration would tend, as is probable, to greatly help the interests of the water carriers on the lakes, rivers, and Gulf by leaving them free to conduct their operations without legal restriction while the railways are bound hand and foot, the injuries resulting from this course would by no means be confined to the railway companies, but would extend to the communities traversed by their lines. Ohio has a very deep interest in this branch of this subject, inasmuch as three of the most important highways of east and west bound traffic pass through her territory, in addition to several other leading railway connections between the Eastern and Western States. Now, if trunk-line operations are crippled to such an extent that western produce is to be forced down the Mississippi or into lake channels instead of being carried over the Lake Shore, Fort Wayne, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and Saint Louis, or other great Ohio avenues of through traffic, it does not require much discernment to see that thousands of citizens of Ohio, now profitably engaged in railway service or in furnishing railway supplies, would lose their present occupation by the abandonment of the existing routes for certain classes of traffic. If, in turn, lake and river ports are to be built up by act of Congress, at the expense of towns located along interior lines which are comparatively distant from the lakes and the navigable rivers, great injustice will in that case be done to all those interior towns, and eventually to all the inhabitants of the regions traversed by the great interior lines of railway.

Ohio is specially interested in this view of the subject, partly for the reasons already stated, and partly also because her leading city, Cincinnati, has expended tens of millions of dollars in constructing the Cincinnati Southern, for the purpose of attracting traffic to Cincinnati from Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, and other Southern States. If a bill is passed by Congress which imposes material obstacles to through movements on the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, an end which can very readily be promoted by enforcing the letter and spirit of Mr. REAGAN'S bill, a great deal of injury will be inflicted on that portion of the commercial interests of Cincinnati which hinge upon the possibilities of obtaining traffic from the Southern States, and also upon the entire body of the citizens of Cincinnati, who have made themselves responsible for the cost of the Cincinnati Southern, and who will receive very little benefit or return from the increase of taxation caused by its construction if interstate-commerce movements are crippled by the Reagan bill. Ohio is also interested largely in this view of the question, namely, she is now one of the great iron and coal producing States of the Union, and on account of this position it is very important that she should have excellent facilities for sending to other States and for receiving from other States such supplies of coal, coke, and iron-ore as may be advantageously moved.

Nearly every other Commonwealth has interests which, although in many instances of less magnitude than those represented by Ohio, are equally susceptible of injury by legislation in Congress antagonistic to cheap through freight movements such as is contemplated by the Reagan bill. It is entirely within the range of possibility that the enforcement of that measure would compel, for instance, the abandonment of important industries now flourishing in the forests of Michigan, from which furniture, lumber, or timber of various kinds are now dispatched to many distant points; or that some of the Lake Superior iron mines could no longer be worked advantageously, or that some of the important factories in Central Ohio or other States should lose their present markets for a large proportion of their products. Independent of all these considerations, Congress should remember that there may be large shippers of grain or merchandise who, knowing that during an era when railway wars prevail they can generally secure rates by which they gain advantage over smaller dealers, desire the passage by Congress of a law prohibiting pooling, inasmuch as pooling takes away from railway companies the temptation to make concessions to any class of shippers, and thus it is entirely within the range of possibility that the bill under consideration would greatly benefit some half-dozen shippers of this country and inflict corresponding injuries upon thousands of their competitors in business.

In this struggling, go-ahead country, while amicable relations exist in a general sense between all sections and the representatives of all interests, it is commonly understood that nearly all our ambitious men, our ambitious cities, and our progressive interests habitually await with eagerness every opportunity by which they may advance their interests at the expense of rivals. If, as can be clearly demonstrated, this bill would enable any one city, interest, or class of interests to build itself up at the expense of any other city or interest, there is very little doubt that the ways and means of accomplishing such a result would very quickly be discerned and utilized. If, for instance, the whole trade of the Southwestern States and the great southwestern metropolis, New Orleans, could be materially benefited by congressional legislation, which would arrest the modern movement of sending the bulk of Western produce to the Atlantic seaboard, via East and West trunk lines, and again turn the tide of this traffic into the old channel down the Mississippi to New Orleans, the Southwestern States and cities and their affiliated interests could not be blamed for availing themselves of a weapon put in their hands by a congressional bill; but however just it may be for Congress to help the Southwest by improving the navigation of the Mississippi and her tributaries, it would be an outrageous act of injustice, specially prejudicial to the welfare of Ohio, to adopt legislation that would have a manifest tendency to drive back this great volume of traffic to its ancient channels after thousands of millions of dollars have been expended for the purpose of creating the extensive facilities by which the grain, live stock, and provisions of the upper portion of the Mississippi Valley are now moved to New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, and intervening points.

Any commission which thoroughly investigated this subject would doubtless discover, in addition to the interests briefly sketched here, many others of varying magnitude that would be affected disastrously or disadvantageously by this bill. It is manifestly open to the grave objection of being a sectional measure of the worst character, in the sense that it would palpably benefit some districts of the country at the expense of others; and on this ground alone any just Congress should pause before it committed the entire body of the representatives of the American people to a policy that involved the infliction of serious wrong upon any State, section, interest, or industry.

One of the results of a general prosperity of railway interests, such as was witnessed in the latter part of 1879 and 1880, is the encouragement of new railway enterprises. There are few States that profited more by this influence during 1880 than Ohio, as will be seen by statements showing the construction of new railways in that year in various portions of the United States, which place her in a leading rank. She needs many of these railways for local development, for opening up her coal mines and iron ores, for accommodating the local traffic of her flourishing agricultural districts, &c. She got an unusually large share of these railways last year, very largely because the pooling arrangements which Mr. REAGAN'S bill prohibits enabled railway companies to obtain uniform rates and thus to earn sufficient profits to pay the interest on bonded indebtedness, and to spread abroad the conviction that railway property was not inevitably destined to fall into the hands of the sheriff. If Congress passes a measure that restricts the liberty of action of railway managers, prohibits pools, and discourages low rates for long distances, it is easy to see that another era of railway disaster will be near at hand, and Ohio, in common with all other States, will find it exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to secure the means needed to establish new railway lines or to keep the facilities of old companies up to their proper standard.

The entire idea of seeking by a congressional enactment to discourage and prevent the cheap carriage of bulky traffic over long distances is exceedingly fallacious and prejudicial to American interests. Nine-tenths of all the business of this country hinges upon the possibility of effecting such movements; and with our population of fifty millions distributed over our vast territory, and discovering at points far remote from each other certain peculiarities of production or capacities of production which, for instance, make it desirable to a man living in Chicago that he should burn for domestic purposes coal mined in the anthracite fields of Pennsylvania, or make it conducive to the interest of the smelter of silver ores in Leadville that he should use coke manufactured in southwestern Pennsylvania, or teach the people of Massachusetts that it is their interest to look to States and Territories west of the Mississippi for nearly all the cereals they consume, or that impress upon the people of the North Atlantic seaboard cities the necessity of looking for their supplies of beef to cattle raised in Texas, Colorado, Nebraska, or Montana—a nation already trained to such channels of supply and movements as are here indicated, and which, in addition to gratifying its own needs in the manner indicated, sends to the outside world through its seaboard cities hundreds of millions of dollars of staples produced at points a thousand miles or more remote from points of expenditure—for such a country to attempt in her Congress to strike a blow at a system which has wrought wonders in the way of cheap transportation of bulky articles over long distances is tantamount to industrial suicide.

The doctrine of prohibiting railway companies from charging a smaller sum for a relatively long distance than they charge for a short distance is fallacious. If Congress once entered into this domain of fixing charges, no end of injustice and confusion would result. It does not require much discernment to see that beyond the stipulations contained in many of the railway charters of the country, fixing the maximum rates which they may charge, all other attempts of various States to definitely prescribe railway rates have either been wholly useless or injurious in their practical workings. When Congress engages in a similar task we can expect no better result from its labors. Besides, as a matter of fact and detail, it often happens that it costs a railway company more to transport produce for a relatively short distance than to transport a similar product over a longer distance. One notable example is given in the testimony submitted by Mr. E. D. Worcester, the secretary of the New York Central, in 1873, before the United States Senate Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard:

It is often supposed that it is always worth less to carry freight a short distance than a long. This is a very mistaken notion. I could, to speak within bounds, mention a hundred cases in which it cost, and is actually worth, considerably more to carry property a shorter distance than a longer. In an investigation once had before the New York Legislature there was one case presented: A man had two or three loads of cattle to ship from a point fifteen or twenty miles this side of Buffalo, and he was charged the full Buffalo rate, of which he complained. The fact was, however, that it was, under the circumstances, worth more to haul his cattle from that point than it would have been to haul them from Buffalo. The reason, when stated, will be apparent. Buffalo is a point of accumulation, where the cattle business is steady; all empty cars go to Buffalo; all the complete arrangements for doing that business are there. We have our yards, our cattle-men, our loading conveniences, and everything accessory to doing the business at that point efficiently and economically. The cars that this man's cattle would need at the point this side would either have to be left off a train going up by special arrangement, involving the stopping of the train expressly to leave them, or else they would have to be hauled away empty from Buffalo to his place and stop, and a stop made to leave them. Take these considerations, and the loading being an exceptional thing at that place, without conveniences therefor, and the company could better have afforded to take even a less amount from Buffalo.

Suppose property were offered at a point where there was no station, would it not be easier to take it at the nearest station, even although it might be, say, ten or fifteen miles more haul. And that is the case between different stations, the steadiness of business and the consequent conveniences and arrangement affecting the question. I have stated the general rules applicable to local rates. There are cases, other than the kind just spoken of, in which what are called discriminations are made by a reduction in the nature of a concession to the shippers, and owing to circumstances peculiar to each. For instance, a man has a manufactory or a mill, and business is dull. The price of his particular product at the time happens to be a little depressed. He says: "I cannot well afford, if at all, to send this to market at the full rate which you are charging." We may, perhaps, happen to have cars to move empty from his place, or to enable business, which may afford a better price by and by, to be kept alive, and we make a concession or a special rate to him. As compared with some other place, this may look like discrimination; but all the discrimination I ever knew of grew out of considerations of a somewhat similar nature.

JUN 10 19